Garnett v. Undercover Officer C0039, 838 F.3d 265, 268, 274-80 & n.6 (2d Cir. 2016) ("In Ricciuti, we held that, even if there is probable cause to arrest a defendant, an officer who subsequently fabricates that defendant's confession 'and forwards that information to prosecutors ... violates the accused's constitutional right to a fair trial, and the harm occasioned by such an unconscionable action is redressable in an action for damages under 42 U.S.C. § 1983.'. . This case calls for us to consider whether Ricciuti requires the same result when the fabricated information at issue is the officer's own account of his or her observations of alleged criminal activity which he or she conveys to prosecutors. We hold that it does. . . .The instant case presents this court with an important legal question: whether Ricciuti's holding—that a Section 1983 plaintiff may sue for denial of the right to a fair trial based on a police officer's fabrication of information—applies when the information fabricated is the officer's own account of his or her observations of alleged criminal activity, which he or she then conveys to a prosecutor. We answer that question in the affirmative, while emphasizing the essential limiting principles encompassed by the Ricciuti standard. . . . Ricciuti's reasoning applies as much to a situation where, as here, the falsified information was the officer's account, conveyed to prosecutors, of what he heard the defendant say or do during the alleged offense, as it did in Ricciuti, where the officer was describing what he heard the defendant say during an interview after his arrest. UC 39 makes two arguments against relying on Ricciuti. First, UC 39 argues that Ricciuti does not control this case because Ricciuti addressed only whether qualified immunity was available to police officers who willfully fabricated evidence, rather than the merits of Ricciuti's denial of the right to a fair trial claim. . . Second, UC 39 argues that falsification of evidence has always been addressed under the auspices of false arrest and malicious prosecution claims under the Fourth Amendment. UC 39 maintains that application of a denial of the right to a fair trial claim to falsified evidence would upset the balance between liability and probable cause developed in Fourth Amendment jurisprudence. On the first point, UC 39 is incorrect that Ricciuti's holding is limited to the question of immunity. In Ricciuti, the panel held that fabrication of evidence violated a 'clearly established constitutional right[ ]' and thus the officers were not entitled to qualified immunity. . . Thus, in order to find that the officers were not entitled to qualified immunity, the panel necessarily also held that the officers' conduct in fabricating Ricciuti's supposed 'confession' violated a clearly established constitutional right, the right to a fair trial. . . .Whether this right is rooted in the Sixth Amendment or Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments, or both, is an issue we need not decide because the constitutional harm resulting from the falsified information at issue is in any event redressable in an action for damages under 42 U.S.C. § 1983. . . .In short, a Section 1983 claim for the denial of a right to a fair trial based on an officer's provision of false information to prosecutors can stand even if the officer had probable cause to arrest the Section 1983 plaintiff. . . .First, claims alleging the denial of a right to a fair trial based on fabricated information are redressable under the Constitution, regardless of which constitutional provision provides the basis for the claim—'[c]ertain wrongs affect more than a single right and, accordingly, can implicate more than one of the Constitution's commands.'. . .Second, probable cause, which is a Fourth Amendment concept, should not be used to immunize a police officer who violates an arrestee's non-Fourth Amendment constitutional rights. . . .Third and lastly, any limitation of false information allegations to false arrest and malicious prosecution claims would ignore the collateral consequences that are associated with fabricated information even if the officer had probable cause for the initial arrest. . . .Although we hold that any information fabricated by an officer can serve as the basis of a claim for a denial of the right to a fair trial, we acknowledge concerns raised by the City of New York ("City") about attaching liability for false information to an officer's account of his or her own observations of an alleged criminal activity giving rise to an arrest. For example, the City posits that an affirmance of Ricciuti would lead to the retrial of every unsuccessful state prosecution as a federal Section 1983 action and would turn an individual's resentment at being prosecuted into allegations of fabrication against police officers. The City cautions that such retrials would impose burdens on society by chilling the work of honest officers and by diverting energy away from general policing and towards defensive litigation. This court does not take those concerns lightly. Nonetheless, the City's proposed distinction between fabricated testimony about what an officer claims to have seen during a 'buy and bust' and fabricated testimony about a purported confession is incoherent. The court's holding in Ricciuti covers 'false information,'. . . not merely false information about confessions. The information fabricated by Lieutenant Wheeler in Ricciuti, exactly like the fabricated information at issue here, is nothing more or less than a false account of something the officer claimed to have seen or heard the defendant say, which he forwarded to prosecutors and to which he would be expected to testify at trial. That the officer here fabricated testimony about what he heard in a bodega, rather than what he heard in a police station during an interview, cannot conceivably make a difference. Having considered the City's policy arguments, we find that the standard outlined in Ricciuti places appropriate limitations on the availability of a claim for denial of the right to a fair trial based on fabrication of information by a police officer which serve to address the City's fears. As the jury was properly instructed here, the standard in Ricciuti restricts fair trial claims based on fabrication of information to those cases in which an (1) investigating official (2) fabricates information (3) that is likely to influence a jury's verdict, (4) forwards that information to prosecutors, and (5) the plaintiff suffers a deprivation of life, liberty, or property as a result. . . In order to succeed on a claim for a denial of the right to a fair trial against a police officer based on an allegation that the officer falsified information, an arrestee must prove by a preponderance of the evidence that the officer created false information, the officer forwarded the false information to prosecutors, and the false information was likely to influence a jury's decision. . . These requirements all provide necessary limits on the reach of a denial of a fair trial claim based on false information. In particular, the requirements that the information be both false and likely to influence a jury's decision constrain the types of information that can serve as the basis for a denial of the right to a fair trial claim. Ricciuti has been the law for nearly twenty years, without the dire results that the City predicts from the perfectly routine application of its principles to the facts here. Experience thus suggests that the limiting principles of Ricciuti have proven effective to date in restricting claims for a denial of the right to a fair trial against police officers on the basis of false information. The court thus embraces the limiting principles inherent in the Ricciuti standard while affirming that Ricciuti's holding applies to falsified information contained in an officer's account of his or her observations of alleged criminal activity which he or she conveys to prosecutors.")

Vill. of Freeport v. Barrella, 814 F.3d 594, 609 & n.57 (2d Cir. 2016) ("[W]e reject Hardwick's qualified-immunity argument, which contends—rather incredibly—that it was 'objectively reasonable' for him to believe in 2010 that federal law did not forbid discrimination based on Hispanic ethnicity. . . . This case presents many knotty legal and factual issues. For purposes of qualified immunity, however, the question is simple. The jury found that Hardwick appointed Bermudez rather than Barrella because the former was 'a White person of Hispanic origin' and the latter was 'a White person of Italian origin.'. .Would a reasonable official in Hardwick's position have known that such intentional discrimination against non-Hispanic whites violated Barrella's rights under federal antidiscrimination law?[57] [fn 57 Importantly, Hardwick does not argue that the law was not clearly established with respect to when intentional racial discrimination might be permissible. For instance, he does not claim that he gave preference to a Hispanic as part of an arguably lawful affirmative-action program, or that he was attempting to appeal to Hispanic voters. . . Accordingly, we consider qualified immunity with respect to 'unjustified' racial discrimination only.] The answer is plainly yes. As Hardwick acknowledges, a right is clearly established if 'the Supreme Court or the Second Circuit has recognized the right.'. .Under that standard, it has been clear since the Reagan Administration that § 1981 bars employers from discriminating based on Hispanic ethnicity or lack thereof. . . Indeed, defendants manage to obscure the clarity of established law only by failing to cite Albert v. Carovano in any of the four briefs they collectively submitted, despite the District Court's citation of that case in its opinions below. . . The most charitable reading of Hardwick's assertion of qualified immunity is that the law was unsettled with respect to Title VII. But Title VII is irrelevant to Hardwick's personal liability, which stems solely from § 1981. . . And in any event, it has long been obvious under Title VII that employers may not discriminate based on Hispanic ethnicity, even if it has not hitherto been clearly established that such discrimination would constitute discrimination on the basis of race. . . In short, we conclude that the District Court correctly denied defendants' pre-and post-verdict motions for judgment as a matter of law pursuant to Rule 50.")

Mangino v. Inc. Vill. of Patchogue, 808 F.3d 951, 953, 956-59 & n.10 (2d Cir. 2015) ("The principal question presented is whether, in August 2005, there was a clearly established right to be free from abuse of process under New York law even where probable cause existed. We conclude that there was not. . . . 'The existence of probable cause will defeat ... a First Amendment claim that is premised on the allegation that defendants prosecuted a plaintiff out of a retaliatory motive, in an attempt to silence [him].' Fabrikant v. French, 691 F.3d 193, 215 (2d Cir.2012); see also Hartman v. Moore . . . . Here, as the District Court correctly found, . . . probable cause existed with respect to each of the criminal summonses issued to Mangino. . . . We turn next to Mangino's argument that the District Court erred in dismissing his abuse-of-process claim, which dismissal we also review de novo. . . The basis for this dismissal was the District Court's determination that Nudo was entitled to qualified immunity because, under New York law, 'although there was a clearly established right to be free from malicious abuse of process at the time of the alleged conduct'—that is, in August 2005—'it was not clearly established that such a claim [could] exist even when probable cause existed for the issuance of the [summonses].'. . . We agree. There has been considerable confusion within our Circuit regarding whether probable cause is a complete defense to a claim of abuse of process under New York law. . . . We need not, and do not, resolve this confusion here, as its very existence establishes that Nudo is entitled to qualified immunity. . . .This appeal 'presents the legal possibility that law, which may have once been clear [for purposes of qualified immunity], can become unclear later.'. . Which is to say, it may be the case that, under this Circuit's interpretation of New York law, the existence of a right to be free from abuse of process even where probable cause existed was incontrovertible in 1963, when Weiss was decided, but had been called into question by 1988, when PSI Metals was decided, or 2005, when the alleged conduct occurred. No matter-'[t]he nature of the law is not always to move from unsettled to settled. Although one of our decisions may not be expressly overruled, later cases ... may bring its reasoning or holding into such doubt that the elements set out in the case are no longer clearly established....'").

Morse v. Fusto, 804 F.3d 538, 547, 550 (2d Cir. 2015) ("Notwithstanding the legally permissible one-sided nature of grand jury proceedings, everyone possesses the additional and distinct 'right not to be deprived of liberty as a result of the fabrication of evidence by a government officer acting in an investigating capacity.'. . This right was violated, Morse contends, when the defendants knowingly created false or misleading billing summaries that were determined to be material to the grand jury's decision to indict. We conclude that the omissions in this case were properly considered under the rubric of Zahrey, under which government officials may be held liable for fabricating evidence through false statements or omissions that are both material and made knowingly. . . . Having concluded that the defendants' falsifications constituted a violation of Morse's constitutional rights, we must next determine whether the falsifications violated clearly established law that sufficiently warned the defendants that their conduct was unconstitutional. We conclude that they did. . . . We conclude that the right in question was clearly established such that the defendants are not entitled to qualified immunity. Although there is no prior decision of ours precisely equating the fraudulent omission of factual information from a document with the affirmative perpetration of a falsehood, Ricciuti and its progeny, including Zahrey, clearly establish that 'qualified immunity is unavailable on a claim for denial of the right to a fair trial where that claim is premised on proof that a defendant knowingly fabricated evidence and where a reasonable jury could so find.'. . As discussed in detail above, because there is no plausible legal distinction between misstatements and omissions that we can perceive in this context, we conclude that it was not 'objectively legally reasonable' for the defendants in this case to believe that it was permissible for them to knowingly make material omissions in the creation of the billing summaries, thereby knowingly altering evidence during a criminal investigation.")

Edwards v. Arnone, 613 F.3d 44, 46 (2d Cir. 2015) ("The district court in this case described the right at issue as one 'to recreate free from restraints' and held that, as a matter of law, such a right was not clearly established. . . We disagree, however, and conclude that the district court erred in finding that no clearly established right was implicated because the court defined the scope of the relevant right too narrowly. . . .Taken together, our earlier decisions have clearly established a right for inmates to have some meaningful opportunity for exercise, unless the prison has a legitimate safety justification and has adequately considered feasible alternatives. As such, the district court erred by defining the scope of the right at issue too narrowly and by concluding that no right implicated in this case is clearly established. . . . The defendants nevertheless press that, even if the district court did not consider the adequacy of the safety justification, we should affirm because, at the time of the defendants' actions, 'there was no decisional law requiring that inmates in [Phase I of Administrative Segregation] exercise without handcuffs and leg restraints.'. . But 'the absence of legal precedent addressing an identical factual scenario does not necessarily yield a conclusion that the law is not clearly established.'. . Under existing clearly established case law, a reasonable juror may conclude that reasonable officers would agree that fully restraining inmates during out-of-cell exercise without an adequate safety justification is unconstitutional. Accordingly, the district court erred in granting qualified immunity to the defendants without first considering whether disputed issues of fact precluded summary judgment with respect to the adequacy of the defendants' proffered safety justification for the exercise-restraint policy imposed on Edwards. We therefore vacate the judgment and remand for the district court to consider in the first instance the adequacy of the safety justification for the imposition of this policy on Edwards.")

Gardner v. Murphy, 613 F. App'x 40, 42, 43 (2d Cir. 2015) ("Here, the defendants argue that all reasonable jurors would agree that the prison officials acted reasonably in permitting Gardner to exercise only while handcuffed behind his back. We disagree. Of particular relevance on this interlocutory appeal are the district court's conclusions that questions of fact remained as to whether the plaintiff had some meaningful opportunity to engage in exercise and whether the defendants had an adequate safety justification for their imposing restraints on Gardner's exercise. Because we lack jurisdiction to resolve the adequacy of the plaintiff's opportunity for exercise or the defendants' safety justification, . . .the question we must confront on this appeal narrows considerably: We must decide solely whether reasonable jurors could disagree about whether it would have been objectively reasonable for the defendants to believe that they would not violate Gardner's clearly established constitutional rights by requiring him to be handcuffed behind his back during exercise, absent an adequate safety justification for the restraints. The defendants argue that reasonable officials could debate the legality of the conduct now at issue because neither the Supreme Court nor this Court 'has held that requiring an inmate to recreate in restraints for security reasons is unconstitutional.'. . We are unpersuaded for several reasons. First, the defendants' argument assumes that there is in fact a valid safety rationale, which we must assume is not true for purposes of this appeal. Second, the defendants' position defines the scope of the right too narrowly. We have recognized that a restriction on the meaningful opportunity to exercise must be based on a valid security exception. . . Here, it is undisputed that while in Phase I of the Administrative Segregation Program, Gardner was permitted to attend outdoor recreation only while handcuffed behind his back. Such a restriction may be found to infringe an inmate's right to a meaningful opportunity to exercise, and, if so, must be justified by a valid security concern. Accordingly, if it finds unpersuasive a proffered safety justification, a reasonable jury could readily conclude that a corrections official acted unreasonably by permitting an inmate to exercise only in restraints. . . . [A]s we have noted previously, 'the absence of legal precedent addressing an identical factual scenario does not necessarily yield a conclusion that the law is not clearly established.'. . Accordingly, we hold that under existing clearly established case law, a reasonable jury may conclude that reasonable officers would agree that handcuffing inmates behind their backs during their out-of-cell exercise without an adequate safety justification is unconstitutional. We therefore cannot conclude on this interlocutory appeal that the district court erred in denying summary judgment to the defendants.") Golodner v. Berliner, 770 F.3d 196, 205-07 (2d Cir. 2014) ("Few issues related to qualified immunity have caused more ink to be spilled than whether a particular right has been clearly established, mainly because courts must calibrate, on a case-by-case basis, how generally or specifically to define the right at issue. . . In a sense, we must apply the Goldilocks principle. If the right is defined too narrowly based on the exact factual scenario presented, government actors will invariably receive qualified immunity. If, on the other hand, the right is defined too broadly, the entire second prong of qualified immunity analysis will be subsumed by the first and immunity will be available rarely, if ever. . . Since neither result maintains the delicate balance 'between the interests in vindication of citizens' constitutional rights and in public officials' effective performance of their duties' that lies at the heart of qualified immunity, Davis v. Scherer, 468 U.S. 183, 195 (1984), we must chart a middle course. Our definition must be 'particularized' in the sense that '[t]he contours of the right must be sufficiently clear that a reasonable official would understand that what he is doing violates that right. This is not to say that an official action is protected by qualified immunity unless the very action in question has previously been held unlawful, but it is to say that in light of pre-existing law the unlawfulness must be apparent.'. . Once we identify the right at issue we look to whether the Supreme Court or this Court had articulated that right with adequate specificity at the time of the retaliatory actions. . . Here, the determinative question is whether Berliner and Myers could reasonably have believed-based on the law as it existed in the second half of 2009—that the First Amendment did not prevent them from discontinuing the City's existing relationship with an independent contractor on account of a lawsuit the contractor filed against the City alleging an unconstitutional dual-arrest policy and police misconduct. . . As an initial matter, 'the First Amendment right of public employees to be free from retaliation for speech on matters of public concern' is beyond debate. . . Next, as discussed at length above, the speech at issue has nothing to do with personal employee grievances related to Golodner's conditions of employment and extends well into the realm of public concern. This conclusion is firmly supported by the relevant jurisprudence in place in 2009. . . Next, although the right at issue is most often raised in the context of a government official firing an employee in retaliation for his or her speech, any attempt to distinguish the case on appeal from those cases based on Golodner's status as a contractor is vitiated by the Supreme Court's 1996 decision in Board of County Commissioners v. Umbehr, 518 U.S. 668 (1996). . . Finally, it was clearly established that a complaint may constitute a form of speech for First Amendment purposes. . . Based on the relevant case law at the time of the individual defendants' alleged retaliatory actions, we have no trouble concluding that the constitutional right implicated here was clearly established.")

Harris v. O'Hare, 770 F.3d 224, 241 (2d Cir. 2014) ("Because the police officers lacked a warrant or probable cause plus exigent circumstances to invade Plaintiffs' curtilage, and because Defendants cannot offer any other basis on which the officers' intrusion would be lawful, we conclude that Defendants violated Plaintiffs' Fourth Amendment rights. We also hold that Defendants are not entitled to qualified immunity for this violation because, under the undisputed facts, it would not have been objectively reasonable for them to have believed that their conduct was lawful.")

Raspardo v. Carlone, 770 F.3d 97, 114-15 (2d Cir. 2014) ("Although we have long recognized that Title VII-based hostile work environment claims by government employees are actionable under § 1983, . . . we have not specified in our prior decisions the role of individual responsibility required for a defendant in a § 1983 case involving claims of sex-based harassment by multiple defendants, nor have we charted supervisory liability in this context. This case demonstrates how hostile work environment claims that may readily be brought against employers under Title VII do not always fit easily within the context of individual liability under § 1983. The Title VII framework often requires courts to consider the workplace conduct of multiple employees and supervisors in determining whether the plaintiff has experienced a hostile work environment. . . . Section 1983, however, applies by its terms only to individual 'persons' responsible for violating plaintiffs' rights. . . In order to overcome a government official's claim to qualified immunity and 'establish individual liability under § 1983, a plaintiff must show ... that the defendant caused the plaintiff to be deprived of a federal right.'. . If a defendant has not personally violated a plaintiff's constitutional rights, the plaintiff cannot succeed on a § 1983 action against the defendant. Our few prior decisions addressing multi-defendant § 1983 hostile work environment cases have denied qualified immunity to defendants whose conduct, considered alone, was sufficiently severe or pervasive to alter the conditions of the plaintiff's employment. . . .Thus, our prior cases have established only that when a plaintiff alleges that multiple individual defendants have engaged in uncoordinated and unplanned acts of harassment, each defendant is only liable under § 1983 when his own actions are independently sufficient to create a hostile work environment. We therefore cannot say that it is clearly established law that an individual defendant has violated a plaintiff's equal protection rights if he has not personally behaved in such a way as to create an atmosphere of severe or pervasive harassment. Accordingly, absent such behavior, an individual defendant is entitled to qualified immunity.")

Terebesi v. Torreso, 764 F.3d 217, 232, 233 (2d Cir. 2014) ("At least two circuits and one decision from the District of Connecticut have suggested that the decision to employ a tactical team may violate the Fourth Amendment's prohibition on excessive force. [citing cases] The district court referred to these decisions in denying summary judgment on this issue. . . In November 2012—after the district court's decision in this case, but before the appeal was briefed—a panel of this Court determined that 'there was no "clearly established" right in this Circuit to be free from the deployment of a police SWAT team.' Fortunati v. Vermont, 503 F. App'x 78, 81 (2d Cir.2012) (non-precedential summary order). . . . We agree that there is no clearly established right in this Circuit to be free from the deployment of a tactical team in general. . . . It is difficult to ask that a police officer identify clearly established law that three judges of this Court could not find. We therefore reverse the decision of the district court insofar as it denied qualified immunity to Chief Solomon for his decision to call out a tactical team in connection with the search of Terebesi's home.")

Gonzalez v. City of Schenectady, 728 F.3d 149, 160-62 & n.6 (2d Cir. 2013) ("The officers do not dispute that the search violated Gonzalez's right to be free from unreasonable searches; their position is that the right violated was not clearly established. We need not determine whether the facts alleged make out a violation of a constitutional right prior to determining whether that right was clearly established. . . This is especially true here, where the issue was not fully briefed by the government. . . Defendants–Appellees are not liable under § 1983 unless the right at issue was clearly established, meaning that '[t]he contours of the right [are] sufficiently clear that a reasonable official would understand that what he is doing violates that right.'. . At the time of the search, we had never held that the Fourth Amendment is violated by a suspicionless search (strip search or visual body cavity search) of a person arrested for felony drug possession. Although we have repeatedly held that the police may not conduct a suspicionless strip or body cavity search of a person arrested for a misdemeanor, reasonable officers could disagree as to whether that rule applied to those arrested for felony drug crimes, given the propensity of drug dealers to conceal contraband in their body cavities. . . Judge McMahon (who seems to have had a full share of these cases) has repeatedly emphasized that we have never applied the rule from Weber and Shain to searches of suspects arrested for felony drug crimes. . . The New York Court of Appeals' decision in People v. Hall, 10 N.Y.3d 303 (2008), does not support the view that the search of Gonzalez violated a clearly established federal constitutional rule. Hall was decided after the search at issue in this case. It is not a ruling of the Supreme Court or this Court. . . .While we can expect police officers to be familiar with black-letter law applicable to commonly encountered situations, they cannot be subjected to personal liability under § 1983 based on anything less. There are so many permutations of fact that bear upon the constitutional issues of a search: the arrest can be for a misdemeanor or a felony, for a drug offense or not; the search can be a strip search, a visual body cavity search, or a manual one; the person arrested can be headed to the general prison population or a single cell; the place of the search can be private or less than private; the impetus for the search can be a tip, or the policeman's observations or experience or hunch, or the neighborhood, or a description, or some or all of the above; and other considerations as well. The policeman is not expected to know all of our precedents or those of the Supreme Court, or to distinguish holding from dicta, or to put together precedents for line-drawing, or to discern trends or follow doctrinal trajectories. Otherwise, qualified immunity would be available only to a cop who is a professor of criminal procedure in her spare time. The police cannot be expected to know such things at risk of personal liability for the policeman's savings, home equity, and college funds. And such personal liability is the only kind of liability imposed by § 1983 (absent a Monell claim). That tells us something about the threshold of liability in these cases. . . . The premise—that a suit against an individual government employee is in substance a suit against his employer—is wrong. Doubtless in some political subdivisions of this Circuit the government supplies defense counsel and pays the judgment if an officer is personally liable under § 1983. But this Circuit includes scores of counties and hundreds of towns and municipalities; and there are thousands of political subdivisions in the nation. Not all of them will indemnify their employees for § 1983 judgments; many cannot even afford to furnish a defense; some can barely keep the school open. . . .We conclude that a reasonable officer—even one familiar with the cases described above—would not have understood that conducting an otherwise suspicionless visual body cavity search of a person arrested for a felony drug offense was unlawful; the defendants in this case are therefore entitled to qualified immunity.") Gonzalez v. City of Schenectady, 728 F.3d 149, 164-71 (2d Cir. 2013) (Pooler, J., dissenting) ("Here, the relevant question is whether the heightened standard for an anal body cavity search of a felony arrestee was clearly foreshadowed by this Circuit or the Supreme Court, at the time of Gonzalez's search in 2006. . . .Regardless of whether the Supreme Court or this Circuit directly held this rule, it was undoubtedly foreshadowed previous to Gonzalez's arrest, thus, I must disagree with the majority's conclusion in Part III. . . .Despite Supreme Court precedent and over two decades of this Circuit's case law rejecting cavity searches, the district court stated and Appellees still contend that the rule was not clearly established until Hall, 10 N.Y.3d at 310–11. . . Regardless of Hall, the rule established therein was already clearly suggested by the Supreme Court and presaged by this Circuit. As the majority states, 'we have repeatedly held that police may not conduct a suspicionless strip or body cavity search.' Even if no federal case prior to Hall stated the rule as explicitly applying to felony arrestees, the waterfall of decisions from Schmerber to Weber to Shain to Murcia made Hall's and Sarnicola's ultimate results a fait accompli—as reflections of this Circuit's developing case law. In addition, even Appellees are in accord with the district court and the New York Court of Appeals, recognizing that the rule on searches was 'evolving' in this direction. . . We have held that such foreshadowing requires the rule to be deemed clearly established. . . Accordingly, where the Supreme Court and this Court clearly foreshadowed a ruling on the issue, and other courts have also acknowledged this outcome, we should conclude that the rule was clearly established. . . .Moreover, even accepting that the strip search of the defendant was in accordance with police procedure, that, too, does not excuse police who should have known that to perform a strip search of the defendant absent reasonable suspicion was unjustified. . . .Accordingly, where the unlawfulness was 'apparent,'. . . and the searching officers suspicion was based on 'vague' information, an objectively reasonable person in the officer's position should have known that this conduct was unreasonable and qualified immunity should therefore not apply.")

Spavone v. New York State Dept. of Correctional Services, 719 F.3d 127, 138 (2d Cir. 2013) ("Simply put, the record reveals no basis on which to conclude that Fischer and Joy could not reasonably have believed, as Joy has affirmed, that the mental health needs of DOCS inmates were being met 'in the correctional facility setting through the comprehensive services provided by OMH.' This conclusion means that a reasonable public official in the position of Fischer or Joy could reasonably have believed there was a rational basis for distinguishing between leaves of absence for the treatment of mental illness as opposed to other sorts of illness. And this conclusion, in turn, entitles Fischer and Joy to qualified immunity.")

Vincent v. Yelich, 718 F.3d 157, 166-70 (2d Cir. 2013) ("[W]e conclude that Earley I itself, in June 2006, clearly established that the administrative imposition of PRS terms not imposed by the court is unconstitutional. We conclude further, that as to Annucci—the only defendant discussed in plaintiffs' briefs on appeal—the dismissals as a matter of law on the basis of qualified immunity on the present record were inappropriate. . . . Earley I dealt with the AEDPA principle that a federal court may not grant habeas unless the state court's adjudication of the claim was 'contrary to, or involved an unreasonable application of, clearly established Federal law, as determined by the Supreme Court of the United States,' 28 U.S.C. § 2254(d)(1). It was in that context that Earley I ruled that the federal-law principle that punishment for a crime could not properly be imposed administratively but could only be imposed by the court had been clearly established by the United States Supreme Court in Wampler . . . That AEDPA question is not the same as whether a federal right is clearly established for purposes of denying an official qualified immunity: The conclusion that a 'legal proposition was "clearly established" for purposes of its application by professional state court judges does not require a conclusion that it was "clearly established" in the qualified immunity context, which governs the conduct of government officials who are likely neither lawyers nor legal scholars.'. . We thus ruled in Scott that Earley I's holding did not mean that the Wampler principle that there was a right not to be subjected to administratively imposed PRS was clearly established for purposes of qualified immunity. . . .Earley I itself, however, in dealing with the precise conduct at issue in the present cases—the administrative imposition of PRS on a prisoner who has not had that condition imposed on him by the sentencing court—applied Wampler and plainly held such an imposition of PRS to be unconstitutional. . . . We conclude that Earley I itself clearly established that where the court has not included PRS in a defendant's sentence, DOCS may not add that term without violating federal law. . . . State court decisions that rejected Earley I's holding could not disestablish the federal right to due process for the purposes of qualified immunity analysis. . . Because Earley I's explicit ruling that 'New York's Department of Correctional Services has no ... power to alter a sentence' clearly established the contour of the right plaintiffs seek to vindicate, our inquiry ends there.") Bailey v. Pataki, 708 F.3d 391, 404-07 (2d Cir. 2013) ("We have already determined that there is sufficient evidence in the record to support, as a matter of law, the plaintiffs' procedural due process claims. We therefore turn to the question of whether the right at issue was clearly established. In answering that question, we look to whether (1) the right was defined with reasonable clarity, (2) the Supreme Court or the Second Circuit has confirmed the existence of the right, and (3) a reasonable defendant would have understood from the existing law that his conduct was unlawful. . . We have further held that where the law was established in three other circuits and the decisions of our own Court foreshadowed the right, the law was sufficiently 'well established' that its violation stripped the defendant of his immunity. . . .We ultimately agree with the district court that 'the basic proposition that due process requires a predeprivation hearing unless there is an immediate danger to society' was well established prior to 2005. . . Despite the litany of cases cited by the defendants to suggest that due process tolerates civil commitment of inmates without either notice or a hearing, each of those cases involved critical factors not present here. In none of the cases was a civil commitment effected without notice or a predeprivation hearing where the inmate was safely confined, and, indeed, where the standard the inmate met was not one of immediate and acute dangerousness but rather potential recidivism five, ten, or fifteen years after his release. . . The defendants offer no Supreme Court or Second Circuit precedent for the proposition that due process is satisfied if an individual in the plaintiffs' position has the opportunity to request a hearing after he has been labeled an SVP and civilly committed. Except for emergent or otherwise unusual circumstances, such as where an emergency makes it necessary for the State to act immediately to avoid imminent harm to the person being restrained or to the public, or where predeprivation process is highly impracticable, the Supreme Court has long held that 'the Constitution requires some kind of a hearing before the State deprives a person of liberty.'")

Looney v. Black, 702 F.3d 701, 710 (2d Cir. 2012) ("We do not doubt that Looney's interest in his continued full-time employment was important, or that he has felt the negative effects of being deprived of his pension and health care benefits. Unfortunately, however, Looney's interest in these items does not suffice to guarantee them constitutional protection as property rights to which he has any procedural entitlement. . . We therefore conclude that Looney has not adequately alleged a constitutionally protected property interest in his full-time employment. Accordingly, the District Court erred in determining that Black was not entitled to qualified immunity as to Looney's procedural due process claim.")

Looney v. Black, 702 F.3d 701, 713 (2d Cir. 2012) ("It is true that Looney alleges that his supervisor, in admonishing him for this alleged speech, requested that he refrain from discussing matters 'outside [Looney's] job duties.'. . It is also alleged that his speech regarded an 'outside agency enforcing a cease and desist order against Town residents.'. . But '[f]ormal job descriptions often bear little resemblance to the duties an employee actually is expected to perform, and the listing of a given task in an employee's written job description is neither necessary nor sufficient to demonstrate that conducting the task is within the scope of the employee's professional duties for First Amendment purposes.' Garcetti, 547 U.S. at 424–25. Similarly, whether 'speech was unprotected does not rest on the fact that [the] speech was made in the workplace as opposed to elsewhere.'. .The face of Looney's complaint alleges nothing more than a vague set of circumstances regarding speech which necessarily 'owed its existence' to Looney's role as Building Official. . . Because the speech at issue is alleged to have been made in the course of Looney's official duties, he has not adequately alleged that such speech is entitled to First Amendment protection.")

Looney v. Black, 702 F.3d 701, 713 (2d Cir. 2012) (Droney, J., dissenting) ("I respectfully dissent from the majority's resolution of both the due process and First Amendment claims. I cannot conclude that the allegations in Looney's complaint call for qualified immunity and warrant dismissal at this juncture. As to Looney's procedural due process claim, the allegations of the representations and conduct by defendant First Selectman Black and the other Town officials, and the importance of the salary and benefits to Looney, are sufficient to show that he had a property right to full-time employment protected by procedural due process during his four-year statutory term as a Building Official. As to Looney's First Amendment retaliation claim, the allegations in the complaint sufficiently demonstrate that Looney's speech was made as a private citizen and on a matter of public concern. Although discovery may uncover facts to the contrary, it would be premature to conclude otherwise on a motion to dismiss. Accordingly, I would affirm the district court's denial of qualified immunity.")

Fabrikant v. French, 691 F.3d 193, 213, 214 (2d Cir. 2012) ("The due process right asserted by Fabrikant—her right not to have her dogs sterilized by the SPCA, at least without some form of process, prior to being sent to foster homes while she was awaiting trial in state court on animal abuse charges—is not a right that was 'clearly established' at the time of defendants' challenged actions in 2002. Nor has the right achieved that status today. It was not then, and is not now, 'sufficiently clear that every reasonable official would have understood' that spaying or neutering Fabrikant's dogs following their seizure from her home violates a clearly established due process right. . . Fabrikant cites no binding precedent that comes close to establishing that the asserted due process right was clearly established in 2002. . . In fact, she appears to concede that no such binding authority exists; instead, she argues that we should extend existing precedent to prohibit defendants' behavior and to find that the due process right that she has asserted on this appeal was clearly established in 2002. That argument, however, is foreclosed by Reichle and other recent Supreme Court jurisprudence, which recognizes that although '[w]e do not require a case directly on point, ... existing precedent must have placed the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate.' Ashcroft v. al-Kidd, 131 S.Ct. 2074, 2083 (2011). Here, as in Reichle and al-Kidd, the question 'falls far short of that threshold.'").

McGarry v. Pallito, 687 F.3d 505, 511-14 (2d Cir. 2012) ("Because the Thirteenth Amendment 'denounces a status or condition, irrespective of the manner or authority by which it is created,' Clyatt v. United States, 197 U.S. 207, 216 (1905), institutions housing pretrial detainees are not exempt from the Amendment's scope. . . . McGarry's allegations state a claim under the Thirteenth Amendment. He alleges that his work in the prison laundry was compelled and maintained by the use and threatened use of physical and legal coercion. He supports his allegations with well-pleaded facts that the defendants threatened to send him to 'the hole' if he refused to work and that he would thereby be subjected to 23 hour-per-day administrative confinement and shackles. These allegations plausibly allege 'threat of physical restraint or physical injury' within the meaning of Kozminski. . . Likewise, McGarry also plausibly alleges facts supporting his assertion that defendants coerced him through legal process by threatening him with DRs, which are alleged to be taken into consideration when making recommendations for a release date and, therefore, lengthen any period of incarceration. . . .[I]t is clearly established that a state may not 'rehabilitate' pretrial detainees. The Supreme Court has unambiguously and repeatedly held that a state's authority over pretrial detainees is limited by the Constitution in ways that the treatment of convicted persons is not. . . .This Court also has held that, while the State has legitimate interests in the health, safety, and sanitation of the correctional facility and its inhabitants, where pretrial detainees are concerned, those interests do not include rehabilitation. . . In light of this authority, it was clearly established that prison officials may not rehabilitate pretrial detainees, and it was not 'objectively reasonable' for defendants to conclude otherwise. . . . We are prepared to continue to assume that correctional institutions may require inmates to perform personally related housekeeping chores such as, for example, cleaning the areas in or around their cells, without violating the Thirteenth Amendment. However, on a motion to dismiss, 'it is the defendant's conduct as alleged in the complaint that is scrutinized for objective legal reasonableness.'. . As such, we look to the complaint to determine if, at the pleading stage, defendants are entitled to qualified immunity. It is clearly established that requiring hard labor of pretrial detainees—persons not 'duly convicted'—violates the Thirteenth Amendment. See U.S. Const. amend. XIII, § 1. Reviewing the allegations of the complaint in the light most favorable to McGarry, we conclude that a pretrial detainee's compelled work in a laundry for up to 14 hours a day for three days a week doing other inmates' laundry cannot reasonably be construed as personally related housekeeping chores and that officers of reasonable competence could not disagree on these points. . . Accordingly, we conclude that, at this stage of the proceeding, defendants have not demonstrated that they are entitled to qualified immunity.") Southerland v. City of New York, 680 F.3d 127, 160 (2d Cir. 2012), reh'g en banc denied, 681 F.3d 122 (2d Cir. 2012) ("The fact that Tenenbaum changed the legal 'rubric' applicable to the Southerland Children's constitutional claim—from substantive due process to illegal seizure—however, is not alone determinative of whether the constitutional rights implicated in the Children's seizure were clearly established prior to the time of the seizure. It would be inappropriate, we think, to afford Woo qualified immunity on the Southerland Children's claim solely because, two years after the events in question, we shifted the constitutional label for evaluating that claim from the Fourteenth to the Fourth Amendment. . . What matters is whether an objectively reasonable caseworker in Woo's position would have known that removing a child from his or her home without parental consent, circumstances warranting the removal, or court order would violate a constitutional right—not whether the caseworker would have known which constitutional provisions would be violated if the caseworker proceeded to act in a particular way. . . . Although the standard for determining whether the circumstances justify seizure of a child without judicial authorization or parental consent under the Fourth Amendment was not established by 1997 and, as we have pointed out, remains unsettled to this day, the Children's right not to be taken from the care of their parent without court order, parental consent, or emergency circumstances was firmly established, albeit under a procedural due process framework. . . Regardless of whether probable cause or exigent circumstances must be established to justify a warrantless seizure for Fourth Amendment purposes, the existence of emergency circumstances sufficient to justify removal of the Southerland Children in a manner comporting with their due process rights would also certainly suffice to justify their removal in a manner comporting with their Fourth Amendment rights barring unreasonable seizure. To that extent, at the time of the events in this case, the Southerland Children's Fourth Amendment rights against unreasonable seizure were clearly established. In light of this determination, the next question the Court must address is whether 'it was objectively reasonable for [Woo] to believe [that his] acts did not violate th[e Childrens' clearly established] right [ ],' Holcomb, 337 F.3d at 220, not to be taken from the care of their parent without court order, parental consent, or emergency circumstances. Once again, for the purposes of the qualified immunity analysis, the legal origin of the right is not determinative. If Woo has established that he was objectively reasonable in believing that he did not violate the Children's right to be free from unwarranted seizure without exigent circumstances, court order, or parental consent, then he is protected against their Fourth Amendment seizure claim, no matter the standard used to determine liability on this claim on the merits. For the same reasons as in our procedural due process analysis—that we cannot conclude as a matter of law on the current record that it would have been objectively reasonable for Woo to believe that his actions did not violate the Children's constitutional right not to be removed from their home barring exigent circumstances—we cannot conclude as a matter of law that Woo must prevail on the 'objectively reasonable' inquiry as to the violation of the children's Fourth Amendment illegal seizure claims. . . Thus, qualified immunity is unavailable to Woo at this stage on the current record.")

Nagle v. Marron, 663 F.3d 100, 115, 116 (2d Cir. 2011) ("In the present case, Appellees do not argue that Nagle did not have a clearly established right not to suffer adverse employment actions in retaliation for her protected speech. Rather, they argue that it is not clearly established that speech protected at one time 'remains protected when discovered years later' in a 'geographically remote community.' Appellees cite no cases suggesting that First Amendment protection wanes over time. More importantly, they point to no basis on which a reasonable official might conclude that it would so wane, thereby permitting the official to retaliate for the speech. As we have previously observed, there are material questions of fact in this case as to whether the complained-of tenure decision was made in retaliation for Nagle's speech. But assuming, as we must, that this causation question is decided against Appellees at trial, no reasonable official could think that such speech-retaliatory conduct was constitutionally permissible based simply on the passage of time. Insofar as Appellees mean to rest on the cases cited by the district court in its discussion of this issue, we note that none of those cases held, or even supported the conclusion, that First Amendment protection deteriorates over time and space. On the contrary, every case the district court cited held or assumed that earlier expressive acts could give rise to a claim of retaliation. . . . It is true that no case in our Circuit has specifically held that First Amendment protection does not grow weaker over time and space. But as the Supreme Court has explained, 'the very action in question' need not have been the subject of a holding in order for a right to be clearly established. . . . Fried and Castar knew or should have known that retaliation for protected speech would violate an employee's First Amendment rights, and they had no reason to think that speech protected in Virginia in 2004 would not be protected in New York in 2007. We therefore hold that, based on the record on appeal, neither Fried nor Castar are subject to qualified immunity from Nagle's suit." footnotes omitted)

Jackler v. Byrne, 658 F.3d 225, 241-43 (2d Cir. 2011) (on prong one of qualified immunity, holding officer's claim that he was retaliated against for his refusal to obey supervisors' instructions to retract truthful report relating to another officer's use of excessive force and file a false report was not controlled by Garcetti and was within the scope of First Amendment protection; on prong two, leaving qualified immunity question for resolution by district court after issues of fact resolved by jury, but noting that "[a]ny uncertainty [in circuit's prior clearly established law] introduced by Garcetti and Weintraub, which were not decided until after defendants' retaliation against [plaintiff] . . . would not entitle defendants to qualified immunity because the availability of that defense depends on whether the unlawfulness of their conduct was apparent in light of ' "pre-existing law."')

Scott v. Fischer, 616 F.3d 100, 107 (2d Cir. 2010) ("In the presence of a statute that requires all sentences for certain crimes to be accompanied by mandatory PRS [Post Release Supervision], and New York cases that routinely upheld the administrative imposition of that PRS, we conclude that it was not clearly established for qualified immunity purposes prior to Earley that the administrative imposition of PRS violates the Due Process Clause.")

Manganiello v. City of New York, 612 F.3d 149, 165 (2d Cir. 2010) ("In the present case, given the jury's findings that Agostini misrepresented the evidence to the prosecutors, or failed to pass on material information, or made statements that were false, and engaged in such misconduct knowingly, and given the ample evidentiary support for those findings, the district court correctly concluded that no reasonable officer could have believed Agostini's actions to be lawful. Agostini's motion for judgment as a matter of law based on qualified immunity was properly denied.")

Okin v. Village of Cornwall-On-Hudson Police Dept., 577 F.3d 415, 434, 435, 437 (2d Cir. 2009) ("The issue in this case is whether defendants were on notice that their affirmative interactions with an individual accused of domestic violence, their failure to arrest the accused individual, and their disregard of established procedures for responding to domestic violence incidents, which were reasonably likely to encourage the accused individual to believe that he would not be arrested, punished, or otherwise interfered with while engaging in domestic violence, would contribute to the vulnerability of the complainant by emboldening her abuser, thereby giving rise to a substantive due process violation. . . . We . . . find that the state-created danger theory, at the time of defendants' actions here, clearly established that police officers are prohibited from affirmatively contributing to the vulnerability of a known victim by engaging in conduct, whether explicit or implicit, that encourages intentional violence against the victim, and as that is the substantive due process violation alleged here, qualified immunity does not apply. Together, Dwares and Hemphill stand for the proposition that police officers may not engage in conduct that encourages or condones a private actor's infliction of intentional violence . . . . In sum, the rule drawn from Dwares, although its application was not clearly established under the circumstances in Pena, applied with 'obvious clarity' to Okin's case. . . We conclude that the state of the law in 2001 to 2003 gave defendants fair warning that police conduct that encourages a private citizen to engage in domestic violence, by fostering the belief that his intentionally violent behavior will not be confronted by arrest, punishment, or police interference, gives rise to a substantive due process violation, and that defendants, if found liable, would not be entitled to qualified immunity.")

Hartline v. Gallo, 546 F.3d 95, 102 & n.5, 103 (2d Cir. 2008) ("Ultimately, if the facts of this case amount to reasonable suspicion, then strip searches will become commonplace. Given the uniquely intrusive nature of strip searches, as well as the multitude of less invasive investigative techniques available to officers confronted by misdemeanor offenders, that result would be unacceptable in any society that takes privacy and bodily integrity seriously. . . . We note that this case presents a markedly different set of circumstances than those addressed by the standard of the 'special needs' of penal or other institutions to conduct strip searches by reason of the presence of a larger, or dangerous, or vulnerable population, where introduction of secreted contraband from the outside raises a substantial risk of harm. See N.G. v. Connecticut, 382 F.3d 225, 234-37 (2d Cir.2004); Covino v. Patrissi, 967 F.2d 73, 76-80 (2d Cir.1992). No such special needs exist where, as here, an arrestee is taken to an empty cell for purposes of an evidentiary search, subsequent booking, and release. . . . Defendants do not dispute that for more than twenty years this Court has held that a misdemeanor arrestee may not be strip searched in the absence of individualized reasonable suspicion that she is secreting contraband. . . . It is true that this Court has never decided a case with facts just like those now before us. However, we have also never decided a case suggesting that a strip search on these facts would be constitutionally permissible. Thus, we are comfortable concluding that in the absence of indicia that this Court has found to support individualized reasonable suspicion in the past, a reasonable jury might determine that Defendants were acting in a fashion that clearly violated Hartline's Fourth Amendment rights. . . Defendants are therefore not entitled to summary judgment on the issue of qualified immunity.").

Higazy v. Templeton, 505 F.3d 161, 174 (2d Cir. 2007) ("The objective prong of the qualified immunity test asks whether an officer in Templeton's shoes would have known that he was violating the right in question. We believe that a reasonable jury could conclude that he would. For the purposes of our inquiry here, we conclude that when the facts are cast in the light most favorable to Higazy, an officer in Templeton's shoes would have understood that the confession he allegedly coerced from Higazy would have been used in a criminal case against Higazy and that his actions therefore violated Higazy's constitutional right to be free from compelled self-incrimination.")

Russo v. City of Bridgeport, 479 F.3d 196, 208, 209, 211, 212 (2d Cir. 2007) ("Today, we hold that the right mentioned in Baker and enunciated in the above cited cases protected Russo from a sustained detention stemming directly from the law enforcement officials' refusal to investigate available exculpatory evidence. The Bridgeport police officers retained sole custody of the videotape evidence–and stored it in an improper manner–for a full 68 days after Russo alerted them that examining the pictures of the perpetrator for tattoos could exonerate Russo. They did this after intentionally misstating that the robber had tattoos. Moreover, their failure to perform the simple task of checking the tape resulted in all of Russo's 217-day incarceration. We must clarify the source of this right, however. Although Justice Blackmun in Baker–and several circuits including our own in Satchell–have suggested that the right was rooted in substantive due process, we now conclude, in light of more recent guidance from the Supreme Court, that the right should instead be analyzed under the Fourth Amendment. . . . . We therefore treat Russo's claim as being based on the Fourth Amendment's protection against unreasonable seizures. And, doing so, we conclude, in light of (1) the length of time of Russo's wrongful incarceration, (2) the ease with which the evidence exculpating Russo–which was in the officers' possession– could have been checked, and (3) the alleged intentionality of DePietro's and Borona's behavior, that Russo has sufficiently alleged that he was unreasonably seized. In other words, the evidence Russo has proffered suffices to prevent summary judgment on Russo's claim of a Fourth Amendment violation by DePietro and Borona. . . . Based on our determination that a reasonable factfinder could conclude that DePietro and Borona's conduct violated Russo's Fourth Amendment rights, we move to the second step of the Saucier inquiry and assess whether these officers are entitled to qualified immunity as a matter of law. . . . First, Russo had a clearly-established constitutional right to be free from prolonged detention caused by law enforcement officials' mishandling or suppression of exculpatory evidence in a manner which 'shocks the conscience.' . . Today we have clarified that Russo's claim should be 'treated under the Fourth Amendment,' . . . rather than under substantive due process. But this clarification is of no consequence to the question of whether the right was clearly established, because the proper inquiry is whether the right itself–rather than its source–is clearly established.").

Jones v. Parmley, 465 F.3d 46, 57-61(2d Cir. 2006) ("Defendants concede that plaintiffs had a constitutional right to protest but instead argue that the contours of the right were not sufficiently clear because of the absence of decisional law supporting the existence of a right to continue with a demonstration after some of the participants create a public safety hazard.' While we recognize that to be clearly established, the right 'must have been recognized in a particularized rather than a general sense,'. . . we disagree for the reasons that follow with defendants' contention that the right at issue in this case was too general to be clearly established. Defendants misapprehend the nature of the inquiry here. They essentially argue that we should find qualified immunity unless a Supreme Court or Second Circuit case expressly denies it, but that standard was rejected by the Supreme Court in favor of one in which courts must examine whether in 'the light of pre-existing law the unlawfulness [is] apparent.'. .As we established in the previous section, the Supreme Court has long applied the 'clear and present danger' test to protest cases to determine when police interference is constitutional. . . . In the protest context, the Supreme Court has already well articulated the contours of the right and made clear that the police may not interfere with demonstrations unless there is a 'clear and present danger' of riot, imminent violence, interference with traffic or other immediate threat to public safety. . . . Taken as a whole, the facts as alleged by plaintiffs reveal an orderly, peaceful crowd, the overwhelming majority of whose members had not entered the I-81 roadway. Given the above, it is clear to this Court that a reasonable factfinder could determine under plaintiffs' version of events that the demonstration did not constitute a 'clear and present danger' and thus that the NYSP's actions violated a clearly established constitutional right to protest. . . . Here, defendants concede that they issued no dispersal order and instead stood in a 'skirmish line,' waited thirty-five seconds, and then charged into the crowd, arresting protesters indiscriminately. . . In the end, the district court properly concluded that the facts as alleged by plaintiffs demonstrate that defendants violated plaintiffs' clearly established First Amendment rights 'of which a reasonable person would have known.'")

Pena v. DePrisco, 432 F.3d 98, 115 (2d Cir. 2005) ("Although it is a close question, we think that the substantive due process violation that the plaintiffs allege here was not clearly established for purposes of qualified immunity. Dwares did not address, let alone decide, whether repeated inaction on the part of government officials over a long period of time without an explicit statement of approval, might effectively constitute such an implicit 'prior assurance' that it rises to the level of an affirmative act. Dwares also did not indicate whether government officials may implicitly send a message of official sanction by engaging in related misconduct themselves or by participating in or tolerating such a practice. And Dwares did not expressly address the question of the scienter required for section 1983 liability. The rule of law that we draw from Dwares today was not 'clearly established' at the time of the conduct in question here. . .We therefore conclude that the pre-accident individual defendants are entitled to qualified immunity as to the substantive due process claims. Insofar as the complaints alleged such substantive due process violations against them, they should have been dismissed.").

Huminski v. Corsones, 396 F.3d 53, 88, 89, 92, 93 (2d Cir. 2005) (as amended on rehearing) ("We have pointed out at some length why it is clear to us that Huminski had a personal right of access to the Rutland courts. We have also noted, however, that we can find no Supreme Court or previous Second Circuit authority that actually decides this issue and thereby establishes that the First Amendment right of access to judicial proceedings or courthouses is violated when one identified person, rather than the public or press at large, is excluded from judicial proceedings. . . .The defendants therefore are not liable for damages to Huminski for their violation of his First Amendment right of access and, to that extent, the district court erred in denying their motion for summary judgment. . . .The Notices Against Trespass in effect prohibit indefinitely any and all expressive activity in which Huminski might want to engage in and around Rutland state courthouses. These notices are thus pervasive enough to be viewed as creating a 'First-Amendment-Free Zone' for Huminski alone in and around the Rutland courts. The defendants' singling out of Huminski for exclusion, thereby permitting all others to engage in similar activity in and around the courts, suggest to us that the trespass notices are not reasonable. . . . Our review thus suggests to us that the defendants violated Huminski's First Amendment right of free expression by issuing the trespass notices. The defendants are not entitled to qualified immunity with regard to this claim because this right was clearly established at the time that the defendants issued the trespass notices.").

Palmer v. Richards, 364 F.3d 60, 67, 68 (2d Cir. 2004) ("Whether Palmer's liberty interest was clearly established depends, in turn, on whether the duration and conditions of Palmer's confinement in SHU not only infringed a liberty interest, but also were of such a degree that an officer in Richards's position should have known, in light of Sandin and the law of this Circuit, that Palmer's liberty interests were at stake. . . . . The same factual question that prevents us from determining whether Palmer's liberty interest was infringed by his SHU confinement also prevents us from deciding whether Richards is entitled to qualified immunity. Given the state of the record, it is impossible to conclude that Palmer endured merely the normal SHU conditions that we have surveyed in our previous cases; instead, it is possible that Palmer endured unusually harsh SHU conditions that constituted an 'atypical and significant deprivation' under Sandin, in which case Palmer's right to due process protections was clearly established. Richards made no effort before the district court to demonstrate what Palmer's conditions were, content to rest on the argument that 'since plaintiff served only 77 days in SHU, no liberty interest is implicated.' We had repeatedly held, prior to Palmer's disciplinary hearing in August 2000, that SHU confinements shorter than 101 days would deprive a prisoner of a liberty interest–and thus trigger due process rights–if the conditions of confinement were severe enough. . . Our decisions, therefore, 'clearly foreshadow' a finding that Palmer's liberty interests could have been infringed, entitling him to hearing procedures that conform to due process, . . . although we cannot conclude as much without knowing more about the conditions of his confinement. Richards, therefore, did not carry his burden on summary judgment to show, on the undisputed facts, that no clearly established right of Palmer's was infringed.").

Cobb v. Pozzi, 363 F.3d 89, 111 (2d Cir. 2004) (as amended) ("The defendants argue that the equal protection principles articulated in Olech were not clearly established law at the time of the alleged unconstitutional conduct at issue in this appeal and that they should therefore be shielded from that claim on the grounds of qualified immunity. They also contend that they are entitled to qualified immunity because they treated the defendants in a manner that was objectively reasonable. We reject each of these arguments. First, the law pertaining to 'class of one' equal protection claims was clearly established in 1999 (i.e. when the events at issue here took place). . . . As the Supreme Court underscored in Olech, the Court has long 'recognized successful equal protection claims brought by a Aclass of one," where the plaintiff alleges that she has been intentionally treated differently from others similarly situated and that there is no rational basis for the difference in treatment.' . . . The defendants nonetheless contend that the specific contours of a 'class of one' equal protection claim were modified when the Supreme Court decided Olech in 2000 such that the standards for this type of claim could not have been 'clearly established' in 1999. However, in African Trade & Info. Ctr., where the plaintiffs brought a 'class of one' equal protection claim premised on conduct that had taken place in 1998, we explained that '[i]f plaintiffs had alleged that [the defendant's conduct] ... was wholly arbitrary, or irrational, they would have alleged a violation of a clearly established constitutional right.' . . Because that is the type of 'class of one' equal protection claim with which the district court charged the jury at the close of the trial, there can be little doubt in the wake of our decision in African Trade & Info. Ctr. that the relevant standards for the particular Olech-based equal protection claim advanced at trial were clearly established even with respect to conduct that pre-dated Olech.")

Blouin v. Spitzer, 356 F.3d 348, 361 (2d Cir. 2004) ("Blouin has not demonstrated that clearly established federal law barred the defendants from effectuating the state's interest in prolonging the life of one of its citizens, whatever its quality.").

Ford v. McGinnis, 352 F.3d 582, 597, 598 (2d Cir. 2003) ("We agree with the district court's discussion of qualified immunity insofar as it found that the constitutional right at issue is clearly established. . . Defendants argue that the specific right at issue has not been clearly established, as this Court has never held that 'prison officials were obligated to provide an inmate with an Eid-ul-Fitr meal.' We, however, have clearly established that a prisoner has a right to a diet consistent with his or her religious scruples . . . . Defendants are correct that we have never had occasion to recognize a prisoner's right to the Eid ul Fitr feast in particular, but courts need not have ruled in favor of a prisoner under precisely the same factual circumstance in order for the right to be clearly established. . . We find that prior cases make it sufficiently clear that absent a legitimate penological justification, which for present purposes we must assume defendants were without, prison officials' conduct in denying Ford a feast imbued with religious import was unlawful. [footnote omitted] We part company with the district court, however, over the reasonableness of defendants' belief that they did not violate Ford's constitutional rights. The district court held that it was 'objectively reasonable for defendants to rely on' the advice of the DOCS religious authorities to conclude that the postponed Eid ul Fitr feast did not retain religious significance. . . Whether the prison officials, with or without the counsel of the religious authorities, thought that the Eid ul Fitr feast was not religious is beside the point. [footnote omitted] Despite the fact that all the religious authorities testified to their belief that the postponed Eid ul Fitr was without religious significance, the proper inquiry was always whether Ford's belief was sincerely held and 'in his own scheme of things, religious.' . . We do not suggest that religious authorities can never be employed in assisting prison officials in making that determination, but the religious authorities' opinions that a particular practice is not religiously mandated under Muslim law, without more, cannot render defendants' conduct reasonable.").

Patel v. Searles, 305 F.3d 130, 139, 140 (2d Cir. 2002) ("Having found that the right to intimate association extended to Patel's family relationships, we must still determine, in this specific factual context, whether defendants' actions violated a clearly established 'constitutional right[ ] of which a reasonable person would have known.' . . . . In this regard, defendants point out that even in the more common fact pattern of a child abuse investigation, our precedents have not delineated the exact boundaries of associational rights, making it difficult for social workers to know when their actions are unconstitutional. . . Similarly, since neither the Supreme Court nor this Court has ever ruled upon a fact pattern similar to the one now before us, the officers maintain that they, like the social workers in Wilkinson, had no reasonable basis to conclude that their alleged actions violated the Constitution. Defendants' contentions are not without merit. Yet, at the pleading stage of this litigation, we are unable to conclude that it is 'beyond doubt that the plaintiff can prove no set of facts in support of his claim which would entitle him to relief.' Conley, 355 U.S. at 45-46. Plaintiff has alleged sufficiently serious misconduct that were we to reverse the district court, it would be equivalent to holding that the right to intimate association does not impose any clearly established limits on the tactics that a police officer may use in the course of an investigation. . . . As a consequence, we do not think it would be objectively reasonable for the police to engage in an extended public and private defamatory misinformation campaign to destroy a family, hoping that those tactics might produce incriminating leads in a murder investigation.").

Poe v. Leonard, 282 F.3d 123, 126 (2d Cir. 2002) ("We hold that in order for a supervisor to be held liable under section 1983, both the law allegedly violated by the subordinate and the supervisory liability doctrine under which the plaintiff seeks to hold the supervisor liable must be clearly established. By 1993, it was clearly established that a police officer violates a person's Fourteenth Amendment right to bodily privacy when that officer views, photographs or otherwise records another's unclothed or partially unclothed body, without that person's consent. By 1993, it was also clearly established that a supervisor could be liable if he had actual or constructive notice that it was highly likely his subordinate, while on duty, might violate another's right to privacy in his or her unclothed body, but the supervisor deliberately or recklessly disregarded that risk by failing to take reasonable action to prevent such a violation, and that failure caused the constitutional injury to the plaintiff.").

Shain v. Ellison, 273 F.3d 56, 66 (2d Cir. 2001) ("[I]t was clearly established in 1995 that persons charged with a misdemeanor and remanded to a local correctional facility like NCCC have a right to be free of a strip search absent reasonable suspicion that they are carrying contraband or weapons.")

Kerman v. City of New York (Kerman II), 261 F.3d 229, 237 (2d Cir. 2001) ("We find that at the time of the officers' conduct in this case no clearly established law prohibited a warrantless entry into an apartment on the ground of exigent circumstances based solely on an anonymous 911 call. Therefore, we affirm the district court's grant of summary judgment to all nine defendant police officers with regard to defendants' entry into Kerman's apartment.").

Johnson v. Newburgh Enlarged School District, 239 F.3d 246, 253 (2d Cir. 2001) ("Bucci's reliance on the absence of Supreme Court or Second Circuit precedent expressly holding students have a substantive due process right, as he puts it, 'not to be struck by a teacher' construes the right too narrowly. In Rodriguez, decided one year before Bucci's alleged attack on T.J., we held that individuals possess a Fourteenth Amendment substantive due process right 'in the non-seizure, non-prisoner context' to be free from excessive force employed by government actors acting under the color of government authority. . . . To the extent that no case applying this right in the educational setting has previously arisen in our circuit, we view this unremarkable absence as a strong indication that the right to be free from excessive force is so well-recognized and widely observed by educators in public schools as to have eluded the necessity of judicial pronouncement. . . . [W]e believe that for claims based on intentionally tortious harmful conduct employed in the absence of any legitimate government interest, the requisite degree of particularity is lessened. Such conduct in the 'non-seizure, non-prisoner context' by any government actor under any circumstances is unjustifiable and, therefore, no additional situation-specific 'contouring' of the right to be free of excessive force is required. Accordingly, we hold that the right to be free of excessive force as announced by this court in Rodriquez was sufficiently concrete to put Bucci on notice that he could not use intentionally harmful force in the absence of a legitimate and discernible government aim.").

Ford v. Moore, 237 F.3d 156, 163 n.4 (2d Cir. 2001) ("The application of qualified immunity law to supervisory liability claims presents important and unresolved questions. What law must be 'clearly established' to defeat a qualified immunity defense: the law violated by the subordinates, or the supervisory liability doctrine under which the plaintiff hopes to hold the defendant liable, or both? And what must be 'objectively unreasonable': the subordinates' acts, or the supervisor's failure to act, or both? These questions have gone largely unexplored. The First Circuit, in a thoughtful opinion, recently appeared to conclude that a court should examine whether the constitutional right allegedly violated by the subordinates and the plaintiff's supervisory liability theory are clearly established, and if they are, then move on to evaluate the supervisor's objective liability in failing to act. See Camilo-Robles v. Hoyos, 151 F.3d 1, 8 (1st Cir.1998). This Circuit has not explicitly discussed the issue, but has at least once used a rule different from the First Circuit's, looking to the clarity of the law allegedly violated by the subordinates, and then moving on to the objective reasonableness of the defendant's actions. [citing cases] Because we hold that Lt. Moore is entitled to qualified immunity under even the narrow rendering of the doctrine favorable to the Plaintiff (one in which only the law violated by the subordinates must be clearly established, and only the supervisor's acts must be objectively unreasonable), we leave this matter to be resolved another day.").

Zahrey v. Coffey, 221 F.3d 342, 344, 349, 356, 357 (2d Cir. 2000) ("We hold that there is a constitutional right not to be deprived of liberty as a result of the fabrication of evidence by a government officer acting in an investigatory capacity, at least where the officer foresees that he himself will use the evidence with a resulting deprivation of liberty. We also believe that this right was clearly established in 1996, when Coffey's alleged misconduct occurred. . . .It is arguable that in this case the right should be identified as the right not to be deprived of liberty as a result of any governmental misconduct occurring in the investigative phase of a criminal matter. A right defined that broadly, however, would cover too much ground because some investigative actions, though fairly labeled as "misconduct," might not merit condemnation as a denial of due process. On the other hand, the right need not be identified at such a level of particularity as to focus only on fabrication of evidence by a prosecutor acting in an investigating capacity. . . . We think the right at issue in this case is appropriately identified as the right not to be deprived of liberty as a result of the fabrication of evidence by a government officer acting in an investigating capacity. . . . Although no prior decision has found a violation by an investigating prosecutor of the right not to be deprived of liberty on the basis of fabricated evidence, the cases in which such claims have been made reveal some support for Zahrey's position. . . . Anderson instructs . . . that for a right to be clearly established for purposes of a qualified immunity defense, the precise conduct at issue need not previously have been ruled unlawful. . . We think the right at issue in this case should not be defined at such a level of particularity as to be limited to a right not to be deprived of liberty as a result of an investigating prosecutor's fabrication of evidence. The right is appropriately identified as the right not to be deprived of liberty as a result of any government officer's fabrication of evidence. That right was clearly established in 1996, when Coffey's alleged acts occurred . . . .").

Lauro v. Charles, 219 F.3d 202, 216 (2d Cir. 2000) ("There are . . . differences between Ayeni and this case that, we believe, render the likeness between the two less than obvious. Thus, the police action in Ayeni was a search, while in this case it was a seizure. More importantly, the search in Ayeni invaded a private home, an area that has traditionally been given the highest degree of protection by the Fourth Amendment . . . , while the seizure in this case infringed Lauro's personal privacy in the course of detention by the police, a situation in which the privacy protections of the Fourth Amendment must often yield to law enforcement needs. . . . For purposes of determining whether the rule we announce today was clearly established by Ayeni, these are significant distinctions. . .In light of Wilson's admonition that the particular right must be defined with specificity, we are not prepared to say that a reasonable police officer should clearly have been able to discern that the search in Ayeni and the seizure in this case infringe what are merely different aspects of the same previously defined constitutional right.").

Tenebaum v. Williams, 193 F.3d 581, 596, 597 (2d Cir. 1999) ("[N]ot until today have we specifically held that where there is reasonable time consistent with the safety of the child to obtain a judicial order, the 'emergency' removal of a child is unwarranted. We cannot say that this principle was clearly enough articulated in or implied by our case law as of 1990 to require the defendants to answer in damages for their failure to abide by it at that time. . . . Because we now hold that it is unconstitutional for state officials to effect a child's removal on an 'emergency' basis where there is reasonable time safely to obtain judicial authorization consistent with the child's safety, caseworkers can no longer claim, as did the defendants here, that they are immune from liability for such actions because the law is not 'clearly established.' But there remains substantial protection for caseworkers under the second prong of the qualified immunity test, so long as it is 'objectively reasonable [for them] to believe that [their] acts [do] not violate these clearly established rights.'. . . We are confident that the doctrine of qualified immunity applied in light of these principles will continue to provide ample protection for caseworkers, enabling them to fulfill their crucial duties safely and effectively.").

Powell v. Schriver, 175 F.3d 107, 115 (2d Cir. 1999) ("In our view, it was as obvious in 1991 as it is now that under certain circumstances the disclosure of an inmate's HIV-positive status and–perhaps more so–her transsexualism could place that inmate in harm's way. Accordingly, we hold that 'under preexisting law,' a reasonable prison official in December of 1991 would have known that such disclosure, under certain circumstances and absent legitimate penological purposes, could constitute deliberate indifference to a substantial risk that such inmate would suffer serious harm at the hands of other inmates.").

Lewis v. Cowen, 165 F.3d 154, 166, 167 (2d Cir. 1999) ("In determining that Hickey had violated a clearly established right of which a reasonable person should have known, both the district judge and the magistrate judge identified the right at issue as the 'freedom of speech.' . . . The district and magistrate judges defined the right in question far too broadly. The relevant inquiry is not whether the defendants should have known that there was a federal right, in the abstract, to "freedom of speech," but whether the defendants should have known that the specific actions complained of violated the plaintiff's freedom of speech. Such an inquiry requires that a court define the constitutional right with some specificity. . . .The present case illustrates the problem of defining the right too broadly. Under the district court's formulation, no defendant in any First Amendment action could ever successfully assert the qualified immunity defense. We think the proper qualified immunity question in this case is whether the defendants should have known that terminating a policymaking public employee for refusing to promote agency policy as directed by his employer would violate the First Amendment. As this opinion indicates, the magistrate judge should have answered this question in the negative. A highranking policy-making employee does not have, and never has had, a First Amendment right to refuse his employer's directive to promote agency policy.").

Bruneau v. South Kortright Central School District, 163 F.3d 749, 755, 756 (2d Cir. 1998) ("The law does not clearly impose a duty on school officials under Title IX or the Fourteenth Amendment to stop peer sexual harassment. Indeed, there are no court of appeals cases before 1998 holding school officials potentially liable for peer sexual harassment in the school environment. Even now, there is disagreement among the circuits as to whether a school district and school officials may be held liable for sexual harassment where the officials are not directly involved in the harassment. . . . We hold that it was not clearly established law in the fall of 1993 that a § 1983 claim could be stated against individual officials for failure to prevent peer sexual harassment among students.").

Smith v. Garretto, 147 F.3d 91, 95 (2d Cir. 1998) ("Though we must be careful not to define the right in terms of the precise circumstances of a case, an approach so narrow that the defined right would rarely if ever be said to have been previously established, see LaBounty v. Coughlin, 137 F.3d 68, 73 (2d Cir.1998), we think the right at issue here must be defined as a right to be free of a retaliatory entrapment, rather than the more general right to be free of any retaliatory action. . . . No case has previously been decided in which an entrapment was ruled to be a retaliatory violation of First Amendment rights. It is therefore not clear whether the First Amendment claimant must show that the criminal case against him was frivolous, or merely lacking in probable cause, or whether he can prevail, as Bodak appears to contend, simply by alleging that although he committed a crime without any apparent inducement, he acted with a benign motive and the prosecutor's motive was retaliatory. However the law might develop with respect to the retaliatory initiation of a plan to see if a target is willing, for whatever reason, to accept the invitation to commit a crime, it was not clearly established at the time of Bodak's acceptance of the offered bribe that Garretto's alleged action violated any constitutionally protected right. For that reason, Bodak's allegations encounter an insuperable defense of qualified immunity.").

LaBounty v. Coughlin, 137 F.3d 68, 73, 74 (2d Cir. 1998) ("The chronic difficulty with this [qualified immunity] analysis for courts is in accurately defining the right at issue. An overly narrow definition of the right can effectively insulate the government's actions by making it easy to assert that the narrowly defined right was not clearly established. On the other hand, as the Supreme Court noted in Anderson, if the right is defined too broadly, '[p]laintiffs would be able to convert the rule of qualified immunity that our cases plainly establish into a rule of virtually unqualified liability simply by alleging violation of extremely abstract rights.' Anderson, 483 U.S. at 639. With these warnings in mind, we find that the district court erred in describing the right at issue as 'the right to be free from crumbling asbestos.'. . . Instead, we find that the right to be free from deliberate indifference to serious medical needs, established in Estelle v. Gamble . . . best encompasses the alleged conduct. . . . Given the known dangers of friable asbestos in 1991-92 [footnote omitted], we hold that a reasonable person would have understood that exposing an inmate to friable asbestos could violate the Eighth Amendment.").

Danahy v. Buscaglia, 134 F.3d 1185, 1193 (2d Cir. 1998) ("The foregoing observations are expressed not to support a finding that plaintiffs were Policymaker/Confidential employees as a matter of law, but rather to show that officers of reasonable competence, based on the information before the defendants concerning the positions of plaintiffs, measured against the decided federal cases (i.e., those in existence at the time the defendants acted) applying the Elrod/Branti exception, could reasonably have perceived that they were, and therefore that defendants are entitled to qualified immunity. . . . For purposes of qualified immunity, enough facts were known to defendants so that an officer of reasonable competence could believe that all of the plaintiffs held confidential positions in a highly specialized prosecutor's office.").

McEvoy v. Spencer, 124 F.3d 92, 97-98 (2d Cir. 1997) ("The claim as to the first demotion . . . requires consideration of the distinction between the Pickering and the Elrod lines of decisions and poses the specific issue of whether an employer motivated to act against an employee for exercising both his speech and associational rights is insulated from liability by Elrod. The claim as to the second demotion . . . appears to present only issues implicating the Pickering line of cases, but since the complaint alleges circumstances warranting a conclusion that McEvoy was a policymaker even after his first demotion, the second demotion poses the specific issue of the significance that should be attached to an employee's policymaker role in applying Pickering. As our discussion . . . reveals, both issues were unsettled at the time of the demotions. As a result, the contours of the rights alleged to have been violated by [defendants] were not 'sufficiently clear that a reasonable official would understand that what he was doing violates [those] right[s],'. . .and these defendants are therefore entitled to qualified immunity. Moreover, our resolution of the first issue entitles [defendants] not only to qualified immunity but also to have the claim against them regarding the first demotion dismissed entirely.").

McEvoy v. Spencer, 124 F.3d 92, 104-05 (2d Cir. 1997) ("[A]s we have previously discussed, the law was unsettled regarding whether an employee's policymaking status automatically immunized an employer's adverse action even in a pure Pickering case. Although we decide in this opinion that no dispositive policymaker exception exists in the Pickering balancing test, [defendants] did not violate a clearly established right of McEvoy's when, reasonably believing that he was a policymaker, they demoted him from Deputy Chief to Captain because of speech activities. They are therefore entitled to qualified immunity on this claim.").

Brown v. City of Oneonta, 106 F.3d 1125, 1131 (2d Cir. 1997) ("Because we agree with appellants' contention that it was unclear whether FERPA's [Family Educational Rights and Privacy Act] emergency exception allowed release of the list, we find that they are entitled to qualified immunity on that ground. . . . The statute, as it read in 1992, made no specific direction whether an educational institution might release information from students' education records to police to aid them in their search for a violent criminal who might be on campus.").

Williams v. Greifinger, 97 F.3d 699, 706 (2d Cir. 1996) (concluding that at time of plaintiff's confinement in medical keeplock, right to exercise was clearly established).

Schecter v. Comptroller of City of New York, 79 F.3d 265, 271 (2d Cir. 1996) ("Although the district court correctly reasoned that a constitutional right to access to the courts has long been established, this general right does not meet the specificity requirements of Anderson. All of the cases cited . . . for the existence of a constitutional right of access to the courts involve impediments to such access by incarcerated prisoners. . . . These cases do not establish with 'reasonable specificity,' that the provision of misleading legal advice to an unincarcerated adversary constitutes a constitutional violation." [cites omitted]).

Genas v. State of New York Dep't of Correctional Servs., 75 F.3d 825, 830-31 (2d Cir. 1996) ("[T]he district court analyzed plaintiff's religious discrimination claim, and concluded that 'the contours of the right to be free from religious discrimination and an employer's duty to make reasonable accommodation for religious observance are clearly defined.' We hold that the district court erred by defining the right at too abstract a level of generality. . . Though the duty to reasonably accommodate the religious preferences of employees has been clearly established, it has not been established that an employer acting under the terms of a collective bargaining agreement must do more to accommodate religious preferences than is required by the agreement.").

Rodriguez v. Phillips, 66 F.3d 470, 476-77 (2d Cir. 1995) ("[W]e must determine whether in January 1991 the right to be free from the use of excessive force was so clearly defined in this non-seizure, non-prisoner context that defendant Epstein knew his actions were unlawful. Earlier in our jurisprudential history, the contours of this right were clearly defined. All excessive force claims were analyzed under a single substantive due process standard . . . . Our silence and that of the Supreme Court on the continued viability of Fourteenth Amendment excessive force actions after Graham, together with the recited decisions of our sister circuits, demonstrate that any federal right of a non-arrestee/non-prisoner to be free from excessive force was not clearly established at the time of Epstein's alleged actions. While we now read the 1989 Graham decision not to preclude a claim such as Ms. Rodriguez', we agree with the Eleventh Circuit's comment that Graham 'forecloses any contention that the law was clearly established in 1990 and 1991 that use of excessive force violated the Due Process Clause.' [Swint] Since, in January 1991, Sara Rodriguez did not have a clearly established substantive due process right to be free from use of excessive force, Officer Epstein is entitled to qualified immunity on this cause of action and the denial of summary judgment in his favor was error.").

Brown v. D'Amico, 35 F.3d 97, 99-100 (2d Cir. 1994) ("In essence, [Plaintiff] is asserting the right to be free from an arrest under circumstances where (a) probable cause is furnished, (b) probable cause would arguably have been negated if information in the applicant's possession had been disclosed to the issuing magistrate, and (c) the undisclosed information had previously been disclosed to an investigatory grand jury that had made a finding of probable cause. We hold that [Defendant] is entitled to qualified immunity because this right was not clearly established in December 1986 when he applied for an arrest warrant . . . . Plaintiff might object that we have defined the right asserted at an undue level of particularity. We do not believe that we have. We do not grant immunity because no previous case has presented the exact set of facts now before us. [citing Anderson] Rather, we uphold the claim of immunity because no case has considered the responsibilities of a state law enforcement officer in the special state procedural context presented here. A police officer violates no settled interpretation of the Fourth Amendment when the officer omits from a warrant application information that has previously been included in the aggregate of evidence that led a neutral investigatory grand jury to make a finding of probable cause. We observe that a more abstract level of generality might be appropriate in other cases involving charges of false arrest and malicious prosecution.").

Soares v. State of Connecticut, 8 F.3d 917, 922 (2d Cir. 1993) ("Given the absence of any preexisting caselaw recognizing plaintiff's alleged right not to be handcuffed and in light of the presently existing conflict of views, it is plain that [defendants] did not violate plaintiff's 'clearly established' rights. . . . ").

Mozzochi v. Borden, 959 F.2d 1174, 1178-79 (2d Cir. 1992) ("The district court framed the qualified immunity question ...as whether 'a citizen possessed a clearly established constitutional right not to have his speech regulated because the state actor disagreed with its content'....Framed at the proper level of generality and incorporating the facts ... the qualified immunity question is whether, at the time the alleged acts took place, it was clearly established that an individual's constitutional rights were violated when a criminal prosecution, supported by probable cause, was initiated in an attempt to deter or silence the exercise by the criminal defendant of his right to free speech, but without the effect of actually deterring or silencing the individual.").

Gibbs v. City of Bridgeport, No. 3:16-CV-635 (JAM), 2018 WL 4119588, at *8-11 (D. Conn. Aug. 29, 2018) ("The qualified immunity doctrine is doubtlessly most easily applied when one side or the other can cite a prior case with virtually identical facts. But that's a lot to ask in terms of coincidence. And it's a shaky proposition as well to presume that police officers devote themselves like fastidious law students to monitoring appellate court opinions for the latest nuances in fact-laden developments of Fourth Amendment law. That is why for qualified immunity purposes there need not necessarily be a case right on point, because 'officials can still be on notice that their conduct violates clearly established law even in novel factual circumstances, and there can be the rare obvious case, where the unlawfulness of the officer's conduct is sufficiently clear even though existing precedent does not address similar circumstances.'. . As discussed above, since the Supreme Court's decision in Tennessee v. Garner, it has been clear that a police officer may not use deadly force against a fleeing suspect unless the officer 'has probable cause to believe that the suspect poses a significant threat of death or serious physical injury to the officer or others.'. . Moreover, in the qualified immunity context, if the substantive Fourth Amendment standard requires a determination of probable cause, a police officer is entitled to qualified immunity so long as there is even arguable probable cause. . . Although the Garner rule is itself a constitutional sub-rule of the more general rule that a police officer may not use objectively unreasonable force, the Supreme Court has cautioned that—absent a so-called 'obvious case'—the Garner rule may be too general a guide for whether an officer's use of force violated clearly established law. . . Fair enough. I will consider in light of the facts of Garner and other cases whether an objectively reasonable police officer would have known as of April 2013 that the Constitution does not permit him to kill a fleeing suspect after the officer sees the suspect lose or abandon his weapon. . . . At the least, the facts and holding of Garner 'clearly foreshadow' the application of the Fourth Amendment to this case. . . . This is the . . . kind of obvious case (if I credit plaintiff's version of the facts). Even though Stukes had previously been armed, Detective Borona knew him no longer to be armed when he advanced up the sidewalk and then shot him for the second time. On plaintiff's version of the facts, no reasonable officer would have believed the use of deadly force to be necessary. . . . I am not persuaded to the contrary by any of the cases that Detective Borona cites. For one thing, most of the cases he cites issued after the shooting occurred in this case in April 2013. The doctrine of qualified immunity requires a court to evaluate what law was clearly established at the time of the incident in question, not several years later. Detective Borona cites Scott v. Harris, supra, and Plumhoff v. Rickard, 134 S. Ct. 2012 (2014), both cases involving police use of force against suspects who led them on Hollywoodstyle high speed car chases that posed a continuing danger to bystanders. Here, by contrast, there was no car chase or anything about Stukes' unarmed flight on foot that posed a continuing danger to the public. Equally distinguishable is the Supreme Court's very recent decision in Kisela, 138 S. Ct. at 1152–1154, in which the Supreme Court concluded that an officer who shot and killed a woman with a large knife was entitled to qualified immunity. The Supreme Court's decision turned on evidence that the woman refused to drop the knife despite repeated commands to do so, such that the officer who shot her reasonably believed she would use the knife on another person standing six feet away. . . The evident difference between this case and Kisela is that the suspect in Kisela continued to be armed when the police decided to shoot her. . . .

In short, when viewing the facts in the light most favorable to plaintiff, I conclude that they do not allow for the grant of qualified immunity at this time. If Detective Borona knew that Stukes was unarmed and did not have other arguable probable cause to believe that Stukes posed an imminent danger to others, then the use of deadly force on Stukes violated clearly established law, and no objectively reasonable police officer would have resorted to the use of deadly force to kill Stukes as he was running away.")

Price v. City of New York, No. 15 CIV. 5871 (KPF), 2018 WL 3117507, at *17–18 (S.D.N.Y. June 25, 2018) ("The Supreme Court has never overruled Hope, but its retreat from that decision is palpable. . . Two years after Hope was decided, the Supreme Court characterized that case as standing for the narrow proposition that the absence of federal appellate authority supporting a claim is not fatal in cases where the constitutional violation is 'obvious.'. . And despite the wave of Supreme Court cases addressing (and granting) qualified immunity in recent years, no Supreme Court majority has cited Hope in the qualified immunity context for approximately four years, see Tolan v. Cotton, 134 S. Ct. 1861, 1866 (2014), and none has cited its 'novel circumstances' holding in almost nine years, see Safford Unified Sch. Dist. No. 1 v. Redding, 557 U.S. 364, 377-78 (2009). In this action, Plaintiff argues that Brooks and Obe are not entitled to qualified immunity because, generally speaking, government officials should know that viewpoint discrimination is unlawful in any forum. . . But the Supreme Court has repeatedly instructed lower courts 'not to define clearly established law at a high level of generality.'. . The Second Circuit has followed suit. . . Here, neither the parties nor the Court has 'identified any binding authority in existence at the relevant time that ... "directly address[ed]" the reasonableness of the challenged conduct,'. . particularly in the context of First Amendment claims concerning the government's use of social media. Nor have decisions from other circuits 'clearly foreshadow[ed] a particular ruling on the issue.'. . After careful consideration, the Court concludes that it must grant qualified immunity to Brooks and Obe on the individual-capacity claims against them.")

Thompson v. Clark, No. 14-CV-7349, 2018 WL 3128975, at *2, *6-8, *11-13 (E.D.N.Y. June 26, 2018) (as amended) ("Qualified immunity is denied. Its grant, in the instant case, would be inconsistent with the purpose of 42 U.S.C. § 1983. . . .The courts, police, and public, will benefit from a clarifying jury decision in this often replicated situation. . . . Qualified immunity has recently come under attack as over-protective of police and at odds with the original purpose of section 1983: 'to deter state actors from using the badge of their authority to deprive individuals of their federally guaranteed rights and to provide relief to victims if such deterrence fails.'. . The Court's expansion of immunity, specifically in excessive force cases, is particularly troubling. . . .The legal precedent and policy justifications of qualified immunity, it has been charged, fail to validate its expansive scope. The law, it is suggested, must return to a state where some effective remedy is available for serious infringement of constitutional rights. . . .The failure to address whether or not an act was constitutional prevents the creation of 'clearly established' law needed to guide law enforcement and courts on narrow issues not yet decided by the Supreme Court. . . . Although the Court is no longer constrained by a common law good faith defense, it continues to rely on the common law as precedent for granting immunity. . . . The Supreme Court's recent emphasis on shielding public officials and federal and local law enforcement means many individuals who suffer a constitutional deprivation will have no redress; state governments are protected by sovereign immunity and municipalities are not liable under Monell unless individual liability can be first proven. . . . Courts should, when reasonable, follow Saucier's guidance to first analyze whether a constitutional violation occurred, instead of skipping to whether the right at issue was 'clearly established.'. . . Turning to the application of qualified immunity, courts should, it has been suggested, return to the standard expressed in Hope v. Pelzer, 536 U.S. 730 (2002), and define 'clearly established law' at a 'high level of generality.' The key inquiry being whether officers are on 'notice their conduct is lawful.'. . This allows courts to recognize 'obvious' constitutional violations, even if not yet specifically outlawed in a prior Supreme Court ruling. Such a standard is vital in a rapidly changing society, where any willing judge or jurist may distinguish precedent as not 'clearly established' because of slightly differing facts. . . . If courts, as instructed in Pearson v. Callahan, 555 U.S. 223, 236 (2009), decline to address constitutional issues by looking first to qualified immunity, and are instructed to rely on 'existing precedent ... [established] beyond debate,' government officials and officers may continue to operate in clear violation of constitutional standards without advise of what is constitutional and without fear of redress, because the law will continue to protect 'all but the plainly incompetent.'. . .The court declines to apply qualified immunity. Case precedent and policy rationale fail to justify an expansive regime of immunity that would prevent plaintiff from proving a serious constitutional violation.")

Case v. Anderson, No. 16 CIV. 983 (NSR), 2017 WL 3701863, at *18 n. 18 (S.D.N.Y. Aug. 25, 2017) ("[C]ourts considering [the] right post-Barkes continue to conclude the right is clearly established. See Estate of Clark v. Walker, No. 16-3560, 2017 WL 3165632, at *6 (7th Cir. July 26, 2017) (in the Seventh Circuit, the right to treatment of a serious medical need, including risk of suicide, is clearly established); Campos v. Cty. of Kern, No. 14 Civ. 1099 (DAD) (JLT), 2017 WL 915294, at *10 (E.D. Cal. Mar. 7, 2017) ("the law regarding the Fourteenth Amendment right to adequate medical care," including right "to be protected from the known risks of suicide in jail," was "clearly established" in the Ninth Circuit by "the time of decedent's suicide, August 2013").")

McEvoy v. Matthews, No. 3:16-CV-922 (JAM), 2017 WL 3597473, at *4-5 (D. Conn. Aug. 21, 2017) ("It does not look like the Second Circuit has addressed the application of the community-

caretaking or emergency-aid exceptions on facts similar to this case. The First Circuit, however, has applied qualified immunity on highly similar facts, concluding that the community-caretaking exception arguably allowed the police to enter a person's home on the report of a neighbor who called the police to say that the door to the home was standing wide open. See MacDonald v. Town of Eastham, 745 F.3d 8 (1st Cir. 2014). The First Circuit surveyed conflicting precedent about the application of the community-caretaking exception in this context, and concluded that '[t]he short of it is that neither the general dimensions of the community caretaking exception nor the case law addressing the application of that exception provides the sort of red flag that would have semaphored to reasonable police officers that their entry into the plaintiff's home was illegal.'. . That is equally true here. Plaintiff argues that the community caretaking exception applies only to the police's search and seizure of automobiles and does not apply to searches by the police inside the home. Maybe plaintiff is right, but the federal courts of appeals are deeply divided on the question. See Sutterfield, 751 F.3d at 556 (collecting cases). And the Second Circuit has yet to take sides. . . Accordingly, the law was not clearly established as of the time of the officers' actions in this case that the community caretaking function could not apply to an entry into plaintiff's home. Just 'the fact that the courts are divided ... demonstrates that the law on the point is not well established.' Ziglar v. Abbasi, 137 S. Ct. 1843, 1868 (2017). So even if plaintiff is right on the merits about the limits of the community caretaking exception, this would not overcome the officers' qualified immunity in the absence of clearly established law in plaintiff's favor. . . . In the event of appellate review of this ruling, it will of course be for the Second Circuit to decide if it wishes in its discretion to offer guidance for the police and citizens alike in this important area of the law.")

Gerskovich v. Iocco, No. 15 CIV. 7280 (RMB), 2017 WL 3236445, at *8–9 (S.D.N.Y. July 17, 2017) ("Assuming it were appropriate for the Court to decide the qualified immunity issue at this point (which it is not), the Court would likely conclude, first, that 'under the First Amendment's right of access to information the public has the commensurate right to record—photograph, film, or audio record—police officers conducting official police activity in public areas' and, second, that Captain Iocco and Chief Anger did not have immunity to arrest Plaintiff for exercising that right because the right was 'clearly established.' Fields, 2017 WL 2884391, at *5. The First, Third, Fifth, Seventh, Ninth, and Eleventh Circuits have found that the First Amendment protects the right to record police activity. [collecting cases] In analyzing the issue of qualified immunity, the Court would point out that not all of the Circuits have found that the constitutional right to photograph police activity was 'clearly established' at the time of their decisions. Compare Glik, 655 F.3d at 85 ("[T]he right violated by [police officers] was clearly established in this circuit at the time of [the plaintiff's] arrest [on October 1, 2007]."), with Fields, 2017 WL 2884391, at *6 ("[O]ur case law does not clearly establish a right to videotape police officers performing their duties [in 2012 and 2013]."), and Turner, 848 F.3d at 687 ("Although the right was not clearly established at the time [i.e. September 2015]," "the right is clearly established henceforth."). . . Qualified immunity, as noted, depends upon 'whether the right plaintiff asserts is so clearly established [or foreshadowed] that defendants should have known it.'. . And, while the Second Circuit Court of Appeals has not spoken definitively on this subject, the '[d]ecisions of other circuits also may indicate whether the law was clearly established' by 'clearly foreshadow[ing] a particular ruling on the issue.'. . If this Court were resolving the issue of qualified immunity, the Court would likely conclude that decisions from other Circuits clearly foreshadowed a finding here that 'the First Amendment right to film was ... clearly established at the time of the arrest.'. . Plaintiff's alleged conduct in this case was very similar to that of the plaintiffs in Glik, Smith, and Fordyce, and those decisions, in this Court's view, clearly foreshadow a ruling here that citizens have a right to film police activity and that police officers are not entitled to qualified immunity if they retaliate against a citizen who exercises that right. . . Tellingly, perhaps, the NYPD has trained its officers since the 1970s to understand that citizens may record (photograph) police activity.")

Soto v. City of N.Y., No. 13 CV 8474-LTS-JLC, 2017 WL 892338, at *5 (S.D.N.Y. Mar. 6, 2017) ("The scope of the First Amendment right to record police activity is the subject of considerable debate. See Rivera v. Foley, 2015 WL 1296258, at *9 (D. Conn. Mar. 23, 2015) (surveying cases and the active split among the Courts of Appeals over this question). To find that officers are entitled to qualified immunity, however, the Court need not resolve that debate: its existence is enough to demonstrate that there was not clearly established law establishing a right to photograph police activity at the time of Plaintiff's arrest. . . The lack of clearly established law entitles Defendants to summary judgment on Plaintiff's retaliation claim on the basis of qualified immunity.")

Charles v. City of New York, No. 12CV6180SLTSMG, 2017 WL 530460, at *21-25 (E.D.N.Y. Feb. 8, 2017) ("Even though neither the Supreme Court nor the Second Circuit has explicitly held that there is a right to videotape or film police activity, the Court may nonetheless find that the right is clearly established 'if decisions from this or other circuits "clearly foreshadow a particular ruling on the issue."'. . Several other circuit courts have either held or implied that a right to film police activity exists, at least under some circumstances. [discussing cases from 1st, 7th, 9th, and 11th Circuits] At least two other circuit court cases have held that the right to record police activity in public places is not clearly established. [discussing cases from 3d and 4th Circuits] At least three district courts in this Circuit have held that the right to record police activity is not clearly established. [discussing Mesa, Rivera, Basinski] At least one district court in this Circuit, however, has found that the First Amendment right to record police officers performing their duties in a public space is clearly established. [discussing Higginbotham] In light of the foregoing cases, the Court concludes that issues of material fact prevent the Court from determining whether Plaintiff had a right to record the police stop under the circumstances of this case. First, the Court agrees with Higginbotham that an argument could be made that a right to videotape police activity in public places was clearly established as of June 5, 2012. As Higginbotham correctly notes, Szymecki and Kelly do not hold that such a right does not exist, but only that the right was not clearly established in the Fourth Circuit as of sometime prior to 2009 and in the Third Circuit as of late May 2007. In contrast, Fordyce, Smith, Glik, and Alvarez all either imply or hold that such a right exists, and Glik and Alvarez were both decided less than a year before the incident at issue. Accordingly, even though neither the Supreme Court nor the Second Circuit had explicitly held that there is a right to videotape or film police activity, one could argue that the 'decisions from ... other circuits "clearly foreshadow [ed]"' a ruling that such a right existed under certain circumstances. . .None of those decisions, however, suggest that the right to film police activity is without limitation. To the contrary, three of the four circuit opinions discussed above and cited in Higginbotham expressly note that the right to film police activity is not absolute, but subject to reasonable time, place and manner limitations. . . . In this case, there is a substantial factual issue regarding whether Plaintiff's filming was interfering with police activity. . . . Since there is a genuine issue of material fact as to whether Plaintiff was interfering in police activity, the Court cannot determine at this juncture whether Plaintiff had a clearly established right to film. However, even if this Court were to find that Plaintiff's videotaping interfered with police activity, that finding would not result in dismissal of Plaintiff's First Amendment retaliation claim on qualified immunity grounds. Plaintiff's First Amendment claim is not based solely on the theory that Defendants retaliated against Plaintiff for exercising her right to videotape police activity. Plaintiff also claims that the arrest was retaliation for Plaintiff's 'request to file a complaint against Office Benites' and 'her speech about the stop-and-frisk she witnessed and the NYPD's stop-and-frisk practices generally.'")

Adkins v. City of New York, 143 F.Supp.3d 134, 140-41 (S.D.N.Y. 2015) ("[T]he Court concludes that transgender people are a quasi-suspect class. Accordingly, the Court must apply intermediate scrutiny to defendants' treatment of plaintiff. To state a claim on this basis, plaintiff's complaint must adequately allege that his removal from the general cell and handcuffing were not 'substantially related to an important government interest.'. . On its face, the complaint does so. . . . Although plaintiff's complaint therefore states a claim that his Fourteenth Amendment rights were violated, the claim must still be dismissed if defendants can successfully plead the affirmative defense of qualified immunity. . . . Plaintiff's rights under the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment were not clearly established at the time of his arrest on October 1, 2011. Windsor v. United States, 699 F.3d 169 (2d Cir.2012), was not decided until October 18, 2012, and the Second Circuit had not previously ruled on what protections are accorded lesbian, gay, bisexual, or transgender people under the Fifth or Fourteenth Amendments. Accordingly, defendants could not be expected to know that their actions would be subject to any standard more stringent than rational basis review. . . . While the Court does not reach the question of whether defendants' actions would survive rational basis review on the merits, it does hold that it would have been objectively reasonable for defendants to conclude as much and that qualified immunity therefore attaches. . . . Particularly because many transgender detainees have alleged that they have been held with individuals who posed a risk to their safety, . . . it was reasonable for defendants to conclude that it would not be arbitrary or irrational to hold plaintiff separately. . . Accordingly, the individual defendants are entitled to immunity, and all claims against them must be dismissed.")

Gonzalez v. City of New York, No. 14 CIV. 7721 LGS, 2015 WL 6873451, at *7 (S.D.N.Y. Nov. 9, 2015) ("In July 2012, when Plaintiff was arrested, neither the Supreme Court nor the Second Circuit had directly addressed the constitutionality of recording officers engaged in official conduct. . . As of July 2012, the First, Seventh, Ninth and Eleventh Circuits had concluded that the right exists, but the Third and Fourth Circuits had determined that the right was not clearly established. . . In particular, the Third Circuit stated that the First Amendment right to record matters of public concern is far from absolute and does not clearly establish the right to videotape police officers during a traffic stop. Kelly v. Borough of Carlisle, 622 F.3d 248, 262–63 (3d Cir.2010). . . .For these reasons, in July 2012, there was no clearly established right in this Circuit to videotape police officers. See Ortiz v. City of New York, No. 11 Civ. 7919, 2013 WL 5339156, at *4 (S.D.N.Y. Sept. 24, 2013) (finding defendants were entitled to qualified immunity because there was no clearly established right to record police officers performing their official duties); Mesa, 2013 WL 31002 at *24–25 (same). But see Higginbotham v. City of New York, —— F.Supp.3d ——, 2015 WL 2212242, at *9 (S.D.N.Y. May 12, 2015) (concluding that "the right to record police activity in public, at least in the case of a journalist who is otherwise unconnected to the events recorded, was in fact 'clearly established' "). Accordingly, Officer Medina is entitled to qualified immunity on the First Amendment claim against him.")

Higginbotham v. City of New York, 105 F.Supp.3d 369, 378-81 (S.D.N.Y. 2015) ("Pluma [see infra in outline] may be distinguishable on the basis that the plaintiff in that case, although he called himself a 'citizen journalist,' did not allege that he ever intended to disseminate his videos: the complaint merely alleged that he went to Zuccotti Park 'with hopeful reflection upon the efforts of Occupy Wall Street.'. . To the extent Pluma is not distinguishable, however, the Court declines to follow it. While videotaping an event is not itself expressive activity, it is an essential step towards an expressive activity, at least when performed by a professional journalist who intends, at the time of recording, to disseminate the product of his work. . . .The defendants also raise the issue whether, more narrowly, a right to record police activity exists, a question that neither the Supreme Court nor the Second Circuit has decided. All of the circuit courts that have, however, have concluded that the First Amendment protects the right to record police officers performing their duties in a public space, subject to reasonable time, place and manner restrictions. [collecting cases] The Court agrees with those cases. If one accepts that photographing and filming receive First Amendment protection as a general matter (at least when they are 'expressive'), it is difficult to see why that protection should disappear simply because their subject is public police activity. . . . On the other side of the ledger lies the government interest in preventing interference with legitimate police activity. But that interest does not override all others. . . . In any event, the right recognized here and by other courts does not apply when the recording would impede police officers in the performance of their duties. The defendants further assert that they are entitled to qualified immunity because the right to record the police is 'insufficiently defined.'. . .The Court concludes, however, that the right to record police activity in public, at least in the case of a journalist who is otherwise unconnected to the events recorded, was in fact 'clearly established' at the time of the events alleged in the complaint. When neither the Supreme Court nor the Second Circuit has decided an issue, a court 'may nonetheless treat the law as clearly established if decisions from ... other circuits "clearly foreshadow a particular ruling on the issue."' Terebesi v. Torreso, 764 F.3d 217, 231 (2d Cir.2014) (quoting Scott v. Fischer, 616 F.3d 100, 105 (2d Cir.2010)); see also Ashcroft v. al-Kidd, 131 S.Ct. 2074, 2084 (2011) (requiring, in the absence of controlling authority, 'a robust "consensus of cases of persuasive authority"' (quoting Wilson v. Layne, 526 U.S. 603, 617 (1999))). By November 2011, the First, Ninth and Eleventh Circuits had all concluded that the right exists. So had a number of district courts. [collecting cases] The Court is unaware of any decision holding that the recording of police activity by a journalist otherwise unconnected to the events recorded is categorically not protected (rather than holding merely that the right to record was not 'clearly established'). At the time of Higginbotham's arrest, there was thus a 'robust consensus of persuasive authority' in favor of the right that 'clearly foreshadowed' an analogous ruling by the Second Circuit or the Supreme Court. . .In so concluding, the Court parts ways with Mesa v. City of New York, No. 09 Civ. 10464(JPO), 2013 WL 31002 (S.D.N.Y. Jan. 3, 2013). That case cited Kelly v. Borough of Carlisle, 622 F.3d 248 (3d Cir.2010), and Szymecki v. Houck, 353 F. App'x 852 (4th Cir.2009), as evidence of a circuit split on the existence of the right to record, and accordingly concluded that the right was not 'clearly established' for qualified immunity purposes. . . In this Court's reading, however, Kelly and Szymecki did not decide whether the right existed: they merely held that, even if it did exist, it was not clearly established for the purposes of qualified immunity in those cases' factual contexts. . . They are thus not relevant to the question whether there is a consensus on the existence of a journalist's right to record events in which he is otherwise a nonparticipant. In both cases, the plaintiff was affiliated with and in close proximity to the person being stopped or arrested by the police: in Kelly, the plaintiff was the passenger of the person stopped, and in Szymecki, the plaintiff was the wife of the arrestee. . . By contrast, Higginbotham had no relation to the arrestees he was filming, and was at a remove from the arrest. In addition, both cases involved particularly dangerous situations: in Kelly, a traffic stop, which the Kelly court itself recognized as an 'inherently dangerous situation,'. . . and in Szymecki, an armed arrestee who defied a police order. Finally, in Kelly, the plaintiff was videotaping the police surreptitiously, whereas Higginbotham's filming was overt. Certainly, the right to record police activity in a public space is not without limits, and some uncertainty may exist on its outer bounds. For instance, it may not apply in particularly dangerous situations, if the recording interferes with the police activity, if it is surreptitious, if it is done by the subject of the police activity, or if the police activity is part of an undercover investigation. As alleged, however, Higginbotham's conduct falls comfortably within the zone protected by the First Amendment. The complaint alleges that he was a professional journalist present to record a public demonstration for broadcast and not a participant in the events leading up to the arrest he was filming. There is nothing in the complaint suggesting that his filming interfered with the arrest. Accordingly, and in light of the case law consensus described above, a reasonable police officer would have been on notice that retaliating against a non-participant, professional journalist for filming an arrest under the circumstances alleged would violate the First Amendment.")

Schoolcraft v. City of New York, 103 F.Supp.3d 465, 511, 514 (S.D.N.Y. 2015), reconsidered in part in Schoolcraft v. City of New York, 133 F.Supp.3d 563 (S.D.N.Y. 2015) ("The QAD and IAB speech, in light of Matthews, is not part-and-parcel of Schoolcraft's role and is therefore protected. Schoolcraft complained of 'corruption involving the integrity control program' in the 81st Precinct, mainly attributable to DI Mauriello, resulting 'in violation of people's civil rights.'. . This is virtually identical to Matthews's speech about his own precinct, when Matthews stated that his own supervisors' policies were resulting in 'unjustified stops, arrests, and summonses because police officers felt forced to abandon their discretion in order to meet their numbers and [were] having an adverse effect on the precinct's relationship with the community.'. . Moreover, Schoolcraft reported this activity outside the chain of command, and separate from his appeal process. These circumstances distinguish Schoolcraft's speech from that in Weintraub and warrant the conclusion that his IAB and QAD reports constituted protectable speech outside of official duties under Matthews IV. . . .As discussed above, and particularly in light of this Court's contrary September 2012 Opinion, Schoolcraft's protected First Amendment right to report to IAB and QAD was not clearly established at the time it was made. Consequently, the First Amendment Claim cannot be pleaded against any officers in their individual capacities.")

Greenaway v. Cty. of Nassau, 97 F. Supp. 3d 225, 240-41 (E.D.N.Y. 2015) ("Here, the Nassau Police Officers' conduct constituted false imprisonment and excessive force, and thus violated a federal right, if Greenaway posed no immediate threat to himself, the officers, or any bystander. As discussed in Sections II and IV above, there are significant factual disputes about whether Greenaway was a threat to anyone. In Garcia, 43 F.Supp.3d at 289–95, the Southern District of New York found no qualified immunity on the first prong of the inquiry where the defendant officer tased someone engaged in non-criminal conduct and where a reasonable fact-finder could have found that the tased person was not a danger to others or actively resisting arrest. If the fact-finder had so found, then the tasing would be a violation of the Fourth Amendment. . . Similarly, the Court here finds that, since a reasonable factfinder could decide that the Nassau police officers' conduct amounted to a violation of the Fourth Amendment, there is no qualified immunity on the first prong. With respect to the second prong, the Court finds that tasing a non-violent mentally ill person engaged in non-criminal conduct violated a federal right that was clearly established on April 25, 2010. . . Since a reasonable fact-finder could find that Greenaway was not actively resisting arrest, the record here precludes qualified immunity for the Nassau police officers.")

Rivera v. Foley, No. 3:14-CV-00196 VLB, 2015 WL 1296258, at *9-10 (D. Conn. Mar. 23, 2015) ("'We look to Supreme Court and Second Circuit precedent existing at the time of the alleged violation to determine whether the conduct violated a clearly established right.'. . At the time of the acts alleged in the Complaint, the right to photograph and record police officers who are engaged in an ongoing investigation was not clearly established as a matter of constitutional law in this Circuit. . . Other circuits are split on this issue. The First Circuit, Seventh Circuit, Eleventh Circuit, and Ninth Circuit all recognize that the First Amendment protects the photography and recording of police officers engaged in their official duties. . .The Third Circuit and the Fourth Circuit take the contrary approach. . . However, '[w]hen neither the Supreme Court nor this [C]ourt has recognized a right, the law of our sister circuits and the holdings of district courts cannot act to render that right clearly established within the Second Circuit.'. . Moreover, the Court notes that in cases where the right to record police activity has been recognized by our sister circuits, it appears that the protected conduct has typically involved using a handheld device to photograph or videotape at a certain distance from, and without interfering with, the police activity at issue. . . By contrast, here Plaintiff directed a flying object into a police-restricted area, where it proceeded to hover over the site of a major motor vehicle accident and the responding officers within it, effectively trespassing onto an active crime scene. . . Even if recording police activity were a clearly established right in the Second Circuit, Plaintiff's conduct is beyond the scope of that right as it has been articulated by other circuits. In sum, the Individual Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity with respect to Plaintiff's First Amendment claim concerning the right to photograph police activity.")

[See also Pluma v. City of New York, No. 13 CIV. 2017 LAP, 2015 WL 1623828, at *6-8 & n.4 (S.D.N.Y. Mar. 31, 2015) ("Although some Courts of Appeals have held that the First Amendment protects the right to film the police, neither the Supreme Court nor the Second Circuit has addressed 'the right to photograph and record the police.' Mesa v. City of New York, 09 Civ. 10464, 2013 WL 31002, at *25 (S.D.N.Y. Jan. 3, 2013). . . It consequently remains unclear whether Plaintiff's filming was protected by the First Amendment. . . . [T]he present motion does not raise a qualified immunity defense, and as such the lack of clearly established law on this point does not conclude the Court's analysis. . . . Even granting that Plaintiff engaged in protected activity, however, the Complaint does not allege a causal connection between that activity and the deployment of pepper spray. On its face, the Complaint fails to allege any motivation related to specific protected speech behind the officers' decision to push the barricade and deploy pepper spray. Rather, Plaintiff's briefing relied on the Complaint's subsequent allegations that the NYPD has a practice of applying excessive force against Occupy Wall Street demonstrators as implicitly supplying the alleged motivation. Assuming these allegations raise an inference that the officers were retaliating against Occupy Wall Street speech, Plaintiff still does not allege that he engaged in that particular expressive conduct. The Complaint makes clear that the commotion began near Plaintiff when he was doing nothing other than 'peacefully remain[ing] in the park,' at which point he began to film the police, who shortly thereafter pepper sprayed him and others near him. . . Yet the only allegations about the officers' motivation for pushing the barricade and deploying pepper spray relates to Occupy Wall Street protest activity, not attempts to film the police. . . Although the Complaint alleges that '[t]he police deployed the pepper spray in such a way as to strike those present holding cameras, including the Plaintiff,' that statement does not suggest that the officers' were substantially motivated by a desire to retaliate against Plaintiff's journalistic activities. . . Rather, the only specific allegation of motive is 'the intention of creating the maximum possible confusion and suffering among the protesters,' which again focuses only on protest activity in which Plaintiff has not alleged he participated. . . Given that Plaintiff was admittedly 'a bystander and citizen journalist witnessing the event,' rather than a protester participating in Occupy Wall Street expressive conduct, the Complaint on its face fails to allege that the police were motivated by Plaintiff's own protected activity when they caused his injury. . . Accordingly, the Complaint fails to raise a plausible claim for First Amendment retaliation, and that cause of action is dismissed. To the extent Plaintiff moves to amend this claim, his proposed amended complaint does nothing to compensate for the defects in this cause of action; indeed, it does not appear to revise any allegations relating to the officers' motivation or Plaintiff's expressive activity. As such, any amendment of this claim would be futile, and Plaintiff is denied leave to amend his First Amendment retaliation cause of action.")]

Poventud v. City of New York, No. 07 CIV. 3998 DAB, 2015 WL 1062186, at *9-10 (S.D.N.Y. Mar. 9, 2015) ("Defendants attempt to avoid a finding that the law was clearly established by defining Plaintiff's constitutional right to having Defendant Umlauft 'prepare a DD5 or otherwise document the photo identification procedure involving Francisco Poventud,' (Defs.' Mot. Summ. J. 19). Their limited definition of the right is too narrow, and totally unsupported by any case law. Plaintiff's right to Brady evidence is not tied to how an officer documents eyewitness evidence; it is based on the officer's obligation to present that evidence and the Government's disclosure of it to the defense where necessary. That Defendant Umlauft had to disclose exculpatory and impeachment evidence to the prosecutor, and that disclosure by the prosecutor to the defense was required in time for it to be effectively used at trial was clearly established. . . . In addition to Second Circuit case law, the NYPD and district attorney's policies and practices demonstrate that Brady obligations related to photo identification procedures and disclosure of exculpatory evidence were clearly established and that reasonable police officers would have known about them.")

Turczyn ex rel. McGregor v. City of Utica, No. 6:13-CV-1357 GLS/ATB, 2014 WL 6685476, at *4-5 (N.D.N.Y. Nov. 26, 2014) ("Unlike Town of Castle Rock v. Gonzales . . . or Neal v. Lee County . . . cases in which police had limited interaction with either the victim or killer prior to the victim's demise, and upon which defendants rely for dismissal of the claim against Shanley, . . . the allegations here go substantially farther. Turczyn alleges several occasions . . . when Shanley knew of Anderson's threatening acts and did nothing, which arguably communicated to him prior assurances that there would be no penalty to pay for his conduct. . . . Okin has specifically recognized the liability that may arise under these circumstances. . . .The amended complaint also pleads facts that demonstrate, at this juncture, egregious behavior that shocks the contemporary conscience. As in Okin, the allegations here tend to show that Shanley, who was tasked with accomplishing certain goals related to curbing domestic violence, was deliberately indifferent as to whether or not Anderson would make good on his multiple threats against Turczyn's life over a twelve-month-period. . . These allegations sufficiently support that Shanley's affirmative conduct was the product of deliberate indifference that shocks the conscience, and would provide a reasonable jury with a valid basis to so find. . . Finally, Shanley is not entitled to qualified immunity at this juncture. Her argument on this issue is two-fold. First, Shanley asserts that no constitutional violation occurred, and, second, she claims that, even if a constitutional violation occurred, the right was not clearly established. . . The first prong of the argument is easily swept aside by reference to the preceding paragraphs that explain that the amended complaint alleges a cognizable substantive due process violation. As for whether or not the right was clearly established, which is a prerequisite to qualified immunity, . . this question has been resolved by the Second Circuit. On the issue, the court has explained that it is 'clearly established,' under the state-created danger theory, 'that police officers are prohibited from affirmatively contributing to the vulnerability of a known victim by engaging in conduct, whether explicit or implicit, that encourages intentional violence against the victim, and as that is the substantive due process violation alleged here, qualified immunity does not apply.' Okin, 577 F.3d at 434. Accordingly, Shanley is not entitled to qualified immunity at this time.")

Garcia v. Dutchess Cnty., 43 F.Supp.3d 281, 296-98 (S.D.N.Y. 2014) ("Tracy involved pepper spray; it did not involve a taser. But just as in Tracy, a jury here could reasonably determine on this record that Healy no longer posed a threat to the arresting officers at the time he was repeatedly tased. And as in Tracy, the use of force here was 'significant,' 'somewhere in the middle of the nonlethal-force spectrum' and 'on par with pepper spray.'. . It was therefore clearly established law in the Second Circuit as of April 2000 that it was a Fourth Amendment violation to use 'significant' force against arrestees who no longer actively resisted arrest or posed a threat to officer safety, regardless of whether that significant force emanated from a pepper spray canister or the trigger of a taser. . . Decisions involving tasers from at least four other federal courts of appeals make pellucid that the contours of the constitutional right at issue here were indeed clearly established by March 2010. [collecting cases] The fact that many of these decisions involve the use of tasers in dart rather than stun mode is not a dispositive difference, given that both methods of deploying a taser constitute 'significant' force in Fourth Amendment jurisprudence. . . The courts of appeals are in broad agreement that for qualified immunity purposes, 'it does not matter [if] no case [in a particular] court directly addresses the use of a particular weapon; ... an officer is not entitled to qualified immunity on the grounds that the law is not clearly established every time a novel method is used to inflict injury.'. . [collecting cases] Defendant Sistarenik seeks refuge in the Second Circuit's Summary Order in Crowell v. Kirkpatrick, 400 Fed.Appx. 592 (2d Cir.2010), which affirmed a district court's grant of qualified immunity to officers who used a taser in stun mode against individuals who 'actively resisted' arrest for trespass by 'chain[ing] themselves' to a barrel drum and repeatedly refusing to unchain themselves despite warnings that they would be tased if they did not leave the property. Crowell provides no safe harbor for Sistarenik. First and foremost, as a Summary Order, Crowell simply has 'no[ ] ... precedential effect.'. . Second, because Crowell's publication post-dated the March 2010 incident at issue here, Sistarenik could not have relied on that decision as a guide to conduct himself. Third, Crowell 'd[id] not suggest that the use of a taser to effect an arrest is always, or even often, objectively reasonable.'. . Instead, Crowell determined that the totality of the circumstances presented in that case did not amount to a clearly established constitutional violation. Fourth, factual distinctions between Crowell and this case abound. Unlike the Crowell plaintiffs, who continued to resist arrest before being tased, Healy was largely subdued on the floor (or so a jury could reasonably find). And unlike the officers in Crowell who had 'attempted several alternate means' of forcing the plaintiffs to unchain themselves before deploying the taser 'as a last resort,' Sistarenik used the taser even though the officers had already successfully restrained Healy, again, viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to plaintiff. . . For these reasons, the Court concludes that with regard to the particular circumstances of this case, Crowell has neither persuasive nor precedential value. Construed in the light most favorable to plaintiff, the record in this case precludes a grant of qualified immunity in Sistarenik's favor.")

Marchand v. Simonson, 16 F.Supp.3d 97, 117-18 (D. Conn. 2014) ("The Supreme Court has recently stated that 'federal and state courts nationwide are sharply divided on the question whether an officer with probable cause to arrest a suspect for a misdemeanor may enter a home without a warrant while in hot pursuit. . . of that suspect.'. . In Stanton, the Supreme Court held that because the law in this area is unsettled, reasonable officers could disagree as to whether they could enter a home while in continuous pursuit of a misdemeanor suspect, and therefore an officer was entitled to qualified immunity from a Fourth Amendment illegal entry claim arising out of such an incident. . . Here, as set out above, although the undisputed facts did not provide actual probable cause for Simonson to arrest plaintiff, they did provide 'arguable probable cause.'. .As in Stanton, the crimes for which Simonson possessed arguable probable cause, and the crime for which Marchand was arrested, were misdemeanors. As the Court has found that reasonable officers could disagree as to whether Simonson was legally permitted to enter the home or curtilage. . .without a warrant to arrest Marchand for a misdemeanor, Simonson is entitled to qualified immunity and the Court will therefore grant defendants' Motion on plaintiff's Fourth Amendment illegal entry claim.")

Dinler v. City of New York, No. 04 Civ. 7921(RJS)(JCF), 2012 WL 4513352, *11 (S.D.N.Y. Sept. 30, 2012) ("As stated above with respect to the Fulton Street arrests, the law of individualized probable cause was clearly established well before August 31, 2004. Accordingly, the arresting officers would be entitled to qualified immunity only if they reasonably could have believed that each of the individuals arrested on East 16th Street was involved in unlawful conduct. As noted above, this inquiry turns on the officers' efforts to release innocent bystanders and to make sure that they arrested only those who participated in the unlawful march. Because there are questions of fact concerning whether the police made sufficient efforts to clear innocent bystanders from East 16th Street before arresting those who remained, the Court must deny Defendants' motion for summary judgment on the basis of qualified immunity. . . .Based on the undisputed facts, and particularly the video of the Fulton Street march and arrests, the Court finds that there was not even arguable probable cause to make those arrests. At most, reasonable officers could disagree as to whether some of the marchers were obstructing traffic; however, no reasonably competent officer could have believed that all of the marchers on Fulton Street had violated the law and were properly subject to arrest. As noted above, it was clearly established by 2004 that an officer must have individualized probable cause to arrest an individual and that mere proximity to illegal conduct does not establish probable cause with respect to an individual.")

Warney v. City of Rochester, 536 F.Supp. 285, 295, 296 (W.D.N.Y. 2008) ("Having determined that Warney did have a right to disclosure of the exculpatory material, the analysis turns upon whether that right is one that was 'clearly established' in 2005 or early 2006. In this respect, I believe that Gauger and Harper, which found that the prosecutors were ultimately entitled to qualified immunity based solely on the lack of voluminous case law to 'clearly establish' the convicted plaintiff's due process rights to disclosure, missed the mark by neglecting to examine whether the due process right to prompt post-conviction disclosure of exculpatory evidence is one of which a reasonable prosecutor would have known. . . Based upon the facts alleged in the complaint, I find that plaintiff's allegations suggest that this is one of the 'rare cases, where the constitutional violation is patently obvious' and where 'widespread compliance with [the] clearly apparent law may have prevented the issue from previously being litigated' to an appreciable extent. . . Implicit in the prosecutor's duty to accomplish the 'dual aim of our criminal justice system[:] 'that guilt shall not escape or innocence suffer,' U.S. v. Nobles, 422 U.S. 225, 230 (1975), quoting Berger, 295 U.S. at 88, is an ongoing obligation to disclose to the imprisoned, within a reasonable time, evidence which falls into the prosecutor's hands which compellingly and forcefully exonerates the prisoner. In short, whether or not he was conversant with the holdings in Harper and Gauger, no reasonable prosecutor in 2005 or early 2006 could have believed that it was constitutionally permissible to withhold or conceal evidence from a convicted citizen, which had substantial power to exonerate him. . . . . Again, the prosecutors here do not dispute that at some point after their receipt of the exculpatory evidence, they were constitutionally required to disclose it to Warney. The crux of the parties' debate is simply whether, under the facts pleaded in the complaint, the 'clearly established' duty was one that arose at the time the prosecutors learned of the exculpatory evidence, or at some later time. . . . Thus, the question becomes whether the prosecutors' disclosure of the exculpatory evidence after the period alleged in the complaint, 72 days at the minimum and potentially several months, comprised reasonably timely disclosure as a matter of law, such that the prosecutors are entitled to qualified immunity . Upon examination of the circumstances as alleged in the complaint, I find that it was not.")

Saleh v. City of New York, 2007 WL 4437167, at *9 (S.D.N.Y. Dec. 17, 2007) ("Defendants urge that a reasonable NYPD officer would have no reason to believe that alerting ICE to the presence of illegal aliens constitutes a constitutional violation. By so framing the issue, however, defendants miss the point. This case is not about whether NYPD officers can alert ICE when they encounter illegal aliens, but whether they can retaliate against individuals who file police-misconduct grievances by making referrals to ICE. With respect to such retaliation, the law is clear: '[t]he rights to complain to public officials and to seek administrative and judicial relief are protected by the First Amendment.' . . When officials take adverse action against those who exercise this right, they can be held liable for a constitutional violation. . . A defendant's ability to justify the purported adverse action on non-retaliatory grounds is irrelevant because ' A[a]n act in retaliation for the exercise of a constitutional right is actionable under section 1983 even if the act, when taken for different reasons, would have been proper."'. . Accordingly, it may be sound practice for NYPD officers to alert ICE when they encounter unlawful aliens under normal circumstances, but when they do so for retaliatory purposes, they run afoul of the Constitution. . . In light of this firmly established law, it would have been clear to a reasonable officer that reporting Saleh to ICE in retaliation for filing a CCRB complaint violated the First Amendment to the Constitution. Accordingly, the individual defendants are not entitled to qualified immunity.") Garcia v. Brown, 442 F.Supp.2d 132, 144, 145 (S.D.N.Y. 2006) ("After Dwares, the law in this Circuit clearly provides that police officers who give express permission to a private citizen to injure another are violating the injured person's Due Process rights. But not until Pena-which came down a year after the events that are the subject of this lawsuit–was it clearly settled that giving implicit permission for a private civil rights violation qualified as unconstitutional. Indeed, the Second Circuit dismissed the case against the defendants in Pena on qualified immunity grounds. The question, then, is whether the facts of this case are closer to those of Dwares than of Pena. If the former, the right was clearly established at the time of the alleged wrongdoing; if the latter, it was not. I conclude that the facts of this case are far closer to those of Dwares than of Pena. . . . Because the facts of this case are far closer to those of Dwares than of Pena, I conclude that Officer Brown does not qualify for qualified immunity under the second prong of Harlow."), aff'd, 2008 WL 681340 (2d Cir. Mar. 11, 2008).

Shapiro v. City of Glen Cove, No. CV 03-0280(WDW), 2005 WL 1076292, at *26 (E.D.N.Y. May 5, 2005) (not reported) ("The 'appropriate inquiry is, therefore, how closely analogous' the defendants' allowing media to enter and remain in the building is to actions by police that had been held unconstitutional at the time the events took place, that is, in January 2000. . . Here, the unconstitutionality of the defendants' alleged acts was not apparent, because the relevant cases– Wilson and Ayeni–did not set forth with the requisite specificity the right to be free from media presence during a search of a building at which the claimant had only a diminished expectation of privacy and where the claimant was not present during the media intrusion. Both Wilson and Ayeni emphasized the violation of the plaintiffs in their homes, and, while Lauro held that the holdings of the earlier cases were not limited to the home, Lauro was decided after January 18, 2000 and cannot be considered in the inquiry into whether the law that they enunciate was 'well-established.' Thus, reasonable police officers could have construed Wilson and Ayeni as being applicable only to media presence in a home. Moreover, Wilson, Hanlon and Ayeni involved situations in which the government actors had expressly invited or arranged for the media to be present, which is not the case here. Further, in those cases the plaintiffs were themselves present at the site and personally subjected to the media intrusion, with the plaintiffs in Wilson and Ayeni . . . appearing in the photographs or video footage that the media took. The relevant cases are, in short, insufficiently analogous to the facts of this case to allow the court to find that 'a reasonable police officer should clearly have been able to discern' that allowing the media to enter 19 Eastway Drive and record the events 'infringed merely different aspects of the same previously defined constitutional right' enunciated in the earlier cases. . . Finally, even if the right that Shapiro alleges was violated was well-established in January 2000, we cannot say that the defendants were unreasonable for failing to reach that conclusion at the time, and they are entitled to qualified immunity on the media ride-along claim.").

Young v. Goord, No. 01 CV 0626(JG), 2005 WL 562756, at *8 (E.D.N.Y. Mar. 10, 2005)(not reported) ("Assuming arguendo a clearly established right not only to have prison officials react promptly to new legislation in new cases, but also to apply that legislation to pending proceedings that are based on pre-legislation events, the question then would be how fast must the reaction be? As Young's counsel put it at oral argument: 'The question is how quickly after the statute did they have to react to it.'. . Given the undisputed facts alleged by Young–the statute became effective on September 22, 2000; 25 days later, Annucci instructed all superintendents about the law and directed them to comply; and by the following day all of the sanctions against Young were lifted– there are no set of facts on which Young could be entitled to relief. DOCS's response to RLUIPA was admirably swift. No one could reasonably suggest that the defendants' belief that they acted quickly enough to satisfy the Constitution was either incorrect or objectively unreasonable.").

Garcia v. Scoppetta, 289 F.Supp.2d 343, 353 (E.D.N.Y. 2003) ("The individual defendants in this case are entitled to qualified immunity. Even accepting the allegations of plaintiff's complaint as true, she fails to state a claim of violation of clearly established law. The law of the Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit does not conclusively support the existence of the right in question. Its decision in Nicholson v. Scoppetta certifying key issues to the New York Court of Appeals indicates that critical areas of the law in this field are not yet established. Although the Nicholson opinion focuses on the uncertainty surrounding the law on removals, it is also relevant to prosecutions for neglect. One of the questions the Court certified to the New York Court of Appeals concerns the definition of a 'neglected child' under the New York Family Court Act and whether it includes instances in which the sole allegation of neglect is allowing the child to witness domestic violence. Such a determination is relevant to whether defendants may prosecute mothers for neglect on this basis alone. In the absence of clearly established law on what constitutes a neglected child, defendants can not reasonably have been expected to know whether or not the initiation of neglect proceedings against plaintiff violated her rights. They are entitled to qualified immunity.").

Brooks v. Berg, 270 F. Supp.2d 302, 311, 312 (N.D.N.Y. 2003) ("[T]he Second Circuit has held that defendants who act pursuant to a facially invalid policy are not entitled to qualified immunity. . . . As noted above, Section 1.31 of the DOCS Health Services Policy Manual provides for the continued treatment of inmates who were diagnosed with GID prior to incarceration. The policy's silence regarding the treatment of transsexual inmates who were not diagnosed with GID prior to incarceration is apparently read by prison officials to indicate that DOCS will not provide any treatment to these inmates. While Defendants rely heavily on this policy as justification for their actions, they do not explain the puzzling distinction that the policy makes between those inmates who were diagnosed before incarceration and those who were diagnosed after being incarcerated. Surely inmates with diabetes, schizophrenia, or any other serious medical need are not denied treatment simply because their conditions were not diagnosed prior to incarceration. . . . This blanket denial of medical treatment is contrary to a decided body of case law. Prisons must provide inmates with serious medical needs some treatment based on sound medical judgment. There is no exception to this rule for serious medical needs that are first diagnosed in prison. Prison officials are thus obliged to determine whether Plaintiff has a serious medical need and, if so, to provide him with at least some treatment. Prison officials cannot deny transsexual inmates all medical treatment simply by referring to a prison policy which makes a seemingly arbitrary distinction between inmates who were and were not diagnosed with GID prior to incarceration. In light of the numerous cases which hold that prison officials may not deny transsexual inmates all medical attention, especially when this denial is not based on sound medical judgment, the Court finds that Defendants have failed to establish as a matter of law that their actions were objectively reasonable."), vacated in part by Brooks v. Berg, 289 F.Supp.2d 286 (N.D.N.Y. 2003).

Small v. City of New York, 274 F. Supp.2d 271, 281 (E.D.N.Y. 2003) ("The City and the individual officer defendants argue that qualified immunity protects them from plaintiffs' substantive due process claim of the right to be free of state created danger because the contours of the state created danger doctrine are not clearly established in this Circuit. That argument is without merit. The Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit decided Dwares in 1993. Thus, for at least a decade, officials in this Circuit have been on notice that police action which emboldens private citizens to injure others may give rise to a substantive due process violation.").

THIRD CIRCUIT

Walker v. Coffey, 905 F.3d 138, 144, 148-50 (3d Cir. 2018) ("[F]or purposes of qualified immunity, we must consider, at a minimum, whether it is clearly established that the Fourth Amendment affords an employee, such as Walker, the right to have the contents of her work emails remain free from a law enforcement search, absent a warrant or valid exception to the warrant requirement. Because we conclude that such a right is not clearly established—especially where, as here, the employer ultimately produces the emails to law enforcement—we hold that Appellees are entitled to qualified immunity. . . . [W]e would be hard put to find that Walker enjoyed a clearly established right to privacy in the content of her work emails. But because this case involves Walker's work emails, which were produced to law enforcement by her employer, Penn State, our inquiry does not end there. As explained below, those facts remove any doubt that Walker has failed to allege a violation of a clearly established constitutional right. . . . We emphasize that nothing in this opinion should be taken as condoning the actions of Appellees in this case. On the contrary we are dismayed by their reliance on an invalid subpoena to procure the documents that they sought. And we add a note of caution that, under slightly difference circumstances, similar actions might well lead us to a conclusion opposite from the one we reach today. But improper conduct alone does not result in a forfeiture of qualified immunity. . . Rather, the relevant question is whether, under the particular circumstances of this case, Appellees' conduct violated Walker's clearly established constitutional rights. Because we conclude that it did not, Appellees are entitled to qualified immunity.")

Munchinski v. Solomon, No. 17-2633, 2018 WL 4090881, at *6-7 (3d Cir. Aug. 28, 2018) (not reported) ("Our decision in Perdomo. . . clearly established that a defendant had a right to exculpatory evidence in the hands of the police, not just evidence physically possessed by the prosecutors. But at the time, the prosecution team's disclosure requirements did not extend to evidence that the defendant, with due diligence, should have discovered on his own. Specifically, '[e]vidence [was] not considered to be suppressed if the defendant either knew or should have known of the essential facts permitting him to take advantage of any exculpatory evidence.'. . In sum, Warman violated clearly established law if he suppressed or withheld favorable and material evidence in possession of police or prosecutors, but only if Munchinski, in the exercise of diligence, could not have discovered that evidence himself.")

Kane v. Barger, 902 F.3d 185, 188-95 (3d Cir. 2018) ("Altogether, the record—again, viewed in the light most favorable to Kane—supports the inference that Barger acted for his own personal gratification, rather than investigative ends, in both touching Kane and photographing her intimate bodily areas with his personal cell phone in violation of department policy. That is conscience-shocking behavior. Thus, Barger violated Kane's right to bodily integrity. . . . Here, the right at issue is an individual's right not to be sexually fondled and illicitly photographed by a police officer investigating his or her case, for the officer's own gratification. Thus, based on the above, '[t]he ultimate question is whether the state of the law when the offense occurred' gave Barger 'fair warning' that his conduct violated this right. . . We conclude that it did. Intuitively, it seems absurd to analyze whether the right to be free from an officer's sexual assault was clearly established by case law at the time of Barger's conduct. This is because, given the egregiousness of Barger's violation of Kane's personal security and bodily integrity, the right here is so 'obvious' that it could be deemed clearly established even without materially similar cases. . . Indeed, while Barger has not been convicted of a crime, his actions—viewed in the light most favorable to Kane—resemble the crime of indecent assault in Pennsylvania, where Barger's conduct occurred. . . .Further, at the time of Barger's conduct, both our case law and that of other circuits placed Barger on notice that he acted unconstitutionally.")

Santini v. Fuentes, No. 17-2890, 2018 WL 3408265, at *3 (3d Cir. July 12, 2018) (not reported) ("Here, viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Santini, the District Court considered: whether Plaintiff had a right to be free from the use of force, including the use of pepper spray and strikes from nightsticks, as a non-suspect witness who walked away from an investigatory discussion, and who admitted he (1) unintentionally did not comply with an officer's request to keep his hands visible, and (2) resisted arrest. . . We agree with the District Court that this formulation of the question adequately contextualizes the alleged conduct as Saucier instructs, with consideration of specifics rather than 'broad general proposition[s].'. . This question captures the particular conduct alleged and allows us meaningfully to consider whether the right at issue was clearly established at the time of the alleged violation. We conclude that the right, if it exists, was not clearly established. First, there are no cases directly on point that suggest that this conduct is unlawful. Santini cites several excessive force cases, but none establish a rule for these facts or state a constitutional right that is obviously applicable to this case. Second, the amount of force used was not so significant that the objectively reasonable officer would know it to be unlawful. This is evidenced by the facts that all force stopped as soon as Santini was in handcuffs and that he suffered no significant or lasting injuries. Finally, the objectively reasonable officer would not know the use of force on these facts to be unlawful. Even in the light most favorable to Santini, the facts suggest some level of resistance to Fuhrmann at all stages of the physical interaction and continued resistance, even as officers instructed him to stop resisting. Also relevant is the repeated non-compliance with the instruction to keep hands visible. Even if the right to be free from police use of force in those circumstances exists, the objectionably reasonable officer might not know that. Because qualified immunity protects officers from reasonable error, we conclude that the grant of summary judgment is appropriate.")

Olson v. Ako, 724 F. App'x 160, 165 (3d Cir. 2018) ("Here, the District Court correctly noted that 'a finding of qualified immunity should be made at the earliest possible point,' but then allowed Plaintiffs' claim to proceed without so finding. . . . A defense motion for a more definite statement is appropriate to 'facilitate an early resolution of the qualified immunity issue.'. . Here, Defendants moved alternatively to dismiss or for a more definite statement. When the Court granted their 12(e) motion, they provided Plaintiffs with relevant documents from the underlying criminal matter. Plaintiffs then filed an amended complaint, attaching exhibits including: the arrest warrants for the Plaintiffs, the interviews of M.R. and J.C., the search warrant and Detective Ako's supporting affidavit, the interview with R.W., the investigation report following the execution of the search warrant, and evidence vouchers signed by Defendant Sullivan. The District Court therefore had a record sufficient to rule on qualified immunity. Considering whether the Defendants are immune, the pertinent question 'is whether a reasonable officer could have believed that his or her conduct was lawful, in light of the clearly established law and the information in the officer's possession.'. . The unlawfulness of the conduct must have been placed 'beyond debate' in light of 'controlling authority' or 'a "robust consensus of ... persuasive authority."'. . Here, neither of Plaintiff's generalized Fourth Amendment claims convincingly places Defendants' conduct in the orbit of unlawful, let alone unlawful 'beyond debate.' Indeed, the Supreme Court has emphasized that '[t]he general proposition ... that an unreasonable search or seizure violates the Fourth Amendment is of little help in determining whether the violative nature of particular conduct is clearly established.'. . .Plaintiffs' allegations 'are the kinds of broad propositions of law that cannot guide a court in determining whether a constitutional right is clearly established.'. . And even if we were to consider their allegations at the broad level of generality requested, Plaintiffs have failed to identify, for either claim, a case where an officer in similar circumstances was held to have violated the Fourth Amendment.")

Kedra v. Schroeter, 876 F.3d 424, 435-38, 440-42, 450-52 (3d Cir. 2017) ("Granted, the contours of a given right are necessarily co-extensive with the scope of conduct that violates that right, so that where it would not be clear to 'a reasonable official ... that what he is doing violates [a] right,'. . . the second prong of qualified immunity would not be satisfied regardless of whether the lack of clarity arose from an uncertain theory of liability or from the application of a clearly established theory of liability to a set of facts so novel as to deprive an actor of fair notice of the violative nature of his actions. But where a defendant contends that neither the theory of liability nor the right at issue is clearly established, the reviewing court may need to analyze both to determine conclusively whether the defendant is entitled to qualified immunity. . . .Here, the District Court addressed the 'clearly established' inquiry only in the first sense, determining that the theory of liability was not clearly established. Because we conclude this was error, we also address the inquiry in the second sense, assessing whether, under the facts of this case, the specific right at issue was clearly established. . . . Here the District Court examined one of the elusive aspects of deliberate indifference with which we and other Courts of Appeals have wrestled over time: whether deliberate indifference in the substantive due process context—as opposed to the Eighth Amendment context—may be satisfied using an objective test or only a subjective 'actual knowledge' test. . . In the Eighth Amendment context, the Supreme Court has rejected an objective standard for 'deliberate indifference,' i.e., a standard where liability may be premised on an official's objective 'failure to alleviate a significant risk that he should have perceived but did not,'. . . and the Court has instead explicitly required a showing of 'subjective culpability,'. . . i.e., a showing that 'the official kn[ew] of and disregard[ed] an excessive risk[.]'. . But uncertainty about whether this 'subjective culpability' requirement carried over to pretrial detainees and other plaintiffs asserting substantive due process claims produced a split among the Courts of Appeals. . . That split led us in Sanford to note, in the substantive due process context, 'the possibility that deliberate indifference might exist without actual knowledge of a risk of harm when the risk is so obvious that it should be known,'. . . and to acknowledge shortly thereafter that we 'ha[d] not yet definitively answered the question of whether the appropriate standard in a non-Eighth Amendment substantive due process case is subjective or objective,' Kaucher v. Cty. of Bucks, 455 F.3d 418, 430–31 (3d Cir. 2006). More recently, both the Supreme Court and this Court have spoken to the issue. In Kingsley v. Hendrickson, . . . distinguishing between the different language of the Eighth Amendment and the Due Process Clause and the different nature of those claims, the Supreme Court held that a pretrial detainee claiming a substantive due process violation based on excessive force 'must show ... only that the officers' use of that force was objectively unreasonable' and not 'that the officers were subjectively aware that their use of force was unreasonable.'. . . Consistent with this approach, we too recently embraced an objective standard in the context of a substantive due process claim—in particular, for a claim of state-created danger. In L.R. v. School District of Philadelphia, we denied qualified immunity to a teacher who released a kindergartener to a stranger who then abused the child. . . After reiterating our observation in Sanford that 'deliberate indifference might exist without actual knowledge of a risk of harm when the risk is so obvious that it should be known,'. . we held this standard was met by the allegations in that complaint. . . . Seeking to benefit from the trajectory of this case law, . . . Appellant would have us rely on L.R. to conclude an objective standard of deliberate indifference was clearly established at the time Schroeter shot Kedra and to reverse the District Court on that basis. We reject that invitation, however, because we assess qualified immunity based on the law that was 'clearly established at the time an action occurred,'. . . while L.R. was not decided until nearly two years after the action at issue in this case. That is, regardless of what may be deemed 'clearly established' in the wake of Kingsley and L.R., we must look to the state of the law at the time of shooting. And at that point, as the District Court correctly recognized, it was not yet clearly established whether deliberate indifference in the substantive due process context was governed by an objective or subjective standard. . . The question to which we therefore turn is whether Appellant pleaded deliberate indifference under the subjective test, which was then-clearly established, or under an objective test, which then was not. . . . Contrary to the way that Schroeter and the District Court characterize it, the complaint here clearly and unmistakably alleges facts that support an inference of actual, subjective knowledge of a substantial risk of lethal harm, and neither the Supreme Court nor we have wavered from the well-established principle that a plaintiff may plead and prove deliberate indifference in the substantive due process context using this subjective test. . . . The risk of lethal harm when a firearms instructor skips over each of several safety checks designed to ascertain if the gun is unloaded, points the gun at a trainee's chest, and pulls the trigger is glaringly obvious, and this obviousness supports the inference that the instructor had actual knowledge of the risk of serious harm. . . . '[D]raw[ing] all inferences from the facts alleged in the light most favorable to [Appellant],'. . . the allegations in Appellant's complaint are more than sufficient to state a claim for a state-created danger based on actual knowledge of a substantial risk of serious harm—the subjective theory of deliberate indifference that was then-clearly established. . . .Having concluded that the facts, as alleged, plead the elements of a substantive due process violation under a clearly established theory of liability, we must still contend with Schroeter's argument that there was no precedent sufficiently 'factually similar to the plaintiff's allegations[ ] to put [him] on notice that his ... conduct [was] constitutionally prohibited.'. . .Here, in view of the allegations of the complaint, we define what is at issue as an individual's right not to be subjected, defenseless, to a police officer's demonstration of the use of deadly force in a manner contrary to all applicable safety protocols. . . We then must determine whether the contours of that right are sufficiently clear that 'a reasonable officer would understand that what he is doing violates that right.'. . We typically look to Supreme Court precedent or a consensus in the Courts of Appeals to give an officer fair warning that his conduct would be unconstitutional. . . . We are persuaded that Schroeter had such fair warning at the time of the shooting. This was not merely an accidental discharge of a firearm that happened to be 'point[ed] ... at another officer' at the time. . . Instead, at a training Kedra was required to attend, he was subjected to his training instructor contravening each and every firearm safety protocol by skipping over both required safety checks, treating the firearm as if it were unloaded, pointing the firearm directly at Kedra, and pulling the trigger. Our case law made it clear at that time that state actors may be liable for affirmatively exposing a plaintiff to a deadly risk of harm through 'highly dangerous ... conduct,'. . . or through 'us[ing] their authority as police officers to create a dangerous situation or to make [the victim] more vulnerable to danger had they not intervened,'. . . and that officials are expected to use the benefit of their expertise and professional training when confronted with situations in which they are responsible for preventing harm to other individuals[.]. . Under that case law, no reasonable officer who was aware of the lethal risk involved in demonstrating the use of deadly force on another person and who proceeded to conduct the demonstration in a manner directly contrary to known safety protocols could think his conduct was lawful. . . .In addition to our own case law and that of the Supreme Court, 'we routinely consider decisions by other Courts of Appeals as part of our "clearly established" analysis when we have not yet addressed the specific right asserted by the plaintiff.'. . A closely analogous case from the First Circuit confirms that a reasonable officer would anticipate liability for this conduct. [discussing Marrero-Rodriguez v. San Juan, 677 F.3d 497 (1st Cir. 2012)] . . . In sum, the right alleged to have been violated was clearly established, and Appellant's complaint sufficiently pleads a violation of that right. Accordingly, Schroeter was not entitled to qualified immunity.") Kedra v. Schroeter, 876 F.3d 424, 452-53, 457-58 (3d Cir. Nov. 28, 2017) (Fisher, J., concurring) ("I file this concurrence to explain my belief that the District Court's judgment should be reversed on narrower grounds than those on which the majority relies. . . . The District Court granted Schroeter qualified immunity under the second prong, concluding that it was not clearly established that he could violate a constitutional right without actual knowledge that his actions posed a substantial risk of harm. The majority reverses, concluding that (1) Kedra has pleaded that Schroeter acted with actual knowledge that his actions posed a substantial risk of harm, and (2) the right at issue here was clearly established. . . . I would limit this decision to the narrowest possible grounds, and would reverse solely because of the allegation that Schroeter pleaded guilty to recklessly endangering another person in Pennsylvania court. I do not believe that the other allegations on which the majority relies are sufficient—separately or together—to state a claim. . . . In short, after scrutinizing the entire complaint, I conclude that aside from Schroeter's guilty plea to reckless endangerment, the remaining allegations in Kedra's complaint make out only a strong case of negligence. I do not believe they would be sufficient, by themselves, to state a claim that Schroeter acted with the deliberate indifference required to shock the conscience. . . .To summarize, Kedra adequately pleaded deliberate indifference, and therefore she alleged all four required elements of a state created danger claim. . . Having adequately pleaded her constitutional claim, Kedra has met the first requirement of the qualified immunity analysis: conduct by an officer that violates a federal right. . . I arrive, then, at the second element that must be shown in order to defeat Schroeter's claim of qualified immunity: that 'the right in question was clearly established at the time of the violation.'. . I agree with the majority's conclusion that the right at issue in this case was clearly established—but again, based on different reasoning. . . .The majority defines the right at issue here as 'an individual's right not to be subjected, defenseless, to a police officer's demonstration of the use of deadly force in a manner contrary to all applicable safety protocols.'. . I would define the right more narrowly, and in accordance with my analysis of the first qualified immunity prong in Section I.A., as: a police officer's right not to be subjected to a firearms training in which the instructor acts with deliberate indifference, that is, consciously disregards a known risk of death or great bodily harm. Schroeter's admitted deliberate indifference is crucial, in my opinion, to the conclusion at the first step of the analysis that a right was violated. . . Therefore, in order to narrowly define the right in light of the particular conduct at issue, . . . I would include deliberate indifference in the definition. . . Given the unique facts of this case—namely, Schroeter's guilty plea—I believe it is appropriate to tether the right in question to the standard of care he admitted he breached. The majority's approach, by contrast, suffers from its focus on the violation of 'all applicable safety protocols,' which will inevitably lead to disputes over how many safety protocols need to be violated for qualified immunity to be forfeited. And those disputes, I predict, will devolve into a negligence-type analysis, which precedent clearly forbids. The majority's definition of the right could prove fertile ground for future plaintiffs seeking to lower the bar yet further in § 1983 cases. Turning to whether the right as I define it was clearly established, I conclude that in light of existing case law, a reasonable person could not have believed that it was consistent with Kedra's substantive due process rights to subject him to a firearms training at which the instructor was deliberately indifferent to his safety. Therefore, the right was clearly established. Unlike the majority, I do not read existing cases as being 'fundamentally' or 'materially' similar to this one. . . The lack of on-point precedent gives me pause, because a case's 'present [ation] [of] a unique set of facts and circumstances' can be 'an important indication' that the conduct at issue 'did not violate a clearly established right.'. . Nonetheless, I feel constrained to conclude that Supreme Court and Circuit precedents have 'clearly established' the 'violative nature,'. . . of conducting a firearms training with deliberate indifference to a known risk. To begin with, the deliberate indifference standard was clearly enunciated in the state created danger context more than a decade ago and was clear at the time of Kedra's death in 2014. . . While our state created danger cases are not factually similar to this one—they do not involve police officers conducting firearms training—I cannot see how any reasonable official could believe that acting with deliberate indifference in the police firearms training context would be consistent with trainees' constitutional rights.")

In Re: J & S Properties, LLC, 872 F.3d 138, 143-45 (3d Cir. 2017) ("We . . . hold that bankruptcy trustees are government officials, entitled under Harlow to qualified immunity from § 1983 claims by third parties when they act in their official capacity in a manner that is not contrary to clearly established law. . . .In this case, Swope was not plainly incompetent and did not violate clearly established law. We agree with the Bankruptcy Court that there is a 'dearth of case law on the topic' of whether a bankruptcy trustee may take control of a building which she is obliged to preserve and which is at imminent risk of destruction or damage, especially in the face of the lack of cooperation by a third-party tenant. . . Rather than point to any case balancing a bankruptcy trustee's duties to preserve the estate under her care in the face of 'exigent circumstances' and her duties to a third-party tenant, . . .Phoenician cites black-letter Pennsylvania law indicating that self-help eviction is generally impermissible. . . .The Supreme Court has cautioned that the question of 'objective legal reasonableness' with respect to clearly established precedent should not be applied at too high a level of generality. . . Phoenician makes that mistake by noting that its rights to due process of law and to be free of illegal seizure are 'quite clearly established.'. . But the existence of those clearly established rights sheds no light on whether Swope's actions would violate them in the circumstances presented here. . . The cases Phoenician cites do not approach the level of specificity required for clearly established law. . . .None of the cases upon which Phoenician relies involved a trustee attempting to preserve assets of an estate under her care in the face of past and future damage to those assets. And considering Phoenician's lack of cooperation by giving Swope a key that only opened the outer door, its refusal 'to keep the property adequately heated,' and its failure to meet at the property and maintain insurance, . . . there is no law that clearly establishes the unlawfulness of Swope's actions. . . . It strains credulity to suggest, as Phoenician does, that 'every reasonable official would have understood that what' Swope did constituted an impermissible eviction that violated due process.")

Borrell v. Bloomsburg Univ., 870 F.3d 154, 162-63 (3d Cir. 2017) ("The record indicates that it is hardly 'beyond debate' that Ficca violated Borrell's due process rights. Although many cases have concluded that graduate students at public universities have property interests in continuing their education, . . . those cases do not speak to the right of a clinical student at a private hospital to a hearing or comparable process before termination—even if the natural consequence of that termination is an inability to complete an educational program. The District Court pointed to no cases even suggesting such a right and we are aware of no such case. And the district court cases cited cannot clearly establish law for qualified immunity purposes in any event. . . . In responding to Ficca's qualified immunity argument, Borrell seems to miss the relevant question—would a reasonable official have known that her actions violated a clearly established right? Even if, as Borrell claims, Ficca should have known that Richer's actions were disciplinary and not academic, and Borrell was thus entitled to more process from someone, this does not answer the question of whether Ficca was that person. Given all the factors discussed herein, and given her reasonable understanding that she could not have provided process for the clinical dismissal even if she thought it was necessary in the abstract, the District Court should have granted qualified immunity to Ficca.")

Fields v. City of Philadelphia, 862 F.3d 353, 355-62 (3d Cir. 2017) ("Every Circuit Court of Appeals to address this issue (First, Fifth, Seventh, Ninth, and Eleventh) has held that there is a First Amendment right to record police activity in public. [collecting cases] Today we join this growing consensus. Simply put, the First Amendment protects the act of photographing, filming, or otherwise recording police officers conducting their official duties in public. . . .Defendants ask us to avoid ruling on the First Amendment issue. Instead, they want us to hold that, regardless of the right's existence, the officers are entitled to qualified immunity and the City cannot be vicariously liable for the officers' acts. We reject this invitation to take the easy way out. Because this First Amendment issue is of great importance and the recording of police activity is a widespread, common practice, we deal with it before addressing, if needed, defenses to liability. . . . We have not ruled on the First Amendment right, instead merely holding that at the time of our rulings the claimed right was not clearly established. Kelly v. Borough of Carlisle, 622 F.3d 248 (3d Cir. 2010); True Blue Auctions v. Foster, 528 F. App'x 190 (3d Cir. 2013). In the years since, First Amendment issues from the recording of police activity recur, and they deal directly with constitutional doctrine. With technological progress and the ubiquity of smartphone ownership—especially in the years since our Kelly decision—we are now in an age where the public can record our public officials' conduct and easily distribute that recording widely. This increase in the observation, recording, and sharing of police activity has contributed greatly to our national discussion of proper policing. Consequently, police departments nationwide, often with input from the U.S. Department of Justice, are developing polices addressing precisely these issues, and our opinion can assist in their efforts to comply with the Constitution. Moreover, in the case before us the constitutional question is not 'so factbound that [our] decision [will] provide[ ] little guidance for future cases.'. . All we need to decide is whether the First Amendment protects the act of recording police officers carrying out official duties in public places. We also have excellent briefing on appeal, including counsel for the parties and eight amici, including the U.S. Department of Justice, the Cato Institute, well-known First Amendment law professors, and some of the largest news organizations in the country. We therefore address the First Amendment question before moving to the defenses. . . . The First Amendment protects the public's right of access to information about their officials' public activities. . . .[R]ecording police activity in public falls squarely within the First Amendment right of access to information. As no doubt the press has this right, so does the public. . . .We do not say that all recording is protected or desirable. The right to record police is not absolute. '[I]t is subject to reasonable time, place, and manner restrictions.'. . But in public places these restrictions are restrained. We need not, however, address at length the limits of this constitutional right. Defendants offer nothing to justify their actions. Fields took a photograph across the street from where the police were breaking up a party. Geraci moved to a vantage point where she could record a protestor's arrest, but did so without getting in the officers' way. If a person's recording interferes with police activity, that activity might not be protected. For instance, recording a police conversation with a confidential informant may interfere with an investigation and put a life at stake. But here there are no countervailing concerns. In sum, under the First Amendment's right of access to information the public has the commensurate right to record—photograph, film, or audio record—police officers conducting official police activity in public areas. . . . To determine whether the right is clearly established, we look at the state of the law when the retaliation occurred, here in 2012 (Geraci) and 2013 (Fields). . . To conduct the clearly established inquiry, we 'frame the right "in light of the specific context of the case, not as a broad general proposition,"'. . . as it needs to be 'specific enough to put "every reasonable official" on notice of it.'. . At issue here is Plaintiffs' ability to record the police carrying out official duties in public. We have never held that such a right exists, only that it might. . . In 2010 we held that there was no clearly established right for the public to do so, at least in the context of a police traffic stop. . . Only a few years later in 2013, in a non-precedential opinion, we held that '[e]ven if the distinction between traffic stops and public sidewalk confrontations is [ ] meaningful ... [,] our case law does not clearly establish a right to videotape police officers performing their duties [in 2009].'. . . So to resolve whether the right has become clearly established after these decisions, we must decide whether a 'robust consensus' has emerged that puts the existence of this First Amendment right 'beyond debate.'. . .Plaintiffs contend the absence of Circuit precedent does not end the inquiry, as after the events in Kelly and True Blue the Philadelphia Police Department adopted official policies recognizing the First Amendment right of citizens to record police in public. As plausible as that may be on the surface, it does not win the argument. With one breath Plaintiffs assert that these policies clearly established their legal right, but for purposes of municipal liability (an issue we remand) they vigorously argue that the policies were utterly ineffective in conveying to the officers that this right clearly existed. And Plaintiffs have compiled evidence indicating this was so. . . .As to decisions of other appellate courts relevant to the qualified immunity analysis, Defendants and the District Court argue that those decisions are distinguishable because they involved expressive intent or an intent to distribute. . . .Indeed, the Fifth Circuit just this year recognized that these other appellate decisions did not clearly establish the constitutional right to record. . . Where District Courts in our Circuit have held in favor of the First Amendment right, Defendants also distinguish those cases for requiring expressive act or intent, not just recording alone, once again echoing the reasoning of the District Court here. . . .Whether Defendants and the District Court correctly distinguished these cases, we cannot say that the state of the law at the time of our cases (2012 and 2013) gave fair warning so that every reasonable officer knew that, absent some sort of expressive intent, recording public police activity was constitutionally protected. Accordingly, the officers are entitled to qualified immunity.") Fields v. City of Philadelphia, 862 F.3d 353, 362-65 (3d Cir. 2017) (Nygaard, J., concurring in the part, dissenting in part) ("I agree with the majority that the cause must be remanded. Because I conclude that the First Amendment right at issue is and was clearly established, I dissent. . . .First, as the majority notes, every Circuit Court of Appeals that has considered the issue ruled that there is a First Amendment right to record police activity in public. Four of these decisions were published before the conduct at issue here, and two of them occurred after our decision in Kelly v. Borough of Carlisle, 622 F.3d 248 (3d Cir. 2010), in which we posited that the right was not clearly established at that time. See Am. Civil Liberties Union of Ill. v. Alvarez, 679 F.3d 583 (7th Cir. 2012); Glik v. Cunniffe, 655 F.3d 78 (1st Cir. 2011); Smith v. City of Cumming, 212 F.3d 1332

(11th Cir. 2000); Fordyce v. City of Seattle, 55 F.3d 436 (9th Cir. 1995). . . I am convinced that such a 'robust consensus,' alone, sufficiently grounds a ruling that the right is clearly established. . . However, our record goes far beyond that. The Police Department's official policies explicitly recognized this First Amendment right well before the incidents under review here took place. . . .Although the Directives declared a First Amendment right well ahead of this Court, the Philadelphia Police Department Commissioner had a desire to 'get out ahead' of what he presciently viewed as an inevitable ruling. With all of this, it is indisputable that all officers in the Philadelphia Police Department were put on actual notice that they were required to uphold the First Amendment right to make recordings of police activity. From a practical perspective, the police officers had no ground to claim ambiguity about the boundaries of the citizens' constitutional right here. Mindful of the established trend among the Circuit Courts of Appeals, this combined with this clear Guidance from the Commissioner sufficiently grounds a conclusion that the right to record official, public police activity was clearly established and 'beyond debate.'. . However, this, too, ignores another piece of the context of this case that should be considered as part of the 'reasonable official' inquiry. The majority cites to the 2011 article of Seth F. Kreimer. . . in which he notes that, given the ubiquity of personal electronic devices with cameras, '[w]e live, relate, work, and decide in a world where image capture from life is routine, and captured images are part of ongoing discourse, both public and private. Capture of images has become an adjunct to memory and an accepted medium of connection and correspondence.' Seth F. Kreimer, Pervasive Image Capture and the First Amendment: Memory, Discourse, and the Right to Record, 159 U. Pa. L. Rev. 335, 337 (2011). If we are to assess the issue from a reasonable officer perspective, we cannot artificially remove him or her from this widespread societal phenomenon. (Indeed, it is not unreasonable to speculate that most—if not all—of the police officers themselves possessed such a personal electronic device at the time that the incidents underlying these cases took place.) A reasonable police officer would have understood, first-hand, the significance of this proliferation of personal electronic devices that have integrated image capture into our daily lives, making it a routine aspect of the way in which people record and communicate events. Apart from any court ruling or official directive, the officers' own lived experience with personal electronic devices (both from the perspective of being the one who is recording and one who is being recorded) makes it unreasonable to assume that the police officers were oblivious to the First Amendment implications of any attempt by them to curtail such recordings. As I noted above, I concur with the majority's analysis and conclusions regarding the existence of a First Amendment right to record, and agree that the case against the City of Philadelphia should be remanded for further proceedings. However, in light of the social, cultural, and legal context in which this case arose, I am convinced that—in this unique circumstance—no reasonable officer could have denied at the time of the incidents underlying these cases that efforts to prevent people from recording their activities infringed rights guaranteed by the First Amendment. For these reasons, I dissent from the majority's conclusion that the police officers are immune from suit.")

De Ritis v. McGarrigle, 861 F.3d 444, 458 n.12 (3d Cir. 2017) ("As we conclude that there was no constitutional right violated by Roger under then-existing case law, a fortiori, such right was not ' "clearly established" at the time of the challenged conduct,'. . . and thus Roger was entitled to qualified immunity on that independent ground. The District Judge here diligently identified the relevant case law and properly recognized as a general matter that a public employee has a clearly established right to 'alleg[e] misconduct or wrongdoing by public officials.'. . . That description of the right, however, is so general as to encompass not only cases where speech alleging misconduct or wrongdoing is protected, . . . but also those where it is not[.] Under our case law, the 'clearly established' inquiry requires reference not to such 'broad general proposition[s],' but to precedent that is 'factually similar to the plaintiff's allegations,' based on 'the specific context of the case.'")

Bag of Holdings, LLC v. City of Philadelphia, 682 F. App'x 94, ___ (3d Cir. 2017) ("BOH does not cite, and the Court has not found, any precedent clearly establishing that operation of a governmental land sale process which results in more favorable treatment for friends and political contributors amounts to an equal protection violation. To now say that Olech established that principle of law would be too near to concluding that any disparate treatment by a government actor without a rational basis—regardless of the factual circumstance—so clearly establishes a violation of the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment that the question is beyond debate. Such a broad pronouncement would fail to define the right at issue with sufficient specificity, and it would run contrary to a long-recognized purpose of qualified immunity: to shield public officials from potentially disabling threats of constitutional liability except in those situations where they have fair warning that their conduct violates federal law. . .Accordingly, we agree with the District Court's conclusion that Councilman Johnson is entitled to qualified immunity.")

Holt v. Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, No. 15-3302, 2017 WL 1048055, at *6 (3d Cir. Mar. 20, 2017) (not published) ("We start with the First Amendment retaliation claim, for which a plaintiff must prove: (1) constitutionally protected conduct; (2) an adverse action sufficient to deter a person of ordinary firmness from exercising his constitutional rights; and (3) a causal link between the constitutionally protected conduct and the retaliatory action. . . Our Circuit has not considered whether the initiation of an internal investigation can constitute an 'adverse action' for purposes of a First Amendment retaliation claim, and our sister circuits are split on the issue. Compare Breaux v. City of Garland, 205 F.3d 150, 158 (5th Cir. 2000) ("Investigating alleged violations of departmental policies ... [is] not [an] adverse employment action[.]"), with Dahlia v. Rodriguez, 735 F.3d 1060, 1078–79 (9th Cir. 2013) (holding that placement on administrative leave pending discipline can constitute an adverse action for a First Amendment retaliation cases). This disagreement among our sister courts indicates that Winterbottom is entitled to qualified immunity. After all, '[i]f judges thus disagree on a constitutional question, it is unfair to subject [a public official] to money damages for picking the losing side of the controversy.' Wilson v. Layne, 526 U.S. 603, 618 (1999). We next consider Holt's racial discrimination claim, where we apply the McDonnell Douglas burden-shifting framework. See Stewart v. Rutgers, The State Univ., 120 F.3d 426, 431–32 (3d Cir. 1997). At the first step of the McDonnell Douglas framework, Holt must establish a prima facie case of discrimination, which includes proving by a preponderance of the evidence that he suffered an 'adverse employment action.'. . In the Title VII context, we recently held that suspension with pay pending an internal investigation does not constitute an adverse employment action. . .And because of the overlap between Title VII claims and constitutional discrimination claims, we have applied Title VII caselaw to equal protection claims. . . Given our holding in Jones and the close relationship between Title VII and equal protection claims, it would have been reasonable for Winterbottom to conclude that the initiation of an IAD investigation would not create liability under the Equal Protection Clause. She is thus entitled to qualified immunity.")

Pearson v. Prison Health Service, 850 F.3d 526, 542 n.6 (3d Cir. 2017) ("Nurse Rhodes argued that he was entitled to qualified immunity because it was not clearly established at the time of these events that an official would be liable for a delay in care without expert medical evidence that the inmate suffered harm as a result. This fundamentally misunderstands the qualified immunity inquiry. Qualified immunity requires us to ask whether a reasonable official would have understood, at the time of the challenged conduct, that what he or she was doing violated an established right. Ashcroft v. al-Kidd, 563 U.S. 731, 741 (2011).That analysis cannot turn on facts that could not be known to an official at the time, like whether the plaintiff would ultimately be able to produce expert testimony that the delay resulted in harm. It was sufficiently clear at the time of these events that exposing an inmate to the kind of severe and protracted pain and mental anxiety alleged in this case could expose an official to Eighth Amendment liability.")

Rossiter v. City of Philadelphia, 674 F.App'x 192, ___ (3d Cir. 2016) ("Rossiter alleged that Ramsey and the Department retaliated against him because he exercised his First Amendment right to be a member of the FOP, his union. The District Court found a clearly established right of a public-sector employee to be a member of an association. . . However, what it did not do was focus specifically on the kind of associational activity present in this case. . .That a public employee has a right to associate with a union is unchallenged. What is contested here is whether there is an established right of that employee in a pending disciplinary proceeding to associate passively with a union whose representatives oppose internal policies. . . .In Sanguigni, we emphasized Labov 'd[id] not make clear' whether Connick's public concern requirement for public employee speech applies in associational cases. . .We recognized that, in the years since we decided Labov, our Court had not settled the question of whether a public employee must demonstrate that the union representative's advocacy raises a matter of public concern in bringing a claim for expressive association. . . We reserved judgment on whether the public concern requirement applies to association claims when those claims do not allege retaliation for the member's speech. . .Our sister Circuits are split on whether an employee must demonstrate that the protected activity relates to a matter of public concern to trigger First Amendment associational rights and consequent protections against retaliation. [collecting cases] . . . .We accordingly find no consensus of authority that leveraging a claim against a specific union member facing good faith disciplinary action in an effort to settle internal police affairs implicates a clearly established constitutional right. What the Deputy Commissioner attempted to resolve by tethering Rossiter's case to resolution of union opposition to the Disciplinary Code may not be Hoyle, but it was not established as unconstitutional when it occurred. Therefore, Ramsey and the Department are entitled to qualified immunity, and we reverse the decision of the District Court and remand this case for it to enter judgment in their favor.")

L.R. v. School District of Philadelphia, 836 F.3d 235, 248-50 (3d Cir. 2016) ("Defendants argue that the District Court defined Jane's right at the highest level of generality: '[Jane's] Fourteenth Amendment right to bodily integrity ... under the state-created danger theory.'. . We agree that this definition is too broad. Individuals indeed have a broad substantive due process right to be free from 'unjustified intrusions on personal security.'. . In light of the specific allegations in the complaint, however, the right at issue here is an individual's right to not be removed from a safe environment and placed into one in which it is clear that harm is likely to occur, particularly when the individual may, due to youth or other factors, be especially vulnerable to the risk of harm. Framed in this way, and surveying both our case law and that of our sister circuits, we conclude that this right was clearly established at the time of Littlejohn's actions. Although there is no case that directly mirrors the facts here, as in Estate of Lagano, there are sufficiently analogous cases that should have placed a reasonable official in Littlejohn's position on notice that his actions were unlawful. . . .[W]e conclude that the state of the law in 2013 was sufficiently clear to put Littlejohn on notice that permitting a kindergarten student to leave his classroom with an unidentified adult could lead to a deprivation of that student's substantive due process rights. . . .State-created danger cases often involve unsettling facts and this case is no different. Even so, our resolution of the legal issues is straightforward. Exposing a young child to an obvious danger is the quintessential example of when qualified immunity should not shield a public official from suit. Accordingly, the order of the District Court is affirmed.")

Mammaro v. New Jersey Div. of Child Prot. & Permanency, 814 F.3d 164, 169-70 (3d Cir. 2016) ("In bringing a substantive due process claim, one alleges that the government has abused its power in an arbitrary manner that 'shocks the conscience.'. . In this case Mammaro alleged the arbitrary interference with her right to parent her child. . . She contends that the right at issue is her right to be free from the temporary removal of her child unless there is 'some reasonable and articulable evidence giving rise to a reasonable suspicion that a child has been abused or is in imminent danger of abuse.'. . This definition is too broad for purposes of qualified immunity, however. We must frame clearly established law 'in light of the specific context of the case, not as a broad general proposition.'. . . We thus consider the substantive due process right of Mammaro as a parent in light of the specific allegations in her amended complaint. She contends that the caseworkers removed her child after she violated the restrictions on her contact with D.M. by removing the child from supervised housing. At the time of the removal, Mammaro alleges that there was insufficient evidence of past abuse or risk of future abuse by her to justify D.M.'s removal. Even if so, for Mammaro's case to have legs she must show that the law was so well established at that time a reasonable caseworker would have understood that temporarily removing a child in those circumstances would violate substantive due process. . . We conclude that there was no consensus of authority that temporarily removing a child after the parent takes the child from approved housing violates substantive due process. . . . The Court has never found a substantive due process violation when state agencies temporarily remove a child, whatever the circumstances of the removal. Accordingly, no Supreme Court precedent clearly establishes that D.M.'s temporary removal from her mother's custody violated substantive due process. Likewise, assuming a consensus of persuasive authority could clearly establish a right, there is no consensus that removing D.M. was an unconstitutional interference with the parent-child relationship.")

Estep v. Mackey, 639 F. App'x 870, 872-74 & n.4 (3d Cir. 2016) ("Here, the District Court's order turned on its view that there were disputed issues of material fact, but it reached this conclusion without identifying with the requisite level of specificity the right that was allegedly violated and whether that right was clearly established at the time of the conduct at issue. This omission constitutes a legal error that requires us to vacate the order denying summary judgment. . . In this case, the District Court defined the right at issue as the Fourth Amendment right to be free from the excessive use of force. This formulation lacks the required level of specificity and does not address the question that needs to be answered in this context because it does not describe the specific situation that the officers confronted. . . As a result, we will remand to the District Court to allow it to more specifically identify the right at issue. After the District Court formulates the right, its second task will be to determine if that right was clearly established at the time the taser was used against Baum. While there need not be a case on point, 'existing precedent must have placed the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate.'. . Put differently, while a court need not find that 'the very action in question has previously been held unlawful,'. . to be clearly established, it must 'conclude that the firmly settled state of the law, established by a forceful body of persuasive precedent, would place a reasonable official on notice that his actions obviously violated a clearly established constitutional right.' . . If the District Court determines that such a right was clearly established, it would then determine whether the facts it already correctly found to be in dispute are material to assessing whether that right was violated. . . . Our Court has not yet spoken in a precedential opinion about taser use and we decline to do so here, as the District Court has not specifically identified the right allegedly violated and whether it was clearly established at the time Baum was tased. As stated in the text, the identification of the right depends upon the factual circumstances of the case.")

Michtavi v. Scism, 808 F.3d 203, 207 (3d Cir. 2015) ("Barkes makes clear that there must be precedent indicating that the specific right at issue is clearly established. There is no Supreme Court or appellate precedent holding that prison officials must treat retrograde ejaculation, infertility, or erectile dysfunction; in fact, the weight of authority is to the contrary. The Magistrate Judge relied on Skinner, but Skinner establishes only that states may not sterilize prisoners; it does not hold that prisoners are entitled to treatment for infertility or sexual problems. The Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit has held that a prisoner is not entitled to treatment for erectile dysfunction. . . . Because there is no authority establishing—let alone 'clearly' establishing—a right for prisoners to receive treatment for a right for prisoners to receive treatment for conditions resulting in impotence and/or infertility, such as retrograde ejaculation or erectile dysfunction, Appellants are entitled to qualified immunity.")

Young v. Martin, 801 F.3d 172, 180 & n.8, 182 (3d Cir. 2015) ("[I]n Hope, the Supreme Court applied its excessive force jurisprudence for the first time to a prisoner's allegation that his placement in mechanical restraints was unconstitutional. We conclude, under Hope, that Young's claims should be analyzed under the excessive force test and that such analysis demonstrates that the District Court's grant of summary judgment was in error. . . .We conclude from our independent review of the videotape and record evidence that the District Court failed to draw all reasonable inferences in Young's favor and that, when those inferences are properly drawn, there are genuine disputes of material fact as to whether the Defendants' use of the restraint chair in this case violated the Eighth Amendment. . . .In sum, applying the use of excessive force test, analyzing the record under the criteria identified in Hope, and drawing all inferences in favor of Young as the nonmoving party, we cannot say that 'there is no genuine dispute as to any material fact and the movant is entitled to judgment as a matter of law.'. . .The Defendants also ask us—in a single sentence—to affirm on the ground of qualified immunity. The District Court did not reach the issue and the availability of the defense was not briefed on appeal. In Hope, the Supreme Court held that the officers were not entitled to qualified immunity because their actions violated 'clearly established statutory or constitutional rights of which a reasonable person would have known.'. . We will leave this issue for the District Court to address in the first instance on remand, considering (1) whether 'the state of the law' in 2009, including Hope, gave the Defendants 'fair warning that their alleged treatment of [Young] was unconstitutional,'. . . and (2) whether Young's confinement in the restraint chair violated prison regulations of which the Defendants were aware[.]. . . While we conclude that the particular claims here concerning the use of mechanical restraints are properly analyzed under the excessive force test, we note that the record in this case, reflecting Young's detention in solitary confinement for over six years, and the DOJ investigative report, detailing prolonged solitary confinement at SCI–Greene and five other Pennsylvania prisons, raises serious concerns under the Eighth Amendment's conditions of confinement test. As Justice Kennedy recently observed, '[y]ears on end of near-total isolation exact a terrible price.' Davis v. Ayala, —– U.S. ——, ——, 135 S.Ct. 2187, 2210, 192 L.Ed.2d 323 (2015) (Kennedy, J., concurring)[.]")

Potts v. Holt, 617 F. App'x 148, 151-53 (3d Cir. 2015) ("The District Court determined that defendants had not adduced evidence sufficient to show that their suspension of the certified meals program was reasonable under Turner or that it satisfied the RFRA standard. We agree with these determinations because, inter alia, defendants did not establish the nature or even the existence of any nexus between the salmonella outbreak/lockdown and their suspension of certified religious meals. . .The District Court concluded, however, that Potts's rights were not clearly established at the time of defendants' alleged conduct. . . . The District Court defined the right at issue in this case as the right to 'religious meals during a prison-wide lockdown that resulted after an outbreak of food poisoning (or disease generally) in the inmate population.'. . The District Court further concluded that such a right was not clearly established because there is no case law addressing an inmate's right to religious meals in a similar factual scenario. There does indeed appear to be a dearth of such case law. . . . 'Even though there may be no previous precedent directly on point,' however, 'an action can still violate a clearly established right where a general constitutional rule already identified in the decisional law applies with obvious clarity.'. .Such is the case here. At the time of defendants' alleged conduct, it was clearly established in this Circuit that prisoners' general right to freely exercise their religion gives them the more specific right to be served religiously acceptable meals while in prison. . . It also had long been established that prison officials may constitutionally infringe that specific First Amendment right when prison administration so requires, but only when the infringement is reasonable under the Turner factors. . . And RFRA clearly establishes that defendants may not substantially burden an inmate's exercise of religion without satisfying the standard set forth in 42 U.S.C. § 2000bb–1(b). Thus, at the time of defendants' alleged conduct, it was clearly established both that Potts had a right to religiously acceptable meals and that defendants could not infringe on that right without sufficient justification under Turner and RFRA. . . In light of our precedent addressing prisoners' religious diets, no reasonable prison official could have believed that he or she could simply withhold Potts's religious meals for two weeks in the absence of some justification. And in light of Turner and RFRA, no reasonable prison official could have believed that the salmonella outbreak and lockdown provided such justification in the absence of some nexus between the outbreak/lockdown and defendants' ability to provide religious meals, which the current record does not reveal. . . .In sum, the District Court erred in concluding on this record that defendants are entitled to qualified immunity on Potts's First Amendment and RFRA claims. We express no opinion on the merits of those claims or on whether, at some later stage, defendants might show that they are entitled to qualified immunity.")

Vargas v. City of Philadelphia, 783 F.3d 962, 972 n.13 (3d Cir. 2015) ("The officers' conduct here would also be shielded by qualified immunity. . . The case law does not indicate any analogous factual circumstances that would have put the officers on notice that they cannot briefly detain individuals in response to an emergency call and to await trained medical transport without violating the Fourth Amendment. We had not, before today, expressly held that the community caretaking doctrine could justify the seizure of a person outside of a home, which suggests that, to the extent there was doubt, the law in this area was not 'clearly established.'")

Estate of Lagano v. Bergen Cnty. Prosecutor's Office, 769 F.3d 850, 859 (3d Cir. 2014) ("The District Court focused on the second prong of the qualified immunity analysis, holding that the constitutional right claimed to have been violated was not clearly established at the time of Lagano's murder. In reaching this conclusion, the District Court reasoned that because '[t]here are no published cases that extend the state created danger right to confidential informants in the Third Circuit[,] ... it would be unfair to hold that a constitutional right was "clearly established."'. . The District Court defined the right asserted by the Estate as 'a confidential informant's constitutional right to nondisclosure.'. . We cannot endorse the District Court's unduly narrow construction of the right at issue, or its statement that the right was not clearly established. It has been clearly established in this Circuit for nearly two decades that a state-created danger violates due process. . . That we have not applied the state-created danger theory in the context of a confidential informant is not dispositive on the qualified immunity defense. . . . Thus, the Estate can overcome Mordaga's qualified immunity defense without proving that we have previously issued a binding decision recognizing a state-created danger in the context of the disclosure of a confidential informant's status, and the District Court erred in requiring it to do so. The focus of the qualified immunity inquiry is on the allegations made by the Estate. Specifically, the question is whether the facts averred by the Estate fall within the elements of the state-created danger theory, and whether 'it would be clear to a reasonable officer' that the alleged disclosure was unlawful under the circumstances. . . We express no opinion as to whether the amended complaint satisfies these inquiries, but, because the District Court failed to apply the proper standard, we must vacate the District Court's decision in favor of Mordaga on the qualified immunity defense.")

Montanez v. Sec'y Pennsylvania Dep't of Corr., 773 F.3d 472, 487 (3d Cir. 2014) ("At the time that the deductions from Hale's account first occurred in February 2004, it was not clearly established in this Court that the failure to provide prison inmates with a pre-deprivation opportunity to object to automatic deductions from their prison accounts violated the Due Process Clause. In 2005, the Pennsylvania Supreme Court decided Buck v. Beard, which could be read to suggest that a sentencing hearing was the only pre-deprivation hearing constitutionally required. . . Further, earlier decisions of our Court had held that, in some circumstances, postdeprivation remedies were sufficient constitutional process for deductions. . . For these reasons, there was a sufficient lack of clarity in Third Circuit and Pennsylvania case law regarding automatic deductions that the Corrections Officials should be entitled to qualified immunity in this case.")

Shively v. Green Local Sch. Dist. Bd. of Educ., 579 F. App'x 348, 356, 358 (6th Cir. 2014) ("Here, Defendants' alleged decision not to enforce rules against bullying or punishments for bullying gave students license to act with impunity. We decline to establish a standard in which '[d]ereliction of duty becomes a school's best defense,' particularly in cases such as this where it 'enabl[es] a pattern of physical abuse to persist,' Morrow v. Balaski, 719 F.3d 160, 196 (3d Cir.2013) (Fuentes, J. dissenting), and would reasonably be expected to embolden them to continue to escalate their abuse. In any event, even assuming there was a state-created danger, reasonable officials would not have believed that their conduct was unlawful based on clearly established law. Defendants correctly argue that federal cases addressing the state-created danger doctrine have not previously found school officials liable for student-on-student harassment. Although these cases are distinguishable, the fact remains that at the time Defendants violated T.S.'s substantive due process right, it was not clearly established that school officials violate due process by failing to address student-on-student harassment. Accordingly, we reverse the district court's denial of qualified immunity for violations of T.S.'s substantive due process right. . . . The equal protection right to be free from student-on-student discrimination is well-established. See Williams, 455 F. App'x at 619; Murrell, 186 F.3d at 1250–52; Flores, 324 F.3d at 1135. It is difficult to imagine how any school administrator could think he would not be liable for allowing unregulated religious and gender-based persecution that spanned a four-year period. In light of the case law, the Shivelys have pled facts that show Defendants were objectively unreasonable in failing to address their complaints of student-on-student harassment and are not entitled to qualified immunity on the Shivelys' equal protection claim.")

Shively v. Green Local Sch. Dist. Bd. of Educ., 579 F. App'x 348, 360-63 (6th Cir. 2014) (Griffin, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("Although I agree with the majority in most respects, I respectfully disagree with my colleagues regarding two issues. First, the majority finds no error with the district court's blanket denial of immunity to all six individual defendants. I disagree. . . . The district court failed to separately analyze the constitutionality of each defendant's actions. Its failure to do so was error. . . In the same vein, neither did the Shivelys 'plead that each' individual defendant, 'through [the individual defendant's] own ... actions' violated the constitution. . . The Shivelys did make specific allegations as to defendants Booth, Nutter, and Lucas (a school principal and two superintendents, respectively). The Shivelys' complaint alleges that these defendants had knowledge of T .S.'s harassment and that they made decisions about the district's response to that harassment. However, the complaint is deficient regarding defendants Wells, Miller, and Brown. The complaint does not allege any instances where Wells, Miller, or Brown were informed about T.S.'s harassment or that they made any decisions about how to respond to that harassment. The majority concludes that it is proper to allow claims against Wells, Miller, and Brown to proceed, despite the complaint's failure to make allegations regarding these defendants. I respectfully disagree. The majority reaches this conclusion on the theory that, because Wells, Miller, and Brown were administrators of the schools T.S. attended, it is reasonable to infer that they must have known about the harassment and made decisions in response to it. This, however, is precisely the type of inference that the law prohibits. . . For these reasons, I would hold that we should address the claims against Lucas, Booth, and Nutter, as they were properly pleaded. However, the claims as to Wells, Miller, and Brown should be dismissed because the Shivelys have not shown that they are entitled to relief against these defendants. Second, although I agree with the majority that the district court properly concluded that Lucas, Booth, and Nutter are entitled to qualified immunity on the Shivelys' substantive due process claim, I write separately to emphasize that the majority does not hold that the Shivelys have established a substantive due process violation. Rather, it holds that, assuming the Shivelys did establish such a violation, the right at issue here was not clearly established. Therefore, the majority's rather extensive discussion regarding whether the Shivelys have established a due process violation is unnecessary. Moreover, in my judgment, the Shivelys could not establish a due process violation in any event. As the majority notes, generally 'a State's failure to protect an individual against private violence ... does not constitute a violation of the due process clause.'. . A failure of the state to protect a citizen is only cognizable if the plaintiff can establish that the 'state-created danger exception' is met. . . . The thrust of the Shivelys' allegations are that Booth, Nutter, and Lucas knew about the violence and harassment to which T.S. was subjected and failed to act. Repeatedly, the Shivelys assert that defendants are not entitled to qualified immunity because 'defendants did nothing to stop' the violence and 'fail[ed] to address' the violence. However, this court has specifically held that a 'failure to act is not an affirmative act under the state-created danger theory.'. . . Accordingly, I would also reverse the district court's judgment on the basis that plaintiffs failed to establish a violation of T.S.'s due process rights.")

Halsey v. Pfeiffer, 750 F.3d 273, 289, 292-96 & n.19 (3d Cir. 2014) ("When falsified evidence is used as a basis to initiate the prosecution of a defendant, or is used to convict him, the defendant has been injured regardless of whether the totality of the evidence, excluding the fabricated evidence, would have given the state actor a probable cause defense in a malicious prosecution action that a defendant later brought against him. We thus pass to the question of whether a state actor can be liable on a stand-alone claim for fabrication of evidence or whether a defendant's fabrication claim must be included as an aspect of a malicious prosecution claim. . . . To the best of our knowledge, every court of appeals that has considered the question of whether a state actor has violated the defendant's right to due process of law by fabricating evidence to charge or convict the defendant has answered the question in the affirmative. See Whitlock v. Brueggemann, 682 F.3d 567, 585 (7th Cir.2012) (collecting court of appeals cases. . . We join these courts in expressly adopting this principle. . . . Accordingly, we hold that if a defendant has been convicted at a trial at which the prosecution has used fabricated evidence, the defendant has a stand-alone claim under section 1983 based on the Fourteenth Amendment if there is a reasonable likelihood that, without the use of that evidence, the defendant would not have been convicted. . . [W]e [do not] decide whether a defendant acquitted at a trial where fabricated evidence has been used against him has an actionable section 1983 claim. We note, however, that if fabricated evidence is used as a basis for a criminal charge that would not have been filed without its use the defendant certainly has suffered an injury. . . . Analogous precedent should have informed appellees or any reasonable state actor that, by fabricating evidence for use in a criminal prosecution, a state actor would violate a defendant's constitutional rights regardless of whether or not the state actor violated other constitutional rights of the defendant. . . .The obviousness of this violation would be difficult to escape even without the closely analogous Supreme Court precedent discussed above. By the time appellees allegedly fabricated Halsey's confession, more than two decades had passed since the Supreme Court had held that the due process clause required that the prosecution reveal exculpatory evidence to a criminal defendant. Brady v. Maryland, 373 U.S. 83, 83 S.Ct. 1194 (1963). Reasonable officers should have known that if they could not withhold exculpatory evidence from a defendant, they certainly could not fabricate inculpatory evidence against a suspect or defendant. For these reasons, we will reverse the District Court's entry of summary judgment dismissing Halsey's fabricated-evidence claim.")

Hinterberger v. Iroquois School Dist., 548 F. App'x 50, 2013 WL 6284433, *4 & n.2 (3d Cir. 2013) (not published) ("We note that cases decided in this circuit after Hinterberger's accident have not been models of clarity as to whether a state-created danger claim can be successfully maintained in the context of school sports. [collecting and comparing cases] The differing outcomes in these cases further undermines Hinterberger's contention that Loftus should reasonably have understood her actions in March 2004 to violate a constitutional right. . . . We thus conclude that Hinterberger's alleged right was not clearly established at the time of her accident. It was not 'beyond debate' as of March 2004 that Loftus's decision to introduce a new cheerleading stunt following a delay of several months, through the instruction of an experienced cheerleader, with the use of multiple spotters, but without any matting, violated Hinterberger's substantive due process rights. . . . As Hinterberger's alleged right was not clearly established at the time of her injury, Loftus is entitled to qualified immunity from suit.")

Sharp v. Johnson, 669 F.3d 144, 159, 160 (3d Cir. 2012) ("At issue here is whether Sharp had a clearly established right under the First Amendment to separate religious services in accordance with the Habashi sect of Sunni Islam when Sunni Islamic services were already available. The Supreme Court has stated that '[a] special chapel or place of worship need not be provided for every faith regardless of size; nor must a chaplain, priest, or minister be provided without regard to the extent of the demand.'. . We echoed this when we said, 'The requirement that a state interpose no unreasonable barriers to the free exercise of an inmate's religion cannot be equated with the suggestion that the state has an affirmative duty to provide, furnish, or supply every inmate with a clergyman or religious services of his choice.' Gittlemacker v. Prasse, 428 F.2d 1, 4 (3d Cir.1970). . . . Given this precedent, a reasonable official would not have understood the denial of Sharp's request, whether made by Sharp on behalf of either himself or a small number of inmates, to violate a constitutional right.")

Beckinger v. Township of Elizabeth, No. 10-2002, 2011 WL 2559446, at *4, *5 (3d Cir. June 29, 2011) (not published) ("As the District Court reasoned, after Garcetti and prior to our decision in Reilly on July 1, 2008, the status of First Amendment protection for government employee attendance at hearings as part of employment duties was uncertain. To the extent that Reilly clarified the issue, it did so in the context of testimony presented under compulsion of a subpoena in a criminal trial. Reilly, therefore, does not stand for the proposition that a law enforcement officer has a First Amendment right to attend voluntarily a parking ticket adjudication hearing in derogation of direct orders to the contrary. Thus, it cannot be said that the right asserted in this case was clearly established when Memorandum No. 07-17 was issued. Moreover, Reilly is also distinguishable on the ground that it involved discipline for the content of the employee's testimony. In this case, by way of contrast, the employer made a decision not to pursue parking violation charges against any alleged violators as part of an effort to correct what it felt was an overzealous enforcement of a township parking ordinance. . . . The instant case, rather than focusing on an employer's retaliation based on the substance of testimony, is far more akin to an employer's attempt to restrain the actions of employees which were considered to 'detract from the agency's effective operation.' In this case, a decision was made to not devote public resources to pursuing parking citations issued under unique circumstances. Our holding in Reilly certainly did not address this particular context. Nor have the Appellants cited any authority that would preclude a municipality from instructing its law enforcement officers from appearing at hearings to enforce parking violations. Under this set of facts, it simply cannot be said that the Appellants' 'right' to appear at hearings was 'clearly established.' In summary, we find that a government employee's right to attend a court proceeding to enforce parking violations was not clearly established at the time Memorandum No. 07-17 was issued. . . Thus, we will affirm the District Court's finding of qualified immunity for Appellants McNeilly and Black and its concomitant grant of summary judgment on this basis.")

Burns v. PA Dept. of Corrections, 642 F.3d 163, 179 (3d Cir. 2011) ("[W]e do not think it is unreasonable for prison officials at the time of Burns' hearing to have known that: (1) Burns had a property interest in his prison account, (2) he was entitled to due process before his account could be debited, (3) a later Holloway hearing would determine the amount of money to be deducted, but the actual disciplinary hearing was the only forum for determining if any money should be deducted at all, and (4) due process is violated when a determination to deprive an inmate of a protected interest is based solely on the uncorroborated statements of confidential informants. However, two matters give us pause in concluding that Burns is entitled to relief here. First, although it was not unreasonable for a government official to have realized that due process must be provided in adjudicating whether a prison account can be debited, Burns is the first case that clearly established that the assessment itself implicates a prisoner's protected property interests, even if the account is not actually debited. The devaluation in the property interest in the inmate's funds that results from such an assessment was not clearly established before Burns I, and we do not believe that a reasonable official could have foreseen the analogy to a judgment creditor that formed the basis of our holding in Burns I. Second, we think it understandable that the existence of a later Holloway hearing could have caused a reasonable prison official to believe that, because the Pennsylvania state courts have found that a Holloway hearing was necessary to satisfy due process, that hearing was also sufficient to satisfy due process. Although some officials may have been able to deduce that a Holloway hearing was insufficient to satisfy due process, we do not believe that a reasonable official in Canino's position would have had a 'fair warning' that an assessment of the account prior to the Holloway hearing was subject to due process protections. Prior to Burns I, inmates were only entitled to procedural due process before their accounts were debited. Neither this court, nor any Pennsylvania appellate courts had held that an inmate was also entitled to procedural due process before the account was assessed, even if the fund was not debited before we decided Burns I. Thus we cannot conclude that the circumstances here were sufficient to give prison officials 'fair warning' that their conduct was unconstitutional. . . Accordingly, we hold that they are entitled to qualified immunity.")

McSpadden v. Wolfe, No. 08-2209, 2009 WL 1059552, at *5 (3rd Cir. Apr. 21, 2009) ("In the case at hand, Appellees were forced to apply confused caselaw to a confusing factual situation– when presented with a sentence that, in their opinion, violated Bowser, they twice wrote for clarification to the sentencing judge, who, in emphasizing that the April 10, 1997, sentence was 'with all appropriate credit for time served,' led them to believe that the credit specified in the amended order had already been applied. In light of the complexity of Pennsylvania sentencing case law, and the fact that Appellees were confronted with Judge New's ambiguous letter, computation of Appellant's sentence constituted a discretionary function for which qualified immunity may be available.").

Yarris v. County of Delaware, 465 F.3d 129, 142, 143 (3d Cir. 2006)("At the outset, we note that Youngblood addresses law enforcement officials' constitutional duty to preserve evidence prior to conviction, whereas Yarris's claim is based on the CID Detectives' post-conviction conduct. . . . The CID Detectives contend that their alleged mishandling of DNA samples does not amount to a constitutional violation because they could not have acted in bad faith insofar as DNA testing was still in its infancy at the time of the alleged violation. We disagree. . . . [A]ccepting Yarris's allegations as true and drawing all reasonable inferences in his favor, we conclude that even though DNA testing may have been less common at the time of the alleged mishandling of evidence, the CID Detectives were given fair warning that their conduct was unconstitutional. . . Accordingly, the CID Detectives are not entitled to qualified immunity from this claim at this stage of the proceedings.").

Jones v. Brown, 461 F.3d 353, 364, 365 (3d Cir. 2006) ("Bieregu established as a general matter that prisoners have a First Amendment protected interest in being present when their legal mail is opened. . . But as the Supreme Court emphasized in Saucier, 'that is not enough.'. . . For two reasons, we believe it cannot be said with confidence that reasonable prison administrators in the defendants' position would have realized that they were violating the teachings of Bieregu. First, as we have explained, prison administrators in defendants' position would not have been violating inmates' rights if they reasonably believed they were acting in the interest of inmate and staff health and safety. As we have further explained, the Turner test is highly fact sensitive and, at the time the challenged regulation was adopted, there was no guidance in our case law regarding the application of Bieregu and Turner in the context of the special circumstances encountered in the Fall of 2001. Without being able to determine whether the October 2001 series of anthrax letters had ended or was on-going, a reasonable administrator might well have understood the legal mail policy to be consistent with those cases. Second, even at a later point in time when it became apparent that there was no significant, on-going risk from anthrax attack, we believe a reasonable prison administrator evaluating whether the legal mail policy should be continued might well have concluded that Bieregu was no longer sound law. As previously noted, at that point we had declared without reservation in Oliver v. Fauver, 118 F.3d 175, 178 (3d Cir.1997), that the Supreme Court had 'effectively overruled Bieregu.' While we here hold that this was not true with respect to the First Amendment aspects of Bieregu, in the absence of authority suggesting otherwise, we cannot find a prison administrator to have been unreasonable in taking our statement in Oliver at face value. Accordingly, we will affirm the ruling of both the Allah Court and the Jones Court that the defendants are entitled to qualified immunity with respect to plaintiffs' damage claims.").

McKee v. Hart, 436 F.3d 165, 171-73 (3d Cir. 2006) ("Before Sattele allegedly engaged in the conduct at issue in this case, we held . . . that a public employee states a First Amendment claim by alleging that his or her employer engaged in a 'campaign of retaliatory harassment' in response to the employee's speech on a matter of public concern, even if the employee could not prove a causal connection between the retaliation and an adverse employment action. . . Jones contends that Suppan and Baldassare, taken together, were sufficient precedent to put Sattele on notice that his conduct–making harassing comments to Jones arising out of Jones's voicing of concerns about corruption in the pharmaceutical industry–was constitutionally prohibited. In Suppan, however, we gave little guidance as to what the threshold of actionability is in retaliatory harassment cases. Instead, we merely held that such a claim existed. . . . Moreover, the alleged conduct in Suppan spanned more than a year and involved the supposed lowering of ratings on employees' promotion evaluations and the admonishment of employees because of their union activities and support for a particular mayoral candidate. . . Based only on our acknowledgment of a retaliatory harassment cause of action in Suppan and the facts of that case, a reasonable official in Sattele's position would not have been aware that making a few comments over the course of a few months (the gist of which was asking an employee to focus on his job) might have run afoul of the First Amendment. Baldassare also does not further Jones's argument that his First Amendment right to be free from retaliatory harassment was clearly established at the time of Sattele's alleged conduct. That case involved a straightforward retaliation claim brought under the First Amendment in which the plaintiff alleged a direct causal connection between his speech on a matter of public concern and his demotion, . . . not that he was subject to a campaign of retaliatory harassment such as the one involved in Suppan and alleged by Jones in this case. Thus, Baldassare would not have helped Sattele understand that his conduct might be constitutionally prohibited. . . . Brennan provided some additional guidance about what types of conduct would support such a claim, holding that some of the plaintiff's allegations (that he had been taken off the payroll for some time and given various suspensions as a result of his speech) would support a retaliation claim, whereas other of his allegations (including his claim that his supervisor stopped using his title to address him) would not because of their triviality. . . However, Brennan was not decided until 2003, after Sattele's alleged conduct, which occurred in the fall of 2002, had already taken place. Thus, to the extent that *Brenna*n added some specificity to the contours of the retaliatory harassment cause of action, an employee's First Amendment right to be free from such harassment was still not clearly established at the time of Sattele's conduct. . . . Accordingly, because of the dearth of precedent of sufficient specificity (and factual similarity to this case) regarding a public employee's First Amendment right to be free from retaliatory harassment by his or her employer at the time of Sattele's conduct, we cannot say that the constitutional right Jones alleged Sattele violated was clearly established. Sattele is therefore entitled to qualified immunity under the second, as well as the first, prong of our Saucier analysis.").

Estate of Smith v. Marasco, 430 F.3d 140, 154, 155 (3d Cir. 2005) (Smith II)("The question we must address, of course, is not simply whether the behavior of the troopers 'shocks the conscience' under the applicable standard, but whether a reasonable officer would have realized as much. In this regard, 'the salient question' we must ask is whether the law, as it existed in 1999, gave the troopers 'fair warning' that their actions were unconstitutional. . . It is not necessary for the plaintiffs to identify a case presenting analogous factual circumstances, but they must show that the contours of the right at issue were ' Asufficiently clear that a reasonable official would understand that what he is doing violates that right." ' . . While the jurisprudence does not yield a clear definition of 'conscience-shocking' (applicable to situations such as this), we agree with the District Court that the Smiths have not shown that a reasonable officer in the position of these troopers would have understood his conduct to be 'conscience-shocking.' . . We therefore conclude that the troopers are entitled to qualified immunity with respect to the state-created danger claim. . . . [W]e think a reasonable officer could recognize a difference between abandoning a private citizen with whom he had come in contact and failing to prolong a two-hour search for a private citizen whom he has been unable to locate . . . . At this stage, such a difference is sufficient for the officers to be entitled to qualified immunity.").

Rivas v. City of Passaic, 365 F.3d 181, 200, 201 (3d Cir. 2004) ("We discern from these cases that, as of November 1998, our case law had established the general proposition that state actors may not abandon a private citizen in a dangerous situation, provided that the state actors are aware of the risk of serious harm and are partly responsible for creating the opportunity for that harm to happen. As the Supreme Court explained in Hope v. Pelzer . . . in some cases 'a general constitutional rule already identified in the decisional law may apply with obvious clarity to the specific conduct in question, even though Athe very action in question has [not] previously been held unlawful."' In sum, we find that the preexisting law of 'state-created danger' jurisprudence was clearly established. As such, it was sufficient to put Garcia and Rodriguez on notice that their conduct, if deemed unlawful, would not shield them with immunity.").

Doe v. Groody, 361 F.3d 232, 243 (3d Cir. 2004) ("We agree that in determining whether a right is 'clearly established,' we should analyze the right with specificity. . .Where a challenged police action presents a legal question that is 'unusual and largely heretofore undiscussed' . . . or where there is 'at least some significant authority' that lends support of the police action, . . . we have upheld qualified immunity even while deciding that the action in question violates the Constitution. On the other hand, the plaintiff need not show that there is a prior decision that is factually identical to the case at hand in order to establish that a right was clearly established. . . . The principal narrow question in this case is whether in 1999, when these searches occurred, it was clearly established that police could not broaden the scope of a warrant with an unincorporated affidavit. We think that a review of the cases indicates that it was.").

Kopec v. Tate, 361 F.3d 772, 778 (3d Cir. 2004) ("Therefore, we hold that the right of an arrestee to be free from the use of excessive force in the course of his handcuffing clearly was established when Officer Tate acted in this case, and that a reasonable officer would have known that employing excessive force in the course of handcuffing would violate the Fourth Amendment. Accordingly, the district court committed error in granting summary judgment in favor of Officer Tate on the basis of his qualified immunity defense. In reaching our result we point out that other courts of appeals have made determinations consistent with ours. [citing cases] ").

Kopec v. Tate, 361 F.3d 772, 779, 785, 786 (3d Cir. 2004) (Smith, J., dissenting) ("The Supreme Court has repeatedly instructed that the determination of qualified immunity requires particularizing the constitutional right 'in light of the specific context of the case.' . . This is where I believe the majority's analysis falls short, because it only relies on the broad proposition that the Fourth Amendment secures the right to be free from the use of excessive force during an arrest, and concludes that Officer Tate violated this clearly established right. This analysis is flawed, in my view, because it fails to determine what the contours of the right were, and neglects to recognize that the law did not provide Officer Tate with fair warning that he was required to respond more promptly than he did to Kopec's complaint that the handcuffs were too tight. . . . In February 2000, only a handful of cases of § 1983 claims involving tight handcuffing were extant. [citing cases] . . . . Prior to the incident at issue in this case, the caselaw did not provide any guidance with respect to how quickly an officer must respond to a complaint that handcuffs have been applied too tightly. Nor was there any guidance in the cases as to how an officer should prioritize his response when there are other tasks in which he is legitimately engaged or may be required to undertake at the time. In light of this caselaw, I conclude that Tate could have reasonably believed that his response to Kopec's complaints was lawful. To put it another way, I believe the law did not put Officer Tate on notice that he had to respond immediately to Kopec's complaint that the handcuffs were too tight. Nor was there any caselaw providing Officer Tate with fair notice that he must stop engaging in the legitimate police task at hand, i.e., interviewing Smith, in order to assess whether the handcuffs were too tight. Because the caselaw did not provide Tate with notice that his response was unlawful, he should be entitled to qualified immunity.").

S.G., as Guardian ad Litem of A.G. v.Sayreville Bd. of Ed., 333 F.3d 417, 423 (3d Cir. 2003) ("[W]e hold that the school's prohibition of speech threatening violence and the use of firearms was a legitimate decision related to reasonable pedagogical concerns and therefore did not violate A.G.'s First Amendment rights. In any event, defendants are entitled to qualified immunity because there was no clearly established law to the contrary.")

Atkinson v. Taylor, 316 F.3d 257, 264 (3d Cir. 2003) ("In the present case, without weighing the underlying evidence with respect to Atkinson's claim, we conclude that appellants are not entitled to qualified immunity on the ETS claim of future harm. As the Warren Court recognized, the Helling decision established the constitutional right required by the first prong of the Saucier test. . . Atkinson invokes the constitutional right claimed by the Helling prisoner: alleging that he was unwillingly exposed to levels of ETS that pose an unreasonable risk of future harm. Similarly, Atkinson has satisfied the second prong of the Saucier test. The right recognized by the Helling decision is 'clearly established' so that a reasonable prison official would know when he is violating that right.").

McLaughlin v. Watson, 271 F.3d 566, 572 (3d Cir. 2001) ("[W]e agree with Defendant that the District Court erred in summarily dispensing with the qualified immunity issue in favor of Plaintiffs. As discussed above, the analytical framework that a court must use in addressing a 'qualified immunity' argument is well-settled in this Circuit. The court cannot–as the District Court essentially did here–stop with a conclusory statement that Stiles' alleged use of 'influence with plaintiffs' employer' violated the first amendment. Rather, the District Court must go one step further and determine whether the facts alleged by plaintiffs violated a 'clearly established right.' This necessarily entails an analysis of case law existing at the time of the defendant's alleged improper conduct. Without such an analysis there is no way to determine if the defendant should have known that what he or she was doing was constitutionally prohibited . . . . In other words, there must be sufficient precedent at the time of action, factually similar to the plaintiff's allegations, to put defendant on notice that his or her conduct is constitutionally prohibited.").

Brown v. Muhlenberg Township, 269 F.3d 205, 211 & n.4 (3d Cir. 2001) ("If the facts asserted by the Browns are found to be true, we conclude that a reasonable officer in Officer Eberly's position could not have applied these well established principles to the situation before him and have concluded that he could lawfully destroy a pet who posed no imminent danger and whose owners were known, available, and desirous of assuming custody. . . In other words, it would have been apparent to a reasonable officer that shooting Immi would be unlawful. . . . If the unlawfulness of the defendant's conduct would have been apparent to a reasonable official based on the current state of the law, it is not necessary that there be binding precedent from this circuit so advising.").

Brown v. Muhlenberg Township, 269 F.3d 205, 219-22 (3d Cir. 2001) (Garth, J., dissenting and concurring) ("The issue that has divided this panel and which should concern every judge, every police officer and every official who claims qualified immunity by virtue of his or her office is: how do we determine the second prong of the qualified immunity doctrine–i.e., when is the constitutional right which is claimed to have been violated clearly established so as to visit liability on the official? Distressingly, the majority opinion fails to announce a standard by which the bench and the bar can test whether a particular legal principle–that is the particular constitutional right–is 'clearly established' for purposes of qualified immunity. I strongly urge that in deciding this second prong, at the least a balancing process should be undertaken whereby the factors to be balanced are: (1) Was the particular right which was alleged to have been violated specifically defined, or did it have to be constructed or gleaned from analogous general precepts? [citing Wilson v.Layne] (2) Has that particular right ever been discussed or announced by either the Supreme Court or by this Circuit? (3) If neither the Supreme Court nor this Circuit has pronounced such a right, have there been persuasive appellate decisions of other circuit courts– and by that I mean more than just one or two–so that the particular right could be said to be known generally? (4) Were the circumstances under which such a right was announced of the nature that an official who claimed qualified immunity would have, acting objectively under pre-existing law, reasonably understood that his act or conduct was unlawful? . . . . Can it really be held that the Fourth Amendment 'seizure of property' right was readily and generally known to apply to the shooting of a Rottweiler which was loose on the street? Can we really say that this particular Fourth Amendment principle was defined with particular specificity and was therefore clearly established for purposes of qualified immunity? I am aware of no authority which defines the principle with sufficient particularity so as to make it applicable to the situation here. . . . The relevant focus has to be on the final part of the qualified immunity inquiry–whether the right allegedly violated was clearly established so that a reasonable official in Eberly's position would understand that what he was doing violated that right. . . . If there has never been a constitutional right articulated that would prevent a police officer from shooting a barking, unleashed, uncontrolled dog such as the Rottweiler which was killed–as there has not been in this jurisdiction or any others–how can the absence of such a right as postulated by the majority constitute a clearly established right so as to hold Eberly liable?").

Doe v. Delie, 257 F.3d 309, 322 (3d Cir.2001) ("We conclude that the contours of defendants' legal obligations under the Constitution were not sufficiently clear in 1995 that a reasonable prison official would understand that the non-consensual disclosure of a prisoner's HIV status violates the Constitution.").

Doe v. County of Centre, 242 F.3d 437, 454 (3d Cir. 2001) ("The Supreme Court has directed that the right in question should be defined in a particularized and relevant manner, rather than abstractly. . . .Therefore, we define the right in question as the right of HIV-positive individuals and related persons to be free from generalized discrimination when public agencies place HIV-negative individuals into their HIV-positive private homes. To defeat qualified immunity, this right must have been sufficiently clear such that a reasonable official would have known that enacting and applying the County's policy would have violated the right. . . To the contrary, however, the placement of HIV-negative children into HIV-positive private homes presents a novel legal issue.").

Sterling v. Borough of Minersville, 232 F.3d 190, 197, 198 (3d Cir. 2000) (". . . Wilinsky testified that he did not include suspicion of homosexual activity in his police report because of the confidential nature of the information. Obviously, then, Wilinsky was aware that one's sexual orientation is intrinsically personal and no compelling reason to disclose such information was warranted. Because the confidential and private nature of the information was obvious, and because the right to privacy is well-settled, the concomitant constitutional violation was apparent notwithstanding the fact that the very action in question had not previously been held to be unlawful.").

Gruenke v. Seip, 225 F.3d 290, 300 (3d Cir. 2000) ("Merely because the Supreme Court has not yet ruled on whether a school official's administration of a pregnancy test to a student violates her Fourth Amendment rights does not mean the right is not clearly established. Moreover, a review of current Fourth Amendment law in the public school context reveals not only that the right is clearly established, but also that Seip's conduct as alleged was objectively unreasonable.").

Bartholomew v. Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, 221 F.3d 425, 429, 430 (3d Cir. 2000) ("[W]hile it was 'clearly established' that warrants must be particular, the narrower and more appropriate question, i.e. whether it was clearly established that one has a constitutional right to be free from a search pursuant to a warrant based upon a sealed list of items to be seized, has not heretofore been answered, at least in those terms. . . It simply cannot be said, therefore, that 'the contours of the right'–the precise right at issue here–were 'sufficiently clear' such that 'a reasonable official would understand that what he[or she] is doing violates that right.' . . . We now make clear what was heretofore not 'sufficiently clear' and hold that, generally speaking, where the list of items to be seized does not appear on the face of the warrant, sealing that list, even though it is 'incorporated' in the warrant, would violate the Fourth Amendment.").

Assaf v. Fields, 178 F.3d 170, 177 (3d Cir. 1999) ("Given the nature of the inquiry in the Branti-Elrod cases, we reject appellees' argument that qualified immunity is 'well suited to cases where there is no Abright line" rule.'. . Were we to adopt this position, we would effectively eviscerate the constitutional imperative behind Branti-Elrod jurisprudence. Under the qualified immunity regime contemplated by appellees, liability in such areas could never attach because the lack of 'bright line' rules inherent in the doctrine would continually provide cover for violations of constitutional rights. In an earlier case in which we rejected the defendants' qualified immunity claim, we explained that if we were to require ' Aprecise factual correspondence" between the case at issue and a previous case ... we would not be Afaithful to the purposes of immunity by permitting ... officials one liability-free violation of a constitutional or statutory requirement."' . . . . Contrary to the District Court's assertion, our cases have given guidance to government officials within our circuit. An employee may be terminated for political reasons only if 'a difference in party affiliation [is] highly likely to cause an official to be ineffective in carrying out the duties and responsibilities of the office,' . . . and that only if an employee's duties make it possible to cause 'serious political embarrassment,'. . . will the position meet the narrow Branti-Elrod exception.").

Thomas v. City of Philadelphia, No. 17-4196, 2018 WL 684836, at *8-10 (E.D. Pa. Feb. 5, 2018) ("The fundamental distinction between the Fourth and Fourteenth Amendments is temporal: The Fourth Amendment's 'protection against unlawful seizures extends only until trial.'. . Once trial starts, however, the Fourteenth Amendment kicks in: 'The guarantee of due process of law...protects defendants during an entire criminal proceeding through and after trial.'. . This temporal distinction suggests that a procedural due process right against malicious prosecution may exist. However, this was, and indeed remains, an unsettled question, meaning that Mr. Thomas fails to overcome the defense of qualified immunity, discussed next. . . .The procedural due process right against malicious prosecution is not clearly established. The Supreme Court has not yet articulated such a right. And the Third Circuit Court of Appeals stopped short of deciding the right's 'viability' in 2014, let alone in the early 1990s when Mr. Thomas interacted with the defendants. . . In response, Mr. Thomas shifts his focus from the right to the officers' conduct. As he puts it, the 'exact constitutional provision' that has been violated is 'irrelevant,' so long as some constitutional provision is clearly violated. The officers' conduct as alleged in this case was clearly unconstitutional: it violated Mr. Thomas's clearly established Fourth Amendment right against malicious prosecution. But the conduct was not clearly unconstitutional under the Fourteenth Amendment. Thus, the question becomes: what is a Court to do when certain conduct is clearly unconstitutional, but due to a different constitutional source? Is there still qualified immunity as to the unsettled constitutional source — in this case, the Fourteenth Amendment? The parties each endeavor to marshal case law to support their positions. On the one hand, courts have addressed qualified immunity as providing 'fair and clear warning' to officers 'that their conduct is unlawful.' Halsey, 750 F.3d at 295 (quoting Devereaux v. Abbey, 263 F.3d 1070, 1075 (9th Cir. 2001) (en banc)) (emphasis added); see also United States v. Lanier, 520 U.S. 259, 270 (1997) (explaining that "the qualified immunity test is simply the adaptation of the fair warning standard" from the criminal context). As Mr. Thomas put the issue: 'The dispositive question here is whether Defendants Devlin and Worrell were on notice that their conduct violated Mr. Thomas' constitutional rights. The answer is yes.' On the other hand, '[t]he contours of the right,' as opposed to the conduct, 'must be sufficiently clear that a reasonable official would understand that what he is doing violates that right.' Anderson v. Creighton, 483 U.S. 635, 640 (1987) (emphasis added). The Court holds that this latter 'right-centric' position is the correct one. It would be strange to say that right X is clearly established just because right Y is clearly established and happens to prohibit the same conduct. Indeed, precisely because right Y is clearly established (in this case, precisely because a Fourth Amendment right against malicious prosecution is clearly established), Mr. Thomas has a clear avenue to recovery for being the target of a malicious prosecution. Therefore, the Court holds that the individual defendants have qualified immunity from a claim for malicious prosecution in violation of the procedural due process clause.")

Castellani v. City of Atl. City, No. CV 13-5848 (JBS/AMD), 2017 WL 3112820, at *14-15 (D.N.J. July 21, 2017) ("Thus, the question presented here is whether a reasonable officer in Defendant Wheaten's position would have understood that it violated the Fourth Amendment to use mechanical force against an individual who was pinned to the ground face down by five officers and was told '[w]e're ok right now.' Applying the evidence most favorably to Plaintiff, a reasonable officer, even arriving late to the scene and assuming the other officers followed proper procedures, could not have believed that immediately unleashing his K9, without warning or without assessing the situation, to attack a person who, under Plaintiff's testimony, was not resisting arrest and restrained by five officers, was lawful. It would have been clear to a reasonable K9 officer approaching the scene that the unleashing of the K9 to attack the downed civilian was excessive and unconstitutional. Additionally, clearly establishing the existence of the right does 'not require a case directly on point, but existing precedent must have placed the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate.'. . The Supreme Court gave no indication that its decision in Pauly was intended to repudiate the proposition that 'officials can still be on notice that their conduct violates established law even in novel factual circumstances.' Hope v. Pelzer, 536 U.S. 730, 741 (2002). Furthermore, Justice Ginsberg's concurrence in Pauly confirms that the per curium opinion 'does not foreclose the denial of summary judgment' on qualified immunity where fact disputes exist on material issues. . . Accordingly, and in light of the previously identified disputed issues of material fact, Defendant Wheaten is not entitled to qualified immunity. . . While Plaintiff does not submit any factually-identical cases regarding the deployment of a police dog while five officers have already subdued a plaintiff, it was certainly clearly established in June 2013 that even if someone posed a threat at the time force was initiated on them, an officer cannot continue to apply serious force when the threat has subsided. . . .Regardless of what Defendant Wheaten knew as he arrived to the scene and when he initially deployed the dog, it was clearly established at the time that he could not continue holding the dog on Plaintiff for two additional minutes.")

Igwe v. Skaggs, No. CV 16-1403, 2017 WL 395745, at *4-7 (W.D. Pa. Jan. 30, 2017) ("Citing this mid-level culpability standard, Mr. Igwe alleges Officer Skaggs was not involved in a high-speed chase the day of the accident and, having voluntarily undertaken the pursuit, had a reasonable three minute opportunity to deliberate. . .Mr. Igwe alleges Officer Skaggs, against Monroeville's policy, voluntarily joined the pursuit of the suspect despite Officer Supancic's dispatch as 'secondary unit;' failed to advise dispatch he intended to provide assistance until he approached the intersection where the accident occurred; failed to obtain approval from a pursuant supervisor before joining the pursuit in violation of Monroeville's policy; failed to comply with Monroeville's 'Pursuit' and 'Emergency Response' policies as well as Pennsylvania law on pursuits and emergency vehicles; drove his police car at a high rate of speed in the area of a retail shopping area; entered an intersection against a red traffic signal; and outran the Opticom safety system, all of which evidences Skaggs 'consciously disregarded a substantial risk that great harm would result from his conduct.'. . Taking Mr. Igwe's allegations as true and applying the mid-level culpability standard, the allegations give rise to a plausible claim under a state-created danger theory. The thrust of Mr. Igwe's allegations focuses on Officer Skaggs' decision to voluntarily assume a role as a responding officer in violation of Monroeville policy, knew he could terminate his response at any time, and drove his police car in reckless disregard for the safety of the general public. While Mr. Igwe provides us with no authority, nor could we find any, where this alleged conduct shocks the conscience and thus requires we dismiss Officer Skaggs under qualified immunity, we cannot find Mr. Igwe's allegations could never state a substantive due process claim at this preliminary stage. At this stage, we address only whether Mr. Igwe pleaded Officer Skaggs consciously disregarded a great risk of harm by voluntarily joining a police pursuit including over-running several red lights. Until we review the discovery, we defer to Mr. Igwe's allegation of either no need to pursue or a limited emergency. Under this rubric, Officer Skaggs' speeding through traffic lights in a voluntary pursuit of a suspect leaving his vehicle may shock the conscience. . . . Having found Mr. Igwe pleads a plausible substantive due process claim, we now must determine whether this substantive due process right was 'clearly established' when Officer Skaggs decided to join a police pursuit on December 8, 2014. . . .Earlier this month in White, the Supreme Court again reminded district courts we must identify a case where an officer acting under similar circumstances violated the Constitution to defeat qualified immunity. . . While our Court of Appeals defined the high standards in a hyperpressurized police pursuit, we are aware of no controlling precedent applying when an officer decides to join in a police pursuit and whether he has time to deliberate. . . A clearly established right is not defined by the state actors' internal guidelines and policies. . . . As conceded by the absence of authority in the parties' briefs, we are unaware of any existing precedent giving fair warning to Officer Skaggs deciding to join an ongoing high speed police pursuit as to his substantive due process liability. We have no guidelines in clearly established law. As in Taylor, we have a general standard with no clearly established law. We have general guidance from the Supreme Court in Lewis and our Court of Appeals in Sanford regarding the officer's potential mid-level culpability depending on the immediacy of the need for police action and generally directing a test focusing on whether he 'consciously disregarded a great risk of harm' in circumstances where there is less than a 'split-second' decision but more than an 'unhurried judgment.' But this general test does not define the procedures or conduct permissible when deciding to join a police pursuit. Officer Skaggs has no clearly established caselaw advising when he can decide to join a high speed police pursuit during the course of his police duties. As in the Fourth Amendment context in White, this case of an allegedly voluntary joinder into an ongoing police pursuit presents a unique set of facts and circumstances. . . Also, unlike the Court of Appeals for the Tenth Circuit's decisions in Browder v. Casaus, . . . the parties do not dispute Officer Skaggs acted within the scope of his police duties and did not speed for personal purposes. Counsel has not shown, and we are not aware, of any clearly established federal constitutional right contravened by Officer Skaggs' deciding to join a police pursuit and, through violating state driving laws, causing fatal harm to Ms. Robinson. Absent a clearly established federal constitutional right, Mr. Igwe may seek damages under state law claims but Officer Skaggs is immune from civil rights liability.")

Kenneth v. Palmerton Area Sch. Dist. et al., No. 3:14-CV-00068, 2016 WL 3090404, at *7-8 (M.D. Pa. June 2, 2016) ("The viability of a state-created danger claim is well-settled. . . However, no published opinion of the Third Circuit has found that a state-created danger arises when coaches fail to take certain precautions in athletic practice or in any analogous situation. . . . Here, Plaintiffs allege that the relevant constitutional right is 'the student's right to freedom from school officials' deliberate indifference to, or affirmative acts that increase the danger of, serious injury from unjustified invasions of bodily integrity perpetrated by third parties in the school setting.'. . In support of this constitutional right, Plaintiffs rely on an opinion from the Eastern District of Pennsylvania, Sciotto v. Marple Newtown Sch. Dist., 81 F. Supp. 2d 559, 568 (E.D. Pa. 1999). However, as explained by the Third Circuit in Hinterberger, which was decided in 2013, over a decade after Sciotto was decided, this right was not clearly established. . . In fact, the Third Circuit cited Sciottio in their opinion, yet still found that the right was not clearly established. . . Because Sheldon's alleged right was not clearly established at the time of his injury, Coach Walkowiak is entitled to qualified immunity. Judgment will be entered in favor of Coach Walkowiak on this claim.")

Rodriguez v. Panarello, 119 F. Supp. 3d 331, 342-43 (E.D. Pa. 2015) ("The most compelling aspect of this case is the height at which Plaintiff was standing when the Taser was discharged. The record does not reveal the precise height of the roof of the vehicle on which Mr. Rodriguez was standing at the time, but for purposes of analogy it is enough to note that the prevailing standard for fall protection in general industry workplaces is four feet. . . Despite that, the circuit court decision most analogous to this case is of no help to the plaintiff. In Harper v. Davis, an alcohol-fueled disturbance at a barbecue prompted an inebriated suspect to fire a rifle inside a home. . . He then hid in the woods with the weapon, perching on a tree branch eight feet above the ground. . . When found by officers, he was told both to descend the tree and show his hands. . . The suspect protested he could not do both, but identified for the officers the location of the gun down by his feet. . . Upon seeing the gun, even though the plaintiff was not holding it and had volunteered its location, an officer Tasered him, and the resulting fall caused paraplegia. . . The Court concluded that the officer's perception of risk was reasonable and warranted the precautionary use of force. . . In this case, the officers did not see a gun, but responded to radio calls that included a report of shots fired, and a man with a gun. Unlike the suspect in Harper, Plaintiff here resisted the officers' instructions, and most importantly he refused to show his hands. The law is clear that an officer need not be accurate in his perception of a risk in order to justify deadly force, but only that his perception of the threat and the corresponding need to use force is objectively reasonable under the conditions he faced. Moreover, to defeat a qualified immunity defense, the right allegedly violated must have been clearly established at the time of the violation. . . . As of 2012, several courts had found the use of a Taser to bring a resisting subject under control was reasonable. . . .The parameters of the constitutional use of a Taser in circumstances like those Officer Panarello confronted would not have been sufficiently clear that a reasonable officer would have known his conduct was unlawful. . . Officer Panarello is thus protected by qualified immunity for his conduct using a Taser on Plaintiff.")

Kingsmill v. Szewczak, 117 F. Supp. 3d 657 (E.D. Pa. 2015) ("Although the parties did not identify, and we were unable to locate, a case with a cognate claim and a constellation of factual averments, this is the type of case where the alleged conduct is outrageous enough, and the broad contours of the constitutional right sufficiently well-known, that Officer Szewczak was on notice that his conduct violated Kingsmill's constitutional rights. Officer Szewczak lured Kingsmill away from a physical altercation, engaged him in conversation, and then watched as Brown hit Kingsmill in the face with a steel pipe. Officer Szewczak reacted by telling Brown to flee the scene, declining to make a police report, and refusing to render assistance to the injured Kingsmill. . .Qualified immunity protects 'all but the plainly incompetent or those who knowingly violate the law.'. . . Although this particular scenario does not appear to have been considered by our Court of Appeals, the conduct alleged is not the type qualified immunity protects. Any reasonable officer at the time of this incident—February 9, 2014—would have known that he had a duty not to place an individual at greater risk of injury from a physical assault by hailing him away from the altercation and then declining to intervene. A reasonable officer would have known that he had a duty not to command such an individual to comply with a directive, so that compliance would increase the risk of harm to him. This is not a case where the 'most that can be said of the state functionaries in this case is that they stood by and did nothing when ... circumstances dictated a more active role for them.'. . . Officer Szewczak exercised his authority to command Kingsmill to disengage from a physical altercation, and, as a result of Kingsmill's compliance, Brown was able to attack him from behind. Officer Szewczak's failure to warn Kingsmill that Brown was approaching from behind might appear more akin to the inaction that prior courts have found insufficient to ground liability under a state-created danger theory. But Officer Szewczak did not just fail to warn: his initial hail and interference with the assault in this circumstance placed Kingsmill at risk of additional serious injury. After placing Kingsmill in greater danger than he had been before, the officer did not bother to warn him of Brown's oncoming assault. Nor is this a case where the exercise of a state actor's discretion did not increase the danger. . . To be sure, Officer Szewczak was not obligated to protect either Kingsmill or Brown, and his knowledge of their altercation was not sufficient to create an affirmative duty to act. But once Officer Szewczak chose to call Kingsmill to his patrol car, and chose to continue their conversation despite Brown's approach, pipe in hand, he put Kingsmill in greater danger of the assault from Brown. . . . Officer Szewczak may not have placed Kingsmill in the physical confrontation with Brown, but observing Kingsmill in such a snake pit, he made it worse by hailing him and commanding him to disengage, leaving him vulnerable to Brown's attack from behind. Such conduct is sufficiently outrageous that a reasonable officer would have known that doing so could violate Kingsmill's constitutional rights. We find that Kingsmill's right to be free from state-created danger in this particular factual circumstance was clearly established when this incident took place in February of 2014, when this incident took place. Officer Szewczak is therefore not entitled to qualified immunity.")

Biddle v. Parker, No. CV 13-343-RGA, 2015 WL 5190694, at *3 (D. Del. Sept. 4, 2015) ("Similar to the claim at issue in Taylor, Counts III and IV assert Plaintiff's right to the proper implementation of training, supervision, and policies for handling individuals who suffer from seizures. As of May 16, 2012-the date of the challenged conduct-there was no Supreme Court decision establishing such a right. Further, there was not a 'robust consensus of cases of persuasive authority' suggesting that such a right existed. Plaintiff fails to cite a single case suggesting the existence of an inmate's right to the implementation of adequate training and policies for handling inmates with seizures. . . As the Supreme Court held in Taylor, even if HRYCI's training and policies regarding seizures were as deficient as Counts III and IV allege, there was no precedent in May 2012 that would have made clear to Supervisor Defendants 'that they were overseeing a system that violated the Constitution.' Taylor, 135 S. Ct. at 2045. Thus, Counts III and IV do not allege a 'statutory or constitutional right that was clearly established at the time of the challenged conduct.' Therefore, Supervisor Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity with respect to Counts III and IV").

Gaymon v. Borough of Collingdale, No. CIV.A. 14-5454, 2015 WL 4389585, at *9-10 (E.D. Pa. July 17, 2015) ("Here, Mrs. Gaymon openly videotaped the officers, and the recording took place within the curtilage of her property and inside her home. No officer could credibly claim any expectation of privacy on Plaintiffs' property or inside their house. If anyone had an expectation of privacy under these circumstances, it was clearly the Gaymons. Unlike Kelly II, there are no allegations that Defendant White stopped and in good faith sought advice provided from a prosecuting authority. Moreover, in Kelly there was at least some basis on which a uniformed officer might be confused, because the recording there was 'surreptitious,' as opposed to Mrs. Gaymon's open and obvious recording. Without a doubt, Mrs. Gaymon wanted the officer to know he was being recorded. This was not an 'inherently dangerous situation,' such as a traffic stop. . . Rather, the officers responded during daylight to a non-violent complaint about a vehicle's tire touching the curb in a residential neighborhood. . . . Killingsworth involved events in 2011. Even if I assume that there was still no clearly established First Amendment right to record officers by 2014, the lack of such a right would not transform a citizen's act of recording on her own property to something criminal in nature justifying arrest. It is certainly clear that the absence of a First Amendment right to record from the confines of one's own home would not amount to exigent or other circumstances that would justify entering the Plaintiffs' home without a valid warrant or consent. . . The Killingsworth plaintiffs were all citizens who came upon police activity on public streets and undertook the role of observers and recorders of events. The issues presented by cases of that nature, where the person inserts himself into a situation as the police are discharging their duties, bear little relevance to this case, where Mrs. Gaymon was either on or inside her private property at all times, the police had entered onto that property without permission, and in addition to herself, both her daughter and husband were directly affected by the actions of the police. Finally, Plaintiffs' retaliatory arrest claim focuses on the Plaintiffs' First Amendment right to 'verbally express their disagreement with and challenge the authority' of the Defendant officers. . . 'The Supreme Court has explicitly held that an individual has a viable claim against the government when he is able to prove that the government took action against him in retaliation for his exercise of First Amendment rights.'. . It is indisputable that 'the First Amendment protects a significant amount of verbal criticism and challenge directed at police officers.'. . In fact, the Supreme Court has gone so far as to say that '[t]he freedom of individuals verbally to oppose or challenge police action without thereby risking arrest is one of the principal characteristics by which we distinguish a free nation from a police state.'. . . Here, a jury could reasonably conclude that the Defendant officers arrested Mrs. Gaymon and Ms. Purnell for voicing disagreement about the officers' actions in violation of the First Amendment. Accordingly, a jury could find liability on every constitutional claim alleged without ever needing to confront the issue of whether recording an officer under these circumstances is protected by the First Amendment. . . It is the combination of factors that make this case compelling to the Court on the facts alleged: the frivolous nature of the neighbor's initial complaint; the absence of lurking risks inherent in other police activities, such as traffic stops; the alleged aggressiveness of the responding officers; the purported threat to deploy Tasers against a family on the premises of their own home; the overall disproportionate response of law enforcement; the protective instincts of a wife and mother seeking only to record what was occurring; the makeweight nature of the criminal charges brought; and finally, the contorted nature of the qualified immunity defense raised. Defendants have the right to contest, and may well disprove, these allegations at trial. But the contention that no reasonable officer would have understood that such conduct would palpably violate our Constitution is utterly lacking in merit. Therefore, qualified immunity is not a viable defense at this preliminary stage. Defendants' Motion has been denied.")

Montgomery v. Killingsworth, No. 13CV256, 2015 WL 289934, at *11-12 (E.D. Pa. Jan. 22, 2015) ("[T]he clearly established right cannot be the broad First Amendment right to be free from retaliation for engaging in protected speech, although the specific right in this case differs from the one the Court defined in Reichle. Unlike Reichle, Fleck asserts the constitutional right to be free from an arrest that is not supported by probable cause and was initiated in retaliation for peacefully criticizing a government official. This right was clearly established at the time of Fleck's arrest. . . . Under Fleck's version of that day's events, Nicholson and Doe thus violated clearly established law. Losch was decided many years before the incident here, and it involved a constitutional right that almost mirrors the right asserted by Fleck in this case: the right to be free from an arrest that lacked probable cause and was initiated in retaliation for the peaceful observation and criticism of a police officer. To be sure, the cases are not factually identical, but the rights invoked in both cases are close enough to establish that 'existing precedent [has] placed the ... constitutional question beyond debate.'. . .[T]he right that Fleck asserts was clearly established because any reasonable officer would have known that arresting her in this manner and for this reason violated her constitutional rights.")

Montgomery v. Killingsworth, No. 13CV256, 2015 WL 289934, at *13-15 & n.7 (E.D. Pa. Jan. 22, 2015) ("Although Montgomery and Loeb urge the court to follow the two-step Saucier procedure and first 'reaffirm the existence of a First Amendment right to observe and record public police activities in public,' it declines to do so and addresses only the second Saucier step. That is because, unlike Fleck's case, these cases are ones 'in which it is plain that a constitutional right is not clearly established but far from obvious whether in fact there is such a right.'. . .Under their version of the facts, which the court must adopt here, Montgomery and Loeb were arrested without probable cause while they were peacefully recording police officers performing their duties in public. . . The dispositive inquiry here is thus whether they had a clearly established constitutional right to peacefully record police officers performing their duties in public. . . . Existing precedent is not limited to Third Circuit case law; case law from other circuits is relevant in analyzing whether a reasonable officer would have known that his conduct violated the Constitution. . . Importantly, this inquiry focuses only on the state of the law at the time of the arrests: January 23, 2011, for Montgomery, and July 14, 2011, for Loeb. . . Relying on case law from the First, Ninth, and Eleventh circuits, Montgomery and Loeb contend that this right was clearly established at the time of their arrests. . . . Killingsworth and Gaspar, on the other hand, draw mostly on a Third Circuit case in arguing that the right to peacefully film police conduct was not clearly established at the time of the arrests. . . . Given this pre-existing and recent Third Circuit case law, Montgomery and Loeb did not have a clearly established right to record police officers while they were performing their duties in public. The case law at the time of their 2011 arrests did not establish a clear constitutional rule such that reasonable police officers would know that they were violating the constitutional rights of Montgomery and Loeb. . . . Killingsworth and Gaspar are thus entitled to qualified immunity on the First Amendment retaliation claims asserted against them by Montgomery and Loeb, respectively. . . . Whether the Third Circuit will eventually decide to follow what appears to be a growing trend in other circuits to recognize a First Amendment right to observe and record police activity is, of course, not for this court to decide, even if there are good policy reasons [to] adopt that change.")

Hartman v. Gloucester Tp., No. 12–2085, 2014 WL 2773581, *10-*12 (D.N.J. June 19, 2014) ("Defendants argue that the right to be free from entry of a home under the community caretaking function was not clearly established in April, 2010. Ray v. Twp. Of Warren was decided on November 23, 2010 (after Hartman's arrest) and held that:

> The community caretaking doctrine cannot be used to justify warrantless searches of a home. Whether that exception can ever apply outside the context of an automobile search, we need not now decide. It is enough to say that, in the context of a search of a home, it does not override the warrant requirement of the Fourth Amendment or the carefully crafted and well-recognized exceptions to that requirement.

Ray, 626 F.3d at 177. Until Ray, the question of whether the community caretaking doctrine could justify a warrantless entry into a home was unanswered in our Circuit; on that basis the Ray police officer defendants were entitled to qualified immunity because it would not have been apparent to an objectively reasonable officer that entry into Ray's home on June 17, 2005 was a violation of the law. While Ray resolved the question of whether the community caretaking exception applied to searches of the home, it is not dispositive here. Although Belcher and the other officers may have had a mistaken belief as to whether or not they could enter the home under the community caretaking exception, application of the exception still requires an evaluation of the totality of the circumstances. And an assertion of a constitutional right to privacy cannot be evidence of wrongdoing or used as justification for warrantless entry. . .Thus, even if the police officers believed they could enter the home under the exception, because Hartman's right was not clearly established, there are questions of facts related to whether the circumstances justified warrantless entry into Hartman's residence pursuant to the community caretaking exception. . . As a result, the Court cannot evaluate whether the police officer's actions were objectively reasonable under the present record, and Defendants' Motion for Summary Judgment is denied on this basis.")

Adams v. Springmeyer, 17 F.Supp.3d 478, 508-09 (W.D. Pa. 2014) ("Nine months after the raid at issue in this case, the Court of Appeals continued to question whether Payton had established a threshold lower than 'probable cause' to justify an entry into the residence of an individual named in an arrest warrant. . . If the applicable standard was unclear to members of the Court of Appeals after the raid, there is no way that it could have been clear to the Defendants at the time of the raid. In Deary, the Court of Appeals concluded that defendants sued under § 1983 could not establish their entitlement to qualified immunity as long as genuine issues of material fact existed as to whether their actions had been supported by probable cause. . . To the extent that Deary held that a defendant could never establish his or her entitlement to qualified immunity as a matter of law in the face of such a factual dispute, it is no longer good law. In Karnes v. Skrutski, 62 F.3d 485, 491, n. 3 (3d Cir.1995), the Court of Appeals recognized that Deary had been 'supplanted by the Supreme Court's subsequent determination of the question' in Anderson v. Creighton, 483 U.S. 635, 107 S. Ct. 3034, 97 L.Ed.2d 523 (1987). In Anderson, the Supreme Court clarified that a law enforcement officer may be entitled to qualified immunity if he or she 'reasonably but mistakenly conclude[s] that probable cause is present' and proceeds to conduct a search proscribed by the Fourth Amendment. . . .Although the meaning of the phrase 'reason to believe' appearing in Payton has been the subject of disagreement among courts, the Defendants cannot establish their entitlement to qualified immunity simply by demonstrating that 'courts ha[ve] not agreed on one verbal formulation of the controlling standard.'. . The relevant question is whether the 'state of the law' on March 3, 2011, gave the Defendants 'fair warning that their conduct violated the Constitution.'. . Regardless of how the applicable standard has been articulated, courts have generally agreed that an entry is permissible under Payton only where multiple facts support a belief that the individual named in an arrest warrant is both residing and present within a particular home at the time of entry. . . Extensive surveillance of the Orchard Avenue residence conducted in February 2011 failed to yield a single observation of Hunter. . . . On the basis of the existing record, the Court is not convinced that objectively reasonable officials in the situation faced by the Defendants would have concluded that they had 'reason to believe' that Hunter was still residing and present within the home on the morning of March 3, 2011. . . The Defendants' decision to move forward with the raid appears to have been heavily influenced by Whaley's alleged observation of Black at the Orchard Avenue residence on February 10, 2011. . . In his email of February 25, 2011, Christman expressed a belief that Hunter and Black were living together. . . At the time of Black's earlier arrest, however, it became known that he was a resident of Delaware. . . .This inconsistency in the Defendants' asserted beliefs about the location of Black's residence undermines their contention that they reasonably believed him to be living in the Plaintiffs' home. Reasonable officials in the position of the Defendants would have known that they needed a search warrant to 'legally search for the subject of an arrest warrant in the home of a third party.'. . The entering officers sued in Ray were entitled to qualified immunity because, at the time of their actions, it had not been clear whether the 'community caretaking doctrine' could justify a warrantless search of a home in the absence of consent or exigent circumstances. . . Ray was decided more than three months before the raid conducted at the Orchard Avenue residence. The evidentiary record, when viewed in the light most favorable to the Plaintiffs, could support a finding that Springmeyer entered the Orchard Avenue residence after learning that Hunter and Black were not present. . . . At the time of Springmeyer's entry, it was clearly established law that, in the absence of a warrant, a law enforcement officer could enter a home without the consent of the owners only in the face of exigent circumstances. . . Because the Defendants' entitlement to qualified immunity will turn on the existence of facts that have not yet been reduced to findings, the Defendants' motion for summary judgment will be denied with respect to the Fourth Amendment claims remaining in the case. The Defendants remain free to raise the defense of qualified immunity at trial.")

Caldwell v. Nodiff, No. 13–162, 2014 WL 641356, *9, *10 (E.D. Pa. Feb. 18, 2014) ("Notwithstanding the sometimes broad statements about the scope of the failure-to-intervene doctrine, however, the Court has not found a case applying the failure-to-intervene doctrine to a case analogous to this one where the alleged constitutional violation is an unreasonable search and seizure of a person's bodily fluids for the purposes of testing for substance abuse. Under these circumstances, the Court concludes that it would not be clear to a reasonable officer that his failure to intervene in what plaintiff avers was an unreasonable drug test was unlawful. Walker v. Jackson, No. 12–cv–10267, 2013 WL 3379685, at *5 (D.Mass. July 8, 2013) ("The court has not found any support for the proposition that allowing a fellow officer to enter a residence and participating in the subsequent search constitutes a claim for failure to intervene."). Thus, the Court concludes that Sgt. Henry and Jane and/or John Does are entitled to qualified immunity with respect to plaintiff's Section 1983 claim insofar as it asserts liability against officers who failed to intervene with respect to the four drug tests.")

Fleck v. Trustees of University of Pennsylvania, 995 F.Supp.2d 390, 408 (E.D. Pa. 2014) ("The plaintiffs were on a public street, not in a car, and initially recorded only their own activity. But when they ignored repeated police requests to move from the mosque doorway and lower their voices, the landscape changed. Marcavage refused to shift the camera away from the Penn officer's face, a refusal she took as a threat. That disregard led to their arrest and the video camera's seizure. Under such circumstances we hold that there was then no clearly-established First Amendment right in our Circuit to film police activity where, as here, the plaintiffs actively impeded efforts to restore public order.")

McAndrew v. Bucks Cnty. Bd. of Comm'rs, 982 F. Supp. 2d 491, 499-503 (E.D. Pa. 2013) ("The Third Circuit has categorically found that testimony, even voluntary testimony, at a grand jury hearing is protected speech. . . .Therefore, plaintiff's grand jury testimony as alleged in paragraph

39 of his complaint is protected speech. The court further concludes that plaintiff's reporting of corruption and wrongdoing also implicate the First Amendment because, based on the limited information before the court, it appears that these statements were made in plaintiff's capacity as a citizen, not as a government employee. Plaintiff was a deputy at the Bucks County Sheriffs Office, and the complaint alleges that he complained to his superiors about rigged auto-repair bids, false gun-training certifications, the office's use-of-force policy, corruption, and retaliation for his whistleblowing activities. While the parties have provided only limited information from which the court may infer the boundaries of plaintiff's job responsibilities, the reporting of corruption and wrongdoing does not appear to fall within the ambit of the responsibilities of a deputy sheriff. Furthermore, it is not dispositive that plaintiff learned about the alleged wrongdoing by nature of his position with the Sheriff's Department; indeed 'courts have found that public officials are uniquely qualified to comment on issues of public concern, precisely because of the access to information their positions afford them.'. . After carefully examining the allegations of the complaint and considering the inferences that flow therefrom, the court has determined that plaintiff has stated a plausible First Amendment claim for which relief can be granted, one which discovery may further substantiate. . . Furthermore, the court believes that the Supreme Court's decision in Garcetti v. Ceballos as well as a long line of Third Circuit cases addressing the free speech rights of government employees have settled the issue of when a government employee's speech is entitled to First Amendment Protection. . . While these cases may be somewhat distinguishable from the present matter, the Third Circuit has acknowledged that there need not be 'previous precedent directly on point' for a constitutional right to be clearly established for qualified immunity purposes. . . Given the substantial precedent addressing the First Amendment rights of public employees, the court believes plaintiff's rights were clearly established at the time he was discharged from employment. As such, defendants' qualified immunity defense is without merit.")

Ingram v. Township of Deptford, 858 F.Supp.2d 386, 399, 400 (D.N.J. 2012) ("A right is clearly established when 'it would [have been] clear to a reasonable officer that his conduct was unlawful in the situation he confronted.'. . It is clearly established that the '[u]se of excessive force by a state official effectuating a search or seizure violates the Fourth Amendment.'. . Moreover, while the law surrounding excessive force is fact-dependent, this does not mean the law is not clearly established. Tofano v. Reidel, 61 F.Supp.2d 289, 299 (D.N.J.1999). At the time of this incident, it was clearly established law in the Third Circuit that the objective reasonableness standard articulated in Graham v. Connor, infra, and reiterated in Couden v. Duffy, infra, applied to alleged excessive force violations of the Fourth Amendment. . .While there was no case law in this circuit addressing the reasonableness of force used when removing a litigant from a courtroom pursuant to a judge's directive, it would have been clear to a reasonable officer in Sergeant Taylor's position that forcibly lifting a non–resisting senior citizen and carrying her out of the courtroom was excessive. Therefore, from the facts alleged in the Plaintiff's complaint, Sergeant Taylor is not entitled to qualified immunity on the allegation that he used constitutionally excessive force in executing the judge's directive. Accordingly, the Defendants' motion to dismiss the claims against Sergeant Taylor will be denied.")

Velius v. Township of Hamilton, No. 09-53 (JEI/JS), 2010 WL 4975979, at *5 (D.N.J. Dec. 7, 2010) ("[T]e Court concludes that in 2007, the law with respect to claims of excessive force by handcuffing, was clear: officers may violate a person's Fourth Amendment right to be free from excessive force even in the absence of physical injury. Defendants are therefore not entitled to qualified immunity.")

Hain v. DeLeo, No. 1:08-CV-2136, 2010 WL 4514315, at *5 (M.D. Pa. Nov. 2, 2010) ("Even now many questions remain as to the scope of the Second Amendment. As the Third Circuit has recently cautioned, 'Second Amendment doctrine remains in its nascency, and lower courts must proceed deliberately when addressing regulations unmentioned by Heller.' United States v. Marzzarella, 614 F.3d 85, 101 (3d Cir. 2010). Plaintiffs' argument must therefore be rejected; there is no question that the clearly established legal rules confronting DeLeo would not have put him on notice that his conduct violated the Second Amendment. As a local official, it would not have been clear to him at the time that his actions implicated Plaintiff's Second Amendment right, which was only just recently incorporated by the Supreme Court. Indeed, it was not and is still not clear that the Second Amendment right set out in Heller is implicated by the revocation of a license to carry concealed weapons in public. Even interpreting the complaint to allege that the revocation of Plaintiff's permit in retaliation for Plaintiff's exercise of her Second Amendment rights is a distinct Second Amendment violation, qualified immunity applies to Plaintiff's claims against Sheriff DeLeo. Accordingly, the Court finds that DeLeo is entitled to qualified immunity; the Defendants' motion to dismiss will be granted on this claim.")

Burke v. Twp. of Cheltenham, No. 10-1508, 2010 WL 3928524, at *15 (E.D. Pa. Oct. 5, 2010) ("Even though the strip search in question here occurred in April of 2008–well before our Circuit decided Florence–we cannot find that the right of an arrestee–even one charged with a minor offense–not to be strip searched while in a correctional facility was 'clearly established' twenty-eight months ago. Baskins is therefore entitled to qualified immunity with respect to Burke's unlawful search and seizure claims arising out of the strip search of Burke at the Cheltenham Township Police station. Regarding strip searches incident to arrest, however, Judge DuBois has recently noted that '[n]o Supreme Court case discusses the constitutionality of strip searches incident to arrest, which appear to fall between the "full searches" considered by Robinson and the "intrusions beyond the body's surface" considered by Schmerber.'. . But the factors elucidated in Wolfish that must be considered before ruling on whether a strip search in prison is reasonable–'the scope of the particular intrusion, the manner in which it is conducted, the justification for initiating it, and the place in which it is conducted,'. . all militate against the legality of the street strip search described in Burke's complaint. . . . [A] public strip search that fails the four-factor test of Wolfish would necessarily be unreasonable given that Wolfish explicitly dealt with strip searches *in prisons.*Applying Wolfish to Burke's version of the facts, then, we conclude on this limited record that the arresting officers violated the Fourth Amendment when they searched Burke on Fenton Road. While this satisfies only the first prong of Saucier, what little precedent there is dealing with public strip searches suggests that such searches violate clearly established rights under Saucier's second prong.")

Henry v. City of Philadelphia, No. 09-1584, 2010 WL 3927638, at *15, *16 (E.D. Pa. Sept. 30, 2010) ("Since Grazier, which was issued on May 9, 2003, and the Third Circuit's decision in Neuberger, which was issued on January 5, 2005 but was non-precedential, our Court of Appeals has not answered the question left open by Abraham v. Raso in 1999. As a result, we cannot say that, as of August 5, 2007, the notion that an officer violates an individual's constitutional rights if he engages in conduct that unreasonably or unnecessarily increased the likelihood that significant force would be applied against the individual was a constitutional right that was 'clearly established' by virtue of controlling case law in the Third Circuit. . . Nor do we find that a consensus of cases of persuasive authority had embraced this notion as of the relevant date as to have had the effect of 'clearly establishing' it for purposes of the qualified immunity analysis. . . .Having surveyed the case law, we are not persuaded that Henry had a clearly established right as of August 5, 2007 to be free of instructions by officers to drop his knives and come outside, where the officers sought to disarm and subdue him at a time when he was subject to arrest for his earlier assaults on officers and notwithstanding the fact that department policy instructed them to leave such tactics to colleagues in a specialized unit. . . .Because Plaintiffs have not established that any conduct of Officer Orth or Sergeants Schiavone or Bradshaw in directing Henry to emerge from the house violated a clearly established constitutional right, these officers are entitled to summary judgment on the basis of qualified immunity . . . .")

Beckinger v. Township of Elizabeth, No. 08-432, 2010 WL 1024644, at *17 (W.D. Pa. Mar. 17, 2010) ("As evident from Green, with respect to whether an employee has a clearly established First Amendment right to attend or testify at judicial proceedings, this court concludes that Garcetti called into question whether the testimony of a government employee at a judicial hearing in the course of the employee's duties may constitute speech as a citizen entitled to First Amendment protection. This ambiguity after Garcetti lasted until Reilly was decided. While Reilly recognized that the right was clearly established prior to Garcetti, it noted that no precedential opinion was rendered after Garcetti until the court of appeals in Reilly addressed the issue. The relevant conduct in Reilly occurred prior to Garcetti at a time when the right was clearly established. Reilly did not address the situation where the conduct occurred in the period between Garcetti and Reilly when there was uncertainty about how broadly Garcetti would be applied. . . . The court finds that during the small window of time between May 30, 2006 when Garcetti was decided and July 1, 2008 when Reilly was decided, it would not have been clear to a reasonable officer that imposing discipline on a police officer for testifying on matters related to the officer's official duties was unlawful.")

Crawford v. Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, No. Civ.A. 1CV03-693, 2005 WL 2465863, at *10 (M.D. Pa. Oct. 6, 2005) ("The individual Defendants argue that because it was not clear at the time of Plaintiff's prosecutions that police were obligated under Brady to disclose favorable evidence to the accused, they are entitled to qualified immunity. If this was the extent of the violation claimed by Plaintiff, Defendants argument might have some appeal. [citing Gibson]However, the right to be free from falsifying documents, fabricating evidence, giving misleading or perjured testimony, and malicious prosecution was clearly established. It strains credibility to think that police officers could participate in the conduct alleged here and not understand that their actions violate the accused's rights. . . It is up to Plaintiff to prove by a preponderance of the evidence at trial that the individuals did in fact conspire to alter the evidence in order to convict him and are responsible for his imprisonment. At summary judgment, taking the facts in the light most favorable to Plaintiff, the individual Defendants have failed to meet their burden in demonstrating immunity for the violations claimed.").

Maslow v. Evans, No. 01-CV-3636, 00-CV-5660, 00-CV-5805, 01-CV-1538, 01-CV-2166, 2003 WL 22594577, at *27, *28 (E.D. Pa. Nov. 7, 2003) ("It is beyond question that when Plaintiffs' claim arose it was a clearly established principle of law that a state actor violates another's constitutional rights when he sexually assaults that person in the course of an arrest, or transports a person to her house and then forcibly performs oral sex, or otherwise uses his authority as a state official to force himself sexually upon an unwilling victim. Even if no case had ever proclaimed it so, it would be manifestly clear to any reasonable officer that such conduct is unlawful. . . . Having addressed the law applicable to the subordinate, the Court must next determine whether the supervisory liability doctrine, as it applies to this context, was clearly established. . . As set forth above, Plaintiffs have adduced sufficient facts to make out a constitutional violation, thus satisfying the first step in the Saucier analysis. . . The Court concludes that it was clearly established by early 1999 that a supervisor who was deliberately indifferent in the face of an unreasonable risk of harm could be held liable under § 1983 if his inaction bore an affirmative causal link to the harm suffered by the plaintiff. . . . Given the nature, quality and quantity of scandalous and troubling information known to these Defendants, the Court cannot conclude that their legal obligations could have been unclear. Each of these Defendants was aware that Evans had used his authority as a state trooper improperly and that the objects of his egregious misconduct were, on far too many occasions, women or young girls in the community. Defendants contend that it is only with the benefit of hindsight that the extent of Evans' depravity and risk to the community could be known and that these officials acted reasonably at the time. However, the Court is satisfied that the information known to these Defendants in early 1999 would compel a reasonable officer to intervene and take appropriate steps to prevent Evans from abusing his position of power for his own perverted sexual gratification. In these circumstances, no reasonable officer could believe that the Constitution demanded less. Accordingly, these Defendants are not entitled to qualified immunity.").

FOURTH CIRCUIT

Abbott v. Pastides, 900 F.3d 160, 174-75 (4th Cir. 2018) ("For the reasons laid out above, we agree with the district court that the plaintiffs have failed as a matter of law to establish that the University defendants violated their First Amendment rights in connection with the inquiry into the Free Speech Event. . . We note, however, that even if this were not the case, the defendants would be entitled to summary judgment on qualified immunity grounds. . . [E]ven assuming, arguendo, that it were possible to find that the University's response to student complaints arising out of the Free Speech Event transgressed some First Amendment limit, the plaintiffs are unable to identify any precedent – and we have found none – that would put that result 'beyond debate.' As we and other courts have recognized, First Amendment parameters may be especially difficult to discern in the school context. . . And as we have noted, the plaintiffs' claim for damages relief in connection with a speech event that the University approved and for which they were never sanctioned presents some especially novel questions. At a minimum, the University defendants were not on clear notice that their response to student complaints regarding the Free Speech Event violated the First Amendment, and for that reason alone they are entitled to qualified immunity.")

Cannon v. Vill. of Bald Head Island, N. Carolina, 891 F.3d 489, 499-501 (4th Cir. 2018) ("Acknowledging that the fact-specific nature of the Pickering inquiry often leads courts to conclude that a defendant is entitled to qualified immunity from a First Amendment retaliation claim, the district court nonetheless held that this Court's opinions in Cromer and Ridpath clearly established that the balance of interests weighed in the Officers' favor. [Court distinguishes both cases] . . . . [N]either Cromer nor Ridpath rendered it 'beyond debate,'. . . that the balance of interests weighs in the Officers' favor here. We therefore reverse the district court's determination that Peck and Mitchell were not shielded by qualified immunity from the Officers' First Amendment retaliation claims.")

Cannon v. Vill. of Bald Head Island, N. Carolina, 891 F.3d 489, 502, 506 (4th Cir. 2018) (4th Cir. 2018) ("In the context of a claim that a governmental defendant violated a former employee's Fourteenth Amendment rights by publicly disclosing the reasons for the employee's discharge, as here, this Court has held that this opportunity to be heard 'must be granted at a meaningful time.'. . This is because, as we further held, '[a]n opportunity to clear your name after it has been ruined by dissemination of false, stigmatizing charges is not "meaningful."'. . .With this legal framework in mind, we now must determine (1) whether, under clearly established law, the Officers were deprived of a protected liberty interest and (2) if so, whether, under clearly established law, the Officers were deprived of that interest without due process of law. . . . '[H]arassment,' 'sexual harassment,' and 'detrimental personal conduct' amount to 'significant character defects,'such as 'immorality,'. . . and therefore stigmatize the Officers' reputation in a constitutionally cognizable manner. Additionally, the Officers' evidence shows that after the Department released the relevant documents, each Officer either had difficulty securing a job or accepted a job with less significant responsibilities and lower pay, thereby creating a reasonable inference that the claims in the termination letters did, in fact, place a stigma on the Officers' reputations with prospective employers. . . . This Court decided Sciolino, Ledford, Ridpath, and the other cases cited above years before the Department discharged the Officers and disclosed the grounds for their termination. Accordingly, under our qualified immunity analysis, it was clearly established at the time of the disclosures that the disclosed allegations would place a constitutionally cognizable stigma on the Officers' reputations. . . .In sum, under our qualified immunity analysis, at the time of the disclosures this Court's precedent clearly established that the allegedly stigmatizing statements were made public by Peck. . . . In sum, we conclude that under clearly established precedent, Peck made public false and stigmatizing charges regarding the grounds for the Officers' termination. This satisfies Sciolino's four prongs, thus demonstrating deprivation of the Officers' constitutionally cognizable liberty interests under clearly established law. . . . Having concluded that this Court's decisions clearly established that Peck deprived the Officers of a liberty interest, we now must determine whether, under clearly established law, the Officers were deprived of that interest 'without due process of law.'. . As explained above, when a governmental employer places an employee's reputation 'at stake' by publicly disclosing defamatory charges, the employee is entitled to a hearing 'to "clear [his] name" against [the] unfounded charges.'. . Here, the Officers never received a name-clearing hearing. Accordingly, Peck has denied the Officers due process of law. Peck nonetheless asserts that the failure to afford the Officers a name-clearing hearing does not amount to a violation of clearly established law for two reasons: (1) he 'w[as] not required to provide [the Officers] with an adversarial pre-termination hearing,'. . . and (2) '[the Officers] had alternative processes to contest the contents of the termination letter[s][.]'. . We disagree. . . . In Sciolino, this Court clearly established that '[a]n opportunity to clear your name after it has been ruined by dissemination of false, stigmatizing charges is not "meaningful."'. . Accordingly, regardless whether the Fourteenth Amendment obliged Defendants to afford the Officers an adversarial, pre-termination name-clearing hearing, Sciolino established that the Fourteenth Amendment required Defendants to afford the Officers a constitutionally adequate name-clearing hearing before publicly disclosing false information regarding the basis for the Officers' termination that, in fact, restricted their ability to obtain new employment.")

Adams v. Ferguson, 884 F.3d 219, 226-30 (4th Cir. 2018) ("The Supreme Court previously required courts to address the first prong before the second. . . In 2009, however, the Court held that judges 'should be permitted to exercise their sound discretion in deciding which of the two prongs of the qualified immunity analysis should be addressed first in light of the circumstances in the particular case at hand.'. . Thus, we now can 'skip ahead to the question whether the law clearly established that the officer's conduct was unlawful in the circumstances of the case.'. .We do so here. . . . Farmer, Iko, and Slakan. . . do not establish that failure to transfer an inmate from a prison to a state mental health facility creates 'an excessive risk to inmate health or safety,'. . . or, as Adams claims, a 'know[n] ... substantial risk' that an inmate will 'suffer[ ] serious harm[.[' . . . This is true even with respect to an inmate subject to a Competency Order or equivalent court order directing treatment of the inmate's mental health needs. Adams has not identified any case law that holds that mentally ill prisoners housed in state prisons, including those subject to Competency Orders or the like, must be transferred to state mental health hospitals to escape an excessive risk to their health. Nor have we found any. Virginia law requires prisons to provide mental health services to inmates. . . The Competency Order scheme presumes that inmates with serious mental health conditions are more likely to have their competency restored if they receive treatment at a state mental health hospital. . . But that does not mean that inmates with such conditions who remain in Virginia's prison system are per se subject to an 'excessive risk to inmate health or safety.'. .We are not blind to the fact that many prison systems offer inadequate mental health care. But we are unaware of any clearly established law (or indeed, any law at all) holding that prisons are, as a general rule, unfit to house mentally ill inmates. Instead, inmates regularly challenge, and judges regularly address, the provision of prison mental health services on a system-by-system, facility-by-facility, and prisoner-by-prisoner basis. . . Of course, in this case, the complaint alleges that prison officials affirmatively denied Mitchell his constitutional right to personal health and safety. It maintains that prison guards denied Mitchell food, turned off the water to his cell, and allowed him to live in a less-than-human state. Prison medical staff assertedly provided Mitchell little-to-no medication or treatment for severe mental and physical ailments. The complaint further alleges that guards forced Mitchell 'to the ground, dragged, sprayed with mace, stood upon, punched and kicked' him, and that after he died, 'a correctional officer employee ... attempted to clean Mitchell's cell' to hide the evidence of this systemic mistreatment. Adams has brought suit against some forty-nine other defendants in an effort to hold them liable for this conduct. But these are not the claims alleged against Ferguson. In assessing whether she is entitled to qualified immunity, we must differentiate the claims made against other defendants from those asserted against her. The Tenth Circuit recently undertook a similar analysis in Blackmon v. Sutton, 734 F.3d 1237 (10th Cir. 2013), which concerned the treatment of a juvenile in a detention facility. The court, in an opinion by then-Judge Gorsuch, denied qualified immunity for defendants who allegedly 'shackled' the plaintiff to a restraining chair and allowed 'a fully grown man ... to sit on the [plaintiff's] chest' 'simply ... to punish him.'. . It also denied qualified immunity for prison officials who 'were well aware of' the plaintiff's 'grave mental health problems' but 'delayed or denied' the plaintiff's access to necessary medical care. . . But the Blackmon court rejected the claim that the director of the facility violated the plaintiff's constitutional rights by 'failing to transfer him to' a less restrictive facility pending trial. . . The court reasoned that the plaintiff had not shown 'that his placement in the juvenile detention facility automatically and alone amounted to an "objectively excessive risk" to his health and safety.'. . Said differently, it was not clear that, absent the use of excessive force or denial of access to medical care, placing the plaintiff in the detention center and denying him a transfer per se violated the Constitution. The court therefore granted the director qualified immunity. . .The same is true here. Adams has alleged conduct by many other defendants that, if true, clearly violates the Constitution. But her claim against Ferguson turns on 'five words: "waiting lists and empty beds."'. . Our qualified immunity analysis must therefore focus on this conduct, and this claim, alone: that—in her own words—it is clearly established that 'plausible allegations of "waiting lists and empty beds" state claims for relief' under § 1983. . . We cannot hold that they do. Time and again, the Supreme Court has reiterated that for a right to be clearly established, 'existing precedent must have placed the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate.'. . No clearly established law dictates that housing mentally ill inmates in prisons, rather than transferring them to state mental health facilities, 'automatically and alone amount[s] to an "objectively excessive risk" to [inmate] health and safety.'. .In light of repeated instruction from the Supreme Court, we must conclude that Ferguson is entitled to qualified immunity from suit on Adams's § 1983 claims.")

force analysis thus focuses on the maliciousness of the force used, not the severity of the injury that results from that force. . . Here, the momentum from the van was sufficient to cause a gash on Mr. Thompson's forehead, bleeding from his hands and arms and bruising, not to mention significant emotional distress. The force alleged is therefore beyond de minimis for Eighth Amendment purposes. . . .Because Mr. Thompson has alleged facts from which a reasonable factfinder could conclude that Officer Cooper maliciously subjected him to a rough ride, he has sufficiently alleged an Eighth Amendment excessive force claim sufficient to survive summary judgment as to Cooper. . .We further hold that Mr. Thompson's right was clearly established by April 8, 2010, the date of the incident. Defined at the appropriate level of specificity, prisoners have a right not to be assaulted by their captors. Under the Eighth Amendment, prisoners have the right to be free from malicious or penologically unjustified infliction of pain and suffering. . . . After examining both controlling and persuasive authority, we conclude that Officer Cooper had fair warning that gratuitously giving an inmate a 'rough ride' for no reason other than to retaliate against him for filing lawsuits and grievances is unconstitutional. A reasonable officer would have known from Supreme Court precedent that the Eighth Amendment prohibits such malicious acts of violence or intentional endangerment. In McMillian, one of the seminal cases defining the scope of the right not to be subjected to excessive force, the Supreme Court reversed the dismissal of an Eighth Amendment claim based on a correctional officer's gratuitous punch of an inmate during transport. . . In Wilkins, a prison official, angered by the prisoner's request for a grievance form, slammed the prisoner against the ground and physically beat him in response. . . The Supreme Court reversed the district court's dismissal of the case for failure to state a claim and held that the prisoner would prevail if he proved that the official had in fact acted maliciously. . . As in Wilkins, if we credit Mr. Thompson's account, the only reason Cooper used force against him was in retaliation for filing grievances. Accordingly, Wilkins and McMillian are sufficiently similar to Cooper's alleged conduct that a reasonable officer would have known that a retaliatory "rough ride" is unconstitutional. To be sure, McMillian and Wilkins involved direct punches and kicks, rather than a 'rough ride,' but it makes no difference to the constitutional analysis whether Mr. Thompson was slammed against the side of the van by the officer's hands or by the momentum maliciously created by the officer's driving. . . The intentionally erratic driving was simply a different means of effectuating the same constitutional violation. To draw a line between these acts would encourage bad actors to invent creative and novel means of using unjustified force on prisoners. Although McMillian and Wilkins did not reach the qualified immunity question, their holdings provide officers with fair notice that malicious, unprovoked, unjustified force inflicted on inmates who are compliant and restrained, and violates the Eighth Amendment. In other words, the Eighth Amendment principle prohibiting such gratuitous violence applies with 'obvious clarity' to a malicious 'rough ride,' just as it does to a malicious direct blow. . . Indeed, two Eighth Circuit cases have held that malicious 'rough rides' violate the Eighth Amendment. . . .Given the factual parallels, the Eighth Circuit cases are powerful indicators that the officers here had fair notice. . . .As is apparent from the case law of eleven federal courts of appeals, the Eighth Amendment protection against the malicious and sadistic infliction of pain and suffering applies in a diverse range of factual scenarios. That unifying thread provides fair notice to prison officials that they cannot, no matter their creativity, maliciously harm a prisoner on a whim or for reasons unrelated to the government's interest in maintaining order. That principle applies with particular clarity to cases such as this one, where the victim is restrained, compliant, and incapable of resisting or protecting himself, and otherwise presents no physical threat in any way. The government argues, unpersuasively, that the law is not clearly established because courts have not found a constitutional violation in some failure-to-fasten-seatbelt cases, notwithstanding the Eighth Circuit precedent. However, with one exception, every other seatbelt case cited by the district court and the government involved mere negligence, rather than malice or even recklessness. . . . The government also argues, unpersuasively, that an official's wrongful intent is never relevant to the qualified immunity analysis, even in the context of an Eighth Amendment deliberate indifference or excessive force claim. . . The government cites Crawford-El v. Britton for the sweeping proposition that, under Harlow v. Fitzgerald . . . '[e]vidence concerning the defendant's subjective intent is simply irrelevant.'. . Crawford-El's holding is much more limited and is not itself a decision on qualified immunity. . . Read in context, the Court was merely referring to and reiterating Harlow's holding that ' "bare allegations of malice" cannot overcome the qualified immunity defense.'. . Crawford-El and Harlow do not forbid us from considering evidence of intent in Mr. Thompson's excessive force claim. Harlow did not involve an Eighth Amendment excessive force claim or a deliberate indifference claim. . . As Crawford-El itself recognized, the significance of evidence of intent differs when it 'is an essential component of the plaintiff's affirmative case.'. . For claims where intent is an element, an official's state of mind is a reference point by which she can reasonably assess conformity to the law because the case law is intent-specific. Considering evidence of intent in this manner is not foreclosed by Crawford-El, as the Supreme Court itself has applied the clearly established prong in reference to retaliatory intent. See Ortiz v. Jordan, 562 U.S. 180, 189–91, 131 S.Ct. 884, 178 L.Ed.2d 703 (2011) (holding that law was clearly established that prison guard cannot retaliate against inmate by putting her in solitary confinement) (citing Crawford-El, 523 U.S. at 592, 118 S.Ct. 1584). Thus, in light of the Supreme Court precedent in McMillian and Wilkins, case law on 'rough rides' from our sister circuit, and the overwhelming consensus on the prisoner's right to be free from assault, i.e., malicious infliction of pain and suffering, we conclude that Officer Cooper had fair warning that his actions were unconstitutional and that Mr. Thompson's right was therefore clearly established. Accordingly, we reverse the district court's determination that Officer Cooper is entitled to qualified immunity on the Eighth Amendment excessive force claim. . . .Unlike Cooper, who drove the van, Diming did not use unlawful force against Mr. Thompson—rather, he failed to do anything to stop it. Accordingly, the claim against Diming is functionally the same as claims in failure-to-protect or conditions-of-confinement cases, which are evaluated under the deliberate indifference standard. . . .In sum, viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to Mr. Thompson, he has alleged sufficient facts to satisfy both prongs of the deliberate indifference test. He adequately asserts that he was exposed to the substantial risk of harm of being physically tossed about in an erratic vehicle and that Diming was aware of that risk and disregarded it by failing to take any preventative measures. . .The only remaining question is whether Mr. Thompson's right to reasonable protection from a known threat was clearly established as of April 8, 2010, the date of the incident. . . .We conclude that Mr. Thompson's right was clearly established. Odom held that, by June 2000, it was clearly established in the Fourth Circuit that 'a correctional officer who stands by as a passive observer and takes no action whatsoever to intervene during an assault violates the rights of the victim inmate.' . . Reasonable officials would understand Odom to mean that inmates have an Eighth Amendment right to be protected from malicious attacks, not just by other inmates, but also from the very officials tasked with ensuring their security. . . . Because controlling authority clearly establishes an inmate's right to reasonable protection from malicious assault, we look no further and conclude that Mr. Thompson's right was clearly established in this case. Accordingly, we reverse the district court's grant of qualified immunity to Officer Diming.") Humbert v. Mayor & City Council of Baltimore City, 866 F.3d 546, 560-62 (4th Cir. 2017) ("All of [the] facts taken together are not 'sufficient to warrant a prudent person, or one of reasonable caution, in believing, in the circumstances shown,' that Humbert engaged in criminal activity. . . Much like with the corrected warrant application, we simply cannot see how, under the circumstances of this case, the Officers could have reasonably concluded that they had probable cause to arrest Humbert. At most, the circumstances would have given the Officers only reasonable suspicion to investigate Humbert further. We therefore conclude that Humbert's arrest was not supported by probable cause. Similarly, the legal process instituted against Humbert and his resulting pretrial detention were unsupported by probable cause. The evidence shows that the court commissioner made his probable cause determination by relying on a materially false and misleading warrant application. And during Humbert's fifteen-month detention, the Officers never obtained any evidence of his criminality before or after his arraignment. To the contrary, the victim continuously informed them that she could not identify Humbert. What is more, the Officers received reports excluding Humbert as a source of the DNA found on the victim and her clothing—the first report on June 2, 2008, and the last report on December 15, 2008. Yet, they did not give the reports to Assistant State's Attorney Tan until May 11, 2009, despite receiving a memorandum from Tan a year earlier on May 12, 2008, expressly demanding that any and all information received by the BPD in connection with the case be immediately delivered to his office. Drawing all inferences in Humbert's favor, the Officers failed to promptly give the reports to Tan because the victim only agreed to testify against Humbert based on their assurances that DNA evidence supported Humbert's guilt. Further, they never notified Tan of the victim's inability to identify Humbert. It was only after Tan received the reports that he learned from the victim herself that she could not identify Humbert and she refused to testify. Because the Officers withheld such substantial information from Tan, he maintained the criminal proceedings against Humbert without any proper basis. To be sure, once Tan finally possessed this information, he entered a nolle prosequi. Viewing these facts in the light most favorable to Humbert, his criminal proceedings and pretrial detention also violated his Fourth Amendment rights. Put differently, the Officers caused legal process to be instituted and maintained against him without probable cause to believe that he committed a crime. See Manuel v. City of Joliet, ——U.S. ——, 137 S. Ct. 911, 918 (2017) (holding that pretrial detention resulting from legal process unsupported by probable cause violates the Fourth Amendment). We therefore conclude that the evidence reasonably supports the jury's verdict in favor of Humbert's § 1983 malicious prosecution claim. . . . Because we have determined that the Officers lacked probable cause to seize Humbert, we must next examine whether instituting criminal process against him violated a clearly established rule. The Officers argue that a reasonable person in the Officers' positions would not have known that his or her actions violated a clearly established right. Certainly, the Fourth Amendment right to be seized only on probable cause was clearly established at the time of the events at issue here. . . The law made clear that arresting and initiating legal process against a person without probable cause amounts to a seizure in violation of the Fourth Amendment. . . Additionally, it was clearly established 'that the Constitution did not permit a police officer deliberately, or with reckless disregard for the truth, to make material misrepresentations or omissions to seek a warrant that would otherwise be without probable cause.'. . The objective standard for qualified immunity accommodates the allegation of falsity or material omissions 'because a reasonable officer cannot believe a warrant is supported by probable cause if the magistrate is misled by [stated or omitted facts] that the officer knows or should know are false [or would negate probable cause].'")

Bounds v. Parsons, 700 F. App'x 217, ___ (4th Cir. 2017) ("[I]n 2013, when Bounds was arrested, relevant precedent did not clearly prohibit an officer from using force, including a taser, in order to effectuate an arrest of a suspect who physically resists. It was not until 2016, in Armstrong, that we made clear that a taser 'may only be deployed when a police officer is confronted with an exigency that creates an immediate safety risk,' and not 'in the face of stationary and non-violent resistance to being handcuffed.'. . Nor does Meyers v. Baltimore Cty., Md., 713 F.3d 723 (4th Cir. 2013), decided before Bounds's arrest, clearly establish any limit on the use of force to restrain a suspect who is resisting: At the time excessive force was applied in Meyers, the suspect 'was not actively resisting arrest,' . . . whereas Bounds resisted arrest throughout, starting with his efforts to turn and face Parsons while being handcuffed and continuing through the officers' multiple efforts to secure Bounds in the police car. . . . At the time of Bounds's arrest, neither Meyers nor any other precedent would have made clear to 'every reasonable official,'. . . that they were precluded from using force to effectuate the arrest of a physically resistant and noncompliant suspect. The officers are therefore entitled to qualified immunity.")

Safar v. Tingle, 859 F.3d 241, 246-48 (4th Cir. 2017) ("Here the complaint presupposes an altogether novel duty: after a magistrate issued the arrest warrants based on probable cause, Rodriguez had the duty to take steps to withdraw the warrants upon learning that the charges were meritless. By no means do we diminish the dreadful ordeal that Rodriguez might have averted by seeking to retract the warrants. But that is a different matter from holding that Rodriguez had an affirmative duty in law to do so. We need not decide whether such a duty exists: the critical point is that the proposed duty was certainly not clearly established. Tellingly, plaintiffs fail to note what exactly the duty was or where in the law the obligation was to be found. They do not sketch out the procedures officer Rodriguez was supposed to follow, identify the point in the criminal process when such steps should have been taken, or explain why it was her responsibility to have the warrants revoked. Moreover, a Virginia police officer does not 'ha[ve] the authority to unilaterally withdraw or dismiss a lawfully issued arrest warrant.'. . Only an attorney for the Commonwealth may move the court for dismissal. . . And while Rodriguez might have raised the issue with a supervisor or relayed her concerns to a prosecutor, we are unaware of a nebulous duty requiring police officers to follow some undefined procedure whenever they come across further information that casts doubt on an active arrest warrant. After all, 'in a situation in which a warrant has issued upon probable cause, a police officer is not called upon either to exercise discretion or to weigh the proof.' Brady v. Dill, 187 F.3d 104, 112 (1st Cir. 1999); see also id. at 111 ("[I]t is the magistrate and not the policeman who should decide whether probable cause has dissipated to such an extent following arrest that the suspect should be released.").This is no abstract point. Although plaintiffs assure us that this is an exceptional circumstance where probable cause had completely dissipated, we must be careful not to make bad law out of an ostensibly 'easy' case. . . To say that an affirmative duty attached here fails to emphasize the limits of such an obligation and how it might function in practice. Probable cause is fluid; after an arrest warrant is sworn out there often comes to light additional evidence that may be more or less exculpatory. Sometimes a victim may recant, as Costco did here. Or perhaps a complaining witness offers new or conflicting testimony. In either case, an officer is forced to make a discretionary call about whether the subsequent information undermines a magistrate's finding of probable cause and, if so, how best to proceed. Given the vagaries of these evidentiary judgments, courts should not lightly enter the business of micromanaging police investigations and impose a categorical duty on officers governing the termination of allegedly stale arrest warrants. Indeed, if every failure of a police officer to act in some unspecified way on the basis of new information gave rise to liability, we would invite a legion of cases urging us to second-guess an officer's decision about whether to second-guess a magistrate's finding of probable cause. In any event, to the extent that plaintiffs struggle to define a Fourth Amendment right, they face an even bigger obstacle demonstrating that such a duty was clearly established. Plaintiffs frame the constitutional right at the highest level of generality, asserting that centuries of 'Anglo-American law' forbid a state official from 'knowingly caus[ing] or permit[ting] the arrest of an innocent citizen.'. . That is certainly true, as far as it goes. But what plaintiffs fail to do is 'identify a case where an officer acting under similar circumstances ... was held to have violated the Fourth Amendment.' White, 137 S. Ct. at 552. The absence of controlling cases suggests that Rodriguez did not have a clearly established affirmative duty to take steps to revoke the arrests warrants. In fact, all the indications from our case law point to the opposite conclusion. . . .We do not require that a prior case be identical to the case at bar to advance a civil suit. . . But despite their assertions to the contrary, plaintiffs cannot marshal a 'settled Fourth Amendment principle' that would have put Rodriguez on notice that she was violating the Constitution. . . Given the absence of an established duty to act, we award qualified immunity to Rodriguez on the § 1983 claims.")

Safar v. Tingle, 859 F.3d 241, 252-55 (4th Cir. 2017) (Floyd, J., concurring) ("The seizures that occurred when Plaintiffs Jan Eshow and Fadwa Safar were arrested strike me as manifestly unreasonable. The affiant for their warrants, Officer Rodriguez, was aware that probable cause for their arrests had entirely dissipated. . .Yet, she did nothing to initiate any recall of the arrest warrants or to inform the Commonwealth's Attorney's Office that the information on which she relied to obtain the warrants was entirely undermined. I believe that the Fourth Amendment mandates that when probable cause for an outstanding arrest warrant wholly disappears and the affiant is aware, the affiant has a duty to take steps to rescind the warrant. My belief that a seizure pursuant to a warrant for which probable cause has entirely dissipated is unreasonable under the Fourth Amendment is not novel. Multiple justices of the Supreme Court have recognized this point, albeit in opinions that have no binding force of law, as have several of our sister circuits. . . .The duty I envision would be limited to those extreme cases where probable cause has completely dissipated, a question we ask police officers to evaluate every day in the context of warrantless arrests. . . Thus, it would not be a departure to require an officer, having sworn under oath to facts in support of a warrant application, to have a responsibility to inform the court when the facts have so drastically changed as to eliminate all probable cause prior to the execution of the warrant the officer sought. . . Although I believe that the Fourth Amendment mandates such a duty, I recognize that announcing such a duty in this case would stand in tension with our decisions in Taylor v. Waters, 81 F.3d 429 (4th Cir. 1996) and Brooks v. City of Winston-Salem, N.C., 85 F.3d 178 (4th Cir. 1996), as the majority notes. . . I fear that the holdings in these cases are overbroad, and ultimately stray too far from their facts in appearing to establish a bright line rule that all potential liability for an officer cuts off at the moment of a warrant being issued, absent a materially false statement or material omission in the warrant application. . .If we adhere to the idea of reasonableness in understanding the Fourth Amendment, as we must, then the holdings of Taylor and Brooks appear to be in tension with that idea. Thus, I write separately to note this problem in the hopes that a future en banc court may have the chance to consider the impact of Taylor and Brooks and considerably narrow the scope of their holdings.")

Martin v. Duffy, 858 F.3d 239, 251 (4th Cir. 2017) ("In Booker, this Court held that an inmate's 'right to file a prison grievance free from retaliation was clearly established under the First Amendment' at least as far back in time as 2010—the year in which the defendant's conduct in Booker took place. . . Because Martin's First Amendment right to be free from retaliation by prison officials for filing a grievance was clearly established in 2010, . . . Duffy—whose alleged conduct took place in 2014—is not entitled to qualified immunity. Accordingly, we conclude that the district court erred in dismissing Martin's First Amendment retaliation claim.")

Liverman v. City of Petersburg, 844 F.3d 400, 407-12 (4th Cir. 2016) ("The threshold question in this case is whether the Department's policy regulates officers' rights to speak on matters of public concern. There can be no doubt that it does: the restraint is a virtual blanket prohibition on all speech critical of the government employer. The explicit terms of the Negative Comments Provision prevent plaintiffs and any other officer from making unfavorable comments on the operations and policies of the Department, arguably the 'paradigmatic' matter of public concern. . . .If the Department wishes to pursue a narrower social media policy, then it can craft a regulation that does not have the chilling effects on speech that the Supreme Court deplored. We cannot, however, allow the current policy to survive as a management and disciplinary mechanism. . . .In light of the First Amendment protection accorded to the officers' posts, we conclude that the discipline they received pursuant to the social networking policy was unconstitutional. . . . Having found that Dixon violated the officers' First Amendment rights, we must consider whether such rights were 'clearly established' at the time of the events at issue. . . . [T]his case does not involve gray areas: the right against such a sweeping prior restraint on speech was clearly established and then some. Indeed, it is axiomatic that the government may not ban speech on the ground that it expresses an objecting viewpoint. . . Accordingly, there can be no doubt that prohibiting any '[n]egative comments on the internal operations of the Bureau, or specific conduct of supervisors or peers' — even comments of great public concern — violates the First Amendment. . . .Dixon also asserts that the disciplinary actions taken pursuant to the policy were reasonable in light of the vague boundaries distinguishing public and private speech. Given the patent unconstitutionality of the social networking policy, however, efforts to enforce the policy are similarly suspect. After all, the core of the policy was a prohibition on legitimate speech and, as detailed above, we have little difficulty locating the officers' speech within this protected sphere. Plaintiffs raised serious concerns regarding the Department's training programs and the promotion of inexperienced supervisors, both of which are matters of public concern. As this court has held time and again, it was clearly established law that such speech is protected by the First Amendment. . .We appreciate the need for order and discipline in the ranks. . . At the same time, we cannot countenance an arm of government with such enormous powers being removed to this extent from public scrutiny. This is not an all- or-nothing matter; there is a balance to be struck. But the Department's social networking policy, and the disciplinary actions taken to enforce it, lean too far to one side. We therefore hold that Chief Dixon is not entitled to qualified immunity.")

Jackson v. Holley, 666 F. App'x 242, ___ & n.* (4th Cir. 2016) ("In this case, Jackson alleges only that Holley: (1) sent him one 'sexually explicit and lurid' letter; (2) 'posed up seductively before [Jackson] and whispered sexually explicit words to [him;]' and (3) 'plant[ed] her groin area in [Jackson's] face while [he] was seated for [his] haircut in the barber's chair.' We conclude that the conduct about which Jackson complains does not amount to an Eighth Amendment violation. . . . Given the lack of circuit authority regarding whether sexual harassment by prison officials amounts to a constitutional violation, we also find that it was not unreasonable for Holley to have 'failed to appreciate that h[er] conduct would violate [Jackson's] rights.' Meyers v. Baltimore Cnty., 713 F.3d 723, 731 (4th Cir. 2013) (internal quotation marks omitted). Thus, even if the conduct about which Jackson complains is sufficient to state an Eighth Amendment violation, Holley is entitled to qualified immunity under the second prong of the qualified immunity inquiry.")

Scinto v. Stansberry, 841 F.3d 219, 235-36 (4th Cir. 2016) ("Plaintiff has alleged facts sufficient for a reasonable jury to conclude that his constitutional rights were violated when Dr. Phillip denied Plaintiff his prescribed insulin and when Dr. Phillip and Administrator McClintock failed to aid Plaintiff during a medical emergency. . . Although a jury may ultimately decide that Defendants' version of events is more credible, we are barred from making such a determination when deciding whether to grant summary judgment based on qualified immunity. . . To determine whether the right was clearly established, we first must define the right at issue. . . Dr. Phillip maintains that we should frame our analysis of qualified immunity as to Plaintiff's insulin claim as whether it is 'clearly established that a prison medical provider runs afoul of the Eighth Amendment when he does not give one single dose of insulin to a federal inmate, after the inmate becomes angry and hostile ..., and the doctor implements a plan to monitor the inmate thereafter.'. . Similarly, Dr. Phillip and Administrator McClintock assert that we should consider their qualified immunity as to Plaintiff's medical emergency claim based on whether a reasonable official would have known it violated a clearly established constitutional right to follow protocol by placing an inmate in administrative detention after he receives an incident report. But '[f]or a constitutional right to be clearly established, its contours "must be sufficiently clear that a reasonable official would understand that what he is doing violates that right."'. . There is no requirement that the 'very action in question [must have] previously been held unlawful' for a reasonable official to have notice that his conduct violated that right. . . Accordingly, we reject Dr. Phillip's and Administrator McClintock's invitations to define the rights at issue in accordance with the 'very action[s] in question.'. .Rather, we define the right in question as the right of prisoners to receive adequate medical care and to be free from officials' deliberate indifference to their known medical needs. This definition is consistent with previous deliberate indifference cases from this Circuit. For example, in Iko v. Shreve--a case in which a prisoner alleged government officials failed to conduct a medical evaluation after pepper-spraying him to compel compliance during a cell removal--this Court defined the right at issue as 'the right to adequate medical care.'. . This definition also accords with Supreme Court jurisprudence, which has long dictated that the Eighth Amendment confers a duty upon prison officials to ensure that prisoners 'receive adequate ... medical care.'. .A prisoner's right to adequate medical care and freedom from deliberate indifference to medical needs has been clearly established by the Supreme Court and this Circuit since at least 1976 and, thus, was clearly established at the time of the events in question. . . Because we conclude that there is sufficient evidence that Plaintiff's Eighth Amendment right to adequate medical care and freedom from officials' deliberate indifference to his medical needs was violated and that the right was clearly established, Dr. Phillip and Administrator McClintock are not entitled to qualified immunity.")

Lane v. Anderson, 660 F. App'x 185, ___ (4th Cir. 2016) ("With respect to the first McVey prong, we cannot agree with Sheriff Anderson that Appellant stated his concerns merely as a self-serving complaint. Rather, Appellant, as a private citizen, spoke on a matter of public concern when he questioned a police shooting, which resulted in a fatality, and the subsequent investigation. When Appellant communicated with the media, he was acting outside the scope of his duties as a deputy sheriff. Although Appellant's 'expressions related to [his] job,' the First Amendment affords him protection when he conveys these views as a private citizen. . . . The content of Appellant's speech here was undeniably a matter of public concern. He questioned a shooting in which a suspect was killed (and Appellant himself injured). He questioned an allegedly botched investigation, which he suspected was cloaked in a police cover-up. And he ultimately questioned whether friendly fire occurred, as opposed to the Suspect having allegedly shot him, which resulted in the Suspect's death. . . .Having concluded that Appellant's speech should be accorded First Amendment protection, we now turn to the second prong of the qualified immunity analysis: whether every reasonable official would have known that terminating Appellant for speaking out would be in violation of his First Amendment rights. . . Appellees maintain that Maryland state law, specifically the Law Enforcement Officers' Bill of Rights, expressly provides that the law enforcement agency's chief -- here, Sheriff Anderson -- is permitted to punish Appellant for 'divulg[ing] information' that is contrary to the department's policy. . . If Sheriff Anderson complied with this express statutory right, Appellees' argument goes, 'he had no reason to doubt the constitutionality of the policies.'. . But, the position urged by Appellees, and adopted by the district court, that the Sheriff was acting within his legal authority because he was acting pursuant to Maryland law, ignores clearly established precedent. . .Sheriff Anderson's adherence to state law is not helpful here. An independent basis for sanctions does not provide a shield from liability when the speech is constitutionally protected. . . .[W]hen Sheriff Anderson terminated Appellant in 2012, the law was not in any 'gray area[ ].' . . Rather, the law was clearly established. After our decisions in Andrew and Durham, no reasonable official could have believed that a law enforcement officer's statements to media outlets regarding misconduct and corruption surrounding a police-involved shooting lacked First Amendment protection. Therefore, we hold that Sheriff Anderson is not entitled to qualified immunity, and Appellant can continue to press the damages claim brought against Sheriff Anderson in his individual capacity."

Brickey v. Hall, 828 F.3d 298, 303-08 (4th Cir. 2016) ("On appeal, Hall does not challenge the district court's holding that Brickey has properly alleged a constitutional violation—the first qualified-immunity prong. Instead, Hall contends that the right Brickey asserts was not clearly established in 2012 when Brickey was terminated. Our review, therefore, is confined to the question of what law was clearly established—we do not reach the merits of Brickey's constitutional claim. . . .Because we hold that the law was not clearly established as to the second question—the balancing of the employee's and employer's interests—Hall is entitled to qualified immunity. Consequently, we need not reach the question of whether it was clearly established that Brickey spoke as a citizen on a matter of public concern. . . .It was clearly established in 2012 that police officials are entitled to impose more restrictions on speech than other public employers because a police force is ' "paramilitary"—discipline is demanded, and freedom must be correspondingly denied.'. . Because of this heightened need for discipline, police officials have 'greater latitude ... in dealing with dissension in their ranks.'. . . In sum, the parties have not directed us to any case that would have clearly warned Hall that terminating Brickey for his comments about the D.A.R.E. funds would violate his First Amendment rights. On the contrary, our case law had stressed the broad discretion granted police officials to limit speech when discipline is at stake. As a result, we cannot say that it was beyond debate that Brickey's interests outweighed Hall's. . . .We hold that it was not clearly established on the date of Brickey's termination that his speech interests as a citizen outweighed Hall's interests as an employer. Hall is therefore entitled to qualified immunity.")

Lawson v. Union Cty. Clerk of Court, 828 F.3d 239, 250 (4th Cir. 2016) ("In an effort to demonstrate that the law in this area is muddled, Gault cites a 1996 decision in which we held, in an unpublished opinion, that qualified immunity shielded a clerk of court who fired his chief deputy for disloyalty. . . This does not advance Gault's argument, however, because the fact that the law was unsettled in 1996 tells us nothing about the state of the law nearly sixteen years later. As we have explained, the state of the law in 2012 would have put Gault on notice that political affiliation was not an appropriate requirement for administrative employees. Thus, we conclude that Gault has not established the defense of qualified immunity, and we cannot affirm the district court's judgment on that basis.")

Cox v. Quinn, 828 F.3d 227, 239 (4th Cir. 2016) ("On the record as we may view it here, we find that the district court correctly concluded that the correctional officers were not entitled to qualified immunity. It has long been established that jail officials have a duty to protect inmates from a substantial and known risk of harm, including harm inflicted by other prisoners. . . Moreover, by 2011, we had made it clear that 'a prison official acts with deliberate indifference when he ignores repeated requests from a vulnerable inmate to be separated from a fellow inmate who has issued violent threats which the aggressor will likely carry out in the absence of official intervention.'. . Here, Cox repeatedly informed the appellants that he was being threatened and robbed and that he feared for his safety, and his concerns were corroborated by other inmates. But the only action the correctional officers took in response to this information — despite the instructions of their sergeant — was to do the one thing Cox specifically warned them would increase the risk to his safety. And when confronted with Cox's concerns again, Miles just threw up his hands and walked away. Under the law of this Circuit, an objectively reasonable correctional officer — certified or uncertified — would have known that these actions were unreasonable, ran afoul of clearly established law, and violated rights "manifestly included within more general applications of the core constitutional principle" articulated in Farmer. . . Accordingly, the correctional officers are not entitled to qualified immunity.")

King v. Rubenstein, 825 F.3d 206, 222 n.3 (4th Cir. 2016) ("The defendants argued that they are entitled to qualified immunity, as any constitutional violations were not clearly established. The district court did not consider this argument, presumably because it concluded that King failed to allege a violation. As we may affirm a dismissal on any grounds supported by the record, . . . we briefly consider the argument here. Even where a plaintiff suffers a constitutional violation, an officer is only liable if 'the right was clearly established at the time the violation occurred such that a reasonable person would have known that his conduct was unconstitutional.'. . . We decline to affirm the dismissal on qualified-immunity grounds at this stage: we cannot conclude that a right to be free from an egregiously sexually invasive, unjustified, compelled surgery was not clearly established under the Fourth, Eighth, and Fourteenth Amendments.")

Goines v. Valley Cmty. Servs. Bd., 822 F.3d 159, 170 (4th Cir. 2016) ("Accepting the allegations of the complaint as true, Goines, though having speech and other physical difficulties, exhibited no signs of mental illness and made no threats to harm himself or others, but instead sought the help of the police to avoid a confrontation and potential fight with a neighbor who had spliced into Goines' cable line. Under these facts, the Officers lacked probable cause for an emergency mental-health detention, and Goines' complaint therefore alleges a constitutional violation. . . And again accepting Goines' allegations as true, the constitutional violation alleged is one for which the Officers would not be entitled to qualified immunity. . . . [T]he facts as alleged by Goines—the involuntary detention of a man with physical disabilities who exhibited no signs of mental illness and made no threats of harm—are sufficiently beyond the realm of probable cause that no reasonable police officer would find them adequate. . . . Because Goines' complaint plausibly alleges facts that no reasonable officer would have found sufficient to justify an emergency mental-health detention, the complaint states a constitutional violation by the Officers for which they would not be entitled to qualified immunity.")

Yates v. Terry, 817 F.3d 877, 886-88 (4th Cir. 2016) ("Our analysis of the Graham factors when measured against the level of force used by Terry against Yates leads us to conclude that such force was not objectively reasonable in light of the totality of the circumstances in this case. Terry was ordered out of his car and subsequently tased three times over not having his driver's license. We have explained that '[d]eploying a taser is a serious use of force,' that is designed to 'inflict[ ] a painful and frightening blow.'. . For these reasons, it 'may only be deployed when a police officer is confronted with an exigency that creates an immediate safety risk and that is reasonably likely to be cured by using the taser.'. . As we held in Estate of Armstrong, '[t]he subject of a seizure does not create such a risk simply because he is doing something that can be characterized as resistance-even when that resistance includes physically preventing an officer's manipulations of his body.'. . The objective facts, when viewed in the light most favorable to Yates, as we must do at this point in the proceedings, show that he was neither a dangerous felon, a flight risk, nor an immediate threat to Terry or anyone else. Yates has thus established that Terry's use of his taser constituted excessive force in violation of Yates' Fourth Amendment rights. . . . Having concluded that Yates' constitutional rights were violated, we must determine whether those rights were clearly established at the time of Terry's conduct. . . .In this case, it was clearly established in 2008 that a police officer was not entitled to use unnecessary, gratuitous, or disproportionate force by repeatedly tasing a nonviolent misdemeanant who presented no threat to the safety of the officer or the public and who was compliant and not actively resisting arrest or fleeing. . . Although our decisions in Meyers, Bailey, and Jones dealt with individuals who were secured when they were subjected to excessive force, our precedent nonetheless provided Terry with fair notice that the force he used against Yates under the facts of this case was unconstitutionally excessive. . . .Even though Yates was not handcuffed, our precedent makes clear that a nonviolent misdemeanant who is compliant, is not actively resisting arrest, and poses no threat to the safety of the officer or others should not be subjected to 'unnecessary, gratuitous, and disproportionate force.'. . . Viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Yates, no reasonable officer would have believed that Terry's use of the taser was justifiable at all and certainly not on three occasions. We reject Terry's argument that the unlawfulness of his conduct was not clearly established because he was faced with a dual-sided threat. Drawing reasonable inferences in Yates' favor, there was no threat to safety, dual-sided or otherwise. Rather, there was a commotion attributable to Terry's excessive and unjustifiable use of force, which unnecessarily escalated tension during what can at best be described as a routine traffic stop. . . . For the foregoing reasons, we conclude that based on the totality of the circumstances and viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to the non-moving party, Terry is not entitled to qualified immunity as a matter of law. We therefore affirm the district court's denial of Terry's motion for summary judgment based on qualified immunity.")

Smith v. Murphy, 634 F. App'x 914, 917 (4th Cir. 2015) ("Defendants contend, the fact that Smith suffered only de minimis injuries absolves them from liability under the clearly established law at the time of the incident. Prior to Wilkins v. Gaddy, 559 U.S. 34 (2010), this court 'consistently held that a plaintiff could not prevail on an excessive force claim [under the Eighth Amendment] absent the most extraordinary circumstances, if he had not suffered more than a de minimis injury.'. . . For Fourth Amendment excessive force claims, however, the severity of injury resulting from the force used has always been but one 'consideration in determining whether force was excessive.'. . . The cases cited by Defendants do not suggest otherwise. All but one of the cases involves either prisoners or pretrial detainees, therefore implicating either the Eighth or Fourteenth Amendment, rather than the Fourth Amendment. And Carter v. Morris, 164 F.3d 215, 219 n.3 (4th Cir.1999), the free citizen case, does not demonstrate that the de minimis injury rule applies to Fourth Amendment claims; rather, it merely suggests, in passing, that the plaintiff's claim failed because she offered 'minimal evidence' to support it. . . Finding no support for Defendants' contention that suffering only de minimis injuries bars one from asserting a Fourth Amendment excessive force claim, we conclude that the district court appropriately denied Defendants' motion for summary judgment as to this claim.")

Hunter v. Town of Mocksville, N.C., 789 F.3d 389, 399-402 (4th Cir. 2015) ("Nothing before us suggests that Plaintiffs' 'daily professional activities,'. . . included calling the Governor's Office for any purpose, much less to express concerns about the Mocksville PD. Nothing suggests that Plaintiffs' request that the Governor's Office look into suspected corruption and misconduct at the Mocksville PD was 'ordinarily within the scope of [Plaintiffs'] duties.'. . . Indeed, a 'practical' inquiry into Plaintiffs' day-to-day duties, . . . manifestly does not lead to the conclusion that those included reaching out to the Governor's Office about anything at all. Instead, the evidence viewed in the light most favorable to Plaintiffs illustrates that Plaintiffs acted as private citizens. . . . Defendants counter that Plaintiffs acted pursuant to their official duties because all sworn police officers have a duty to enforce criminal laws, and Plaintiffs, police officers, suspected criminal conduct. While some of the suspected corruption and misconduct at issue here, such as misusing public funds for personal gain, might qualify as criminal, other misconduct, such as racial discrimination within the Mocksville PD, might not. Moreover, and more importantly, a general duty to enforce criminal laws in the community does not morph calling the Governor's Office because the chief of police himself is engaging in misconduct into part of an officer's daily duties. . . . . In sum, privately reaching out to the Governor's Office about suspected corruption and misconduct at the Mocksville PD, at the hands of the chief of police, cannot fairly or accurately be portrayed as simply part of Plaintiffs' 'daily professional activities.'. . . In reaching out to the Governor's Office, Plaintiffs were not 'just doing [their] job'. . . Rather, Plaintiffs spoke as citizens, on a matter of undisputedly public concern. . . and no countervailing government interest has even been suggested. Accordingly, the district court rightly rejected Defendants' motion for summary judgment on this basis. . . .With their final argument on appeal, Defendants contend that even if Plaintiffs' First Amendment rights were violated, those rights were not clearly established at the time, i.e., in December 2011. Accordingly, Cook and Bralley argue that they are entitled to qualified immunity protecting them from suit. . . . Andrew and Durham clearly established that, long before the December 2011 speech and retaliation at issue here, 'speech about serious governmental misconduct, and certainly not least of all serious misconduct in a law enforcement agency, is protected.'. . . Defendants attempt to make much of the fact that, in both Andrew and Durham, the plaintiffs had reached out to the news media (though in Durham, the plaintiff also reached out to others, including the Governor's Office). That may be. But nothing in this Court's reasoning or broadly-worded holdings in either Andrew or Durham suggests that that fact was somehow dispositive. Nothing in either Andrew or Durham stands for the proposition that only speech to a media organization can qualify for First Amendment protection. And we agree with Justice Stevens that it would be 'perverse to fashion a new rule that provides employees with an incentive to voice their concerns publicly,'. . . which is precisely what we would be doing, were we to adopt Defendants' position that exposing serious government misconduct to the news media is protected, but exposing that same misconduct to the Governor's Office, as in this case, by definition is not. In sum, 'it was clearly established in the law of this Circuit' in December 2011 that speech about 'serious misconduct in a law enforcement agency[ ] is protected.'. . The district court therefore did not err in denying qualified immunity to Cook and Bralley on this basis.")

Hunter v. Town of Mocksville, N.C., 789 F.3d 389, 403-07 (4th Cir. 2015) (Niemeyer, J., dissenting) ("I would grant qualified immunity to Police Chief Robert Cook and Town Manager Christine Bralley because it was not clearly established at the time that Chief Cook fired the plaintiff-officers that the officers had complained to the North Carolina Governor's Office as citizens, rather than as employees. If the officers had complained as employees, 'the Constitution does not insulate their communications from employer discipline.'. . . [T]he majority fails to identify any controlling precedent that would have informed Chief Cook and Town Manager Bralley that they were acting unlawfully in firing the officers for going over their heads to the Governor's Office to complain about departmental misconduct. The question of whether police officers speak as employees or as citizens when complaining to the Governor's Office about departmental corruption and misconduct was undecided in this circuit—and has remained so before today—and the proper application of relevant principles is murky at best. Therefore, the relevant case law was not clearly established at the time of the defendants' conduct. In such circumstances, Chief Cook and Town Manager Bralley are entitled to qualified immunity, which shields government officials from suits for damages when acting in their personal capacity unless (1) they violate a statutory or constitutional right (2) that was 'clearly established at the time of the challenged conduct.'. . .I agree with the defendants that, as of December 2011, the law was not clearly established—nor, indeed, has it been at any time before now—that a police officer complaining to the Governor's Office of departmental corruption involving his police chief speaks as a citizen. Given the lack of relevant authority, it was entirely reasonable for Chief Cook and Town Manager Bralley to have concluded that the officers were complaining as employees in the course of their official duties when making their complaints. In deciding otherwise, the majority relies on two decisions—Andrew v. Clark, 561 F.3d 261 (4th Cir.2009), and Durham v. Jones, 737 F.3d 291 (4th Cir.2013). But those cases only go so far as to conclude unremarkably that exposing corruption within a police department is a matter of public concern—a proposition with which Chief Cook and Town Manager Bralley agree. Neither case addresses the independent inquiry of whether the officers were speaking as citizens when reporting departmental corruption for investigation. . . . Not only did Andrew and Durham not address whether police officers speak as citizens when reporting corruption to a state agency, but the facts of those cases also render them decidedly distinguishable from the case before us. Whereas the terminated officers in those cases had leaked information to members of the media, either exclusively (Andrew) or in tandem with a distribution to a broad spectrum of public officials (Durham), the terminated officers in this case reported the corruption exclusively to a single governmental agency that could have been thought to have supervisory or investigatory responsibility over the Police Chief and the Town Manager. In light of this factual distinction, it can hardly be said that existing precedent 'placed the ... constitutional question beyond debate[.]'. . . To the extent that our prior case law suggested that a law-enforcement officer speaks as a citizen when reporting corruption and misconduct to the media for publication, it would not necessarily have been apparent to a reasonable official that such an officer speaks as a citizen when making such a report to a governmental agency for investigation. . . 'Officials are not liable for bad guesses in gray areas; they are liable for transgressing bright lines.'. . Here, not only was there no authority in this circuit holding that the defendants' conduct was unlawful, but also there was no precedent regarding when a police officer speaks as a citizen rather than as an employee. Thus, Chief Cook and Town Manager Bralley were left to speculate about and guess whether terminating the employment of Officers Hunter, Donathan, and Medlin would violate their First Amendment rights. Because those public officials are not liable for incorrect guesses, I would grant them qualified immunity and reverse the district court's ruling denying that immunity.")

Ussery v. Mansfield, 786 F.3d 332, 335-36, 338 (4th Cir. 2015) ("As the parties agree, the law clearly established at the time of the extraction governs the entitlement to qualified immunity here. Further, they agree that Norman v. Taylor, 25 F.3d 1259 (4th Cir.1994) (en banc), provides the legal framework for determination of that question. In Norman, this court held that 'absent the most extraordinary circumstances, a plaintiff cannot prevail on an Eighth Amendment excessive force claim if his injury is de minimis.'. . The Supreme Court expressly abrogated Norman in Wilkins v. Gaddy, 559 U.S. 34, 38–39 (2010). . . . We have subsequently concluded, however, that where the alleged use of force occurred prior to Wilkins, a defendant's entitlement to qualified immunity turns on whether that force 'was objectively reasonable in view of the clearly established law at the time of the alleged event'—i.e., the law as set forth in Norman. See Hill v. Crum, 727 F.3d 312, 321, 322 (4th Cir.2013). To prevail, then, an inmate like Ussery, seeking relief for excessive force deployed before the issuance of Wilkins in 2010, must establish either that he sustained more than de minimis injuries or that the defendants' use of force was 'of a sort repugnant to the conscience of mankind and thus expressly outside the de minimis force exception.'. . With this standard in mind, we turn to the case at hand. . . . [O]n numerous occasions, applying the Norman standard, we have concluded that injuries comparable to—and arguably less severe than—those Ussery maintains he suffered were not de minimis.")

between the facts of the present case and those of Rowland. However, our determination that the officer was not entitled to qualified immunity in Rowland was not based on any case that was factually on all fours. Rather, it was based on the simple fact that the officer took a situation where there obviously was no need for the use of any significant force and yet took an unreasonably aggressive tack that quickly escalated it to a violent exchange when the suspect instinctively attempted to defend himself.")

Covey v. Assessor of Ohio Cnty., 777 F.3d 186, 196 (4th Cir. 2015) ("At this stage, we cannot conclude that the defendants are entitled to qualified immunity. As to the police officers, the Supreme Court has held that no reasonable officer can 'claim to be unaware of the basic rule, well established by our cases, that, absent consent or exigency, a warrantless search of the home is presumptively unconstitutional.'. . As we have recognized for over a decade, 'the curtilage is entitled to the same level of Fourth Amendment protection extended to the home.'. . As alleged in the complaint, the officers violated clearly established law by proceeding directly to where they suspected marijuana would be found and without any reason to believe that they would find Mr. Covey there. Thus, they are not entitled to qualified immunity at this stage. The tax assessor's claim to qualified immunity is a closer call. On one hand, 'an official who performs an act clearly established to be beyond the scope of his discretionary authority is not entitled to claim qualified immunity under § 1983,' and the Supreme Court has 'made clear that determination of the scope of an official's authority depends upon an analysis of the statutes or regulations controlling the official's duties.'. . . Arguably, by entering into the curtilage and house despite the presence of 'No Trespassing' signs and a regulation's explicit directive to leave, the tax assessor exceeded his discretionary authority and therefore should not be entitled to qualified immunity. On the other hand, the Supreme Court has repeatedly instructed that we should not 'define clearly established law at a high level of generality.'. . . The parties have failed to offer any caselaw involving facts substantially similar to this case. Thus, it may be unwarranted to deny qualified immunity on the basis that 'a reasonable [civil servant] would have known' that merely entering into the curtilage, in contravention to a regulatory directive, violated a clearly established right under the Constitution. . . As already stated, however, the exact manner in which Crews searched the property is unknown and should be developed through discovery. Therefore, at this stage, Crews is not entitled to qualified immunity.")

M.C. ex rel. Crawford v. Amrhein, 598 F. App'x 143, 147-50 (4th Cir. 2015) ("The 'salient question' before us is 'whether the state of the law in [2006] gave [the defendants] fair warning that their alleged treatment of [M.C.] was unconstitutional.'. . Because we find that the alleged rights at issue in this case were not clearly established at the time of M.C.'s 2006 sex assignment surgery, we need not reach the question of whether M.C. alleged sufficient facts to show that the surgery violated his constitutional rights. . . We first consider M.C.'s contention, accepted by the district court, that the defendants had fair warning that the sex assignment surgery violated his constitutional right to reproduction. In support of this proposition, M.C. draws our attention to three cases: Planned Parenthood of Southeastern Pennsylvania v. Casey, 505 U.S. 833 (1992); Skinner v. Oklahoma ex rel. Williamson, 316 U.S. 535 (1942); and Avery v. County of Burke, 660

F.2d 111 (4th Cir.1981). Although we acknowledge the broad statements in these cases about reproductive rights, we cannot say that a reasonable official would understand them as clearly establishing an infant's constitutional right to delay sex assignment surgery. . . .Relying on the principles gleaned from these cases, the district court concluded that the defendants violated M.C.'s clearly established 'right to procreation.'. . We think, however, that this frames the right too broadly for purposes of assessing the defendants' entitlement to qualified immunity. . . .In our view, the alleged right at issue is that of an infant to delay medically unnecessary sex assignment surgery. By 'medically unnecessary,' we mean that no imminent threat to M.C.'s health or life required state officials to consent to the surgery, or doctors to perform it. Viewed in that light, we do not think that Casey, Skinner, or Avery put reasonable officials on notice that they were violating M.C.'s constitutional rights. As we have repeatedly emphasized, '[o]fficials are not liable for bad guesses in gray areas; they are liable for transgressing bright lines.'. . We hold that the defendants did not transgress such a bright line in this case. . . . Our core inquiry is whether a reasonable official in 2006 would have fair warning from then-existing precedent that performing sex assignment surgery on sixteen-month-old M.C. violated a clearly established constitutional right. In concluding that these officials did not have fair warning, we do not mean to diminish the severe harm that M.C. claims to have suffered. While M.C. may well have a remedy under state law, . . . we hold that qualified immunity bars his federal constitutional claims because the defendants did not violate M.C.'s clearly established rights.")

Owens v. Baltimore City State's Attorneys Office, 767 F.3d 379, 396-401(4th Cir. 2014) ("A qualified immunity defense can be presented in a Rule 12(b)(6) motion, but, as the Second Circuit has noted, when asserted at this early stage in the proceedings, 'the defense faces a formidable hurdle' and 'is usually not successful.'. . This is so because dismissal under Rule 12(b)(6) is appropriate only if a plaintiff fails to state a claim that is plausible on its face. . . A claim has 'facial plausibility when the pleaded factual content allows the court to draw the reasonable inference that the defendant is liable for the misconduct alleged.'. . To satisfy the standard, a plaintiff must do more than allege facts that show the 'sheer possibility' of wrongdoing. . . The plaintiff's complaint will not be dismissed as long as he provides sufficient detail about his claim to show that he has a more-than-conceivable chance of success on the merits. . . . We have little difficulty concluding that Owens's allegations state a plausible § 1983 claim. First, the information Officers Pelligrini, Dunnigan, and Landsman assertedly withheld from ASA Brave was favorable to Owens. Had the Officers properly disclosed Thompson's statements, his inconsistencies would have lent support to the contention advanced by Owens's defense that Thompson, not Owens, had raped and murdered Ms. Williar. At a minimum, the inconsistencies would have aided Owens in his attempt to discredit Thompson's testimony and sow reasonable doubt in the minds of the jurors. . . Second, Owens has offered specific allegations as to the Officers' bad faith. He asserts that these experienced police officers willfully, consciously, and in bad faith 'chose not to disclose' the multiple revisions to Thompson's statement that they elicited from him during their hours-long interrogation. Further, he alleges that the Officers told ASA Brave about the final version of the story almost as soon as the witness had said it. The temporal proximity between Thompson's succession of narratives and the Officers' report to the prosecutor lends support to the contention that Thompson's inconsistent narratives were fresh in the Officers' minds, and thus, the Officers' omissions were not accidental, but intentional and malicious. Finally, Owens's allegations satisfy Brady's materiality requirement. Owens asserts that Thompson was the State's 'star witness,' and that in post-trial proceedings, ASA Brave admitted that without Thompson, 'the case could not have gone forward.' Certainly, it is plausible that impeachment of such a key witness could have altered the outcome at trial. We emphasize that Brady does not require that disclosure probably would have modified a trial's result. . . On the contrary, it is enough that the suppression of evidence cast serious doubt on the proceedings' integrity. . . If Owens can prove his allegations, they would certainly satisfy this requirement. . . . [T]o be clearly established, a right need not be one with respect to which all judges on all courts agree. Rather, '[i]f the unlawfulness is apparent, the fact that some court may have reached an incorrect result will not shield a defendant's violation of a clearly established right.'. . Thus, although judicial disagreement about the existence of a right is certainly a factor we consider in determining whether a right has been clearly established, . . . disagreement alone does not defeat a plaintiff's claim in every instance. The Supreme Court has never sanctioned such a rule, see, e.g., Hope, 536 U.S. at 745–46 (holding a right was clearly established and rejecting a qualified-immunity defense notwithstanding the contrary views of three dissenting justices and the court of appeals), and neither have we, see, e.g., Henry v. Purnell, 652 F.3d 524, 536–37 (4th Cir.2011) (en banc) (rejecting a qualified-immunity defense over a three-judge dissent). With these principles in mind, we consider whether the constitutional rights Owens asserts were clearly established as of February and March 1988, the time of the alleged violations. . . . The partial dissent offers a different view. It maintains that the law was not clearly established in 1988 because the cases decided before that date—Barbee, Sutton, and Boone—imposed no independent obligation on police officers to disclose exculpatory evidence. The dissent insists that Barbee, Sutton, and Boone stand only for the proposition that 'a police officer's knowledge of exculpatory evidence will be imputed to the prosecutor for Brady purposes.' This holding, the dissent contends, fails to notify police officers of their susceptibility to suit, and thus, the Officers in the case at hand enjoy qualified immunity. We cannot agree. Qualified immunity exists to ensure that 'public officials performing discretionary functions [are] free to act without fear of retributive suits ... except when they should have understood that particular conduct was unlawful.' Limone v. Condon, 372 F.3d 39, 44 (1st Cir.2004). Ever since it first articulated the contours of modern qualified-immunity doctrine, the Supreme Court has emphasized that qualified immunity assesses the apparent unlawfulness of conduct. . . . Barbee, Sutton, and Boone each held that certain conduct by police officers—the suppression of material exculpatory evidence—results in the violation of criminal defendants' rights. Whether or not an officer's knowledge is "imputed" to the prosecutor does not affect the lawfulness of the officer's own conduct. See Limone, 372 F.3d at 47 (rejecting police officers' argument that law was not clearly established because cases announcing plaintiff's constitutional right referenced "the State's" obligations, not those of police officers). Barbee, Sutton, and Boone taught police officers how to conform their conduct to the law. These cases each held that if a police officer suppresses material exculpatory evidence, courts will invalidate a defendant's criminal sentence as unconstitutional. A police officer acting after the issuance of these decisions, like each of the Officers here, could not have thought that the suppression of material exculpatory evidence would pass constitutional muster. . . Goodwin recognized this reality, and held in light of Barbee, Sutton, and Boone that a police officer's obligation to disclose material exculpatory evidence was clearly established by 1983, five years prior to the Brady violations alleged in this case. Yet the dissent suggests that our reliance on Goodwin retroactively subjects the Officers to liability. Not so. For although Goodwin issued after the Officers in this case acted, Goodwin announced no new rule of constitutional law. Rather, it merely held, in light of the constitutional rule already established by Barbee, Sutton, and Boone, that a police officer's duty to disclose material exculpatory evidence was clearly established in 1983. If a right was clearly established in 1983 (as Goodwin held), it must have been clearly established in 1988 (when the Officers acted). To hold to the contrary would directly conflict with Goodwin. . . Indeed, if the dissent is correct and Barbee, Sutton, and Boone announced no rule of constitutional law applicable to police officers, then Goodwin was wrongly decided. For according to the dissent's view, Goodwin acted in the absence of any prior circuit precedent to hold that a constitutional right was clearly established and so a police officer did not enjoy qualified immunity. We cannot endorse such an extraordinary view of our precedent. In sum, our precedent unmistakably provides that, by 1988, a police officer violates clearly established constitutional law when he suppresses material exculpatory evidence in bad faith. Accordingly, we hold that the Officers were clearly on notice of the impermissibility of their conduct in 1988, the time of the alleged violations.")

Smith v. Gilchrist, 749 F.3d 302, 312, 313 (4th Cir. 2014) ("Gilchrist argues to us. . . as he did to the district court, that even assuming that Smith's interests actually (and completely) outweighed the government's, he is nonetheless entitled to qualified immunity because it would not have been clear to a reasonable official in Gilchrist's position that Smith's interests outweighed the government's. . . In this regard, Gilchrist emphasizes that balancing the government's interests against the employee's is a subtle process. He also maintains that because of the significant role that the defensive-driving course played in reducing the DA's office caseload and freeing resources for other matters, a reasonable DA in his position could have believed that any public criticism of that course undermined the operation and mission of the DA's office. Gilchrist contends that, under this theory, a reasonable DA might have believed he was justified in firing Smith for publicly making the statements in question. This argument need not detain us long. For purposes of determining whether Smith's right to speak without recrimination was clearly established, we conclude that the right at issue, described at the appropriate level of specificity, is as follows: it is the right of an ADA running for public office not to be fired for speaking publicly in his capacity as a candidate on matters of public concern when the speech is critical of a program that substantially reduces the DA's office's caseload but there is no reason to believe the speech will negatively impact the DA's office's efficiency. Any reasonable official in Gilchrist's position would have been aware of that right on the day of Smith's termination. . . The notion that programs that reduce a government agency's workload are somehow off limits from criticism by government employees even when there is no reason to expect that the criticism will actually hamper the government office's efficiency finds no basis whatsoever in the law. At the time of Smith's firing, it was well established that a government employee's speech made as a private citizen on a matter of public concern is balanced against the adverse effect that the government reasonably anticipates the speech will have on its ability to operate efficiently. See Maciariello, 973 F.2d at 300. In this case, there was no evidence forecasted in the summary judgment record that Smith's speech was expected to have any particular effect, as Gilchrist's concession in the district court reflected. Thus, although Gilchrist is certainly correct that the process of balancing the employer's interests against the employee's is a subtle one, the general complexity of the balancing test is of no consequence in this case since there is nothing on the employer's side of the ledger to weigh. . . . In sum, a reasonable DA in Gilchrist's position would have known that he could not fire an ADA running for public office for speaking publicly in his capacity as a candidate on matters of public concern when the speech is critical of a program that substantially reduces the DA's office's caseload but there is no reason to believe the speech will negatively impact the DA's office's efficiency. We therefore hold that the district court erred in granting summary judgment to Gilchrist on the First Amendment claim on the basis of qualified immunity.")

Wall v. Wade, 741 F.3d 492, 502, 503 (4th Cir. 2014) ("As noted, we have previously held that under 'the Free Exercise Clause ... a prisoner has a clearly established ... right to a diet consistent with his ... religious scruples, including proper food during Ramadan.'. . Further, '[a] prison official violates this clearly established right if he intentionally and without sufficient justification denies an inmate his religiously mandated diet.'. . We take these statements to mean quite exactly what they say: that Wall's right to participate in Ramadan was clearly established, and when the defendants abridged this right without first satisfying Turner's reasonableness test, they subjected themselves to the potential for liability. As expressed above, the defendants' application of their policy to Wall was unnecessarily strict. They overlooked (at best) significant evidence that Wall was, in fact, a practicing Muslim who was entitled to participate in Ramadan. We cannot conclude that a reasonable official in the defendants' position, giving proper consideration to our statement in Lovelace that the right is clearly established, and to Turner's objective reasonableness test, would have felt it permissible to apply the policy in so strict a fashion. The defendants attempt to avoid this rather straightforward result by arguing that there is a lack of case law elucidating exactly how prisons may utilize sincerity tests in determining eligibility for religious accommodations. While it may be true that we have never specifically evaluated a sincerity test, . . . this argument overlooks the broader right at issue: that inmates are entitled to religious dietary accommodations absent a legitimate reason to the contrary. As we have previously stated, clearly established 'includes not only already specifically adjudicated rights, but those manifestly included within more general applications of the core constitutional principle invoked.'. . In light of our unequivocal statement in Lovelace that inmates are entitled to religious dietary accommodations, we need not to have previously passed judgment on the appropriateness of particular sincerity tests in order to demand that prison officials act reasonably in administering that right. An expectation of reasonableness in this context is not a high bar, and does not punish officials for 'bad guesses in gray areas.'. . To the contrary, it offers only a minimal level of protection to inmates seeking to exercise their constitutionally protected rights.")

Williams v. Calton, 551 F. App'x 50, 51 (4th Cir. 2013) (per curiam) ("Viewed in the evidence most favorable to Williams, the evidence showed that when Williams, who was being escorted in restraints, resisted entering a cell, Calton slammed his head into the cell door and then shoved him to the floor. Williams sustained a "minor" and "superficial" 1.5 inch scalp laceration requiring six staples. . . . In Norman v. Taylor, 25 F.3d 1259 (4th Cir.1994) (en banc), this court held that, 'absent the most extraordinary circumstances, a plaintiff cannot prevail on an Eighth Amendment excessive force claim if his injury is de minimis.'. . Three days after Williams filed his initial complaint, however, the Supreme Court handed down Wilkins v. Gaddy, 559 U.S. 34 (2010), abrogating Norman and stating that there was no injury threshold for excessive force claims. However, because 'Norman and its progeny were controlling in the Fourth Circuit' when the incident in this case occurred, Williams' excessive force claim and Calton's qualified immunity defense must be analyzed under the standards established by those cases. Hill, 727 F.3d at 322. We conclude that, under the legal standards in place when the incident occurred, a reasonable officer in Calton's position would not have understood his actions to have violated Williams' constitutional rights. . . Consequently, Calton is entitled to qualified immunity.") Occupy Columbia v. Haley, 738 F.3d 107, 121, 122, 124, 125 (4th Cir. 2013) ("Stated at the appropriate level of particularity, the right allegedly violated by Appellants is the right to be present and protest on State House grounds after 6:00 p.m. Therefore, the qualified immunity analysis must begin with this alleged constitutional violation in mind, and we must simply determine 'whether [Occupy Columbia's] allegations, if true, establish a constitutional violation.'. . . Occupy Columbia's Third Amended Complaint sufficiently alleges that its members were engaged in protected speech at the time they were arrested. Specifically, the complaint alleges Occupy Colombia's members were assembled on State House grounds (a public forum) and were 'protesting and petitioning our government.'. . Occupy Columbia's allegations thus satisfy the standards to qualify as protected speech. . . .Therefore, in the absence of a valid time, place, and manner restriction, Occupy Columbia had a First Amendment right to assemble on State House grounds after 6:00 p.m., and its Third Amended Complaint sufficiently alleges that this right was violated. . . .Having concluded that Occupy Columbia's complaint sufficiently alleges that arresting its members for their presence and protests on State House grounds after 6:00 p.m. constituted a violation of their First Amendment rights, we must turn to the second prong of the qualified immunity analysis. . . . At this stage, we must assess whether the First Amendment right allegedly violated by Appellants was a 'clearly established' right 'of which a reasonable person would have known.'. . It is not disputed that South Carolina and its state officials could have restricted the time when the State House grounds are open to the public with a valid time, place, and manner restriction. However, as explained above, at the time of Occupy Columbia's arrest, no such restrictions existed. In light of the case law from this circuit and from the Supreme Court, it was clearly established on November 16, 2011, that arresting Occupy Columbia for protesting on State House grounds after 6:00 p.m. was a First Amendment violation. Accordingly, at this stage, Appellants are not entitled to qualified immunity for damages arising out of Occupy Columbia's arrest on November 16, 2011. . . .In sum, we hold that the Occupy Columbia protesters have stated a viable claim that Appellants violated their First Amendment rights to assemble and protest peacefully on the grounds of the South Carolina State House in the absence of a valid time, place, or manner regulation. Condition 8 did not constitute a valid regulation because on its face it imposed no limit on when the State House grounds were open to the public and, even if it had restricted the time during which protesters could assemble, it did not contain any standards to guide the official's decision regarding when to grant special permission to continue such activities beyond closing time. Furthermore, at this point in the proceedings, we cannot say as a matter of law that the state statutes upon which Appellants rely are valid applicable time, place, and manner restrictions. For purposes of this motion, we must accept as true Occupy Columbia's assertion that its members gathered in a peaceful and lawful manner and conclude that the protesters were not violating any law. Based on the complaint, there were no existing time, place, and manner restrictions on the protesters' First Amendment activities on the State House grounds. Therefore, Appellants violated these rights by removing the protesters from the grounds. We also hold that the right of the protesters to assemble and speak out against the government on the State House grounds in the absence of valid time, place, and manner restrictions has been clearly established since Edwards v. South Carolina, 372 U.S. 229, 235 (1963).")

Durham v. Jones, 737 F.3d 291, 303, 304 (4th Cir. 2013) ("We have been clear that where public employees are speaking out on government misconduct, their speech warrants protection. . . .The incidents at issue here rise far above an ordinary workplace dispute. Durham accused several high-ranking law enforcement officials, in positions of authority within the SCSO, of falsifying law enforcement reports and with authorizing aggressive threats against a member of their own agency if he persisted in his opposition to such a practice. As we have indicated above, Durham's honest belief, even if it was a mistaken belief, that his use of force was both justified to assist in the apprehension of the suspect, but (at the same time) did not arise out of any contemporaneous criminal act by the suspect, might call for retraining or some other response from his supervisors. That is their call. But the use of coercion and threats against him as shown in this record and accepted as accurate by the jury goes far beyond such permissible bounds. Durham was being coerced to lie under oath insofar as they demanded that he revise his reports in a way contrary to his honestly-held beliefs; he testified that, as when any law enforcement officer signs a police report, 'you're swearing under oath and swearing to God that that's the truth, that's the facts of the case.'. . . This is especially important to the function of law enforcement, as such reports 'become a piece of evidence that could later on be used in court to prosecute somebody, to possible even send them to jail, so it has to be truthful and accurate of the facts.'. .In short, it was clearly established in the law of this Circuit in September 2009 that an employee's speech about serious governmental misconduct, and certainly not least of all serious misconduct in a law enforcement agency, . . . is protected. The mere fact that Jones may have had an independent basis to impose some lesser disciplinary sanction on Durham short of outright termination, such as a short suspension from duty, does not muddle the clarity of that legal principle.")

Bland v. Roberts, 730 F.3d 368, 391-94 (4th Cir. 2013) ("We conclude that the Sheriff is entitled to qualified immunity concerning Carter's, McCoy's, and Dixon's claims because in December 2009 a reasonable sheriff could have believed he had the right to choose not to reappoint his sworn deputies for political reasons, including speech indicating the deputies' support for the Sheriff's political opponent. Simply put, Jenkins sent very mixed signals. Although we conclude today for the reasons discussed earlier that Jenkins is best read as analyzing the duties of the particular deputies before the court, much of the opinion's language seemed to indicate that a North Carolina sheriff could terminate his deputies for political reasons regardless of the duties of their particular positions. Truthfully, the Jenkins majority opinion reads almost like two separate opinions that are in tension with one another. All of the majority's analysis up to the opinion's final page concerns deputies generally or North Carolina deputies, and references particular duties of deputies without indicating that the plaintiffs had those duties. . . . This analysis leads up to the broad conclusion that 'North Carolina deputy sheriffs may be lawfully terminated for political reasons under the Elrod–Branti exception to prohibited political terminations.'. . .As if this language were not already strong support for a broader reading of Jenkins, as we have pointed out, the dissent in Jenkins read it that way as well, accusing the majority of 'hold[ing] that all deputy sheriffs in North Carolina—regardless of their actual duties—are policymaking officials.'. . .Additionally, Knight v. Vernon, while important to our decision regarding the merits of Carter's, McCoy's, and Dixon's constitutional claims, did not clearly establish that the broader reading of Jenkins was incorrect. . . . A sheriff reasonably reading Jenkins as painting all deputies with a broad brush could well have viewed Knight as doing the same, or, at the very least, not weighing in on the issue. . .The broader reading of Jenkins is also in line with a statement from another of our opinions, which was issued after Knight. In Pike v. Osborne, 301 F.3d 182 (4th Cir.2002), we held that, on a claim that a sheriff terminated a dispatcher for political affiliation reasons, the sheriff was entitled to qualified immunity because in December 1999 it was not clearly established that a sheriff in Virginia could not lawfully terminate, for political affiliation reasons, a dispatcher who was privy to confidential information. . . . For the reasons we explained in reviewing the merits of the Elrod–Branti issue, we believe that this language, while consistent with the Jenkins dissent's characterization of Jenkins's reasoning, is an overstatement in light of the Jenkins majority's specific rejection of the dissent's characterization of its analysis. Nevertheless, considering the conflicting signals that Jenkins and Pike sent, we conclude that a reasonable sheriff in December 2009 could have believed that he was authorized to terminate any of his deputies for political reasons. . .If we were deciding what the law was in December 2009 regarding the legality of a sheriff firing a deputy for political reasons, we would agree with our colleague in dissent that the law was that a sheriff could not fire for political reasons a deputy sheriff with the limited duties of a jailer. Where we believe we differ in our assessment of this case is in whether that law was clearly established and would have been so recognized not by a judge trained in the law, but by a reasonable sheriff. For the reasons stated previously, we believe we have sent mixed signals as to when a sheriff could fire a deputy for political reasons and we have been unclear as to when he could and when he could not. Some parts of our en banc decision in Jenkins indicate he could do so and other parts would prohibit it. The dissent in Jenkins expressed its own confusion as to what the holding of Jenkins was and language in our cases since, as well as those from other courts, have interpreted the holding in Jenkins broadly and consistent with the Sheriff's. In short, we understand why a sheriff would not find the law in this situation clear, particularly given that he is a lay person. We do not expect sheriffs to be judges and to have the training to sort through every intricacy of case law that is hardly a model of clarity. . .Rather, in considering whether constitutional rights were clearly established for qualified-immunity purposes, we view the issue from 'the layman's perspective,'. . . recognizing that '[p]articularly with regard to legal conclusions, lay officers obviously cannot be expected to perform at the level achievable by those trained in the law. . . . We note that in cases in which the Elrod–Branti exception applies, and an employer therefore does not violate his employee's association rights by terminating him for political disloyalty, the employer also does not violate his employee's free speech rights by terminating him for speech displaying that political disloyalty. . . Thus, a reasonable sheriff in December 2009 who believed that the Elrod–Branti exception applied to his deputies could have also reasonably believed that he could choose not to reappoint them for their speech indicating their political disloyalty to him. And Carter's and McCoy's Facebook activity and Dixon's bumper sticker and polling-place comment certainly fall into that category. For this reason, we conclude that the Sheriff was entitled to qualified immunity concerning the claims of Carter, McCoy, and Dixon.")

Bland v. Roberts, 730 F.3d 368, 395, 401, 402 (4th Cir. 2013) (Hollander, District Judge, concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("I concur in Chief Judge Traxler's excellent opinion, with one exception. The majority concludes that, at the relevant time, 'a reasonable sheriff could have believed he had the right to choose not to reappoint his sworn deputies for political reasons,'. . . and, on this basis, it determines that Sheriff Roberts is protected by qualified immunity with respect to his discharge of Carter, Dixon, and McCoy. In my view, when these deputies were discharged in December 2009, the law was clearly established that a sheriff's deputy with the job duties of a jailer could not be fired on the basis of political affiliation. Therefore, I respectfully disagree with the majority's ruling as to qualified immunity. . . .The salient facts of this case are so close to the facts in Knight that any reasonable sheriff would have predicted that both cases would yield the same result. To the extent that there is any distinction between Knight and this case, it concerns only the title of the positions held by the employees. Yet, it was clearly established that the title itself is of no legal significance. Therefore, Sheriff Roberts should have known that he could not discharge his jailers on the basis of their political affiliation. The majority is correct in stating that, in considering whether the law was clearly established for purposes of qualified immunity, we look to the perspective of a layperson, not a lawyer. . . .In 1997, this court delivered an unequivocally clear message to lay sheriffs. Directly addressing sheriffs, the Jenkins Court announced: 'We ... caution sheriffs that courts examine the job duties of the position, and not merely the title, of those dismissed.'. . Any person capable of serving as a sheriff surely would have understood that directive, which was subsequently reiterated in Knight, and would have grasped what all the members of this panel agree was 'the law ... in December 2009 regarding the legality of a sheriff firing a deputy for political reasons.'. .In sum, Sheriff Roberts' dismissal of Carter, McCoy, and Dixon on the basis of their political allegiance, if ultimately proven, cannot be excused on the basis of qualified immunity. Therefore, I respectfully dissent from the portion of the majority opinion that upholds the finding of qualified immunity for Sheriff Roberts with respect to the First Amendment claims lodged by Carter, McCoy, and Dixon.")

Hill v. Crum, 727 F.3d 312, 320-24 (4th Cir. 2013) ("The threshold requirement that a plaintiff suffer more than a de minimis injury to state an excessive force claim was thus settled law in this circuit until 2010, when the Supreme Court in Wilkins abrogated Norman, Riley, and Taylor. . . The Wilkins Court clarified that the nature of the force, rather than the extent of the injury, is the relevant inquiry. . .Thus, it is clear that the de minimis injury threshold that this Court (and the district courts within this circuit) had relied upon in considering excessive force claims is no longer the appropriate test. The question, however, is whether Crum's alleged conduct which took place prior to the Supreme Court's Wilkins decision, is covered by qualified immunity. . . . Crum does not dispute the first prong, that there is a constitutional right to be free of excessive force. His argument is that he is entitled to qualified immunity because Hill's claimed constitutional violation was not clearly established at the time of the assault. Under the clearly established law of the Fourth Circuit on November 1, 2007, we must agree with Crum. . . .At the time of the alleged assault on Hill, Norman and its progeny were controlling in the Fourth Circuit and had been since 1994. Although Wilkins abrogated Norman in 2010, Wilkins can only be applied prospectively in the context of a qualified immunity analysis. . . In other words, the 2010 holding in Wilkins cannot be imputed retroactively to an officer in this circuit whose allegedly tortious conduct predated the Wilkins decision. The applicable law for qualified immunity purposes would be that in existence in 2007, the time of the alleged assault. In 2007 under Norman, a reasonable correctional officer would have objectively believed that the law in this circuit was what the Fourth Circuit said it was; that is, a plaintiff could not prevail on an excessive force claim 'absent the most extraordinary circumstances,' if he had suffered only de minimis injury. . . Although Wilkins established that the Fourth Circuit had been applying the incorrect standard, the inquiry—for qualified immunity purposes—is not whether the officer correctly interpreted the law as it would be changed in later years, but rather, whether the conduct at issue was reasonable based on the officer's imputed knowledge of the law at the time. Crum's reliance on Norman satisfies this standard. . . . In no sense do we suggest that Crum's alleged conduct was appropriate for a correctional officer, but it fails to cross the very high threshold for extraordinary circumstances that permit an excessive force claim to advance in the absence of more than de minimis injury for purposes of a pre- Wilkins qualified immunity analysis.")

Hill v. Crum, 727 F.3d 312, 325-29 (4th Cir. 2013) (Thacker, J., dissenting) ("With all due respect to the majority, I must dissent. Under prevailing Supreme Court precedent available at the time of the assault in this case, it was clearly established that an officer could not maliciously or sadistically impose harm on a custodial, handcuffed, and completely non-resistant inmate without violating the inmate's Eighth Amendment right to be free from cruel and unusual punishment—and any reasonable officer would have known as much. . . . Appellant Crum claims that he was entitled to assault Mr. Hill unabated for over two minutes so long as any resulting injury was de minimis. . . Not so. Under controlling Supreme Court precedent at the time—- not to mention applying pure common sense—no reasonable officer could have believed such abuse was lawful. . .On November 1, 2007, the controlling Supreme Court authority for excessive force cases in the Eighth Amendment context was Hudson v. McMillian, 503 U.S. 1 (1992). One need only read the first paragraph of Hudson to realize the right at issue was clearly established:

> This case requires us to decide whether the use of excessive physical force against a prisoner may constitute cruel and unusual punishment when the inmate does not suffer serious injury. We answer that question in the affirmative.

The Supreme Court went on to emphasize as follows:

> When prison officials maliciously and sadistically use force to cause harm, contemporary standards of decency always are violated. This is true whether or not significant injury is evident. Otherwise, the Eighth Amendment would permit any physical punishment, no matter how diabolic or inhuman, inflicting less than some arbitrary quantity of injury.

At the time of the incident in this case, Hudson had been controlling Supreme Court precedent for 15 years. In fact, this was the controlling law even before Hudson. The Hudson Court merely extended its prior holding in Whitley v. Albers, 475 U.S. 312 (1986) (regarding the legal standard for an Eighth Amendment excessive force claim arising out of a prison riot), to standard claims by inmates against prison officials for the use of excessive force. . . Under Whitley and Hudson, '"the unnecessary and wanton infliction of pain ... constitutes cruel and unusual punishment forbidden by the Eighth Amendment."'. . The Court explained that 'the core judicial inquiry' in excessive force cases is not whether a certain quantum of injury was sustained, but rather 'whether force was applied in a good-faith effort to maintain or restore discipline, or maliciously and sadistically to cause harm.'. . Thus, although this circuit misinterpreted Hudson in Norman v. Taylor, 25 F .3d 1259 (4th Cir.1994), the fact remains that Hudson and Whitley set forth the long standing and clearly established controlling precedent at the time of this incident. . . The law was, and is, clear; the proper focus is on the force used, not on the resulting injury. . . . Even if we assume Hill's injuries were minor—which he does not concede—analysis of the other factors make clear Crum's alleged use of force could be deemed excessive. . . . A lone cooperative inmate, handcuffed and hunched over a desk could not pose a reasonable threat to a prison officer sufficient to justify the use of force. Moreover, Appellant Crum did not temper the severity of the force employed, but, rather, allegedly continued beating Hill for a total of two minutes. These factors indicate that Crum exercised force, not in a good-faith effort to restore order, but, rather, maliciously and sadistically simply to cause harm. . . .Ultimately, whatever erroneous interpretive gloss Norman placed on Hudson, see Wilkins v. Gaddy, 559 U.S. 34 (2010) (abrogating Norman), on November 1, 2007, it would have been readily apparent to a reasonable officer that where a disturbance had already been abated, he could not assault a restrained, compliant, and cooperative inmate for 'a good solid two minutes,'. . . punching and elbowing him repeatedly in the abdomen and head, without applying excessive force in violation of the inmate's Eighth Amendment right to be free from cruel and unusual punishment. Accordingly, I would hold Appellant Crum is not entitled to qualified immunity, and affirm the decision of the district court.")

Tobey v. Jones, 706 F.3d 379, 391 & n.6 (4th Cir. 2013) ("Taken together, it is crystal clear that the First Amendment protects peaceful nondisruptive speech in an airport, and that such speech cannot be suppressed solely because the government disagrees with it. Thus, Mr. Tobey's right to display a peaceful non-disruptive message in protest of a government policy without recourse was clearly established at the time of his arrest. . . .[E]ven though the dissent purports to understand factually analogous precedent is not a prerequisite for finding that a right is clearly established, the entire dissent seemingly hinges on this very premise. Moreover, the unequivocal constitutional precedent provided Appellants with more than adequate notice that they cannot retaliate against Mr. Tobey for exercising his First Amendment rights. This is not an abstract principle but an irrefutable precept. . . . Appellants argue that because there is no case on-point detailing what is a reasonable restriction on speech in an airport screening area, Mr. Tobey's constitutional rights cannot be said to have been clearly established. . . . .While reasonableness in and of itself may be an ineffective guide as to whether a right is 'clearly established,' in this case there are clear constitutional parameters. It may be unclear as to what reasonableness entails in the abstract, but at a minimum, given well-established precedent, we know that it is unreasonable to effect an arrest without probable cause for displaying a silent, nondisruptive message of protest—which is what allegedly occurred here. Appellants even conceded at oral argument that it would have clearly been unlawful for them to seize Mr. Tobey if the text of the Fourth Amendment was printed on his t-shirt. We see no reason why the same clear principle should not apply here, as Mr. Tobey's allegations amount to the factual equivalent. Appellants cite Reichle v. Howards, 132 S.Ct. 2088 (2012) as supporting their argument that Mr. Tobey's constitutional rights were not clearly established, but in doing so, miss the mark completely. In Reichle, an appeal from summary judgment, the Supreme Court found that it was not clearly established that a plaintiff could make out a cognizable First Amendment claim for an arrest that was supported by probable cause. . . . Reichle does not apply here because Mr. Tobey specifically alleges that his arrest was not supported by probable cause, and 'probable cause or its absence will be at least an evidentiary issue in practically all [ ] cases.' Hartman v. Moore, 547 U.S. 250, 265 (2006). At this stage in the litigation, of course, we must credit Mr. Tobey's allegation that Appellants arrested or caused him to be arrested without probable cause. He has, therefore, satisfied the requirement in Hartman and Reichle to plead an absence of probable cause.")

Tobey v. Jones, 706 F.3d 379, 392 (4th Cir. 2013) ("Given that peaceful, silent, nondisruptive protest is protected in a nonpublic forum, like an airport; that it is unequivocally clear that the government cannot effectuate an arrest for the display of a message of peaceful protest; and that Mr. Tobey's arrest in this instance was allegedly not supported by probable cause—we find that Mr. Tobey's rights at the time of his arrest were clearly established by decades-old precedent. . . . Here, Mr. Tobey engaged in a silent, peaceful protest using the text of our Constitution—he was well within the ambit of First Amendment protections. And while it is tempting to hold that First Amendment rights should acquiesce to national security in this instance, our Forefather Benjamin Franklin warned against such a temptation by opining that those 'who can give up essential liberty to obtain a little temporary safety, deserve neither liberty nor safety.' We take heed of his warning and are therefore unwilling to relinquish our First Amendment protections—even in an airport.")

Tobey v. Jones, 706 F.3d 379, 394-97 (4th Cir. 2013) (Wilkinson, J., dissenting) ("I cannot join the majority's decision permitting a damages action to proceed against Transportation Security Administration ("TSA") agents who were faithfully performing one of the most essential functions in our post–9/11 age: protecting air passengers from the threat of air terrorism. We now view these events in the comfort of hindsight. But while some may consider plaintiff Aaron Tobey's conduct to be cute or even funny in retrospect, it was no laughing matter at the time. . . . One would think the Supreme Court's admonitions on the need for some modicum of specificity in notice to defendants might actually mean something. . . And yet, by allowing Tobey's suit to proceed by enunciating legal principles at the highest and most nebulous level of generality, the majority deprives the doctrine of its value. . . . I regret that a doctrine so essential to the performance of public functions has been reduced to hollow and formulaic recitations that signal only its demise. . . . General propositions stripped of all sense of context may seem useful to my fine appellate colleagues, . . . but they are of no use at all to people who must confront specific and difficult real-life situations. Neither Tobey nor the majority points to a single court decision addressing a situation even remotely similar in time, place, or manner to the one that occurred here, let alone a decision that would have made the unlawfulness of defendants' actions 'apparent.' They cite no decision involving the period before scores of passengers board airplanes, no decision involving the security-screening area of an airport, and no decision involving distracting conduct that poses a potential security threat. . . . The complete dearth of pertinent precedent should be dispositive of the question whether it was clearly established that defendants' conduct was unreasonable: it was not.")

Tobey v. Jones, 706 F.3d 379, 400, 401 (4th Cir. 2013) (Wilkinson, J., dissenting) ("Tobey's complaint. . . alleged a violation of the Fourth Amendment as well as the First, and for many of the reasons noted above, the district court rightly dismissed Tobey's Fourth Amendment claim, describing defendants' decision to summon local law enforcement as 'eminently reasonable.'. . This conclusion should have led it to dispose of Tobey's First Amendment claim as well. For just last Term, the Supreme Court held that, notwithstanding the First Amendment's general prohibition against retaliatory arrests, 'the more specific right to be free from a retaliatory arrest that is otherwise supported by probable cause' is not clearly established for purposes of qualified immunity, reasoning that any inference of impermissible causation is severely undermined by the existence of probable cause. . . .The same conclusion applies here: the causation element of Tobey's First Amendment claim is undermined, if not vitiated, by the fact that defendants' actions were reasonable under the Fourth Amendment. In light of Reichle, then, it was not clearly established that these same actions violated the First Amendment. The majority responds by pointing to Tobey's allegation that defendants' actions were not supported by 'probable cause.'. . The problem with this argument is that neither Tobey nor the majority cites a single case holding that probable cause is the relevant standard governing the decision by an official who does not have arresting authority, such as a TSA agent, to refer someone to another official who does. And any confusion regarding the appropriate Fourth Amendment standard only bolsters the conclusion that defendants' alleged constitutional violation was not clearly established. For the majority to hold otherwise, it must ignore conflicting precedents and expect lay TSA agents to have imposed on the spot a degree of coherence on First and Fourth Amendment jurisprudence that has eluded serious students of constitutional law. Qualified immunity exists to forestall precisely this result.")

Cilman v. Reeves, Nos. 09-1887, 09-1920, 2011 WL 5252646, at *3 (4th Cir. Nov. 4, 2011) (unpublished) ("No controlling Supreme Court or Fourth Circuit precedent speaks to a person's right to be free from a warrantless entry into his home in circumstances like those in the case at hand. Numerous out-of-circuit cases do address this issue, but courts have divided on this question. Some hold that commission of a misdemeanor drunk driving offense subject to a possible jail term does not justify a warrantless home arrest. [collecting cases] Others, however, hold to the contrary. [collecting cases] In light of the divergence in these holdings, we can only conclude that Officer Reeves was entitled to qualified immunity. . . Accordingly, the district court erred in granting summary judgment to Cilman on liability as to the § 1983 and Va.Code Ann. § 19.2-59 claims.")

H.H. ex rel. H.F. v. Moffett, No. 08-1009, 2009 WL 1931203, at *7 (4th Cir. July 7, 2009) ("We have little difficulty finding that a reasonable teacher would know that maliciously restraining [disabled] child in her [wheel]chair for hours at a time interferes with that child's constitutional liberty interests.").

Fields v. Prater, 566 F.3d 381, 389, 390(4th Cir. 2009) ("It is true that defendants knew or should have known that consideration of political affiliation when hiring a local director was forbidden by the State Board's regulations. However, 'an official's clear violation of a state administrative regulation does not allow a § 1983 plaintiff to overcome the official's qualified immunity .'. . The law requires something more, namely that it be clear to a reasonable official at the time of the decision that selecting a local director on the basis of political affiliation contravened the First Amendment. We conclude that at the time of the hiring decision the law had not achieved that level of constitutional clarity that would allow us to hold defendants liable. . . . Because application of the principles of Branti and Jenkins to new situations invariably requires particularized inquiries into specific positions in the context of specific systems, it is not always easy to say that there is a clearly drawn line between those positions for which consideration of political affiliation is allowed and those for which it is not. . . . Undisputed evidence in the record, including an affidavit from a state official familiar with the system and the job application itself, show that political affiliation was not 'an appropriate requirement for the effective performance of the public office involved.'. . But to say that the rule in the Commonwealth is now clear going forward is a different matter from the retrospective imposition of monetary consequence. Both Nader and this case concerned management positions in local services agencies. In both cases, resolving the constitutional issue required a fact-intensive inquiry into the particular responsibilities of the positions and their role in their respective state systems. There was thus no 'bright line[ ]' rule in this context. . . .We find no fault with the able district judge, who concluded that the constitutional rights at issue were clearly established; this was a close question. But because we cannot unequivocally say that defendants knew or should have known they were violating Fields's constitutional rights when they refused to hire her, they are entitled to qualified immunity.")

Iko v. Shreve, 535 F.3d 225, 240 (4th Cir. 2008) ("We held over a decade ago that '[i]t is generally recognized that it is a violation of the Eighth Amendment for prison officials to use mace, tear gas or other chemical agents in quantities greater than necessary or for the sole purpose of infliction of pain.' . . Notwithstanding this clear pronouncement, Lt. Shreve attempts to distinguish Williams on the grounds that it involved the use of mace, not pepper spray. Williams's use of 'or other chemical agents,'. . . plainly reaches the use of pepper spray, and evinces the principle that ' A'[c]learly established" ... includes not only already specifically adjudicated rights, but those manifestly included within more general applications of the core constitutional principle invoked.' . . . Because Lt. Shreve had ' Afair warning" that [his] conduct was unconstitutional,' . . . we hold that Iko's right to be free from excessive use of pepper spray was clearly established, preventing an award of qualified immunity to Lt. Shreve on the facts before us.").

Campbell v. Galloway, 483 F.3d 258, 271 (4th Cir. 2007) ("There is no doubt that the broad legal principle governing this case– that public employees may not be fired on a basis that infringes on their First Amendment rights–was clearly established at the time of Campbell's termination. At this stage of our analysis, however, our focus must be narrower, as the determination of whether a given right was clearly established requires us to define that right 'at a high level of particularity.' . . When the right is defined at the proper level of particularity and the analysis is directed to what is disputed in this case, the question becomes whether a reasonable officer would have known that Campbell's rambling thirteen-page memo to Chief Galloway, which focused overwhelmingly on personal grievances and vague gripes about fellow officers not being very nice to her, touched on a matter of public concern, thus entitling Campbell to the protection of the First Amendment. We answer that question in the negative. . . . As discussed above, this circuit has provided limited guidance on when complaints about sexual harassment will amount to matters of public concern. . . . Our fact-specific resolution of individual cases has done little to sharpen the line between cases where the complaints about discrimination are matters of public concern and those where such complaints are not matters of public concern. In our view, the speech at issue in this case falls within the gray area between speech that clearly is a matter of public concern and speech that clearly is not a matter of public concern. . . . Under these circumstances, we cannot conclude that the defendants unreasonably viewed Campbell's letter as involving personal grievances only, particularly given the state of the law in other circuits.").

Miller v. Prince George's County, 475 F.3d 621, 632, 633 (4th Cir. 2007) (". . . . Det. Dougans. . . seems to claim entitlement to qualified immunity on the theory that the magistrate found that his affidavit provided probable cause to issue the warrant. . . . In sum, well before the events at issue in this case, it was clearly established that a police officer could not lawfully make intentionally or recklessly false material statements or omissions in order to obtain a warrant. Accordingly, Det. Dougans is not entitled to qualified immunity, as a matter of law, on the present record.")

Lovelace v. Lee, 472 F.3d 174, 196-99 (4th Cir. 2006) ("Here, the district court erroneously granted Lester qualified immunity on the premise that there was uncertainty about RLUIPA's constitutionality at the time of the alleged violation. We apply a two-step analysis in assessing whether qualified immunity is available. . .We first consider whether the facts alleged, taken in the light most favorable to Lovelace, show that Lester violated Lovelace's statutory rights under RLUIPA. Lovelace satisfies this part of the test, as our earlier discussion establishes. Second, we consider whether these statutory rights were clearly established at the time of the claimed violation. . . .Chronology and the origins of RLUIPA inform our analysis of whether the rights in question were clearly established at the time Lovelace was removed from the Ramadan pass list. RLUIPA was enacted in September 2000; the alleged violation occurred more than two years later, November and December 2002. . . . Section 3 of RLUIPA. . .encountered some hurdles before the Supreme Court declared it constitutional under the Establishment Clause in Cutter v. Wilkinson, 544 U.S. at 719-26. Prior to that decision, the Fourth, Seventh, and Ninth Circuits had upheld the provision under the Establishment Clause while the Sixth Circuit had invalidated it. . . . The question still remains whether a reasonable prison guard should have known that the conduct attributed to Lester violated Lovelace's free exercise rights under RLUIPA. . . . Because the facts support an inference that Lester acted intentionally in depriving Lovelace of his free exercise rights, Lester is not entitled to summary judgment on qualified immunity grounds. Although the outer boundaries of RLUIPA may have been uncharted at the time, its core protections were not. As explained earlier, RLUIPA incorporates and exceeds the Constitution's basic protections of religious exercise. . . Under both the Free Exercise Clause and RLUIPA in its most elemental form, a prisoner has a 'clearly established ... right to a diet consistent with his ... religious scruples,' including proper food during Ramadan. . . A prison official violates this clearly established right if he intentionally and without sufficient justification denies an inmate his religiously mandated diet. . . Thus, under both the First Amendment and any straightforward interpretation of RLUIPA, the unlawfulness of intentional and unjustified deprivations of Ramadan meals was apparent at the time of the incident. Lester's state of mind is therefore critical to determining whether a reasonable person in his position would have understood that his conduct violated clearly established rights. If Lovelace succeeds in showing that Lester intentionally blocked his observance of Ramadan in violation of RLUIPA's basic protections, then Lester would not be entitled to qualified immunity. Because there is on this record a genuine issue of material fact as to whether Lester intentionally and purposefully infringed Lovelace's free exercise rights–rights clearly established at the time under RLUIPA and the First Amendment–Lester is not entitled to qualified immunity at this stage on the RLUIPA claim.")

Blankenship v. Manchin, 471 F.3d 523, 533 (4th Cir. 2006) ("In sum, the general proposition that a government official may not retaliate against a citizen for the exercise of a constitutional right is clearly established law, per Trulock. The specific right at issue here, the right to be free of threats of imminent, adverse regulatory action due to the exercise of the right to free speech, was clearly established by this Court in Suarez.").

Ridpath v. Bd. of Governors of Marshall University, 447 F.3d 292, 314, 315, 321 (4th Cir. 2006)("We have provided, in several decisions, concrete examples of the types of public statements implying the existence of serious character defects such as dishonesty and immorality. . . Of course, none of these decisions involved the use of the 'corrective action' label in the course of an NCAA investigation. However, there is no logical distinction between, for instance, linking an employee's discharge to an investigation of financial irregularities . . . and tying Ridpath's reassignment from the Department of Athletics to the University's serious NCAA rules violations (as the 'corrective action' label served to do). In each of these scenarios, the charge at issue can be understood to insinuate dishonesty and other serious character defects. Thus, our precedent gave the Administrators fair warning that the 'corrective action' label was just the type of charge that implicates a protected liberty interest. . . Similarly, we have specified that a public employer's stigmatizing remarks may infringe on an employee's liberty interest if such remarks are 'made in the course of a discharge or significant demotion.'. . . The Administrators therefore were provided with fair and clear warning that, by banishing Ridpath from the Department of Athletics, they were unlawfully subjecting him to a 'significant demotion' within the meaning of Stone and authorities relied on therein. . . Finally, because it is undisputed that Ridpath was not provided any procedural safeguards with respect to the labeling of his reassignment as a 'corrective action,' it cannot be questioned that the Administrators contravened Roth's requirement for 'notice and an opportunity to be heard.'. . Accordingly, accepting the allegations of the Amended Complaint as true, the Administrators contravened a clearly established Fourteenth Amendment procedural due process right of which a reasonable person would have known. They therefore are not entitled to qualified immunity at this stage of these proceedings on Ridpath's due process claim. . . . While further factual development in this case may present a murky picture of why Ridpath was relieved of his teaching position, the content and context of his statements, and any negative impact his remarks had on the efficiency of his workplace, the scene painted by the Amended Complaint is crystal clear. Read in the proper light, it alleges that the Administrators retaliated against Ridpath for making protected statements that they did not like. Such activity does not merely implicate the gray edges of the right Ridpath asserts; it goes to its very core. And taking the allegations of the Amended Complaint as true, a clearer violation of constitutionally protected free speech would be difficult to fathom. Therefore, Ridpath's retaliation claim alleges a violation of clearly established law of which a reasonable person would have known.").

Short v. Smoot, 436 F.3d 422, 427-30 (4th Cir. 2006) (" The right in question here, defined at the appropriate level of specificity, is the right of a detainee, whose jailers know that he is suicidal, to have his jailers take precautions against his suicide beyond merely placing him in a cell under video surveillance. We hold that Brown v. Harris, 240 F.3d 383 (4th Cir.2001), demonstrates that no such right derives from the Eighth Amendment. . . . Importantly, a prison official 'who actually [knows] of a substantial risk to inmate health or safety may be found free from liability if [he] responded reasonably to the risk, even if the harm ultimately was not averted.'. . . Brown demonstrates that the first-shift officers' response to Short's risk of suicide was objectively reasonable and therefore sufficient to prevent liability under the Eighth Amendment. . . . Here, the first-shift officers' response to the risk that Short would kill himself was the same as Ogden's response in Brown: they placed the detainee in a cell under video surveillance. Thus, under Brown, this response was sufficient under the Cruel and Unusual Punishments Clause regardless of whether additional precautions might also have been advisable. . . . The critical point is that despite the actual failure of the officers' measures to prevent the detainees' suicides, and despite possible inattentiveness of the officers whose duty it was at the time of the suicides to watch the monitors, in both Brown and the present case the officers placed their detainees in video-monitored cells, knowing that someone would be responsible for watching the monitors. . . . Appellants do not dispute that it was clearly established on the day of Short's death that the conscious failure by a jailer to make any attempt to stop an ongoing suicide attempt by one of his detainees would constitute deliberate indifference.").

Meeker v. Edmundson, 415 F.3d 317, 323 (4th Cir. 2005) ("Having concluded that Meeker has alleged the violation of a constitutional right, we turn to the second step of the Saucier qualified immunity analysis to determine whether Coach Edmundson is nonetheless entitled to immunity from suit. . . . [H]ere we ask whether in November 2000 a reasonable educator could have believed that repeatedly instituting the unprovoked and painful beatings of one of his students was lawful, in light of clearly established law. By November 2000, the law provided clear guidance: No school official could, consistent with constitutional principles, cause a student to be subjected to such beatings.").

Washington v. Wilmore, 407 F.3d 274, 283, 284 (4th Cir. 2005) ("We therefore conclude that the facts stated by Washington allege the violation of his constitutional right not to be deprived of liberty as a result of the fabrication of evidence by an investigating officer. Moreover, this right was clearly established in 1983, when the events relevant to this litigation took place. . . Accordingly, we affirm the denial of qualified immunity.").

Kirby v. City of Elizabeth City, 388 F.3d 440, 448, 450, 451 (4th Cir. 2004) ("It would violate the principles articulated in McDonald and Thorne to extend constitutional protection of public employees' petitions for redress beyond the protections afforded to public employee speech. In fact, it would allow the anomalous result that a private employment dispute could 'be constitutionalized merely by filing a legal action.' . . We therefore join the majority of circuits to have addressed the question in holding that a public employee's petition, like his speech, is constitutionally protected only when it addresses a matter of public concern. . . . Although we hold that Kirby's petitions implicated a matter of public concern, we affirm the judgment in favor of Appellees on other grounds. . . . Here, the petition rights that Kirby alleges that Chief Hampton and Lieutenant Koch violated were anything but clear. As is apparent from our analysis of the petition claim, the legal viability of the claim presents a close and novel issue, and even assuming that Kirby's allegations are true, Hampton and Koch cannot be held liable for what would amount to 'bad guesses in [a] gray area [ ].'").

Mom's Inc. v. Willman, 109 F. App'x 629, 2004 WL 2179166, at *5, *6 (4th Cir. Sept. 29, 2004) ("The remaining question is whether Colaprete's Fourth Amendment right against having his property converted following a search was clearly established when the alleged conversion occurred. The Seventh Circuit has held that the existence of this right is '[s]o obvious ... that we do not think the absence of case law can establish a defense of immunity.' . . We respectfully disagree. This court has never applied the Fourth Amendment in this manner, and Supreme Court precedent tilts slightly against the existence of any constitutional right against theft during the course of a search. . . . If either Appellant stole Colaprete's watch, he or she should have recognized that this was a tort, a crime, and even a sin, but he had no clear notice that this action violated the United States Constitution. Accordingly, the district court erred in denying summary judgment on grounds of qualified immunity.").

Love-Lane v. Martin, 355 F.3d 766, 784 (4th Cir. 2004) ("Thus, by 1997 it was clearly established that Love-Lane's speech about race discrimination at Lewisville involved a matter of public concern. We have said on many occasions, however, that 'only infrequently will it be Aclearly established" that a public employee's speech on a matter of public concern is constitutionally protected, because the relevant inquiry requires a Aparticularized balancing" [under Pickering] that is subtle, difficult to apply, and not yet well-defined.' . . But we have never said 'that a public employee's right to speak on matters of public concern could never be clearly established.' . . In light of this earlier discussion, we are persuaded that the interests to be balanced under Pickering weigh so heavily in Love-Lane's favor that her right to speak about race discrimination in a public school was clearly established well before 1997 and 1998. . . . Because case law had confirmed Love-Lane's right to speak and because the Pickering balancing test tips decidedly in her favor, we hold that any reasonable school superintendent in Martin's position in 1997 and 1998 would have realized that he would violate the Constitution if he, in fact, took adverse employment action against Love-Lane for speaking out about race discrimination at Lewisville Elementary School.")

Love-Lane v. Martin, 355 F.3d 766, 801 (4th Cir. 2004) (Wilkinson, J., dissenting) ("In the final analysis, even if we disagree with Martin's personnel actions, his educational philosophy, his view of school discipline, or his feelings about the need for cooperative relations at the head of a school within his district, that is a far cry from saying that he violated clearly established federal law. In holding that he did, my fine colleagues have made a serious mistake. . . . To eviscerate the doctrine of qualified immunity, as the majority has done here, is to subject public schools uniquely to the omnipresent spectre of litigation, to the detriment of the children and communities they were intended to serve.").

Odom v. South Carolina Dep't of Corrections, 349 F.3d 765, 773, 774 (4th Cir. 2003) ("In June 2000, it was clearly established in this circuit that correctional officers who are present when a violent altercation involving an armed inmate erupts and fail to intervene immediately do not violate the Eighth Amendment if the officers are unarmed, unaware of a risk of harm prior to the altercation, and take reasonable steps to intervene safely. . . . By the same token, we had also determined, well before the time of this attack, that a correctional officer who stands by as a passive observer and takes no action whatsoever to intervene during an assault violates the rights of the victim inmate. . . . Other circuit courts of appeal, at the time of the attack, had concluded that a prison official acts with deliberate indifference when he ignores repeated requests from a vulnerable inmate to be separated from a fellow inmate who has issued violent threats which the aggressor will likely carry out in the absence of official intervention. . . We conclude that, at the time of the attack on Odom, the state of pre-existing law was such that reasonable prison guards in the defendants' position would have understood that doing nothing in response to Odom's requests in light of the circumstances of this case violated Odom's rights.").

Bailey v. Kennedy, 349 F.3d 731, 741 (4th Cir.2003) ("Defining the right at issue with the requisite level of particularity, the appropriate question is whether, at the time of Kennedy and Whitley's actions on May 27, 1998, it was clearly established that a police officer may not detain someone for an emergency mental evaluation based only on a 911 report that the person was suicidal, where the officers were able to observe the person alleged to be suicidal and observed nothing indicating that the person might have been a danger to himself. We conclude that it was clearly established that probable cause was lacking in such a situation."), pet. for reh'g and reh'g en banc denied, 360 F.3d 470 (4th Cir. 2004).

Martin v. St. Mary's Dep't of Social Services, 346 F.3d 502, 506(4th Cir. 2003) ("Because of the complicated balance between parents' rights to raise their children and a State's interest in protecting its minor citizens, the right to familial integrity is 'amorphous' in many cases. . . The contours of the right to familial integrity may not be 'sufficiently clear' in certain situations, to be deemed 'clearly established' as required. . . A public official must decipher what conduct violates protected rights, but an official will not be held liable for 'bad guesses in gray areas.'").

Wilson v. Kittoe, 337 F.3d 392, 403 (4th Cir. 2003) ("In deciding whether the right alleged to have been violated was clearly established, the right must be defined 'at a high level of particularity.'. . Defining the right at issue with the requisite level of particularity, we agree with the district court that the appropriate question is whether, at the time of Kittoe's actions on April 14, 1999, it was clearly established that a police officer may not arrest a third party for criticizing the officer's conduct and refusing to leave the scene of an arrest. We conclude that that right was clearly established at the time of Wilson's arrest: a reasonable Virginia police officer in Kittoe's position would have understood that, as 'obstruction' has long been circumscribed in Virginia law, the four Conversations and the three Refusals to Obey could not generate probable cause for arrest under the Obstruction Statute.").

Altman v. City of High Point, 330 F.3d 194, 210, 211 (4th Cir. 2003) ("The dissent's effort to adduce relevant legal authority is ineffective. At the time Officers Moxley and Perdue acted, neither the Supreme Court nor the Fourth Circuit had held that dogs were 'effects' within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment. Nor had either court issued any opinion as to the Fourth Amendment reasonableness standards governing seizure of dogs. . . . Perhaps sensing this weakness, the dissent seeks to marshal a consensus of cases from other circuits, but no such consensus existed at the time of the actions at issue here. . . . There is one remaining avenue open to the dissent. Qualified immunity is also inappropriate when the action at issue was so obviously unconstitutional that, even though no precedent was factually similar, any reasonable officer would have known from the general contours of the law that his action was in violation thereof. . . . This is a difficult standard to satisfy . . . and it has been rendered even more so in this circuit by the Robles decision. For, if binding a man to a pole in the middle of a deserted parking lot at three in the morning and abandoning him all for no legitimate law enforcement purpose was not clearly unconstitutional, then few things will be. Indeed, it follows a fortiori from the fact that it was far from obvious, even to a court of law, that dogs are 'effects' protected by the Fourth Amendment, that the officer on the beat could not reasonably be expected to know that his seizure of a dog might violate the Fourth Amendment.").

Mills v. Steger, 64 F. App'x 864, 2003 WL 21089092, at *8, *9 (4th Cir. May 14, 2003) (unpublished) ("Although plaintiffs have prevailed in some First Amendment retaliation cases, . . . most do not, simply because the individualized assessment required by the Pickering balancing test means we can rarely say that the law was clearly established and that reasonable officials would have been aware of the law. . . Here, as with most cases, we cannot say that the defendants should have known that transferring or terminating Mills because of his speech would be a violation of his First Amendment rights. Given the fine line drawing required to determine whether someone in Mills's position is entitled to First Amendment protection under the Pickering test, we cannot say that the law with respect to Mills's First Amendment rights was clearly established. We also cannot say that a reasonable official should have known what the outcome of our First Amendment analysis would be. We therefore conclude that the defendants are entitled to qualified immunity on Mills's First Amendment claim.").

Jones v. Buchanan, 325 F.3d 520, 532 (4th Cir. 2003) ("Both before and after November 1999, courts have consistently applied the Graham holding and have consistently held that officers using unnecessary, gratuitous, and disproportionate force to seize a secured, unarmed citizen, do not act in an objectively reasonable manner and, thus, are not entitled to qualified immunity. So it is here. Jones has proffered evidence that Deputy Keller severely injured him by knocking him to the floor and jumping on him, even though Jones, although drunk and using foul language, was unarmed, handcuffed, and alone in a secured room in the sheriff's headquarters, having come there voluntarily and not under arrest or suspected of any crime. In reported cases prior to November 1999 and involving conduct that took place well before then, we and other courts have repeatedly denied qualified immunity to law enforcement officers in similar circumstances.").

Batten v. Gomez, 324 F.3d 288, 296 (4th Cir. 2003) ("The gist of Batten's argument is that it was clearly established that due process required notice and an opportunity to be heard before a state official could interfere with a mother's liberty interest in her child. The statement of the right at this level of generality, however, is of little help in determining the reasonableness of Shuster and Gomez's conduct. . . As the court in Morrell explained, '[t]he appropriate question is whether it would be clear to reasonable officials in the defendants' position that enforcing the [out-of-state] order without prior notice or an opportunity to be heard in [the home state] was unconstitutional.' . . In this case, aside from Morrell, we have been unable to find any authoritative cases considering analogous circumstances that hold that pre- deprivation notice and an opportunity to be heard is required as a matter of constitutional due process before a state may enforce another state's order directing that a child be brought before the out-of-state court. Because Morrell was decided after Shuster and Gomez's actions in this case, Shuster and Gomez, like the defendants in Morrell, are immune from suit under the law of qualified immunity.")

Mansoor v. Trank, 319 F.3d 133, 139, 140 (4th Cir. 2003) ("Appellants' principal . . . argument is that in cases involving qualified immunity and the Pickering balancing test, the outcome of the balancing test can 'only infrequently' be said to be 'clearly established.' [citing DiMeglio] Although this is so, 'we did not say [in DiMeglio] that a public employee's right to speak on matters of public concern could never be clearly established.' . . In this case, as discussed earlier, Appellants have conceded that they had no interest in restricting the clearly protected speech covered by the Plan (i.e., Mansoor's right to speak about matters of public concern as a private citizen). Given this concession, we have no difficulty concluding that the district court did not err in denying them qualified immunity.").

Robles v. Prince George's County, Maryland, 308 F.3d 437, 439, 440 (4th Cir. 2002) (denying rehearing en banc) ("In reasoning as it did, the panel followed the two-step analysis in [Siegert and Wilson]. Under step one of that analysis, if a constitutional violation is found then it will nearly always be a 'bad act.' In fact the constitutional violation in Wilson could be argued to be a far more invasive act than the incident the panel confronted here. If every bad act under step one of the Wilson analysis sufficed by itself to answer the step two qualified immunity inquiry, there would simply be no qualified immunity defense. The district court felt strongly that the officers had not been placed on notice that their behavior, however dumb, violated a clearly established constitutional right. My dissenting brother quotes at length from the majority's analysis under the first step of Wilson. The panel naturally relied on general language in Bell v. Wolfish to find a constitutional violation on these specific facts. The dissent indicates that the language of the step one analysis detailing the unconstitutionality of the officers' actions also suffices to satisfy the second prong of Wilson. However, the pitfalls of this approach should be apparent. If a court's general explanation of why an act is unconstitutional also suffices to supplant the need for specific notice, then there will be no independent force to the qualified immunity inquiry at all. The two steps of an analysis which the Supreme Court clearly intended to be sequential and distinct will simply collapse. The concept of notice is rooted in case law. The panel emphatically did not require the plaintiff to come forward with a case on all fours with the present one in order to abrogate the qualified immunity defense. . . It pressed for even one case that would put the officers on fair notice of a constitutional infraction, but all the cases plaintiff advanced involved much more egregious or far different circumstances than those present here. The plaintiff was unable to provide a single decision to illustrate even the general point that a fleeting or misguided prank rose to the level of a constitutional violation. Wilson requires that a plaintiff point to at least some pertinent authority. . . Plaintiff provided none at all. . . . While Hope certainly did not require prior cases to have fundamentally similar facts, neither did it take leave of the need to inquire into the case law to give at least a semblance of specificity to what would otherwise be general and abstract constitutional principles. These basic, simple principles worked well here. The officers did not go unpunished. In finding a constitutional violation, the panel allowed the plaintiff to proceed before a jury on his state due process claim for which Maryland provides no qualified immunity defense. . . . It makes good sense to allow state law to hold officers to strict account while the parameters of federal violations are fairly defined. Moreover, the proper precedent has been established for the future. Police officers have been put on the clearest notice in this circuit that even brief episodes of foolishness implicate due process guarantees.")

Robles v. Prince George's County, Maryland, 308 F.3d 437, 441, 445 (4th Cir. 2002) (Luttig, J., dissenting from denial of rehearing en banc) ("Irrespective of any larger doctrinal implications, it is significant when a court of appeals holds, as did this panel, that law enforcement officers today could not reasonably have known that handcuffing a pretrial detainee to a pole in a deserted shopping center, and abandoning him there in the middle of the night, admittedly for no law enforcement purpose whatsoever, would violate his rights under the Constitution. I think it clear that the constitutional impermissibility, not to mention the inherent danger of such, is sufficiently self-evident to require the denial of qualified immunity to the defendant officers. . . . It should be apparent that I do not believe that a decided case is necessary in order for officers to be on fair notice that conduct like that by the officers here is violative of the Constitution. . . . And I would like to have thought that at this point in our history no court would hold, as did this panel, that law enforcement officers need an opinion from this court in order for them to be on notice that handcuffing a pretrial detainee to a metal pole in a deserted shopping center at 3:00 a.m. in the morning, and abandoning him there, for no law enforcement purpose at all, is unconstitutional. The sheer danger, not even to mention the constitutional irresponsibility, of such conduct is manifest as a simple matter of common sense, and is made all the more evident by events such as the recent spree of unpredictable sniper killings in the Washington, D.C., metropolitan area, which have even reached to the identical shopping center in which appellant was handcuffed. Such a holding as that of the panel analytically completes the transformation of qualified immunity into absolute immunity and goes a long way toward the dilution of section 1983 itself.").

McVey v. Virginia Highlands Airport Commission, No. 01-2466, 2002 WL 1869992, at * (4th Cir. Aug. 15, 2002) (unpublished) ("Because we conclude that McVey has failed to demonstrate at least two of the necessary elements for establishing a First Amendment claim, we need not reach the second inquiry under qualified immunity–whether her constitutional right was 'clearly established.' But we note in passing that in Cromer v. Brown, 88 F.3d 1315, 1326 (4th Cir.1996), we explained that 'only infrequently will it be Aclearly established" that a public employee's speech on a matter of public concern is constitutionally protected, because the relevant inquiry requires a Aparticularized balancing" that is subtle, difficult to apply and not yet well- defined.'").

Pike v. Osborne, 301 F.3d 182, 186 (4th Cir. 2002) (Hamilton, J., concurring in the judgment) ("Jenkins is confusing, at best, on the point of whether sheriffs in Virginia can lawfully terminate for political affiliation reasons dispatchers with privity to confidential information. Accordingly, because the law was not clearly established in December 1999 that a sheriff could not lawfully terminate for political affiliation reasons a dispatcher with privity to confidential information, Sheriff Osborne was entitled to qualified immunity").

Trulock v. Freeh, 275 F.3d 391, 403, 404 (4th Cir. 2001) ("Trulock had a reasonable expectation of privacy in the password-protected computer files and Conrad's authority to consent to the search did not extend to them. Trulock, therefore, has alleged a violation of his Fourth Amendment rights. Nevertheless, the Defendants are entitled to immunity because a reasonable officer in their position would not have known that the search would violate clearly established law. [footnote omitted] At the time of the search, at least one published case, although from a district court outside this circuit, held that a third party may consent to the search of a shared computer when the third party has complete access to the computer. . . . Conversely, we are aware of no reported cases answering whether an individual has a reasonable expectation of privacy in password-protected files stored in a shared computer. Trulock, though conceding the absence of computer specific caselaw, urges us to recognize a clearly established right based upon Block and other similar cases. We decline to do this. Although cases involving computers are not sui generis, the law of computers is fast evolving, and we are reluctant to recognize a retroactive right based on cases involving footlockers and other dissimilar objects. Thus, a reasonable officer in the Defendants' position would not have known that Conrad's consent did not authorize them to search Trulock's files; the Defendants are, therefore, entitled to qualified immunity.").

Trulock v. Freeh, 275 F.3d 406, 407, 409 (4th Cir. 2001) (Michael, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("The majority holds that Conrad lacked the authority to consent to a search of Trulock's password-protected computer files. . .I agree. I also agree with the majority's conclusion. . .that Trulock's computer files are analogous to the locked footlocker in United States v. Block, 590 F.2d 535, 540-42 (4th Cir.1978) (holding that a mother's consent to the search of her son's room did not extend to his locked footlocker). I respectfully disagree, however, with the majority's view that the defendants are entitled to qualified immunity because there was no clearly established law saying that one co-user's consent to search a computer does not extend to the password-protected files of another co-user when the consenting co-user does not know the other's passwords. I would reject the defendants' qualified immunity defense because the unlawfulness of searching Trulock's password-protected files was readily apparent in light of the principles established in Matlock and reiterated in Block. . . . The central question here is whether in the light of pre-existing law it would have been apparent to a reasonable FBI agent that Conrad's general consent to search the computer she shared with Trulock did not authorize the search of Trulock's password-protected files stored in that computer. In answering this question, we look to Supreme Court cases, ' Acases of controlling authority in [this] jurisdiction," [and] the Aconsensus of cases of persuasive authority" from other jurisdictions' as sources of clearly established law. Amaechi v. West, 237 F.3d 356, 363 (4th Cir.2001) (quoting Wilson, 526 U.S. at 617). No court has decided a case involving third-party consent to the search of password-protected computer files. Nevertheless, we have clearly established law that is applicable: it comes from Matlock and Block. . . . Whatever the physical differences between locked footlockers and password-protected computer files, the question here must be whether a reasonable officer would believe that there is a legal difference for Fourth Amendment purposes. In other words, is there any reason why a reasonable FBI agent fully apprised of the principles in Block would believe that he could lawfully search Trulock's password-protected files on the basis of Conrad's general consent to search the computer? If there is no such reason, the unlawfulness of the agents' conduct in this case is 'apparent,' Wilson, 526 U.S. at 615, and qualified immunity does not apply. Any reasonable officer should have recognized that the privacy expectations attaching to a password-protected computer file are essentially the same as those attaching to a locked footlocker. A computer file is a repository for information and images in electronic form, just as a footlocker is a repository for more tangible items such as papers and other personal effects. Once password protection attaches to a computer file, that protection is the electronic equivalent of the lock on a footlocker containing items that are intended to remain private. The password is an electronic key. While the medium for ensuring privacy is different, the result–a clear signal that privacy is expected against all those who lack the key (or the password)–is the same. There is simply no reason why a reasonable officer who understood that a locked footlocker signals a discrete expectation of privacy would believe that a password-protected computer file does not. The physical differences between the two repositories have no legal significance.").

Knussman v. Maryland, 272 F.3d 625, 638 & n.9 (4th Cir. 2001) (Knussman IV) ("Here, the concurring opinion departs and would, like the district court, define the right in fairly broad terms: whether 'a person's right not to have a gender neutral statute applied in a discriminatory manner' was clearly established in 1994. Such a broad definition is not faithful to the particularity principle which 'mandates that courts refer to concrete applications of abstract concepts to determine whether the right is clearly established.'[citing Amaechi v. West] In our view, defining the right so broadly is not too far removed from framing the issue as whether it was clearly established that a person had the right not to be discriminated against based on gender. Such a definition is too general to provide state officials with adequate guidance on the constitutional limits to their conduct. . . . We view the relevant constitutional question as follows: was the law clearly established in December 1994 that the equal protection clause prohibited a state agency from permitting only mothers, never fathers, to take child-nurturing leave benefits available to the primary care giver for a newborn? We think the decisions outlined above demonstrate that it was.").

Amaechi v. West, 237 F.3d 356, 362, 363 (4th Cir. 2001) ("West conceded at oral argument that a strip search or a body cavity search conducted in public violates an arrestee's Fourth Amendment right to a reasonable search, but he argues that relevant precedent does not define his conduct as unlawful because no case holds that the 'swiping' and 'slight' penetration of an arrestee's genitalia pursuant to a search incident to an arrest violates the Fourth Amendment. Contrary to West's argument, the exact conduct at issue need not have been held unlawful for the law governing an officer's actions to be clearly established. . . . Such precise precedent is not what the particularity principle mandates. Rather, the particularity principle mandates that courts refer to concrete applications of abstract concepts to determine whether the right is clearly established. . . . Accordingly, we must determine whether the contours of the right to be free from an unreasonable search have been identified in such a way as to afford West adequate notice that his search of Amaechi transgressed the Fourth Amendment. In doing so, we look to 'cases of controlling authority in [this] jurisdiction,' as well as the 'consensus of cases of persuasive authority' from other jurisdictions. [citing Wilson]").

Doe v. Broderick, 225 F.3d 440, 455 (4th Cir. 2000) ("In August 1998, clearly established Fourth Amendment principles prohibited officers from searching private areas within commercial or business premises, or even private areas within public places, without probable cause. We believe it would have been apparent to a reasonable officer that these limitations encompassed a locked, patient-records room within a methadone clinic that contained confidential patient files, and that, if nothing else, Detective Broderick knew (or should have known) that his actions violated the Fourth Amendment rights of every person who had an expectation of privacy in the records room or the records contained there.").

Norwood v. Bain, 166 F.3d 243, 252, 253 (4th Cir. 1999) (en banc) (per curiam) (Wilkins, J., writing separately, and joined in this part of his opinion by Wilkinson, C.J., and JJ. Widener, Luttig, Niemeyer, Williams, Traxler) ("The constitutional right that Plaintiffs claim was violated, defined at the appropriate level of specificity, is their Fourth Amendment right to avoid individualized searches of their motorcycle saddlebags and unworn clothing performed prior to entering the rally for the purpose of detecting weapons when reliable information indicated that a real and imminent danger existed that armed members of warring motorcycle gangs planned to attend the rally and when Plaintiffs were informed that they would not be searched unless they chose to enter the fairgrounds on their motorcycles. The qualified immunity question presented, then, is whether in September 1994 this right was clearly established and whether a reasonable officer would have understood that the conduct at issue violated it. . . . But, it is undisputed that when this incident took place there was no clear law from the Supreme Court, this court, or the South Carolina Supreme Court holding that a search fails to pass constitutional muster under the Fourth Amendment as a special needs search when officers conduct a search at a checkpoint without individualized suspicion or a warrant–and a grave matter of public interest is at stake, an effective means of preventing that harm is available, and the searching technique employed is relatively unintrusive.").

Gould v. Davis, 165 F.3d 265, 270-71 (4th Cir. 1998) ("The parties agree, then, that the following was clearly established law in October 1992: the officers were required by the Fourth Amendment to knock and announce their presence, and wait a reasonable time for a response, prior to entering Gould's home; and, this requirement could only be excused if exigent circumstances justified immediate entry. With this background in mind, we turn now to the officers' basic argument in this court–that the exigent circumstances doctrine was not sufficiently defined in 1992 so that a reasonable officer would know he was violating clearly established law in seeking and executing a no-knock warrant under the circumstances of this case. . . . We believe it would have been 'sufficiently clear' and 'apparent' to a reasonable officer in October 1992 that failure to knock and announce prior to entering Gould's home could only be justified by a fear for officer safety or a fear that the evidence sought in the warrant could be easily destroyed.").

Gould v. Davis, 165 F.3d 265, 274 (4th Cir. 1998) (Williams, J., dissenting) ("Although the majority contends that the unlawfulness of the officers' actions was apparent in 1992, it was only last year, 1997, that the Supreme Court stated that the officer safety exception would not justify a 'no-knock' search 'at a time when the only individuals present in a residence ha[d] no connection with the [criminal] activity.' Richards v. Wisconsin, 520 U.S. 385, 117 S.Ct. 1416, 1421, 137 L.Ed.2d 615 (1997). Thus, although it is now clearly established that the officers' conduct–as portrayed by the majority– violated the 'knock and announce' requirement, it was not clearly established that their conduct violated the 'knock and announce' requirement in October 1992.").

Vathekan v. Prince George's County, 154 F.3d 173, 175 (4th Cir. 1998) ("We hold that it was clearly established in 1995 that it is objectively unreasonable for a police officer to fail to give a verbal warning before releasing a police dog to seize someone. We conclude that there is a factual dispute about whether Simms failed to give a warning before sending his dog into the house where Vathekan lived. This unresolved factual issue makes it impossible to grant summary judgment to Simms on qualified immunity grounds.").

Osborne v. Rose, Nos. 97-1259, 97-1264, 1998 WL 17044, *4 (4th Cir. Jan. 20, 1998) (unpublished) ("The Osbornes accept that Albright foreclosed malicious prosecution claims based on the Fourteenth Amendment but contend that Albright recognized such claims brought under the Fourth Amendment. It is true that Albright left open this question, and, prior to November 1994, some courts read Albright in conjunction with earlier Supreme Court cases to permit malicious prosecution claims under the Fourth Amendment. . . We do not believe, however, that the mere possibility that such claims might survive after Albright demonstrates that a constitutional right had reached the status of being clearly established.").

S.P. v. City of Takoma Park, 134 F.3d 260, 265-67 (4th Cir. 1998) ("Peller asserts that the clearly established right that the officers violated was her Fourth Amendment right to be free from seizure for the purpose of medical treatment absent probable cause to believe that she suffered from a mental disorder, posed a danger of serious harm to herself, and that there was no less restrictive alternative available consistent with her welfare. Because we conclude that the contours of such a right were not clearly established so as to make the unlawfulness of these officers' actions apparent, we affirm the district court's order granting the officers qualified immunity and dismissing her claim. . . . Reasonable officers, relying upon our decision in Gooden and the other circuit court decisions addressing similar situations, would have concluded that involuntarily detaining Peller was not only reasonable, but prudent.").

White v. Chambliss, 112 F.3d 731, 736, 737 (4th Cir. 1997) ("If section 1983 liability attaches too readily to removal and placement decisions, the course of public agencies would invariably become one of inaction, thus leaving children in abusive environments. The facts presented by White reveal that the DSS defendants violated no 'clearly established' law in removing White's children from her custody. Therefore, qualified immunity must lie.").

Winfield v. Bass, 106 F.3d 525, 531 (4th Cir. 1997) (en banc) ("The district court ruled that the right to personal security protected by the Eighth Amendment was well established at the time the events underlying this appeal transpired. But, it is axiomatic that defining the applicable right at that degree of abstraction is inappropriate. . . . Thus, we must inquire whether the established contours of the Eighth Amendment were sufficiently clear at the time of the attack to make it plain to reasonable officers that their actions under these particular circumstances violated Winfield's rights. In the context of this case, we ultimately are called upon to decide whether it was clearly established in February 1993 that an unarmed prison official would be deliberately indifferent to an inmate's need for safety if, during an attack by a prisoner armed with a dangerous weapon upon another prisoner, the official instantly mobilized to take control of the situation but failed to intervene immediately. We conclude that it was not.").

Conner v. McGraw, 104 F.3d 358 (Table), 1996 WL 741132, 5-7 (4th Cir. Dec. 30, 1996) ("While no one disagrees with a general statement of the principles of the Elrod/Branti line of cases, the jurisprudence of what offices are legally subject to political patronage terminations has been a burning and unresolved issue that has not been resolved even yet in this circuit, or indeed elsewhere. Less than a year before McGraw terminated Conner, we conducted a survey in the Fourth Circuit as well as in other jurisdictions to determine which positions could require political patronage. See Stott v. Haworth, 916 F.2d 134, 143-144 (4th Cir.1990) . . . . We hold that just as in the area of the Elrod/Branti line of cases, the Pickering/Connick line of cases was, and today is, not much clearer when applied to particularities. . . . The area of discharge for the exercise of First Amendment rights . . . is one of the most complex that we have to apply. When the courts have applied it inconsistently to justify dismissals of some employees and not others, it is simply expecting far too much of an objectively reasonable elected chief clerk to conclude that he is not entitled to fire his chief deputy clerk when he takes office in order to have his own administration carry out the policies of his campaign.").

Hogan v. Carter, 85 F.3d 1113, 1116 (4th Cir. 1996) (en banc) ("[A]lthough [Washington v.] Harper [, 494 U.S. 210 (1990)] had clearly established by the time that Dr. Carter ordered administration of the single emergency dose of Thorazine to Hogan that an inmate possesses a liberty interest in avoiding the administration of psychotropic drugs by prison officials, Harper had not established, let alone clearly established, the particular process that must precede the one-time administration of an antipsychotic drug in an emergency circumstance such as that confronted by Dr. Carter. Contrary to Hogan's contention, and to the holdings of the district court and panel, Harper does not, therefore, constitute clearly established law of which Dr. Carter could have been in violation.")

Price v. Sasser, 65 F.3d 342, 347 (4th Cir. 1995) ("While Farmer established that a risk of danger particular to the individual was not required, . . . that was not clearly the law, at least in this circuit, at the time of the attack on Price. . . . Because Tadlock could not reasonably have known that his behavior violated Price's clearly established rights at the time he was assaulted, Tadlock is entitled to qualified immunity . . . .").

Pinder v. Johnson, 54 F.3d 1169, 1176 (4th Cir. 1995) (en banc) ("Given the principles laid down by DeShaney, it can hardly be said that Johnson was faced with a clearly established duty to protect Pinder or her children in March of 1989. Indeed, it can be argued that DeShaney established exactly the opposite, i.e., that no such affirmative duty existed because neither Pinder nor her children were confined by the state.").

Hodge v. Jones, 31 F.3d 157, 167-68 (4th Cir. 1994) ("[W]e feel compelled to address a matter raised in the district court's opinion with which we find a fundamental error, namely the court's generalized formulation of a constitutional right which prevents reasonable government officials from knowing just what conduct is actually prohibited by the broad concept of family inviolability. [cite omitted] We commend the district court's thoughtful consideration of the familial privacy right, but note that it is this very need for such complex legal analysis that renders a denial of qualified immunity inappropriate in this case. Absent our conclusion that Defendants violated no constitutional rights, this would be a proper case for the application of qualified immunity because '[o]fficials are not liable for bad guesses in gray areas; they are liable for transgressing bright lines.'... To expect Defendants to resolve what reasonable jurists have long debated–namely the precise strictures of the penumbral right of familial privacy . . .is to impose burdens and expectations well beyond their reasonable capacities ... On the facts of this case and in light of preexisting law, we cannot say that the purported unlawfulness of retaining records of unsubstantiated child abuse charges should have been apparent to Defendants.").

Pritchett v. Alford, 973 F.2d 307, 314 (4th Cir.1992) ("[T]he fact that an exact right allegedly violated has not earlier been specifically recognized by any court does not prevent a determination that it was nevertheless 'clearly established' for qualified immunity purposes. [cite omitted] 'Clearly established' in this context includes not only already specifically adjudicated rights, but those manifestly included within more general applications of the core constitutional principle involved.").

Newhard v. Borders, 649 F.Supp.2d 440, 448, 449 (W.D. Va. 2009) ("First, the Unnamed Officer who allegedly searched through Newhard's phone after the arrest is entitled to qualified immunity because Newhard's constitutional right to be free from such a search under the Fourth Amendment was not 'clearly established' at the time of the alleged misconduct. As an initial matter, it is well established that, subsequent to an arrest, an officer may conduct a warrantless search of an arrestee's person and the area 'within his immediate control' 'in order to remove any weapons that the [arrestee] might seek to use in order to resist arrest or effect his escape,' or to prevent the concealment and destruction of evidence, without running afoul of the Fourth Amendment. Chimel v. California, 395 U.S. 752, 763, 89 S.Ct. 2034, 23 L.Ed.2d 685 (1969). Furthermore, a post-arrest, pre-incarceration inventory search is another 'well-defined exception to the warrant requirement.' Illinois v. Lafayette, 462 U.S. 640, 644, 103 S.Ct. 2605, 77 L.Ed.2d 65 (1983). In the Internet age, the extent to which the Fourth Amendment provides protection for the contents of electronic communications (such as images stored on a cell phone) in a search incident to arrest or inventory search is an open question. . . The Fourth Circuit has held that 'officers may retrieve text messages and other information from cell phones and pagers seized incident to an arrest' in order to preserve evidence, see United States v. Murphy, 552 F.3d 405, 411 (4th Cir.2009), and other courts have reached similar conclusions. See, e.g., United States v. Finley, 477 F.3d 250, 259-60 (5th Cir.2007); United States v. Santillan, 571 F.Supp.2d 1093, 1102 (D.Ariz.2008); United States v. Deans, 549 F.Supp.2d 1085, 1093-94 (D.Minn.2008). Under different circumstances, however, other courts have invalidated warrantless searches of cell phones incident to arrest. See, e.g., United States v. McGhee, 2009 WL 2424104, 2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 62427 (D.Neb. July 21, 2009); United States v. Quintana, 594 F.Supp.2d 1291, 1301 (M.D.Fla.2009). But given the Fourth Circuit's approval of the retrieval of text messages and other information from a cell phone seized incident to an arrest in Murphy and the lack of a clear rule from the Supreme Court or other lower courts regarding with the permissible scope of a search of a cell phone incident to arrest, I cannot conclude that the search conducted by the Unnamed Officer in this case violated any 'clearly established' Fourth Amendment right of Newhard's, or that the purported illegality of the search 'would have been evident to a reasonable officer based on existing caselaw.'..Under the circumstances alleged in the Amended Complaint, a reasonable officer could have believed that the Unnamed Officer's search of the cell phone after Newhard's arrest 'comported with the Fourth Amendment' as either a valid search incident to arrest or inventory search.").

Brown v. Mitchell, 327 F.Supp.2d 615, 649-51 (E.D. Va. 2004) ("Mitchell contends that, because Brown is unable to cite to a case presenting the specific fact pattern in this case, qualified immunity attaches. Thus, according to Mitchell, because there is no precedent finding a sheriff, who runs a jail facility owned by a separate political entity and who has tried to get this separate political entity to improve the facility, liable for an inmate's death caused by a disease, of a type that the facility has never before experienced, she is entitled to qualified immunity. Mitchell's argument proves too much. Indeed, to ascertain whether a right is 'clearly established' as posited by Mitchell would mean that, until a particular fact pattern (or an almost identical fact pattern) had been judicially determined to infringe a constitutional right and, thereafter, repeated itself, officials would remain immune from Section 1983 liability. [footnote omitted] Contrary, however, to Mitchell's argument, the nonexistence of controlling authority holding that the defendant's identical (or virtually identical) conduct is unlawful does not guarantee qualified immunity. . . 'Clearly established' does not mean that the very actions in question have previously been held unlawful; rather, it merely means that, in light of preexisting law, the unlawfulness of the official's conduct was reasonably and objectively apparent. . . Qualified immunity is not intended to relieve government officials from the responsibility of applying settled legal principles to new, but reasonably analogous, situations; there need not exist a case on 'all fours' with the fact pattern presented by the case under review before Section 1983 liability can attach. . .[footnote omitted] Mitchell's argument, unfortunately, has come into vogue in this district. Counsel all too often look to, and cite (often out of context), snippets of qualified immunity decisions and not the doctrine of qualified immunity reflected in Fourth Circuit jurisprudence as a whole. That is precisely what Mitchell has done here. As the Court of Appeals recently explained in Parrish, however, the Fourth Circuit rule does not instruct district courts to define the implicated right in terms of decided cases on all fours with the one at issue. And, none of the decisions cited by Mitchell follow the approach that Mitchell urges here. . . . It is undisputed that here, Mitchell knew that the overcrowded conditions at the Jail presented an unacceptably high risk of the spread of contagious disease. A reasonable official, armed with this knowledge, would have realized that housing inmates under such conditions was violative of their rights. And, as explained above, the absence of decisional law containing Mitchell's precisely posited facts (e.g., a jail facility owned by a separate political entity, a inmate who dies from a disease that the facility has never before experienced, a jailor who has asked the jail owners to fix the facility's problems) does not entitle her to qualified immunity. Rather, because the applicability of the complained of right on the facts presented here is manifestly apparent from the core constitutional principle, the absence of a case presenting a virtually identical fact pattern to this one is not dispositive. Simply stated, in light of the clearly established legal authority respecting inmates' rights to be housed in prison conditions that meet their basic human needs, a reasonable official in Mitchell's position would have realized that it was a violation of the Constitution to continue to house inmates in a jail that was so grossly overcrowded that it presented an unacceptably high risk of spreading contagious diseases.").

FIFTH CIRCUIT

Shumpert v. City of Tupelo, 905 F.3d 310, 321-23 (5th Cir. 2018) ("Plaintiffs have the burden of demonstrating that Officer Cook violated a 'clearly established law at the time the challenged conduct occurred.' Plaintiffs do not provide any legal authority to demonstrate that Officer Cook violated clearly established law by releasing the K9. Instead, they contend generally that Shumpert had a constitutional right to be free from excessive force. This court has previously rejected such general contentions. Even if Plaintiffs had included case law to support their argument, they would still be unable to demonstrate that Officer Cook's conduct violated clearly established law. At the time of the challenged conduct, neither the United States Supreme Court nor this court had addressed what constitutes reasonable use of K9 force during an arrest. After that date, this court decided Cooper v. Brown, which addressed the issue. . . .[U]nder Cooper, the law is now clearly established that when '[n]o reasonable officer could conclude that [a suspect] pose[s] an immediate threat to [law enforcement officers] or others,' it is unreasonable to use K9 force to subdue a suspect who is complying with officer instructions. Even if Cooper were applicable, Officer Cook's conduct would not violate clearly established law. We emphasized in Cooper that '[o]ur caselaw makes certain that once an arrestee stops resisting, the degree of force an officer can employ is reduced." Because the officer in Cooper continued to use force and even increased its use while the threat to officers decreased, he violated clearly established law. By contrast, Officer Cook did not use or increase the use of force after Shumpert was subdued; instead, Shumpert ignored Officer Cook's instructions and retreated further under the home, preventing Officer Cook from determining whether he was armed. While caselaw establishes that it is unreasonable to use force after a suspect is subdued or demonstrates compliance, this court has repeatedly held that the 'measured and ascending' use of force is not excessive when a suspect is resisting arrest—provided the officer ceases the use of force once the suspect is subdued. Because it is undisputed that Shumpert was violently resisting arrest and that Officer Cook did not know whether he was armed, Plaintiffs have not met their burden of demonstrating that—under the discrete facts of this case—Officer Cook's use of K9 force was objectively unreasonable in light of clearly established law. The district court properly determined that Officer Cook was entitled to qualified immunity on this claim." [footnotes omitted])

Mote v. Walthall, 902 F.3d 500, 505 n.12 (5th Cir. 2018) ("We recently remarked in another First Amendment case, Davidson v. City of Stafford, 848 F.3d 384 (5th Cir.2017):

On the second prong of the qualified immunity defense, recent Supreme Court decisions addressing claims for excessive force have 'reiterate[d] the longstanding principle that "clearly established law" should not be defined "at a high level of generality."'. . Our cases outside the excessive force area involving warrantless arrests and limits on speech have not specifically mentioned this aspect of Supreme Court cases. See, e.g., Deville v. Marcantel, 567 F.3d 156, 166 (5th Cir.2009); Evett v. DETNTFF, 330 F.3d 681, 687 (5th Cir.2003).

848 F.3d at 394. But we recited the 'high level of generality' standard in another First Amendment case soon thereafter. See Turner v. Lieutenant Driver, 848 F.3d 678, 686 (5th Cir.2017). Because we believe, as shown below, that the First Amendment law here meets this higher standard, we need not analyze whether the 'high level of generality' language perforce applies to cases outside of the excessive force line of cases.")

Zadeh v. Robinson, 902 F.3d 483, 498-500 & n. 11 (5th Cir. 2018) (Willett, J., concurring dubitante) ("The court is right about Dr. Zadeh's rights: They were violated. But owing to a legal deus ex machina—the 'clearly established law' prong of qualified-immunity analysis—the violation eludes vindication. I write separately to register my disquiet over the kudzu-like creep of the modern immunity regime. Doctrinal reform is arduous, often-Sisyphean work. And the entrenched, judge-made doctrine of qualified immunity seems Kevlar-coated, making even tweak-level tinkering doubtful. But immunity ought not be immune from thoughtful reappraisal. To some observers, qualified immunity smacks of unqualified impunity, letting public officials duck consequences for bad behavior—no matter how palpably unreasonable—as long as they were the first to behave badly. Merely proving a constitutional deprivation doesn't cut it; plaintiffs must cite functionally identical precedent that places the legal question 'beyond debate' to 'every' reasonable officer. Put differently, it's immaterial that someone acts unconstitutionally if no prior case held such misconduct unlawful. Today's case applies prevailing immunity precedent (as best we can divine it): Dr. Zadeh loses because no prior decision held such a search unconstitutional. But courts of appeals are divided—intractably—over precisely what degree of factual similarity must exist. How indistinguishable must existing precedent be? On the one hand, the Supreme Court reassures plaintiffs that its caselaw 'does not require a case directly on point for a right to be clearly established.' On the other hand, the Court admonishes that 'clearly established law must be "particularized" to the facts of the case.' But like facts in like cases is unlikely. And this leaves the 'clearly established' standard neither clear nor established among our Nation's lower courts. Two other factors perpetuate perplexity over 'clearly established law.' First, many courts grant immunity without first determining whether the challenged behavior violates the Constitution. They avoid scrutinizing the alleged offense by skipping to the simpler second prong:

no factually analogous precedent. Forgoing a knotty constitutional inquiry makes for easier sledding. But the inexorable result is 'constitutional stagnation'—fewer courts establishing law at all, much less clearly doing so. Second, constitutional litigation increasingly involves cutting-edge technologies. If courts leapfrog the underlying constitutional merits in cases raising novel issues like digital privacy, then constitutional clarity—matter-of-fact guidance about what the Constitution requires—remains exasperatingly elusive. Result: blurred constitutional contours as technological innovation outpaces legal adaptation. Section 1983 meets Catch-22. Plaintiffs must produce precedent even as fewer courts are producing precedent. Important constitutional questions go unanswered precisely because those questions are yet unanswered. Courts then rely on that judicial silence to conclude there's no equivalent case on the books. No precedent = no clearly established law = no liability. An Escherian Stairwell. Heads defendants win, tails plaintiffs lose. Count me with Chief Justice Marshall: 'The government of the United States has been emphatically termed a government of laws, and not of men. It will certainly cease to deserve this high appellation, if the laws furnish no remedy for the violation of a vested legal right.' The current 'yes harm, no foul' imbalance leaves victims violated but not vindicated; wrongs are not righted, wrongdoers are not reproached, and those wronged are not redressed. It is indeed curious how qualified immunity excuses constitutional violations by limiting the statute Congress passed to redress constitutional violations. . . Qualified immunity aims to balance competing policy goals. And I concede it enjoys special favor at the Supreme Court, which seems untroubled by any one-sidedness. Even so, I add my voice to a growing, cross-ideological chorus of jurists and scholars urging recalibration of contemporary immunity jurisprudence and its 'real world implementation.'. . . The most recent issue of the Notre Dame Law Review gathers several scholarly essays that carefully examine qualified immunity and discuss potential refinements in light of mounting legal and empirical criticism. Symposium, The Future of Qualified Immunity, 93 NOTRE DAME L. REV. 1793 (2018); see also, e.g., William Baude, Is Qualified Immunity Unlawful?, 106 CALIF. L. REV. 45, 88 (2018) (claiming the doctrine "lacks legal justification, and the Court's justifications are unpersuasive"); Joanna C. Schwartz, How Qualified Immunity Fails, 127 YALE L.J. 2, 70 (2017) (concluding that "the Court's efforts to advance its policy goals through qualified immunity doctrine has been an exercise in futility"); John C. Jeffries, Jr., What's Wrong with Qualified Immunity?, 62 FLA. L. REV. 851, 869 (2010) ("Today, the law of qualified immunity is out of balance .... The Supreme Court needs to intervene, not only to reconcile the divergent approaches of the Circuits but also, and more fundamentally, to rethink qualified immunity and get constitutional tort law back on track.")." [footnotes omitted])

Collie v. Barron, No. 17-10935, 2018 WL 4182173, at *3 (5th Cir. Aug. 30, 2018) (per curiam) (not reported) ("An officer's use of deadly force is justified when the officer reasonably perceives an immediate threat of serious bodily harm or death to themselves or to others. . . Neither post-incident proof that Collie carried no weapon, nor the fact that Collie never directly pointed at Flores changes this analysis. Nor do the stop-action shots made by Collie's expert from the dash cam video change this analysis, because they give a false perspective on events that transpired in a few seconds. The district court properly focused on whether Officer Barron's actions were justified in the heat of the moment. . . The district court's determination that Officer Barron acted reasonably in light of the facts before him is well supported. . . .Collie fails to address the Supreme Court's explicit directive in Pauly that although claims of excessive force do not require a case that is directly on point, the standard hugs the line closely by requiring a case 'under similar circumstances.'. . Instead, Collie relies on Graham v. Connor for the general rule that an officer's actions must be objectively reasonable. He then contends that because he did not fit more complete descriptions of the suspects, did not point in the direction of Deputy Flores, and did not have a weapon in his hand, Officer Barron's claim to believe his partner's life was in danger should be given no more weight than Collie's own testimony. We note that the summary judgment evidence does not show that the officers had received the height/weight/age descriptions of the suspects at the time they encountered Collie. Collie's position also excludes the relevant facts that he was a shirtless black male on foot in the near vicinity of the robbery who encountered the officers in a dimly lit area and did not stop in response to their commands. Accordingly, Collie's argument failed to discharge his legal burden to 'find a case in his favor that does not define the law at a "high level of generality."'")

Winfrey v. Rogers, 901 F.3d 483, 494-98 (5th Cir. 2018) ("Here, the clearly established constitutional right asserted by Junior is to be free from police arrest without a good faith showing of probable cause. Since Franks v. Delaware, 438 U.S. 154, 98 S.Ct. 2674, 57 L.Ed.2d 667 (1978), it has been clearly established that a defendant's Fourth Amendment rights are violated if (1) the affiant, in support of the warrant, includes 'a false statement knowingly and intentionally, or with reckless disregard for the truth' and (2) 'the allegedly false statement is necessary to the finding of probable cause.'. . In Franks, the Supreme Court observed that the warrant requirement is meant 'to allow the magistrate to make an independent evaluation of the matter.'. . It requires affiants to 'set forth particular facts and circumstances underlying the existence of probable cause,' including those that concern the reliability of the information and the credibility of the source to avoid 'deliberately or reckless false statement[s].'. .Still, 'negligence alone will not defeat qualified immunity.'. . '[A] proven misstatement can vitiate an affidavit only if it is established that the misstatement was the product "of deliberate falsehood or of reckless disregard for the truth."'. . Recklessness requires proof that the defendant ' "in fact entertained serious doubts as to the truth" of the statement.'. .Here, we conclude that Junior alleges a clearly established constitutional violation. . . . In short, the evidence presented is sufficient to support a finding that [Johnson's] conduct was unreasonable in the light of the well-established principle requiring probable cause for the issuance of an arrest warrant. . . . The primary question on remand appears to be whether Johnson acted recklessly, knowingly, or intentionally by presenting the judge with an arrest-warrant affidavit that contained numerous omissions and misstatements. This case should go to trial without delay in a manner not inconsistent with this opinion.")

Perniciaro v. Lea, 901 F.3d 241, 256-57 (5th Cir. 2018) ("Even if we agreed that the professional-judgment standard applies to persons detained pre-trial for competency restoration, Perniciaro still would have failed to establish that defendants' conduct violated clearly established law. . . Perniciaro has not cited a single case—either in his briefing before the district court or before us—clearly establishing that the particular conduct at issue here violates the professional-judgment standard. Thus, he has failed to address the dispositive question: '[W]hether the violative nature of particular conduct is clearly established.'. .Perniciaro relies on the general statement that, under Youngberg, his due-process rights to care and safety were violated because defendants' actions '[were] such a substantial departure from accepted professional judgment, practice, or standards as to demonstrate that the person responsible actually did not base the decision on such a judgment.' But general propositions of law defined at 'high level[s] of generality' are insufficient to define clearly established law for purposes of defeating qualified immunity. . . Even assuming that the Youngberg standard applies, Perniciaro has failed to establish that defendants' conduct was objectively unreasonable in light of clearly established law. . . . But assuming—as did the district court—that the deliberate-indifference standard applies, defendants would still be entitled to qualified immunity. The evidence, taken in the light most favorable to Perniciaro, fails to establish a dispute of material fact as to whether defendants' conduct was objectively unreasonable in light of clearly established law.

Romero v. City of Grapevine, Texas, 888 F.3d 170, 178 n.3 (5th Cir. 2018) ("Even if Clark had used excessive force in violation of Villalpando's Fourth Amendment right, Clark would still be entitled to qualified immunity because the right, defined at a fact specific level, was not clearly established at the time of the violation. . . The Supreme Court has explained that courts must not 'define clearly established law at a high level of generality.'. . Instead, the question is 'whether it was clearly established that the Fourth Amendment prohibited the officer's conduct in the "situation [he or she] confronted.'". . Romero does not cite to any controlling authority nor does she point to a 'robust consensus of persuasive authority' that suggests Clark's actions were obviously unconstitutional. . . While authority need not be exactly analogous to aid the court in determining whether a right was clearly established, 'this area is one in which the result depends very much on the facts of each case,' and the authority must 'squarely govern[ ]' the circumstances. . . There simply is no such authority.")

Hale v. City of Biloxi, 731 F. App'x 259, ___ (5th Cir. 2018) ("Hale must point to case law clearly establishing that Lea and Garner acted unreasonably based on facts similar to the particular circumstances they faced—the use of deadly force and a taser where a person suspected of a nonviolent crime ignores repeated warnings to keep his hands visible and step outside of a confined area when he knows the people warning him are armed police officers, even if they have not told him he is under arrest. . . Hale does not cite any such case on point. Hale does try to distinguish our prior cases where officers were entitled to qualified immunity because they reasonably believed the suspect was reaching for a weapon. As discussed, Hale argues that, in those cases, the suspect was wanted for a violent crime, resisting or fleeing arrest, or clearly brandishing a weapon. We have already explained that Manis shows Hale cannot prevail on this front. Moreover, the fact that in previous cases we found qualified immunity where such factors were present, but where we did not state that those factors were required for qualified immunity, would hardly provide 'fair warning' to Garner and Lea.")

Sam v. Richard, 887 F.3d 710, 714 & n.3 (5th Cir. 2018) ("On the facts as recounted by Sam, Richard's use of force was objectively unreasonable at the summary judgment stage. Although Sam initially ran, he states in deposition that he was lying face down on the ground with his hands on his head when Richard kneed him in the hip and pushed him against a patrol car. Such a use of force on a compliant suspect is excessive and unreasonable. . . Furthermore, it was clearly established at the time of this incident that pushing, kneeing, and slapping a suspect who is neither fleeing nor resisting is excessive. . . Richard's contention that the force alleged by Sam would have produced more serious injuries is a question of credibility which is not appropriate for resolution at this stage. Accordingly, we hold that Sam's evidence of excessive force is sufficient to survive a motion for summary judgment. . . .We note that the Supreme Court recently reversed denial of qualified immunity in an excessive force case. See Kisela v. Hughes, —— U.S. ——, 138 S.Ct. 1148, —— L.Ed.2d —— (2018) (per curiam). But, as that decision instructs, '[u]se of excessive force is an area of the law "in which the result depends very much on the facts of each case."' The facts at issue in Kisela bear little resemblance to those before us here.")

Lincoln v. Scott, 887 F.3d 190, 197-98 (5th Cir. 2018) ("[A]lthough the officers violated Erin's Fourth Amendment rights by detaining her for four hours without probable cause, the court must determine whether that right was 'clearly established.'. . . In a recent, related appeal, this court held that it was not clearly established that an officer could not detain the sole compliant witness to a police shooting. Turner, 874 F.3d at 849. . . The court disagreed with Erin's reliance on Dunaway v. New York . . . and Davis v. Mississippi. . . as evidence that the Fourth Amendment right violated was clearly established. Turner, 874 F.3d at 849. It held that those cases did not 'clearly establish[ ] that a law enforcement officer could not detain a witness to a police shooting for ... two hours while a SWAT team sorted out the scene, [particularly] when the witness was standing beside a person when the police shot him.'. . . Moreover, Walker similarly determined that the officers did not violate clearly established law when officers forcefully detained witnesses in their own home. . . The intricate facts here—reasonableness of detaining a sole, compliant witness to a police shooting—have never been directly addressed or clearly established by this Circuit or the Supreme Court. See Turner, 874 F.3d at 849. The Supreme Court has 'repeatedly stressed that courts must not "define clearly established law at a high level of generality, since doing so avoids the crucial question whether the official acted reasonably in the particular circumstances that he or she faced."'. . Our inability to point to a string of cases establishing 'settled law' that these facts amount to a Fourth Amendment violation demonstrates that the violated right was not so clearly established that these officers can be liable. . . In sum, this court, as well as other circuits, have determined that officers acting under similar circumstances—detaining a sole witness for questioning and investigative preservation—do not violate any clearly established right. It follows that these officers—Meeks, Scott, and Barnes—similarly were not bound by any such clearly established law. The district court correctly granted these officers qualified immunity.")

Melton v. Phillips, 875 F.3d 256, 262-66 (5th Cir. 2017) (en banc) ("The panel opinion treated Jennings and Hampton as in conflict with Hart. . . However, we, like the parties in this case, interpret our precedents to be in one accord. Thus, an officer who has provided information for the purpose of its being included in a warrant application under Hart has assisted in preparing the warrant application for purposes of Jennings and Hampton and may be liable, but an officer who has not provided information for the purpose of its being included in a warrant application may be liable only if he signed or presented the application. . . . Here, the fact issue that the district court identified was whether Deputy Phillips used the P.I.D. in an improper way while preparing the incident report. The district court determined that this fact issue was material to recklessness and that Deputy Phillips's immunity depended on whether he was reckless because, as the district court understood it, Franks applies to 'any government official who makes a reckless misstatement.' However, even assuming arguendo that Deputy Phillips was reckless in completing the incident report, . . . he is still entitled to summary judgment unless there is a question of fact as to whether he assisted in the preparation of the complaint on the basis of which the capias warrant issued. . . Melton seeks to create a fact issue as to whether Deputy Phillips helped prepare the complaint by providing information for use in it, asserting that '[a]ny investigator would know' an incident report will be used to obtain a warrant. However, there is no record evidence of a policy or practice at the Hunt County Sheriff's Office that would have allowed Deputy Phillips to anticipate that the incident report would be used to obtain a warrant. . . .Even assuming arguendo that Melton could demonstrate that a fact issue exists on his claim that Deputy Phillips recklessly filled out the incident report, Melton bears the burden of demonstrating that Deputy Phillips violated his clearly established rights. . . . Rather than attempting to demonstrate that his rights were clearly established by cases addressing analogous or near-analogous facts, Melton has repeatedly emphasized that the facts of his case are unique. . . Moreover, Melton conceded at oral argument that he could not identify a single case applying Franks to a situation in which there was no error in the complaint and no false statement that made its way into the warrant. . . Indeed, Franks expressly requires a falsehood to be included in the warrant application for there to be a Fourth Amendment violation. . . Particularly in light of Franks's detailed discussion of why its rule must be narrowly construed, we cannot say Franks clearly established the unconstitutionality of Deputy Phillips's conduct. . . Moreover, even if Melton had attempted to satisfy his burden rather than conceding that his case is unique and that no case applies Franks in similar circumstances, Melton could not have shown that Deputy Phillips violated his clearly established rights without assisting in preparing, presenting, or signing the complaint. Hart and Hampton had been decided at the time Deputy Phillips prepared the incident report. As discussed above, Hampton held that an officer is entitled to qualified immunity if he does not prepare, present, or sign a warrant application. . . Hart held that an officer is not entitled to qualified immunity if he 'deliberately or recklessly provides false, material information for use in an affidavit in support of [a warrant].". . Because Melton cannot show that Deputy Phillips prepared, presented, signed, or provided information for use in the complaint, he cannot show that Deputy Phillips violated clearly established law.") Melton v. Phillips, 875 F.3d 256, 268 (5th Cir. 2017) (en banc) (Costa, J., concurring in the judgment) ("The en banc court's attempt to reconcile rather than correct our caselaw, with Hart apparently now being a subpart of the Hampton standard, will continue to result in confusion. That confusion is especially problematic for a claim in which individuals can assert a qualified immunity defense as a lack of clarity in the law provides a defense. In a future Franks case, an officer who provided false information 'for use in' an affidavit will no doubt argue he was not 'fully responsible' for the warrant application and thus is immune under the Hampton and Jennings decisions that we reaffirm today. Such a conflict in the caselaw will support an easy defense of qualified immunity as this case demonstrates. Although the 'violation of clearly established law' standard is increasingly being questioned, see Ziglar v. Abbasi, —— U.S. ——, 137 S.Ct. 1843, 1870–72, 198 L.Ed.2d 290 (2017) (Thomas, J., concurring) (citing Baude, Is Qualified Immunity Unlawful?, 106 Cal. L. Rev. (forthcoming 2018)), it is hard to imagine that any immunity threshold should hold law enforcement to a higher standard than judges when it comes to interpreting the law. If judges thought (and apparently still think) that the Michalik standard should extend to Franks cases, then an officer like Phillips who has neither the legal training of judges nor the time we can devote to parsing caselaw should not face civil liability for that error. So I join the majority opinion in concluding that Phillips is immune from this suit. . .But I would use the en banc process to recognize the dubious provenance of the 'sign or prepare' requirement in our Franks case. Hart alone should provide the appropriate standard for Franks claims. Its 'for use in' requirement is more straightforward, consistent with the law in other circuits, and fully captures Franks's concern that an officer's misrepresentations to a court should not be a basis for interfering with citizens' privacy and liberty interests. Our failure to straighten out the strands of Fourth Amendment law that got tangled in Hampton means that the next time one of these cases comes along, perhaps with a stronger case for liability than this one, the important Fourth Amendment concerns that Franks protects might not be vindicated.")

Melton v. Phillips, 875 F.3d 256, 271-75 (5th Cir. 2017) (en banc) (Dennis, J., joined by Graves, J., dissenting) ("The majority opinion's holding that an officer who makes a deliberate or reckless misrepresentation can only be held liable if he 'assisted in the preparation of, or otherwise presented or signed a warrant application' is unsound and, unsurprisingly, is not the law in any other circuit. . .Our sister circuits' caselaw reflects a common-sense understanding: when an officer, acting with reckless disregard for the truth, includes false, material information in an official report for further official use, leading to an unlawful search or arrest of an innocent person, there is no justification to insulate him from liability. . . . .In addition to establishing an imprudent and unfounded rule of law, the court makes serious procedural missteps. On appeal from the denial of a motion for summary judgment based on qualified immunity, this court 'lack[s] jurisdiction to review the genuineness of a fact issue.'. . We have jurisdiction to review only the materiality of the factual issues. . . In this case, the district court found that the plaintiff 'has introduced evidence suggesting that Phillips's identification of [the plaintiff] in his incident report was reckless.' The majority opinion acknowledges that recklessness is a question of fact, but in the same breath, it concludes that the facts identified by the district court are not 'material' to recklessness. . . In actuality, the majority opinion simply overrules the district court's determination that there is a genuine dispute as to whether Phillips 'in fact entertained serious doubts as to the truth of the information included in the warrant application,'. . . and by so doing exceeds this court's jurisdiction. . .The majority proceeds to absolve Phillips on the additional basis that, even if he did violate the plaintiff's constitutional rights, those rights were not 'clearly established.' Phillips never made such an argument—not before the district court, not in his brief on appeal, and not in his supplemental en banc brief. The majority opinion states that Phillips's assertion of qualified immunity below 'placed the burden on Melton to demonstrate that neither prong of the defense applies.'. . But it is the appellant's burden to show that the district court erred. . . .Pro se litigants could only dream of receiving the judicial help that the en banc court is giving an officer represented by a highly competent attorney. . . This court's zeal to protect officers from the prospect of chilling liability cannot justify abandoning our rules and reversing the district court's judgment on the basis of arguments that the appellant has not made. . .Because I believe that the majority opinion errs in reversing the district court's denial of qualified immunity, I respectfully dissent.")

Lincoln v. Turner, 874 F.3d 833, 848-51 (5th Cir. 2017) ("As we have already concluded that Erin sufficiently alleged violations of her right to be free from unreasonable seizure and excessive force, the remaining question for qualified immunity purposes is whether those rights were clearly established. . . .The district court held that plaintiffs did not cite clearly established law establishing that an officer cannot 'detain a witness for a period of approximately two hours while an investigation was underway,' although the parties have also consistently addressed Erin's detention as a potential suspect. . . The reality may be somewhere in between. Turner seized Erin in the aftermath of a police shooting resulting from a SWAT team deployment. Even on Erin's account, the scene was tense, and the officers were acting with incomplete information. In these circumstances, Turner may have been entitled to detain Erin for some amount of time to determine her role in the situation. As we explained, Turner exceeded this authority when he handcuffed Erin and detained her in the back of a police car for two hours. In doing so, Turner violated Erin's constitutional rights. Yet we are not persuaded that 'every reasonable official would have understood that what he is doing violates that right.' At this stage, Erin has the burden to demonstrate that the law was clearly established in this area on the date of the incident. . . .Davis and Dunaway put officers on notice that probable cause may be required even where an interaction is not labeled an arrest, and Lidster warns officers that the Fourth Amendment applies even in a brief, information-gathering stop. However, none of those cases clearly established that a law enforcement officer could not detain a witness to a police shooting for these two hours while a SWAT team sorted out the scene, at the least when the witness was standing beside a person when the police shot him. Thus, we find that Erin has not shown that the contours of the right were so clearly established that 'a reasonable official would understand that what he is doing violates that right.'. . Finally, we note that there may well be an emerging trend toward holding it unreasonable to detain a police shooting witness for an extended period of time, absent either reasonable suspicion or probable cause to believe that a crime has been committed. . . While we may look to other circuits to find clearly established law, we must consider 'the overall weight' of such authority. . . A 'trend' alone is just that. As of December 2013, only two circuits had weighed in on the 'contours of the right.' These cases alone do not provide sufficient authority to find that the law was clearly established. This conclusion is bolstered by the fact that the Tenth Circuit itself found no 'clearly established weight of authority from other courts,'. . . and the Ninth Circuit relied on intra-circuit precedent to find clearly established law. . . .Although Erin identifies the second step in the qualified immunity analysis, it is not clear that her contention was that the right to be free from excessive force was clearly established in this case. Instead, she suggests that her allegations lead to the conclusion that physically removing Erin in the manner that Turner did was unreasonable, and that her injuries sustain her claim. However, these are arguments that feed into the first step of the qualified immunity analysis—whether there was a constitutional violation. Accordingly, Erin waived argument as to the clearly established law prong and thus cannot overcome qualified immunity. . . Regardless, we cannot on this record conclude that Erin could overcome qualified immunity on her excessive force claim given the lack of guiding precedent that shows the force used in this particular situation was 'clearly unreasonable.'")

Jauch v. Choctaw County*, 874 F.3d 425, 436-37 (5th Cir. 2017), reh'g en banc denied, 2018 WL 1542262 (5th Cir. Mar. 29, 2018) ("We have spilled much ink to thoroughly establish our constitutional footing, an effort we found necessary in light of Jones' limited analysis. That explication does not diminish the Jones holding, however—prolonged detention without the benefit of a court appearance violates the detainee's Fourteenth Amendment right to due process. . . The right at issue here was clearly established and its contours 'sufficiently clear' that any reasonable official would understand that the Constitution forbids confining criminal defendants for a prolonged period (months in this case) prior to bringing them before a judge. . . And so we held in Jones itself, ruling the individual defendants, a sheriff and his deputy, not entitled to qualified immunity. . . Sheriff Halford's claim to qualified immunity is less compelling than was the claim of those Mississippi law enforcement officers. Tellingly, Sheriff Halford's arguments relating to qualified immunity do not even mention Jones. In fact, at one point in this litigation, he conceded that that 'the Choctaw County Sheriff's Office, Choctaw County District Attorney or Circuit Court Judge clearly should have provided Plaintiff Jauch with an appearance before the Circuit Court of Choctaw County' within the 30 days provided for by state law. (Emphasis added.) While he attempted to spread the blame to other officials, his actions and decisions are the cause of Jauch's constitutional injury. Either Sheriff Halford is plainly incompetent, or he knowingly violated the law. Sheriff Halford's lone argument regarding qualified immunity is that '[f]unctions of state officials do not impute legal duties actionable by federal tort to a county official simply because the applicable state official is otherwise immune.' Translated from legalese, the assertion is that Jauch sued him only because the truly responsible parties, judges of the circuit court, are immune from suit. This is simply wrong. Sheriff Halford is responsible for those incarcerated in his jail, Miss. Code Ann. § 19-25-69, and the capias did not require him to impose the unconstitutional detention policy.)

See also Jauch v. Choctaw County, No. 16-60690, 2018 WL 1542262, at *1, *4-6 (5th Cir. Mar. 29, 2018) (Southwick, J., joined by Jones, Smith, Owen, Willett, and Ho, JJ., dissenting from denial of rehearing en banc) ("I respectfully dissent from our failure to rehear this case en banc. The panel opinion — for the first time in this or any circuit — declared that a sheriff violated the Constitution when an indicted, pretrial detainee was held until the next regular term of the local criminal court before being afforded an opportunity to have bail set. A capias warrant instructed the sheriff to hold her until the term of court, which was when a judge with authority over that prisoner would be in the county. The sheriff did so, following a practice authorized by the state's Supreme Court. There is no law to the contrary that is established with the clarity the United States Supreme Court requires under recent caselaw that was not considered because it postdates the panel opinion. At its most basic, my concern is that in assessing the liability of the County and the sheriff, the panel opinion used precedents that are inapplicable to the process afforded in this case, a process drawn from statutes, court rules, and perhaps even policies of the local judges. I cannot discern how these defendants had any effect on when this plaintiff was considered for release. Thus, as to these parties, I believe the panel was wrong. More relevant to whether to take a case en banc, what rights prisoners have to be released on bail or otherwise before trial is a profoundly significant question due to its implications for individual liberty. The full court should rework the answer. . . .In summary, under state law the sheriff had no clear obligation to take Jauch before a judicial officer for an initial appearance or for a preliminary hearing because she had been indicted. There was no obligation on the sheriff to have Jauch arraigned because that is a duty that falls elsewhere. The explicit obligation under the court-issued capias was to hold Jauch until the next circuit court term, which is just what the sheriff did. Those legal points are clear, to my eyes at least. The controlling question, then, is whether there was other law that with better clarity established that every reasonable sheriff would have known Jauch had a federal right that overrode these state procedures. See Anderson v. Creighton, 483 U.S. 635, 641 (1987). The only precedent the Jauch panel considered to be directly on point involved jail procedures in Jackson, Mississippi. Jauch v. Choctaw Cnty., 874 F.3d 425, 429 (5th Cir. 2017) (citing Jones v. City of Jackson, 203 F.3d 875 (5th Cir. 2000)). That is a decision that set no specific time limit for presenting a detainee to a magistrate, did not discuss the practice of waiting until the next term of court, and did not address a sheriff's responsibility in such matters. Absolutely critical, Jones had not been jailed after indictment. Thus, in light of what I have already discussed about indicted detainees, Jones seems all but irrelevant. Silence in these varied respects is itself enough to say Jones did not clearly establish the relevant law for the Choctaw County sheriff. . . . [T]he governing law was not clearly established to justify denying qualified immunity to the sheriff. Under Wesby, Jones is not a closely analogous case. Whether Jauch was detained unconstitutionally while awaiting the return of a circuit court judge is not clearly established by Jones, which did not set a specific time limitation and did not involve a circuit-riding judge. Eldridge and Medina offer general pronouncements about due process without remotely similar facts. Finally, this is not a case about indefinite detention. It is about unfairly delayed consideration for bail, but not a delay yet clearly announced as unconstitutional. . . .My able colleagues on the Jauch panel held that based on Jones and these more general authorities, it was 'clearly established' that Mississippi's 'policy whereby certain arrestees were indefinitely detained without access to courts' violates an individual's constitutional due process rights. Jauch, 874 F.3d at 436. No such clarity was established by Jones — it did not even deal with the relevant post-indictment procedures. The panel also concluded it was 'clearly established' that 'the Constitution forbids confining criminal defendants for a prolonged period' before bringing them before a judge. . . True, but what was not clear at all to someone responsible for detention is how prolonged detention must be to constitute a violation of rights. The caselaw would not have informed very many officials that the state's post-indictment rules violated the federal Constitution. Thus, qualified immunity applies.")

Trammell v. Fruge, 868 F.3d 332, 343 (5th Cir. 2017) ("[T]his Court's opinion in Goodson outlines a scenario very similar to this case. Both Goodson and this case involve a plaintiff who was tackled by officers after very minimal physical resistance—pulling away from an officer after the officer grabbed the plaintiff's arm. The primary distinction between Goodson and this case appears to be the fact that in Goodson, the defendant officers lacked any reasonable suspicion to detain or frisk the plaintiff in the first place. Goodson, 202 F.3d at 740. Here, on the other hand, it is virtually undisputed that the officers had probable cause to arrest Trammel for public intoxication. But we find this distinction is merely a matter of degree. In Graham, the Supreme Court directed lower courts to consider 'the severity of the crime at issue' in determining whether police officers used excessive force. . . We interpret Goodson's focus on reasonable suspicion as a consideration of this factor. So, while in Goodson, the officers lacked reasonable suspicion that the plaintiff had committed any crime, here the officers believed the plaintiff was guilty of the minor offense of public intoxication. Although the severity factor may have weighed slightly more in favor of finding a use of force reasonable in this case than it did in Goodson, we nevertheless conclude that Goodson gave officers 'fair warning' that their conduct was unconstitutional. . . Accordingly, the law at the time of Trammel's arrest clearly established that it was objectively unreasonable for several officers to tackle an individual who was not fleeing, not violent, not aggressive, and only resisted by pulling his arm away from an officer's grasp.")

Trammell v. Fruge, 868 F.3d 332, 346-47 (5th Cir. 2017) (Southwick, J., dissenting in part) ("The majority concludes there are several genuine factual disputes, but it does not always view the facts from the perspective of a reasonable officer on the scene. For example, it concludes there is 'a question of fact as to whether Trammell posed any danger to himself,' and there is 'a factual dispute as to whether Trammell was actively resisting arrest....' When we review a grant of summary judgment in this context, we 'first construe[] disputed historical facts in favor of the non-movant,' but we 'then ask how a reasonable officer would have perceived those historical facts.'. . So the question is not, for example, whether 'a reasonable jury might find that [Trammell] was not actually resisting arrest,' but whether the force used was reasonable 'under the facts as a reasonable officer would perceive them[.]'. . . [T]he law was not clearly established so that 'every "reasonable official would have understood"' that the force used here was unlawful. . . The majority relies heavily on one case to conclude that the law was clearly established. See Goodson v. City of Corpus Christi, 202 F.3d 730 (5th Cir. 2000). That case focused on whether the officers violated the defendant's right to be free from seizure without reasonable suspicion. . . After reversing summary judgment on that claim, the court also held the defendant raised a fact issue regarding whether the officers, 'who lacked reasonable suspicion to detain and frisk [the defendant] and from whom [the defendant] was not fleeing,' used reasonable force. . . Goodson's import in the excessive-force context is limited because it focused on the officers' lack of reasonable suspicion. For that reason, we said in Poole that Goodson 'lack[ed] analytical force in assessing the reasonableness of [the officer's] actions' regarding the amount of force used. . .

Griggs supports that the law was not clearly established in our case. . . In Griggs, after the officer told the defendant to stop performing a one-legged stand sobriety test and to put his hands behind his back, the defendant 'lurched to one side and said "no, no."'. . The officer 'immediately placed [the defendant] in a choke hold, swept his legs out from under him, and body-slammed him onto the nearby grass.'. . Once on the ground, the officer punched the defendant several times with a closed fist to the back of the head as he struggled to gain control of the defendant's hands. . . We concluded that our precedent did not clearly establish that the officer's takedown maneuver or use of 'non-deadly punches' to gain control of the defendant was constitutionally unreasonable. . . We distinguished Goodson because that case 'turned not on whether the force was excessive, but on whether the force was justified at all because fact issues remained as to whether the officer had reasonable suspicion to initiate the stop.'. . Here, as in Griggs, our precedents do not make clear to every reasonable officer that the force used was unlawful.")

McClin v. Ard, 866 F.3d 682, 696 (5th Cir. 2017) ("Here, we cannot say that every reasonable officer would understand that McLin was seized for purposes of the Fourth Amendment. To date, neither the Supreme Court nor the Fifth Circuit has decided that an officer's acceptance of a voluntary surrender to an arrest warrant constitutes a Fourth Amendment seizure. And there is no a 'robust consensus of persuasive authority': only one circuit—the Eleventh—has found a seizure in these circumstances in a published opinion, and a majority of circuit courts have not yet weighed in. Although we now hold that McLin was seized, reasonable officers might not have understood that accepting McLin's surrender to the arrest warrants, without imposing further pre-trial restrictions, constituted a seizure. We therefore hold that McLin fails to plead a violation of a 'clearly established' constitutional right, and we affirm the district court's grant of qualified immunity to the Defendants and dismissal of McLin's Fourth Amendment claim on that basis.")

Cobarobio v. Midland County, Tex., No. 15-50096, 2017 WL 3495588, at *1 (5th Cir. Aug. 15, 2017) (not reported) ("As determined by the district court, Cobarobio fails to establish that there was a clearly established First Amendment right for him to record police activity during an on-going emergency situation like the one involved in the instant case. In Turner v. Lieutenant Driver, 848 F.3d 678, 688 (5th Cir. 2017), this court held that 'First Amendment principles, controlling authority, and persuasive precedent demonstrate that a First Amendment right to record the police does exist, subject only to reasonable time, place, and manner restrictions.' However, we did so only after noting that 'there was no clearly established First Amendment right to record the police at the time of Turner's [2015 arrest].'. . Because Cobarobio's arrest occurred in 2012, he cannot satisfy his burden of establishing that the defendants are not entitled to qualified immunity. . . Moreover, because there was probable cause to arrest Cobarobio for interference with public duties, Cobarobio cannot establish a Fourth Amendment violation.")

Rivera v. Bonner, 691 F. App'x 234, ___ (5th Cir. 2017) ("[A] few months before Rivera was sexually assaulted, another senior jailer sexually abused a female detainee at the Hale County Jail. This event should have alerted Appellees that a substantial risk of serious harm existed in their facility and that they needed to do more to protect detainees from sexual exploitation. Yet the record suggests that Appellees did not make any modifications to their training, policies, or supervision. Instead, Appellees merely reminded jailers that they should not sexually exploit detainees and posted a sign indicating that 'sex with inmates' was prohibited. A jury could conclude that these reminders did not constitute an adequate response to the serious incident of sexual abuse that had recently transpired in the jail. . . Nonetheless, we must determine whether the constitutional right at issue was clearly established at the time of Appellees' alleged misconduct. In doing so, we look to 'cases of controlling authority in [this] jurisdiction at the time of the incident which clearly established the rule' or 'a consensus of cases of persuasive authority such that a reasonable [official] could not have believed that his actions were lawful.'. .It has long been clearly established that detainees like Rivera have the right to be protected from sexual abuse, both at the hands of correctional officers and fellow inmates, and that jail officials violate inmates' constitutional rights 'by showing "deliberate indifference" to a substantial risk' of sexual abuse 'when the official[s] "know[ ] of and disregard[ ] an excessive risk' of that harm occurring. . . By now, the substantial risk of sexual assault in jails and prisons is well-documented and obvious. . . Jail administrators are not permitted to 'bury their heads in the sand' and ignore these obvious risks to the inmate populations they have an affirmative duty to protect. . . Accordingly, this Court has previously held that jail officials who provide 'no training' on sexual abuse and leave their employees 'virtually unsupervised' are deliberately indifferent to the substantial risk that jailers might abuse detainees. . . Still, in the case at bar, Rivera concedes that officers at the jail received at least some state-sanctioned training aimed at sexual assault prevention. She also agrees that Appellees took some limited responsive action following the prior incident of sexual abuse. In other words, we are not faced with a case in which jail officials took no preventive measures to address the risk of sexual assault. And unfortunately, when Rivera was sexually assaulted, our case law did not provide much clarity on the scope of jail officials' obligations with respect to protecting detainees from sexual abuse. Indeed, Rivera has not identified any controlling Fifth Circuit authority establishing the constitutional inadequacy of Appellees' response to the risk of sexual assault in their jail. . . . Furthermore, at the time of the sexual assault in this case, there was not a consensus of persuasive authority such that reasonable officials in Appellees' position would have known their actions were unlawful. . . . As a result, we conclude that it was not clearly established at the time of the alleged misconduct that Appellees needed to make significant changes to their training, supervision, and policies in response to the July 2014 incident of sexual abuse. We hold that the district court did not err in concluding that the defendants were entitled to qualified immunity with respect to Rivera's inadequate training and supervision claims.") Brinsdon v. McAllen ISD, 863 F.3d 338, 350-53 (5th Cir. 2017) ("[I]t is clearly established that a school may compel some speech. Otherwise, a student who refuses to respond in class or do homework would not suffer any consequences. Students, moreover, generally do not have a right to reject curricular choices as these decisions are left to the sound discretion of instructors. . . .As true of us all, teachers and administrators can exercise their discretion poorly. This case involved a student's disagreement with a teacher's curricular choices and First Amendment issues arising from how the disagreement was addressed. We conclude that Santos as teacher, and Cavazos as principal, were not ignoring clearly established law when compelling a non-operative recitation of the Mexican pledge. Qualified immunity on compelled speech was properly granted. . . .Making unauthorized and secret video recordings of secondary-school classes does not represent a recognized First Amendment right, nor does the public dissemination of the video. To use Tinker's formulation, it was an 'invasion of the rights of others[.]'. . No clearly established law would have counseled these defendants not to respond to such behavior. To summarize, the evidence is that disruptions in mid-October were triggered primarily by dissemination of the secret video that showed students, with their faces blurred, performing the Mexican pledge. School officials did not violate clearly established law when the school reacted to the secretly taken video, and the evidence is that is what the officials did. We agree with the district court that Brinsdon's First Amendment rights were not violated by school officials reacting to the disruptions that had occurred and might continue. Qualified immunity was properly granted to Santos and Cavazos on the claim they violated Brinsdon's First Amendment rights by removing her from class.")

Brewer v. Hayne, 860 F.3d 819, 824-26 (5th Cir. 2017) ("Plaintiffs argue that the clearly established right at issue here is the due process right to be free from fabricated evidence. We have previously held that 'deliberate or knowing creation of misleading and scientifically inaccurate [evidence] amounts to a violation of a defendant's due process rights,' and that reasonable officers know of this right. . . .As a baseline, we agree with the district court that merely presenting forensic odontology evidence in the early 1990s was not unreasonable or violative of due process. While that sort of evidence has been called into question, . . . at the time of Plaintiffs' trials, forensic odontology was widely accepted. Plaintiffs are thus tasked with demonstrating not that the evidence Defendants presented is no longer considered trustworthy, but rather that Defendants intentionally created false evidence or intentionally produced evidence that they knew to be scientifically inaccurate by the standards of the day. . . . Plaintiffs have made a compelling showing that Defendants were negligent in their forensic analysis, but negligence alone will not defeat qualified immunity. . . Viewed in the most favorable light, Plaintiffs' evidence is not suggestive of an intent to fabricate. . . . Absent some additional evidence, the autopsy form and the result of the biopsy in the Brooks case are not sufficient to raise a reasonable inference that Dr. Hayne either deliberately failed to perform biopsies or withheld exculpatory evidence. At most, Plaintiffs have presented evidence that Dr. Hayne was negligent in failing to perform the biopsies or in failing to examine biopsied tissues. Ultimately, we think that true of all the evidence in the record: viewed in its entirety and in the light most favorable to Plaintiffs, the record tends to show that Defendants were negligent—perhaps grossly so—but no more. Plaintiffs have failed to raise a genuine issue of fact as to whether Defendants violated their right to due process by intentionally creating false or misleading scientific evidence. Defendants were entitled to summary judgment under the defense of qualified immunity. We affirm.")

Lincoln v. Barnes, 855 F.3d 297, 301-04 (5th Cir. 2017) ("The question . . . is whether Erin's detention at the police station for the purposes of questioning her as a witness to her father's shooting and obtaining her statement satisfied the Fourth Amendment's 'reasonableness' requirement. The relevant facts are as follows: Erin witnessed the events leading up to her father's death; after her father was lethally shot by members of the SWAT team, the police had an interest in detaining Erin to solicit information from her, including a statement; toward that end, Erin was handcuffed and placed in the backseat of a patrol car; after a period of approximately two hours, she was transported to the police station; and at the station, Barnes and Meeks questioned her for approximately five hours and forced her to write out a statement. . . . Accordingly, police violate the Fourth Amendment when, absent probable cause or the individual's consent, they seize and transport a person to the police station and subject her to prolonged interrogation. . . .Walker is persuasive authority that the prolonged detention of witnesses to a police shooting for the sole purpose of obtaining information from them, including statements, is unreasonable absent any exigencies justifying the detention for investigative purposes. . . But the clearly established law governing this case derives from Davis and Dunaway, not Walker. . . .While 'the law ordinarily permits police to seek the voluntary cooperation of members of the public in the investigation of a crime,'. . . '[a]bsent special circumstances, the person approached may not be detained ... but may refuse to cooperate and go on his way[.]'. . . Any further detention of such individual constitutes a seizure under the Fourth Amendment, which must satisfy the Fourth Amendment's 'reasonableness' requirement. . . As a general matter, the detention of a witness that is indistinguishable from custodial interrogation requires no less probable cause than a traditional arrest. Dunaway, 442 U.S. at 216; Davis, 394 U.S. at 726–28.")

Alexander v. City of Round Rock, 854 F.3d 298, 305, 308 (5th Cir. 2017) ("We do not suggest that officers in this circuit have faced this precise factual situation before. But that is not a condition precedent to denying qualified immunity—'officials can still be on notice that their conduct violates established law even in novel factual circumstances.'. . Based on these facts alone, we cannot conclude as a matter of law that Garza had reasonable suspicion to detain Alexander pursuant to the Fourth Amendment. Moreover, taking the facts as alleged, the lack of reasonable suspicion was clearly established—the factors we laid out as relevant in Hill, Martinez, Rideau, and Micheletti, as well as the Supreme Court's decision in Wardlow, do not support reasonable suspicion here. We therefore reverse the district court's dismissal of Alexander's unlawful detention claim. . . . Alexander also argues that the officers retaliated against him for exercising his First Amendment right to be silent and not answer their questions. This argument was not addressed straight-on by the district court. We hold that Alexander's claim on this point cannot overcome the officers' qualified immunity, because 'it was not clearly established that an individual has a First Amendment right to refuse to answer an officer's questions during a Terry stop.' Koch v. City of Del City, 660 F.3d 1228, 1244 (10th Cir. 2011). . . Surprisingly few courts have ruled on this precise issue; the parties point to no cases from this circuit directly on point. The sparse case law that does exist, however, indicates no consensus that a defendant has a First Amendment right not to answer an officer's questions during a stop like the one at issue here.")

Hanks v. Rogers, 853 F.3d 738, 747-49 (5th Cir. 2017) ("'[C]learly established law must be "particularized" to the facts of the case,'. . . and 'should not be defined "at a high level of generality,"'. . . . " In other words, outside of 'an obvious case,' the law is only 'clearly established' if a prior case exists 'where an officer acting under similar circumstances ... was held to have violated the Fourth Amendment.'. . In 'an obvious case,' Graham and Garner may supply the 'clearly established law.'. .In this case, we conclude that on the night Officer Rogers stopped Hanks, clearly established law demonstrated that an officer violates the Fourth Amendment if he abruptly resorts to overwhelming physical force rather than continuing verbal negotiations with an individual who poses no immediate threat or flight risk, who engages in, at most, passive resistance, and whom the officer stopped for a minor traffic violation. . . . Though we conclude Deville clearly proscribed Officer Rogers's actions, we also view this as an 'obvious' instance of excessive force in light of the factors set forth in Graham. Graham directs us to consider the 'facts and circumstances of each particular case, including the severity of the crime at issue, whether the suspect poses an immediate threat to the safety of the officers or others, and whether he is actively resisting arrest or attempting to evade arrest by flight.'. . As noted above, all of these factors strongly favor Hanks. No reasonable officer who is aiming a taser at the back of an individual such as Hanks—i.e., an individual who (1) was stopped for a minor traffic violation; (2) exited his car and has his hands displayed behind his back, thus presenting no immediate threat or flight risk; and (3) has displayed, at most, passive resistance, including asking whether he was under arrest—would escalate the situation via a physical takedown only seconds after ordering that individual to kneel. . . We hold that on Feb. 26, 2013, clearly established law demonstrated, and Graham makes obvious, that it was clearly unreasonable and excessive for Officer Rogers to abruptly escalate the encounter via a physical takedown where (1) Officer Rogers stopped Hanks for a minor traffic offense; (2) immediately before the takedown, Officer Rogers had his taser aimed at Hanks's back while Hanks stood against his vehicle, facing away from Officer Rogers, with his empty hands displayed behind his back, presenting no immediate threat or flight risk; and (3) Hanks offered, at most, passive resistance, including asking whether he was under arrest.")

Turner v. Lieutenant Driver, 848 F.3d 678, 685-90 (5th Cir. 2017) ("The district court's analysis rested on the second, 'clearly established,' prong, so we begin there. . . .At the time in question, neither the Supreme Court nor this court had determined whether First Amendment protection extends to the recording or filming of police. . . Although Turner insists, as some district courts in this circuit have concluded, that First Amendment protection extends to the video recording of police activity in light of general First Amendment principles, . . . the Supreme Court has 'repeatedly' instructed courts 'not to define clearly established law at a high level of generality': 'The general proposition, for example, that an unreasonable search or seizure violates the Fourth Amendment is of little help in determining whether the violative nature of particular conduct is clearly established.' . . Thus, Turner's reliance on decisions that 'clarified that [First Amendment] protections ... extend[ ] to gathering information' does not demonstrate whether the specific act at issue here—video recording the police or a police station—was clearly established. . . The district court stated that circuit courts 'are split as to whether or not there is a clearly established First Amendment right to record the public activities of police.' The circuit courts are not split, however, on whether the right exists. The First and Eleventh Circuits have held that the First Amendment protects the rights of individuals to videotape police officers performing their duties. . . In American Civil Liberties Union v. Alvarez, the Seventh Circuit explained that the First Amendment protects the audio recording of the police and concluded that an Illinois wiretapping statute, which criminalized the audio recording of police officers, merited heightened First Amendment scrutiny because of its burdens on First Amendment rights. . . No circuit has held that the First Amendment protection does not extend to the video recording of police activity, although several circuit courts have explained that the law in their respective circuits is not clearly established while refraining from determining whether there is a First Amendment right to record the police. . . We cannot say, however, that 'existing precedent ... placed the ... constitutional question beyond debate' when Turner recorded the police station. . . Neither does it seem that the law 'so clearly and unambiguously prohibited [the officers'] conduct that "every reasonable official would understand that what he is doing violates [the law]."'. . In light of the absence of controlling authority and the dearth of even persuasive authority, there was no clearly established First Amendment right to record the police at the time of Turner's activities. All three officers are entitled to qualified immunity on Turner's First Amendment claim. . . . Although the right was not clearly established at the time of Turner's activities, whether such a right exists and is protected by the First Amendment presents a separate and distinct question. . . Because the issue continues to arise in the qualified immunity context, . . .we now proceed to determine it for the future. We conclude that First Amendment principles, controlling authority, and persuasive precedent demonstrate that a First Amendment right to record the police does exist, subject only to reasonable time, place, and manner restrictions. . . .We agree with every circuit that has ruled on this question: Each has concluded that the First Amendment protects the right to record the police. . . .This right, however, 'is not without limitations.'. . Like all speech, . . filming the police 'may be subject to reasonable time, place, and manner restrictions.'. . In this case, however, we need not decide which specific time, place, and manner restrictions would be reasonable. . . Nonetheless, we note that when police departments or officers adopt time, place, and manner restrictions, those restrictions must be 'narrowly tailored to serve a significant governmental interest.'. . That said, to be constitutionally permissible, a time, place, and manner restriction 'need not be the least restrictive or least intrusive means of serving the government's interests.'")

Turner v. Lieutenant Driver, 848 F.3d 678, 696-97 (5th Cir. 2017) (Clement, J., dissenting as to Parts III.A.2 & III.B.1.b) ("I respectfully dissent from the majority's dicta purporting to clearly establish a First Amendment right to film the police and from the majority's reversal of the district court's grant of qualified immunity to Officers Grinalds and Dyess regarding Turner's unlawful arrest claim. . . .The majority does not determine that the officers here violated Turner's First Amendment rights—perhaps because it would be reasonable for security reasons to restrict individuals from filming police officers entering and leaving a police station. Because the majority does not hold that the officers actually violated the First Amendment, 'an officer acting under similar circumstances' in the future will not have violated any clearly established law.")

Davidson v. City of Stafford, Texas, 848 F.3d 384, 392-94 (5th Cir. 2017) ("We agree with the district court that there was no actual probable cause for Davidson's arrest. At the time Officers Flagg and Jones arrested Davidson, the only crime charged to Davidson was failure to identify under § 38.02. This is further confirmed in Davidson's police report, which charged Davidson with failure to identify under § 38.02(a). But § 38.02(a) applies only when an officer 'has lawfully arrested the person and requested the information.' Tex. Penal Code § 38.02(a). At the time they performed the arrest for the alleged § 38.02 violation, Davidson was not under arrest for any other violation, thus, the 'failure to identify' statute clearly was not triggered. We therefore conclude that the district court correctly determined that the officers had no actual or 'arguable' probable cause for arresting Davidson under § 38.02. We consider whether they had probable cause under any other statute below. Turning to objective or 'arguable' probable cause, and taking the facts in the light most favorable to Davidson, it is clear that the officers were objectively unreasonable in believing that there was probable cause for Davidson's arrest under the only other section posited here, § 42.03. Based on the information available to Officers Flagg and Jones, Davidson had not 'render[ed] impassable or ... render[ed] passage unreasonably inconvenient or hazardous' for Clinic patients. Tex. Penal Code § 42.03. . . .In addition to cases establishing the lack of probable cause, there was fulsome case law clearly establishing that an arrest without probable cause violates both First and Fourth Amendment rights at the time of Davidson's arrest in 2013. Specifically, Officers Flagg's and Jones's conduct violated Davidson's clearly established rights as demonstrated in federal case law. . . .These federal and state decisions make clear that Davidson's arrest without probable cause was a violation of his First and Fourth Amendment rights. . . . On the second prong of the qualified immunity defense, recent Supreme Court decisions addressing claims for excessive force have 'reiterate[d] the longstanding principle that "clearly established law" should not be defined "at a high level of generality."'. . Our cases outside the excessive force area involving warrantless arrests and limits on speech have not specifically mentioned this aspect of Supreme Court cases. . . Assuming arguendo that the specific White/Mullenix admonition applies to all qualified immunity cases regardless of the constitutional violation charged, the officers here still come up short. The cases cited above clearly demonstrate what does and does not violate § 42.03 and also clearly establish the unconstitutionality of warrantless arrests without probable cause. Even if he had not been exercising core First Amendment rights, Davidson was not (even arguably) in violation of § 42.03 when he stood outside of the Clinic. Additionally, his right to protest prohibited the officers' application of § 42.03 in the manner employed here. Resolving all factual disputes in favor of Davidson, the objective unreasonableness displayed by Officers Flagg and Jones in the face of law clearly establishing Davidson's rights leads us to the conclusion that qualified immunity cannot shield their actions against Davidson. We conclude that in Davidson's case, 'every reasonable official would have understood that what he is doing violates' Davidson's rights.")

Cooper v. Brown, 844 F.3d 517, 524-25 (5th Cir. 2016) ("The undisputed facts establish that Brown's use of force was objectively unreasonable. . . To be clear, we do not say that any application of force to a compliant arrestee is per se unreasonable, and we do not opine on the line of reasonableness. Instead, we state only the obvious: Under the facts in this record, permitting a dog to continue biting a compliant and non-threatening arrestee is objectively unreasonable. . . .Cooper's right was clearly established. Our caselaw makes certain that once an arrestee stops resisting, the degree of force an officer can employ is reduced. [discussing cases] In the same way, Cooper was not attempting to resist arrest or flee, and Brown had no reason to think that he posed an immediate threat. Moreover, the fact that Bush and Newman are not dog-bite cases does not shield Brown. 'Lawfulness of force ... does not depend on the precise instrument used to apply it.

Qualified immunity will not protect officers who apply excessive and unreasonable force merely because their means of applying it are novel.'. . Thus, Brown had 'fair warning' that subjecting a compliant and non-threatening arrestee to a lengthy dog attack was objectively unreasonable.") Anderson v. Valdez, 845 F.3d 580, 599-602 (5th Cir. 2016) ("Valdez urges that, even if Anderson stated a retaliation claim, he (Valdez) is entitled to qualified immunity because neither Garcetti nor other relevant contemporary cases clearly established that speech made pursuant to a professional (here, ethical) duty is not speech made pursuant to an official duty. Anderson counters that Garcetti did nothing more than create a limited presumption that speech made by a public employee pursuant to an official duty is unprotected; it did not disrupt the presumption that speech made by a public employee is presumptively protected, including speech made pursuant to an ethical duty. . . . By at least 2014, it was clearly established that an employee's speech made 'externally' concerning 'an event that was not within [his or her] job requirements' was entitled to First Amendment protection. . . Taking Anderson's allegations as true, as we must at this stage of the litigation, Anderson alleges exactly what Cutler requires. First, Anderson alleges that he reported his concerns about Justice Valdez externally, viz., to the State Commission on Judicial Conduct. . . Second, Anderson alleges that his complaint to the judicial conduct commission was outside of his job duties. Accepting Anderson's allegations as true, Cutler decides this appeal. That is not to say that, by 2014, our law applying Garcetti spoke loudly regarding every factual circumstance. Indeed, just after Anderson spoke, the Supreme Court clarified Garcetti in Lane. . . . Lane plainly demonstrates that, following Garcetti, some First Amendment retaliation cases would still result in findings of qualified immunity. That is, Garcetti did not plainly establish all First Amendment retaliation law. Nonetheless, Cutler makes it apparent that Garcetti, and this court's jurisprudence interpreting it, clearly established some law. The question is how much. Based on the allegations at issue here, Howell v. Town of Ball answers that question. . . There, the plaintiff alleged that he had been fired from his job as a town police officer for cooperating with an FBI investigation into public corruption. . . The plaintiff 'emphasize[d] that, under the Supreme Court's recent decision in Lane, the relevant question [was] whether the speech at issue [was] ordinarily within the scope of an employee's duties.'. . And, what job duties were 'ordinary' was critical to the court's holding. The plaintiff 'offered evidence that his involvement in the FBI investigation was outside the ordinary scope [of] his professional duties.'. .The defendants pointed to the 'general' duty of all police officers to 'detect and prevent crime.'. .We found that the defendants' evidence was inadequate because broad general duties 'fail to describe with sufficient detail the day-to-day duties of a public employee's job.'. . . Nonetheless, we determined that the individual defendants were entitled to qualified immunity. . .In doing so, we noted that 'the Supreme Court did not emphasize that only speech made in furtherance of an employee's "ordinary" job duties is not protected until nearly three years after [plaintiff] was discharged.'. . . Reading Howell in the framework of Cutler properly synthesizes Lane's effect on Garcetti. Namely, Garcetti and our court's pre-Lane jurisprudence established that when employees speak outside of their chain of command and outside of their job duties they are entitled to First Amendment protection. . . Lane and Howell, however, indicate that some cases are too difficult to be determined pursuant to that rule. Even though in some cases employees might have a general employment duty to speak, that duty is not part of their 'ordinary' official duties, so their speech pursuant to that general duty is protected by the First Amendment. Equally clear, however, is that neither Lane nor Howell meaningfully altered the analysis required by Garcetti and Cutler when an employee's allegations do not concern the distinction between 'ordinary' and 'non-ordinary' job duties. . . Here, there is not—and at the motion to dismiss stage there can never be—a meaningful factual dispute that implicates Lane's ordinariness rule. . . Anderson alleges that his speech to the State Commission on Judicial Conduct was made outside of his chain of command and outside of his job duties. Perhaps at the summary judgment or trial phase facts will come to light that implicate Lane. Until then, however, the ordinariness rule simply does not implicate the right at issue here. Accordingly, under Cutler, Anderson has pleaded the violation of a clearly established right. Qualified immunity thus does not apply—at least, not yet.")

Anderson v. Valdez, 845 F.3d 580, 603-07 (5th Cir. 2016) (Jones, J., dissenting) ("I agree with the majority that even after Garcetti v. Ceballos, 547 U.S. 410, 126 S. Ct. 1951 (2006), Anderson has plausibly alleged a violation of his First Amendment rights. Unfortunately, that is the end of our agreement, because I disagree with the majority's reasoning to this conclusion and would grant qualified immunity. . . . [T]he issue is more complex than the majority's analysis acknowledges because, under the Texas Constitution, the Commission includes members of the public, . . . but its proposed sanctions against a judge are ultimately reviewable by the Texas Supreme Court. . . The Texas judiciary may thus be considered its own self-regulator. In this situation, Chief Justice Valdez's argument is far from frivolous that Anderson's complaint went up the 'chain of command' within the judiciary. Consequently, the ultimate constitutional status of Anderson's speech, and thus his right to a First Amendment shield against employment consequences, are debatable. Debatable constitutional violations demand qualified immunity for public officials, even when this court is bound to conclude that a violation in fact occurred. . .For these reasons, even if Anderson's allegations are proven to be true, I conclude that Chief Justice Valdez visited unconstitutional retaliation upon Anderson but the law was not 'clearly established' such that any 'reasonable [judicial] official would understand' that Anderson's speech was constitutionally protected because it occurred outside the law clerk's 'chain of command.'") .

Cowart v. Erwin, 837 F.3d 444, 454-55 (5th Cir. 2016) ("We have little difficulty concluding that in 2009, the time of the incident, it was well-established, in sufficiently similar situations, that officers may not 'use gratuitous force against a prisoner who has already been subdued ... [or] incapacitated.' . .Reasonable officers had fair notice that such conduct under the circumstances violated Cowart's right to be free from excessive force.")

Gonzalez v. Huerta, 826 F.3d 854, 857-59 (5th Cir. 2016) ("[E]ven if we assume that Huerta violated Gonzalez's constitutional rights by detaining him without reasonable suspicion, we cannot say that this detention was objectively unreasonable in light of clearly established law. . . Gonzalez argues that the law is clearly established that a police officer's demand for identification constitutes a seizure under the Fourth Amendment and must be based on reasonable suspicion. But this general claim—that a seizure under the Fourth Amendment must be based on reasonable suspicion—is precisely the type of 'general proposition' that the Supreme Court has rejected. See Ashcroft v. al-

Kidd, 131 S. Ct. 2074, 2084 (2011). Instead, the Court has repeatedly emphasized the need to look at the specific facts of a case when determining qualified immunity. . . .With the more specific inquiry the Court requires, the question becomes whether there is either 'directly controlling authority ... establishing the illegality of such conduct' or 'a consensus of cases of persuasive authority such that a reasonable officer could not have believed that his actions were lawful[.]' . . . Here, it appears that Huerta's decision to detain Gonzalez was based, at least in part, on his belief that Gonzalez was required to identify himself pursuant to § 37.105 of the Texas Education Code. [section 37.105 of the Texas Education Code. Section 37.105 provides: The board of trustees of a school district or its authorized representative may refuse to allow a person without legitimate business to enter on property under the board's control and may eject any undesirable person from the property on the person's refusal to leave peaceably on request. Identification may be required of any person on the property.] And while prior Supreme Court cases have held that police may not detain an individual solely for refusing to provide identification, see Brown [v. Texas], 443 U.S. at 52, and Hiibel v. Sixth Judicial District Court of Nevada, Humboldt County, 542 U.S. 177, 188 (2004), neither of those cases dealt with incidents occurring on school property. This is no small distinction, as the Supreme Court has routinely reconsidered the scope of individual constitutional rights in a school setting. See, e.g., Morse v. Frederick, 551 U.S. 393 (2007); Vernonia Sch. Dist. 47J v. Acton, 515 U.S. 646 (1995); New Jersey v. T.L.O., 469 U.S. 325 (1985). Thus, we find that Brown—which Gonzalez relies on—and Hiibel do not meet the 'sufficiently high level of specificity' necessary 'to put a reasonable official on notice' that detaining an individual for a failure to provide identification on school property 'is definitively unlawful.'. . Accordingly, we do not find that Huerta's actions were 'objectively unreasonable in light of a clearly established rule of law.'. . Huerta is therefore entitled to qualified immunity.") Gonzalez v. Huerta, 826 F.3d 854, 859-61 (5th Cir. 2016) (Graves, J., dissenting) ("The majority essentially acknowledges that Huerta did not have a reasonable basis to detain Gonzalez, but then determines that the law is not clearly established. I disagree. As an initial matter, I would explicitly conclude that, under the totality of the circumstances, Huerta lacked reasonable suspicion to detain Gonzalez and, thus, violated his constitutional rights. Huerta received only a bare report that originated from an unknown third party of a suspicious' vehicle in the school parking lot and information of a recent history of automobile burglaries at the same location. Huerta did not receive any information connecting either Gonzalez or the 'suspicious' vehicle to that information. As the majority states, the scenario encountered by Huerta was akin to that in Brown v. Texas, 443 U.S. 47, 52 (1979), and did not justify reasonable suspicion for a stop. As the majority further concludes, based on the totality of the facts and circumstances in this case, any suspicions held by Huerta should have been alleviated when he approached the vehicle. However, after a fairly thorough analysis outlining how Huerta violated Gonzalez's constitutional rights without reasonable suspicion, the majority then determines that the very law it relies upon is not clearly established. . . I cannot agree. Further, I disagree with any attempt to make the qualified immunity analysis so fact-specific that it would never be clearly established. Thus, I would conclude that Huerta's detention of Gonzalez was objectively unreasonable in light of clearly established law. In so concluding, I disagree with the majority's characterization of Gonzalez's claim as a 'general proposition' rejected by the Supreme Court. Although the law is clearly established that a seizure under the Fourth Amendment must be based on reasonable suspicion, Gonzalez does not merely make a general claim. Instead, he asserts that a police officer's demand for identification constitutes such a seizure and must be based on reasonable suspicion based on the clearly established law of Brown. . . Further, even Huerta acknowledges that the applicable law here is well-settled. . . . The Supreme Court has definitively held that a police officer may not detain an individual he deems suspicious solely for refusing to provide identification, even under a state statute and in a neighborhood frequented by drug users, without reasonable suspicion. See Brown, 443 U.S. at 51-52; Tex. Penal Code Ann., Tit. 8, § 38.02. See also Hiibel v. Sixth Jud. Dist. Ct. of Nev., Humboldt Cty., 542 U.S. 177, 188 (2004). . . Despite the fact that the Supreme Court specifically said in al-Kidd that '[w]e do not require a case directly on point,' the majority concludes that school property is somehow different and there must be a case directly on point. . . The majority cites, as does Huerta, section 37.105 of the Texas Education Code. Section 37.105 says:

The board of trustees of a school district or its authorized representative may refuse to allow a person without legitimate business to enter on property under the board's control and may eject any undesirable person from the property on the person's refusal to leave peaceably on request. Identification may be required of any person on the property. . . . However, section 37.105 says nothing about any authority to detain an individual who does not immediately provide identification upon demand, but rather says only that a person may be ejected. Moreover, it is not clear that Huerta is either a member of the board of trustees of the school district or an authorized representative. Nonetheless, assuming that section 37.105 allowed Huerta to require that Gonzalez provide identification, it would have been unreasonable for Huerta to believe that he could then detain Gonzalez under that same section for failing to immediately do so. Huerta apparently agrees because he argues that he did not detain Gonzalez solely for failing to provide identification, but did so because he had a reasonable basis to suspect a connection between Gonzalez and recent car burglaries under what he refers to as the 'settled law' of Terry and Michelletti. Further, the district court decided the case on reasonable suspicion of criminal activity. But, as the majority's analysis reveals, the record does not support the existence of reasonable suspicion. Both Huerta and the district court attempted to distinguish Brown on the basis that Huerta had more specific information than the officer in Brown, not because Brown did not occur in a school parking lot. However, the record does not establish that Huerta had more information than the officer in Brown and the case law does not support the majority's conclusion that the law is not clearly established. For these reasons, I would reverse the grant of summary judgment on the illegal detention claim. Accordingly, I respectfully dissent.")

Hinojosa v. Livingston, 807 F.3d 657, 669-70 (5th Cir. 2015) ("Defendants argue . . . that the complaint cannot surmount the qualified immunity hurdle because there is no clearly established right to an air-conditioned cell or to around-the-clock medical care. Defendants' argument again misreads the complaint and confuses right with remedy. While the complaint does allege that TDCJ cells are not air-conditioned and that TDCJ fails to employ medical staff during nighttime hours, it does not claim that the Eighth Amendment requires such accommodations. Rather, the right that it asserts is the right to be free from exposure to extremely dangerous temperatures without adequate remedial measures. The complaint's description of the lack of remedial measures does not purport to be an exhaustive list of the Eighth Amendment's basic requirements. It is simply a description of several ways in which Defendants could have addressed the risk, but instead chose not to do so. The right that it asserts, however, is the well-established Eighth Amendment right not to be subjected to extremely dangerous temperatures without adequate ameliorative measures. Defendants also contend that the Supreme Court's recent decision in Taylor v. Barkes, —— U.S. ——, 135 S.Ct. 2042, 192 L.Ed.2d 78 (2015), bolsters their qualified immunity argument. It does not. . . .In sum, the Court found, even if the alleged shortcomings existed, 'no precedent on the books ... would have made clear to petitioners that they were overseeing a system that violated the Constitution.'. . Here, by contrast, assuming Hinojosa's allegations to be true, our precedent put Defendants on notice that they were 'overseeing a system that violated the Constitution.'. . Our circuit has made very clear that inmates have a right, under the Eighth Amendment, not to be subjected to extreme temperatures without adequate remedial measures, and Defendants have not alerted us to any contrary authority.") Hinojosa v. Livingston, 807 F.3d 657, 675-80, 683 (5th Cir. 2015) (Jones, J., dissenting) ("No one doubts the tragedy of a prisoner's life lost to heat stroke during a hot Texas summer. The question here, however, is not whether better prison policies or procedures might theoretically have prevented Hinojosa's death in the Garza West transfer unit of the Texas Department of Criminal Justice ("TDCJ"). As in all cases of qualified immunity, the question is whether the three top officials of the TDCJ ("Executive Defendants"), whose 111 institutions supervise over 150,000 prisoners at a time, must endure litigation and potential personal liability in damages for this prisoner's death because of some arguably defective 'condition of confinement.'. . . By the lights of Taylor, Mullenix, and many other Supreme Court decisions, the majority opinion is indefensible for two primary reasons. First, it defines the allegedly 'clearly established right' of Hinojosa in an overbroad and ambiguous way, the antithesis of what qualified immunity stands for. Qualified immunity is due these officials as a matter of law. Second, it affords credence to pleadings that are insufficient under Iqbal . . . to raise a question about these officials' liability under any circumstances. The pleadings thus failed to state a claim under Rule 12(b)(6). . . .Here, as in Taylor, the Executive Defendants were neither plainly incompetent nor knowing lawbreakers. The alleged actions of the Executive Defendants were not objectively unreasonable in light of the clearly established law at the time of the violation, and they are entitled to immunity from suit. . . .The right to be free from extreme temperatures without adequate remedial measures is too generalized to be of any use to the Executive Defendants in deciding what actions they should or should not take regarding system-wide policies. The qualified immunity doctrine is 'highly context-sensitive.'. . And the Supreme Court has repeatedly and frequently instructed—recently with some exasperation—that courts should not 'define clearly established law at a high level of generality.'. . Instead, the right must be defined so that it is 'beyond debate' that 'every reasonable official would have understood that what he is doing violates that right.'. . The Supreme Court's guidance underlines the real world implications of the qualified immunity analysis. General principles are of limited use to prison officials who must often make difficult policy choices in highly fact-dependent situations. Because reasonable mistakes are inevitable in these settings, the 'clearly established' requirement protects mistaken judgments. . . .The parallels between Taylor and this case are obvious. Like the Third Circuit majority, the majority here affirm an Eighth Amendment right of medically vulnerable inmates not to be subjected to extreme temperatures without adequate remedial measures. Like the Third Circuit majority, the panel majority here approve a claim that these defendants were deliberately indifferent to the inmate's serious medical needs because their policies failed to provide certain 'adequate remedial measures' or 'measures like those' mentioned in prior circuit case law. Moreover, as in Taylor, it is alleged that the Executive Defendants knew their system was inadequate because thirteen other inmates died from heatstroke in five years before Hinojosa's death. The Taylor plaintiffs also explicitly alleged that the Delaware prison officials 'were aware that the suicide rate in the Delaware prisons was above the national average.'. . . The majority's analytical mistake in this decision is the same mistake made by the Third Circuit. . . . No prior Fifth Circuit case comes close to giving these Executive Defendants fair notice that they needed additional system-wide housing, medical, or intake policies to avoid running afoul of the Constitution and exposing themselves to personal liability. This court should grant the Executive Defendants' motion to dismiss.")

Cole v. Carson, 802 F.3d 752, 765 (5th Cir. 2015), cert. granted sub nom Hunter v. Cole, judgment vacated and case remanded for further consideration in light of Mullenix v. Luna, 136 S. Ct. 305 (2015) (per curiam), 137 S. Ct. 497 (2016), opinion reinstated on remand, Cole v. Carson, 905 F.3d 334 (5th Cir. 2018) ("The Coles allege that Officer Carson committed a Brady violation in two ways: by lying to conceal his own knowledge that Ryan Cole never assaulted an officer, and by conspiring with other officers to conceal physical evidence also tending to exculpate Ryan. But prior to 2010, we had held that Brady is not implicated when there is no trial. . . Ryan Cole was not tried for aggravated assault, nor did he plead guilty; the charge was dismissed. There is no suggestion that the aggravated assault charge was used as leverage to secure a plea on the unlawful carrying charge. It follows that Officer Carson was not on notice that withholding evidence in these circumstances could violate Brady, and he is entitled to qualified immunity for the alleged Brady violations.")

Cole v. Carson, 802 F.3d 752, 768-74 (5th Cir. 2015), cert. granted sub nom Hunter v. Cole, judgment vacated and case remanded for further consideration in light of Mullenix v. Luna, 136 S. Ct. 305 (2015) (per curiam), 137 S. Ct. 497 (U.S. Nov. 28, 2016), opinion reinstated on remand, Cole v. Carson, 905 F.3d 334 (5th Cir. 2018) ("In sum, we have held that a victim of intentional fabrication of evidence by officials is denied due process when he is either convicted or acquitted. We have never decided whether false charges must survive to the trial stage in order to implicate due process rights. . . . Two circuits have found that there is no due process claim in the absence of a conviction—a requirement we have not insisted upon. . . .The Second, Eighth, Ninth, and Tenth Circuits have . . . all found denials of due process when charges rest on fabricated evidence. The Seventh Circuit's decisions appear to point the other way. The court has held that 'a police officer does not violate an acquitted defendant's due process rights when he fabricates evidence.' Acquittal forecloses the claim. In the Seventh Circuit's view, the only liberty interest damaged in such cases 'stems from [plaintiff's] initial arrest' and should be addressed under the Fourth Amendment; being forced to defend oneself at trial is no deprivation of liberty. The Seventh Circuit's no-due process violation decisions have occurred in cases that either did not address the availability of a Fourth Amendment claim or found that the claim had been purposefully abandoned, and it has suggested a willingness to consider deprivations short of conviction and imprisonment if properly raised. . . .The remaining circuits do not appear to have answered the question before us. [discussing circuit cases] All the circuits that have squarely considered the question have either found that a due process violation may lie where state officers fabricate evidence to support false charges against a plaintiff, or have found no due process violation in the absence of a conviction, an approach we have expressly rejected. We agree with those that have found a due process right not to have police deliberately fabricate evidence and use it to frame and bring false charges against a person. . . .Deliberate framing of a person by the state offends the most strongly held values of our nation. We echo again the apt words of the First Circuit that, 'if any concept is fundamental to our American system of justice, it is that those charged with upholding the law are prohibited from deliberately fabricating evidence and framing individuals.' As the Third Circuit has stated, 'no sensible concept of ordered liberty is consistent with law enforcement cooking up its own evidence.' Here, the framing was allegedly done in order to conceal and justify excessive force against one of the people our laws and systems are supposed to protect. The rule of law, which we have cherished since our founding, cannot abide such conduct. We agree with the Second Circuit that official framing of a person in these circumstances undermines the right to a fair trial. Being framed and falsely charged brings inevitable damage to the person's reputation, especially where, as here, the crime is a felony involving the threat of violence. Alongside the reputational damage, it requires the person framed to mount a defense, and places him in the power of a court of law, where he may be required to appear. Though these wrongs may be addressed through a Fourth Amendment challenge in many cases, they do not disappear where there is no violation of that amendment. Instead, where there is no more specific constitutional protection available, the Fourteenth Amendment may offer protection. It does so here, where the conduct is undoubtedly shocking to the conscience and no conceivable state interest justifies the deprivations imposed. The Fourteenth Amendment forbids what allegedly happened to Ryan Cole. Where police intentionally fabricate evidence and successfully get someone falsely charged with a felony as cover for their colleagues' actions, and the Fourth Amendment is unavailing, there may be a due process violation. Having found that the Coles have alleged a due process violation, we must also decide whether the violation was clearly established in October 2010. . . . By 2010, no 'reasonable law enforcement officer would have thought it permissible to frame somebody for a crime he or she did not commit.' Though the First Circuit was addressing official framing that led to conviction, and the state of the law in 1967, the principle applies with obvious clarity here. 'To hold that police officers, having lawfully arrested a suspect, are then free to fabricate false [evidence] at will, would make a mockery of the notion that Americans enjoy the protection of due process of the law and fundamental justice.' '[T]he wrongfulness of charging someone on the basis of deliberately fabricated evidence is sufficiently obvious,' that in light of our due process violation holdings in Castellano and Boyd and the decisions of our sister circuits, a reasonable officer in Officer Carson's shoes would have known

Chavis v. Borden, 621 F. App'x 283, 286-87 (5th Cir. 2015) ("Unlike our sister Circuits, we have repeatedly declined to decide whether such a cause of action [state-created-danger claim] is viable in the Fifth Circuit. . . Nevertheless, we have identified elements that a plaintiff would need to allege if we ever recognized the state-created danger doctrine. First, the plaintiff would have to allege that the defendant used his or her authority to create a dangerous environment. . .Second, the plaintiff would have to allege that the defendant ' "acted with deliberate indifference to the plight of the plaintiff.''. . To establish deliberate indifference, the plaintiff must allege that (1) the environment created by the state actor was dangerous; (2) the state actor knew the environment was dangerous; and (3) the state actor used his or her authority ' "to create an opportunity that would not otherwise have existed for the third party's crime to occur.'". .A number of our opinions also state that the plaintiff would also have to allege he or she was a 'known victim' of the state-created danger, rather than merely one of many foreseeable victims of the danger in question. . . Chavis asks us to recognize the state-created danger theory without including the 'known victim' requirement as an element of the plaintiff's prima facie case. . . We have no occasion to consider whether a plaintiff must be a 'known victim' to prevail on a state-created danger claim, or, if so, whether Jones would qualify as a 'known victim' under these facts. Nor must we consider whether a state-created danger cause of action exists in this Circuit at all, or whether Chavis's complaint properly alleges a constitutional violation. Assuming—without deciding—that Borden violated Jones's substantive due process rights, we conclude that Borden did not violate a constitutional right that was 'clearly established' at the time of Jones's tragic death. . . . As reckless and unprofessional as Borden's alleged conduct was, none of our Circuit's prior decisions gave Borden reasonable warning that leaving a drunk driver behind the wheel of his vehicle could violate another motorist's substantive due process rights. . .To the contrary, this Court previously held, in a case with relatively similar facts, that a police officer did not 'offend due process by permitting an intoxicated driver to remain on the highway' because his 'decision, while imprudent and ultimately tragic, was not sufficiently willful and targeted toward specific harm to remove the case into the domain of constitutional law.'. . Chavis argues that it is not dispositive that our Circuit has never recognized the state-created danger theory because there is a 'robust consensus of persuasive authority' from other Circuits that could support liability under these facts. It is true that this Court 'may consider the law of other circuits when determining whether a constitutional right is clearly established.'. . However, [t]he reluctance of this court ... to embrace some version of the state-created danger theory despite numerous opportunities to do so suggests that, regardless of the status of this doctrine in other circuits, a reasonable officer in this circuit would, even today, be unclear as to whether there is a right to be free from 'state-created danger.'. .Thus, Chavis's claim does not satisfy the 'clearly established law' element, so Borden is entitled to qualified immunity.") Culbertson v. Lykos, 790 F.3d 608, 627 (5th Cir. 2015) ("Palmer argues she is entitled to qualified immunity because, in light of Beattie, the law was not clearly established that a mere recommendation of termination to a higher authority who makes the final decision causes an adverse employment action. We have already noted ambiguity as to the liability of a person for recommending an adverse employment decision. 'The doctrine of qualified immunity protects government officials from liability for civil damages insofar as their conduct does not violate clearly established statutory or constitutional rights of which a reasonable person would have known.'. . It was unsettled at the time of Palmer's actions, and remains so now, whether someone who is not a final decision-maker and makes a recommendation that leads to the plaintiff being harmed can be liable for retaliation under Section 1983. . . In fact, some clear statements in the caselaw have held there can be no liability. . . We conclude the claims against Palmer should be dismissed based on qualified immunity.")

Singleton v. Darby, 609 F. App'x 190, 196 (5th Cir. 2015) ("[T]he Supreme Court recently repeated its warning against defining the law in question 'at a high level of generality.'. . In doing so, the Supreme Court rejected the lower court's reliance on a generalized assessment of the Graham factors for overcoming qualified immunity in an excessive force case—the same analysis the dissent employs to try and defeat qualified immunity here. . . Instead, to overcome qualified immunity, the plaintiff must identify case law clearly establishing that the 'official acted reasonably in the particular circumstances that he or she faced.'. . Notably, the dissent is unable to point to case law with facts anywhere close to the particular circumstances involved here—the use of pepper spray to clear a road filled with protestors who vastly outnumbered law enforcement—that would have placed Darby on notice that his conduct was unlawful. Thus, viewing the facts through the deferential lens of qualified immunity and from the perspective of a reasonable officer on the scene, we conclude that Darby's use of force was not objectively unreasonable under the circumstances. At a minimum, case law did not make it clear to every reasonable officer that use of pepper spray in this situation was unreasonable. . . The district court therefore properly granted summary judgment in Darby's favor.")

Singleton v. Darby, 609 F. App'x 190, 196-97, 206-07 (5th Cir. 2015) (Dennis, J. concurring in part and dissenting in part) (not reported) ("Regarding the Fourth Amendment claim, the majority incorrectly read the Supreme Court's decision in Scott v. Harris, 550 U.S. 372 (2007) to hold that in analyzing a motion for summary judgment in an excessive force case in which the record contains a videotape of crucial events in question, a court is not required to determine the relevant facts by adopting the plaintiff's version of events and reading the record in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, but rather should decide whether the officer violated the Fourth Amendment solely in light of the facts depicted by the videotape. Scott v. Harris did not so hold. Rather, the Court so proceeded in that case only because the record contained a telling videotape that 'blatantly' and 'utterly' contradicted and discredited the plaintiff's version of the facts, so that no reasonable jury could have believed him. . . In a case, such as the present one, in which the record with a videotape does not contradict, but instead corroborates, plaintiff Singleton's version of the facts, the court is required to apply standard summary-judgment principles, including accepting the plaintiff's version of the facts as the basis for its decision and viewing the record and reasonable inferences in the light most favorable to her. The majority's failure to do so skewed its entire decisional process, leading it to erroneously affirm the district court's summary judgment. . . .At the time of the pepper-spraying incident, '[Singleton] had a clearly established right to be free from excessive force ... and it was clearly established that the amount of force that [Darby] could use depended on the severity of the crime at issue, whether the suspect posed a threat to the officer's safety, and whether the suspect was resisting arrest or attempting to flee.'. . Viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to Singleton, she and the other protesters posed no threat, were not resisting arrest, and were committing, at the very most, a non-violent, minor offense when Darby almost immediately and, without any warning that he would do so, resorted to the significant force of pepper spray. 'While the Fourth Amendment's reasonableness test is "not capable of precise definition or mechanical application," the test is clear enough that [Darby] should have known that he could not [use pepper spray against Singleton and the other protesters under the particular circumstances.]' Bush v. Strain, 513 F.3d 492, 502 (5th Cir.2008) (quoting Graham, 490 U.S. at 396). Accordingly, I would conclude that Darby is not entitled to qualified immunity on Singleton's Fourth Amendment claim. In reaching the opposite conclusion, the majority erroneously contends that the Supreme Court's recent decision in Plumhoff v. Rickard, 134 S.Ct. 2012 (2014), requires us to find a case with nearly identical facts to the particular circumstances here in order to conclude that Darby's conduct violated 'clearly established' Fourth Amendment law. In so doing, the majority grossly misreads that decision and altogether ignores the long-established principle that the lodestar in qualified-immunity cases is whether officers had 'fair warning' that their conduct would violate a constitutional right. . . In Plumhoff, the Court held that police officers who shot the driver of a fleeing vehicle in order to end a dangerous car chase were entitled to qualified immunity. . . In conducting the 'clearly established law' prong of its qualified immunity analysis, the Court emphasized its precedents observing that deadly force cases 'depend[ ] very much on the facts of each case,' meaning that a pure application of the Graham and Garner factors may not be appropriate in such a case. . . Accordingly, in light of the unique fact that the officers utilized deadly force in response to a high-speed car chase, the Court held that Graham and Garner alone did not put the officers on notice that their conduct violated 'clearly established' Fourth Amendment law. . . Contrary to the majority's position, Plumhoff does not eviscerate the long-established principle that a police officer is not entitled to qualified immunity where, as here, he has 'fair warning' based on existing precedents that his conduct would violate the constitutional rights of the plaintiff. . . Rather, as even a cursory review of Plumhoff reveals, the Court's 'clearly established law' analysis pivoted entirely upon the unique fact that the case involved 'deadly force' in response to a dangerous 'vehicular flight,'. . . which is clearly not the case confronting us here. Indeed, unlike the instant case where there was no threat to Darby or the public whatsoever, the officers in Plumhoff 'shot at Rickard to put an end to what had already been a lengthy, high-speed pursuit that indisputably posed a danger both to the officers involved and to any civilians who happened to be nearby.'. . Moreover, in addition to ignoring these meaningful factual distinctions between Plumhoff and the instant case, the majority also errs in concluding that Plumhoff militates against applying a 'generalized assessment of the Graham factors' in order to conclude that Darby violated 'clearly established' Fourth Amendment law. Such logic further reflects the majority's careless reading of Plumhoff. Plumhoff explicitly and repeatedly endorsed the Court's earlier decision in Brousseau, wherein the Court made clear that, even in the fact-dependent context of deadly force cases, 'Graham and Garner alone [can] offer a basis for decision' that officers violated 'clearly established' Fourth Amendment law in 'an obvious case.'. . As explained above, this is an obvious case: in response to the alleged commission of a non-violent and indisputably minor offense, Darby unleased pepper spray into the face and eyes of an elderly woman without providing her any warning or opportunity to comply with his command and without attempting to first utilize any less severe alternative whatsoever. . . Given these egregious facts, a reasonable officer in Darby's position would have 'fair warning' that his conduct violated the Fourth Amendment's prohibition on excessive force pursuant to both Supreme Court and this Circuit's precedents.")

Trent v. Wade, 776 F.3d 368, 382-84 (5th Cir. 2015), reh'g en banc denied, 801 F.3d 849 (5th Cir. 2015) ("We conclude that hot pursuit—unless accompanied by one of the specific justifications enumerated in Richards—does not justify a no-knock entry. Wade points to no authority to the contrary. The fact that the pursued in a hot pursuit is aware of the officer's presence says nothing, without more, about the awareness of the other occupants of the home, all of whom are protected by the knock-and-announce rule. Therefore, the mere fact that the district court upheld the constitutionality of Wade's search of the Trents' home as one carried out in hot pursuit does not justify Wade's failure to knock and announce. . . . As explained above, Wilson and Richards placed the knock-and-announce rule and the justifications for dispensing with it beyond debate. With respect to the justifications, any reasonable officer would know that he was violating the rule if he did not have reasonable suspicion that knocking and announcing would be dangerous or futile or that it would inhibit effective investigation of the crime. . . The rule and the justifications are therefore clearly established. . .Any reasonable officer would understand that, because the knock-and-announce rule serves to alert the occupants of a home of an impending lawful intrusion, the futility justification requires reasonable suspicion that the occupants of the home to be searched are already aware of the officer's presence. The Fifth Circuit's decision in Seelig and the Supreme Court's decisions in Wilson and Richards gave Wade the 'fair warning' that the law requires. . . Although the law in our circuit is not flush with cases explaining specific circumstances in which officers were or were not entitled to rely on the futility justification, the knock-and-announce rule and its accompanying reasonable suspicion requirement are clear. In light of the materiality of the genuine issues of fact regarding whether Wade violated clearly established Fourth Amendment rights when he entered the Trents' home without knocking or announcing his presence, the district court was correct to deny qualified immunity on this ground. The remaining fact issues must be resolved at trial."), pet. for reh'g en banc denied, 2015 WL 5432089 (5th Cir. Sept. 14, 2015)

Wilkerson v. Goodwin, 774 F.3d 845, 858 (5th Cir. 2014) ("The Wade Defendants contend that, despite subsequent developments in the law, they were objectively reasonable in relying on the assumption in Wilkerson I that a liberty interest could not arise from an initial classification, regardless of the duration or indefiniteness of Woodfox's solitary confinement. . . However, the law did not freeze with the decision in Wilkerson I in 2003. As we have said, prior to the 2010 transfer of Woodfox, both our court and the Supreme Court had recognized that even if an initial security classification does not generally implicate a liberty interest, such an interest may arise where an initial classification is also attended by 'extraordinary circumstances,' that is, an 'atypical and significant hardship.'. . .Woodfox was subjected to the sort of 23–hour–a–day in-cell confinement, limited physical exercise, limited human contact, and effectively indefinite placement that gave rise to a liberty interest in Wilkinson. Any differences between the Supermax conditions in Wilkinson and the CCR conditions at Wade are insufficient to render reasonable the conclusion that there is no liberty interest here. . . .In the circumstances of this case, no reasonable prison official could conclude that continuing four decades in indefinite solitary confinement would not implicate a liberty interest protected by due process.")

Gibson v. Kilpatrick, 773 F.3d 661, 667-73 (5th Cir. 2014) ("Lane seems to us to be an application of prior Supreme Court precedent. It was, after all, undisputed in Lane that 'Lane's ordinary job responsibilities did not include testifying in court proceedings.'. . Garcetti had indicated that the mere fact that speech concerns information learned while performing official job duties does not preclude First Amendment protection. . . More fundamentally, the Court's reasoning in Pickering indicated that the high value of public employees' contributions to civic discourse often derives from the knowledge they gain from their public employment, . . . a premise that was reiterated in Garcetti . . . . Given that precedent, Lane does not appear to have altered the standard for whether public employees speak pursuant to their official duties, but appears rather to be an application of *Garcetti'*s rule. Yet three aspects of the Lane opinion merit discussion, as they appear to offer the prospect of new law. The first is *Lane'*s injection of the word 'ordinary' into the 'pursuant to official duties' test. . . . The second is Lane's discussion of the importance of public-employee speech in ferreting out public corruption. The third is Lane's discussion of the affirmative legal obligation to testify truthfully in reasoning that the speech at issue was speech as a citizen. . . . Whatever may come of Lane's use of the 'ordinary' modifier, at this point it likely has not altered the rule in Garcetti, at least not in any way that can be said to be clearly established. It was undisputed in Lane that the employee had not spoken pursuant to his official duties. . . . As such, there was no occasion for the Court to refine the standard for determining when an employee speaks pursuant to his official duties. Therefore, whatever change in the jurisprudence 'ordinary' may augur, we are unable to discern any change in Garcetti's rule from Lane applicable to this case, for any change resulting from Lane cannot be said to have been ' "clearly established" at the time of the challenged conduct.' Al–Kidd, 131 S.Ct. at 2080 (emphasis added). Second, we turn to *Lane'*s discussion of the context of public corruption and its impact on whether the speech in that case was protected by the First Amendment. *Lane'*s discussion of whether the plaintiff spoke as a citizen or as an employee concludes by addressing the necessity of public-employee whistleblowing in stemming public corruption. . . . We doubt that this discussion means that speech is 'as a citizen' whenever public corruption is involved, as that could conflict with the opinion in Garcetti. . . . In Lane, it was undisputed that the employee was not speaking as part of his ordinary job duties. . . The testimony of public-employees is frequently necessary to prosecute public corruption. But it cannot be said to be strictly necessary that they be speaking pursuant to their official duties when they testify in order to prosecute public corruption. As such, it cannot be said that *Lane'*s discussion of public corruption alters Garcetti in a way that is clearly established for purposes of this case. Lastly, we must confront *Lane'*s discussion of the legal obligation to testify truthfully and its relation to classifying speech as citizen-speech. . . . Lane. . . relied upon an independent legal obligation to tell the truth. . . Citing this discussion in Lane, Gibson points to 18 U.S.C. § 4 and Roberts v. United States, 445 U.S. 552, 557–58 (1980), as establishing a similar duty of citizens to affirmatively report crime. But any such independent legal obligation is only relevant if Gibson was speaking pursuant to his official duties; otherwise, his speech would be outside of Garcetti's ambit regardless. And, fatally, if Gibson was speaking pursuant to his official duties and was under an independent legal obligation as a citizen to report crime, it would raise the question that Lane expressly declined to answer, that is, whether there are obligations as a citizen that preempt obligations as an employee for First Amendment purposes. . . As such, we could not say that such a right was 'clearly established' at the time Gibson was allegedly retaliated against. Therefore, we turn to the central issue—whether Gibson was acting pursuant to his official duties in reporting Kilpatrick's use of the gas card to outside agencies. In making that inquiry, one of the factors that we have considered is whether the employee's complaint was made within the chain of command or to an outside actor, such as a different government agency or the media. . . . [W]hen an employee's official duties include communicating with outside agencies or the press, it would be in dissonance with Garcetti to conclude that, when he does so, he enjoys First Amendment protection. . . Further, where, as here, the employee is reporting the misconduct of his supervisor, an outside agency may be the most appropriate entity to which to report the misconduct. . . In turning to the instant case, we cannot say that Kilpatrick's reprimanding Gibson for reporting the illegal use of the gas card to outside agencies violated Gibson's clearly established constitutional rights. Gibson was the Chief of Police for the city, indicating that communicating with outside law enforcement agencies was part of his job responsibilities. The presumption is buttressed by Gibson's admission that he reported his concerns about the gas card to law enforcement officers at the outside agencies whom he had met through his official duties. It is also supported by his statement in a letter to the Mayor and Board of Aldermen that he worked with the FBI and DEA as part of his role as Chief of Police. Further, Gibson's statutory duties provide additional support to the notion that he was acting pursuant to his official duties. . . . While we cannot, and do not, rely on official job descriptions, even statutory ones, in applying Garcetti's rule, they can be instructive. . . . Moreover, the facts of this case make plain that Gibson was acting pursuant to his official duties when he made the reports to the OSA. For Gibson did not merely make a report to the OSA on his personal time after work. He met with the investigator in his office, he coordinated his department's resources with the OSA, and he instructed his employees to aid extensively in the investigation. All of this is compelling circumstantial evidence that Gibson reported the misuse of the gas card not as a citizen, but in his official capacity as Chief of Police. . . . The fact that what was being reported in this case was public corruption does not change the result—Garcetti's rule is a broad one, and it must be applied even where it may lead to a potentially distasteful result in an individual case. As such, any reprimand based on Gibson's reports to the OSA cannot be said to violate his clearly established constitutional rights. Similarly, reprimanding Gibson for his report to the Attorney General would not have violated his clearly established First Amendment rights. Gibson communicated his concerns about the gas card at the 'Chief of Police Conference' to the Mississippi Attorney General in person. He spoke with the Attorney General and others who were with him for about twenty minutes. Given that Gibson was attending a chief of police conference when he met with the Attorney General and expressed his concerns, it would not have been objectively unreasonable for Kilpatrick to believe Gibson made the report while performing his official duties. To the extent that additional facts could show that Gibson was not acting pursuant to his official duties when he made his report to the Attorney General, Gibson has failed to meet his burden of producing evidence sufficient to show that Kilpatrick violated his clearly established constitutional rights. . . The reports to the FBI and DEA present a closer case. Gibson made a call to an FBI agent that he had met through his law enforcement work. He then met with two FBI agents, including the agent he already knew, at schools in Drew rather than at his office. He testified that he believed his report to the FBI was confidential. He also made his initial complaint to the DEA via telephone, then met with DEA agents, and agents from other federal law enforcement agencies, at the DEA office in Oxford, Mississippi, again not at his office in Drew. Gibson testified that he believed his report to the DEA was also confidential. Gibson did, however, testify that he had previously met the agents he contacted at the FBI and the DEA through his official duties. Further, he stated in a letter to the Mayor and Board of Aldermen that he generally worked with outside agencies, including the DEA and FBI, 'to help with crimes within the city of Drew.' Additional facts could elucidate Gibson's role when he made his complaints in this case. Whether he spoke with the agents during working hours, whether he was in uniform, and whether he offered the assistance of local law enforcement would all be instructive as to whether he acted pursuant to his official duties. But those facts are not present in the record, and, there being no genuine dispute as to the facts, we take record as it is. Given the lack of evidence clarifying Gibson's role when he made his reports to the FBI and the DEA, we hold that Gibson has not met his burden of producing evidence sufficient to show that Kilpatrick violated his clearly established constitutional rights, and, as such, summary judgment should have been granted for Kilpatrick. . . We do not hold that, as the Chief of Police, any report of criminal activity Gibson made to outside agencies was part of his official duties. We hold only that Gibson has adduced insufficient evidence here to meet his burden of producing evidence showing that his reports here were made as a citizen rather than in his official capacity. He has therefore failed to come forward with evidence showing that his clearly established constitutional rights were violated. As such, Gibson's communications to the outside agencies in this case are distinguishable from previous cases in which we have held that communications outside the chain of command are speech as a citizen. Therefore, we cannot say that reprimanding Gibson for reporting violations of the law to outside law enforcement agencies violated his clearly established constitutional rights.")

Stephen F. Austin State Univ., 767 F.3d 462, 472, 473 (5th Cir. 2014) ("Garcetti alone may not 'clearly establish' Cutler's First Amendment right. Garcetti did not 'articulate a comprehensive framework for defining the scope of an employee's duties in cases where there is room for serious debate.'. . After all, Garcetti 'did not explicate what it means to speak pursuant to one's official duties, although we do know that a formal job description is not dispositive ... [,] nor is speaking on the subject matter of one's employment.'. .Several pre–2010 decisions have, however, given the Defendants the 'fair warning' they need. [discussing cases] These cases should have provided Defendants with a clear warning that terminating Cutler on the basis of his speech to Rep.

Gohmert's office—based on the undisputed facts and taking all reasonable inferences in Cutler's favor—would violate Cutler's First Amendment right. Assuming that Cutler's account of his conversations with Rep. Gohmert's office is credible, as we must do, Cutler's speech was made externally to a staff member of an 'elected representative[ ] of the people' allegedly about participating in an event that was not within his job requirements. . .. Cutler spoke about concerns entirely unrelated to his job and from a perspective that did not depend on his job as a university employee, but rather emanated from his views as a citizen. . . Therefore, reasonable officials in the Defendants' position should have known on the basis of Charles and Davis that Cutler's speech was protected as the speech of a citizen and that their decision to terminate Cutler on the basis of that citizen speech would violate Cutler's First Amendment right.")

U.S. ex rel. Parikh v. Brown, 13-41088, 2014 WL 3906268, *3, *4 (5th Cir. Aug. 11, 2014) ("Properly focused on the claim for payment here, the relevant pleading that we have taken as true is that Appellants knew their compliance certification was false. The key question, then, is whether the contours of the FCA were sufficiently clear at the time such that every reasonable official would have understood that—as Relators pleaded in their complaint—presenting claims for payment, while knowingly falsely certifying compliance with the AKS and Stark Law, violated the FCA. . . Based on circuit precedent, we answer in the affirmative. . . . In light of our decision in Thompson, every reasonable official would understand that the FCA is violated when (1) 'the government has conditioned payment of a claim upon a claimant's certification of compliance with, for example, a statute or regulation,' and (2) the official 'falsely certifies compliance with that statute or regulation.'. . This clearly established statutory right is precisely what Relators alleged Appellants to have violated. Accordingly, we hold that as a matter of law Brown and Campbell are not entitled to qualified immunity.")

Morgan v. Swanson, 755 F.3d 757, 761, 762 (5th Cir. 2014) (per curiam) ("Morgan argues that his right to distribute religious material is clearly established because 'regardless of forum, viewpoint discrimination regarding private speech is unconstitutional.' This assertion is generally true. Yet such a broad generalization is exactly the kind of proposition that will not suffice for the purposes of qualified immunity analysis, as it simply does not provide the official with any sense of what is permissible under a certain set of facts. . . . When asked at oral argument to name a case that clearly establishes Morgan's right to distribute the religious gifts, Morgan pointed to Chiu v. Plano Indep. Sch. Dist., 260 F.3d 330 (5th Cir.2001). Yet the case is inapposite. Chiu dealt with after-school meetings whose express purpose was to allow adults to discuss mathematics instruction. . . This Court held that-regardless of whether the meetings were properly classified as public forum or limited public forum-school officials could not prohibit the plaintiffs from distributing material related to certain curriculum options. . . It is difficult to imagine how Chiu establishes a specific rule applicable to this case. The present case does not involve an individual trying to contribute relevant materials to a public forum dedicated to adult dialogue. Instead, a parent asked whether he could distribute religious material during a classroom activity. So while Chiu may indeed be relevant in discerning the nature and extent of Morgan's rights in the classroom, the case does not itself establish those rights, and its radically different factual context renders Chiu incapable of providing any meaningful guidance to an educator trying to handle First Amendment concerns arising out of a third-grade party. . . .After carefully considering Morgan's arguments, we find that he has not identified any case clearly establishing the constitutional right asserted here. Nor are we aware of such a case. Where there is no authority recognizing an asserted right, and where the area of law is as 'abstruse' and 'complicated' as First Amendment jurisprudence, that right cannot be clearly established for the purposes of qualified immunity analysis. . . Accordingly, Morgan's allegations are not sufficient to overcome Swanson's qualified immunity defense. His claim is therefore properly dismissed.")

Castro v. Cabrera, 742 F.3d 595, 599-602 (5th Cir. 2014) ("Before addressing qualified immunity, we decide the threshold question whether the Fourth Amendment applies to these detainees. As a general matter, it applies to aliens within U.S. territory. . .In Verdugo–Urquidez, however, the Court held, 494 U.S. at 261, that it does not apply to the search and seizure of nonresident aliens on foreign soil. . . Moreover, excludable aliens that have been denied entry into the United States, even when technically within U.S. territory, may be 'treated, for constitutional purposes, as if stopped at the border.'. .That is the doctrine of 'entry fiction,' which is applied to excludable aliens regarding the constitutionality of indefinite detention and, more specifically, the applicability of substantive and procedural due process rights under the Fifth Amendment. . . There are limitations to our application of entry fiction. In Lynch, we specifically confined it to the contexts of immigration and deportation and held that it 'does not limit the right of aliens detained within the United States territory to humane treatment.'. .For purposes of this exception, we have interpreted 'humane treatment' as being denied only in those cases involving 'gross physical abuse.' . .Therefore, if these detainees are excludable aliens stopped before entry into the United States and their claims arise in the context of immigration, the entry fiction applies and there is no violation of the Fourth Amendment. If, however, they were subject to wanton or malicious infliction of pain or gross physical abuse, the doctrine does not apply, and we consider whether Cabrera was entitled to qualified immunity. . .The detainees, however, were detained as excluded aliens for varying amounts of time—all ten hours or less—as their admissibility was being determined, a situation well within the immigration context. Additionally, neither of the claims involve physical abuse, let alone 'gross physical abuse' as in Lynch or Martinez–Aguero. Therefore, these claims fall squarely within the confines of entry fiction, and the Fourth Amendment is not applicable; the detention did not violate constitutional rights. . .and the district court properly dismissed these claims under Rule 12(b)(6). . . . Lastly, we decide whether the entry fiction applies to the detainees' Fourth Amendment claim of excessive force through the use of harsh interrogation techniques. Although we held in Lynch and Martinez–Aguero that the entry fiction did not apply to the excessive-force claims under, respectively, the Fifth and Fourth Amendments, we did so because the fiction does not apply to 'gross physical abuse at the hands of state or federal officials.'. . The present detainees do not allege any physical contact but make bare assertions of 'threats, insults, and false statements.' These accusations, without any allegation of conduct that could be considered 'gross physical abuse' or the wanton or malicious infliction of pain, do not meet our standard for avoiding application of the entry fiction. . Therefore, the fiction applies to the Fourth Amendment claim, which was properly dismissed. . . .Even if they individuals are in fact U.S. citizens, dismissal is proper because Cabrera enjoys qualified immunity, . . . as the district court convincingly discussed in its order of dismissal. The detainees point to no authority clearly establishing that Cabrera's actions in detaining, even for as long as ten hours, individuals who presented facially valid documentation, plus the use of unspecified threats and insults during interrogation, violated the Constitution. . . Instead, the caselaw of the Supreme Court . . . and of this circuit, . . .as well as federal regulations, . . . are to the contrary. Therefore, the claims of any of the detainees who might be U.S. citizens were properly dismissed.")

Marquez v. Garnett, 567 F. App'x 214, 217, 218 (5th Cir. 2014) ("Stripped of multiple conclusory statements in the amended complaint, the allegation here is that the student was sliding Garnett's compact disc across a table during class time and Garnett reacted. As in Fee and Moore, the setting is pedagogical, and C.M.'s action was unwarranted. The inference must be that Garnett acted to discipline C.M., even if she may have overreacted. . . Because Marquez's pleadings demonstrate corporal punishment rather than a mere attack, the only remaining question is the sufficiency of state remedies. The parties do not dispute that, as we found in Fee and Moore, Texas provides criminal and civil remedies to parents like Marquez. . . In this case, Garnett was charged in state court with assault causing bodily injury, was placed on administrative leave, and was required to surrender her teaching certificate in response to her conduct. Marquez has not shown that C.M.'s substantive due process rights were violated . . .Fifth Circuit law squarely forecloses Marquez's claim against Garnett. Accordingly, she was entitled to qualified immunity.")

Estate of C.A. v. Castro, 547 F. App'x 621, 2013 WL 6155819, *4 (5th Cir. Nov. 25, 2013) ("In addition to the Agwuokes' failure to make out a cognizable constitutional violation, Castro and Coronado are entitled to qualified immunity because the right at issue was not clearly established. The Agwuokes claim that the individual defendants did more than fail to protect C.A. from the inherent dangers of swimming pool: they planned and approved a school project that placed students in a dangerous environment, and did so in a manner that disregarded reasonable and legally required safety measures. . . . Applying this case's facts to the standard set forth in al-Kidd and Kinney, the Agwuokes would need to demonstrate that reasonable teachers and school officials were on notice that designing and executing a high school science experiment involving a pool violated the constitutional right to life of any student that may drown. The Agwuokes do not identify 'controlling authority—or a robust consensus of persuasive authority—that defines the contours of the right in question with a high degree of particularity.'. . Instead, they note merely that C.A. had a 'right to life' under the Fourteenth Amendment, which the individual defendants allegedly violated through their deliberately indifferent conduct. This falls short of the requirement to show 'defendants' actions were objectively unreasonable in light of the law that was clearly established at the time of the actions complained of.'. . We hold that, even assuming a constitutional violation, the individual defendants were not on notice that their conduct violated a clearly established constitutional right because no case has found a violation under similar facts.")

McCreary v. Richardson, 738 F.3d 651, 658, 659 (5th Cir. 2013) ("Strip searches have been upheld as constitutional even when conducted in non-private areas in the presence of non-essential personnel, see Elliott, 38 F.3d at 190–92, or on male prisoners in the presence of female officers, see Letcher, 968 F.2d at 510; Tasby v. Lynaugh, 123 F. App'x 614, 615 (5th Cir.2005). Given the present case law in this circuit, we are not prepared to say that a reasonable officer would believe that a public strip search conducted by a male officer on a male offender in the presence of females after an equally public disruption was contrary to clearly established law. Precedent does not clearly establish that a reasonable officer could not perform the strip search in the most efficient manner possible without abandoning his post—the location where the incident occurred. . . Richardson accordingly deserves qualified immunity relating to Fourth Amendment claims concerning the public nature of the strip search.") Wyatt v. Fletcher, 718 F.3d 496, 503-06, 508-10 (5th Cir. 2013) ("Under the Fifth Circuit standard, the doctrine of qualified immunity protects government officials from civil damages liability when they reasonably could have believed that their conduct was not barred by law, and immunity is not denied unless existing precedent places the constitutional question beyond debate. . . When deciding whether the right allegedly violated was 'clearly established,' the court asks whether the law so clearly and unambiguously prohibited the conduct that every reasonable official would understand that what he is doing violates the law. . . Answering in the affirmative requires the court to be able to point to 'controlling authority—or a robust consensus of persuasive authority—that defines the contours of the right in question with a high degree of particularity.'. . This requirement establishes a high bar. When there is no controlling authority specifically prohibiting a defendant's conduct, the law is not clearly established for the purposes of defeating qualified immunity. . . .The Fifth Circuit has never held that a person has a constitutionally-protected privacy interest in her sexual orientation, and it certainly has never suggested that such a privacy interest precludes school authorities from discussing with parents matters that relate to the interests of their children. . . Therefore, when the magistrate judge in this case held that there is a constitutional right that bars the unauthorized disclosure by school coaches of a student's sexual orientation to the student's mother, he proclaimed a new rule of law. . . .In summary, then, when we consider ACLU of Miss. and Fadjo, neither is established—much less clearly established—authority for the claims presented here. It is of major significance that neither occurred in the context of public schools' relations with their students and the students' parents. We therefore hold there is no controlling Fifth Circuit authority—certainly not with 'sufficient particularity'—showing a clearly established Fourteenth Amendment privacy right that prohibits school officials from communicating to parents information regarding minor students' interests, even when private matters of sex are involved. . . . In our case today, the trial court cited other cases from outside the circuit on its way to denying summary judgment to the coaches. Perhaps the most salient distinguishing factor in all these cases is that none occurred in a school context; together, they establish only the simple and unsurprising proposition that individuals generally can have a privacy interest in some personal 'sexual matters,' a broad, general proposition with which we do not take issue. . . None of these cases approximate the factual context we have before us, and none of them provide any guidance regarding the crucial question: whether a student has a privacy right under the Fourteenth Amendment that forbids school officials from discussing student sexual information during meetings with parents. . . In sum, then, we hold that Wyatt has not alleged a clearly established constitutional right—drawn either from the Supreme Court's jurisprudence, from our own precedent or from that of other circuits—that the coaches violated . . . .To summarize our opinion today: we hold that the magistrate judge erred in denying Newell and Fletcher summary judgment on the claims of qualified immunity. It was error because there is no Supreme Court or Fifth Circuit case that clearly establishes or even suggests that a high school student has a Fourth Amendment right that bars the student from being questioned by coaches in a locker room or a Fourteenth Amendment right to privacy that bars a teacher or coach from discussing the student's private matters with the student's parents. Fletcher and Newell were entitled to qualified immunity for this suit with respect to the federal claims, because, based on undisputed facts, there was no violation of a clearly established federal right.")

Wyatt v. Fletcher, 718 F.3d 496, 513, 514 (5th Cir. 2013) (Graves, J., dissenting) ("At least five other circuits have recognized a right of privacy regarding personal sexual matters. [collecting cases] Based on the applicable case law set out above, there clearly exists a right to privacy regarding one's sexual orientation. The findings of the United States Supreme Court and six Circuit Courts of Appeal (including the 5th) that information of a sexual nature is intrinsically private is more than a 'simple and unsurprising proposition.' Additionally, the school context does not defeat the very existence of a right, but rather comes into play with regard to a balancing test and whether the government's interest outweighs a student's privacy right.")

Waganfeald v. Gusman, 674 F.3d 475, 486 (5th Cir. 2012) ("There is no doubt that Appellees suffered terribly while held in custody after Hurricane Katrina struck New Orleans. It is equally clear, however, that (1) Gusman's failure to release Appellees falls within the emergency exception to the rule that a probable cause determination must be made within 48 hours, and (2) Hunter's failure to allow Appellees to use cell phones was not objectively unreasonable in light of any clearly established law. We therefore reverse and vacate the judgment of the district court, and remand with instructions to enter judgment in favor of Gusman and Hunter on all claims asserted by Appellees.")

Bishop v. Arcuri, 674 F.3d 456, 466, 467 (5th Cir. 2012) ("In sum, neither Arcuri's concerns for evidence preservation nor for officer safety amounted to reasonable suspicion based on particular facts, so exigent circumstances did not justify his team's no-knock entry of Appellants' home. The entry therefore violated Appellants' Fourth Amendment rights. . . . Having concluded that the no-knock entry led by Arcuri violated Appellants' Fourth Amendment right to be free from unreasonable searches, we now turn to the second prong of qualified-immunity analysis: whether Arcuri's conduct was objectively unreasonable under established law. . . .At the time of the search, the Supreme Court's unanimous decision in Richards rejecting a blanket exception to the knock-and-announce requirement for narcotics searches had been on the books for twelve years. As discussed above, Arcuri's proffered justifications for his team's no-knock entry—evidence preservation and officer safety—were based primarily on generalities rather than particularized suspicion, and his position is therefore virtually indistinguishable from the type of blanket rule repudiated in Richards. Moreover, multiple decisions of this circuit, and of the Texas state courts [footnote omitted] have reinforced the applicability of the knock-and-announce requirement to searches indistinguishable from the one conducted on Appellants' home. Arcuri's no-knock entry of Appellants' home, based only on generalized concerns about evidence preservation and officer safety, violated clearly established law and was therefore unreasonable. . .Because the rights violated by Arcuri's team were well-established at the time of the raid, Arcuri's actions were unreasonable, and he is not entitled to qualified immunity.")

Cantrell v. City of Murphy, 666 F.3d 911, 921 (5th Cir. 2012) ("Taking the allegations in the Cantrells' complaint as true, we conclude that they have failed to satisfy their burden of demonstrating the inapplicability of the Officers' qualified immunity defense. In their brief, they fail to cite any cases involving sufficiently similar situations that would have provided reasonable officers with notice that they had an affirmative constitutional duty to provide medical care and protection to a young child [who was strangled when he became entangled in a soccer net] when they temporarily physically separate the child from his mother. While the Cantrells analogize to cases involving foster care in arguing that Matthew's putative right was clearly established, this line of cases is materially distinguishable, and therefore could not have provided reasonable officials in the Officers' position with notice that they had an affirmative constitutional duty to provide medical care and protection to Matthew. Stated differently, Matthew's asserted right was not clearly established on October 2, 2007.")

Juarez v. Aguilar, 666 F.3d 325, 336 (5th Cir. 2011) ("Appellants have not shown their entitlement to qualified immunity at this stage of the proceedings. Appellee's retaliation claim is straightforward. He alleges that because he informed the FBI of illegal activities, the Appellants entered into an agreement not to extend Appellee's contract. Assuming Appellee's allegations are true, . . . such conduct would fall well within the clearly established elements of retaliation in violation of Appellee's First Amendment rights. With respect to the issues we can consider on this appeal, the only distinction between this case and the previous cases we have decided is the fact that Appellants did not formally vote when making the alleged adverse employment decision. That this court has not previously considered an identical fact pattern does not mean that a litigant's rights were not clearly established. . . As long as the officials received fair notice that their conduct violated the litigant's rights, the right was clearly established. . . In this case, it would have been unreasonable for the Appellants to believe that the absence of a formal vote would absolve them of liability. As we explained above, the conclusion that informal actions can result in liability follows clearly from the precedent of this court and the Supreme Court. This was sufficient to provide Appellants with fair notice that even an informal decision to retaliate against Appellee would violate Appellee's First Amendment rights. Accordingly, the district court did not err when it denied summary judgment on Appellants' qualified immunity defense.")

Morgan v. Swanson, 659 F.3d 359, 371, 372 (5th Cir. 2011) (en banc) (opinion of Benevides, J.) ("Before discussing the substantive law in this case, we turn to first principles to guide our determination of what it means for the law to be 'clearly established.'. . .Where no controlling authority specifically prohibits a defendant's conduct, and when the federal circuit courts are split on the issue, the law cannot be said to be clearly established. This is true even when the circuit split developed after the events in question. . . . The Supreme Court's admonition in Al-Kidd that we should not 'define clearly established law at a high level of generality' sits in tension with its earlier statement in Hope v. Pelzer that 'general statements of the law are not inherently incapable of giving fair and clear warning,' at least in a certain category of 'obvious' cases. In Hope, the Court noted that the general Eighth Amendment prohibition against the unnecessary and wanton infliction of pain 'arguably' gave the defendants 'fair warning' that it was unconstitutional to strip a prisoner shirtless and chain him to a hitching post (a painful stress position) for seven hours in the Alabama sun. But the Court's suggestion that generalizations can sometimes clearly establish the law was dicta; the Court did not rest its qualified-immunity decision on such a broad statement. It relied instead on binding circuit precedent prohibiting extremely similar conduct, including 'handcuffing inmates to the fence and to cells for long periods of time.'. . .The Al-Kidd Court, in admonishing lower courts 'not to define clearly established law at a high level of generality,' did not discuss or even cite Hope, nor other earlier opinions reflecting a similar concern that a damages remedy be available for 'obvious' or flagrant constitutional violations. This silence is puzzling given that Al-Kidd reversed a Ninth Circuit decision denying immunity in reliance on Hope. Adding to the perplexity is that, in its next major 'clearly established' opinion after Hope, the Supreme Court granted qualified immunity because there were no cases that 'squarely govern[ed].' That said, this case does not call on us to decide whether the Court's statements in Hope survive Al-Kidd: the constitutional issue in this case is far from 'beyond debate,' as evidenced by a large body of oft-conflicting case law and the variety of opinion among members of this Court. We leave for another day the question of whether and when a constitutional violation may be so 'obvious' that its illegality is clear from only a generalized statement of law." [footnotes omitted])

Morgan v. Swanson, 659 F.3d 359, 391-94 (5th Cir. 2011) (en banc) (opinion of Dennis, J., specially concurring in parts and not joining in other parts) ("I . . . do not join fully in Part IV.A of Judge Benavides' opinion because I disagree with one of its premises in discussing clearly established law. Specifically, I disagree with the blanket statement that 'generalizations and abstract propositions are not capable of establishing the law.'. . . [T]he Hope Court reversed the court of appeals not only because it reached the wrong result on qualified immunity based on prior circuit precedent, but also because it had wrongly applied the 'materially similar' standard in reaching that result. Indeed, the Court first held that the fair warning standard from Lanier should be used to evaluate whether the defendants were entitled to qualified immunity, and then applied that standard to conclude that they were. . . .Therefore, the Court's pronouncements on the fair and clear warning standard were an essential part of its holding in Hope. Moreover, in the years since Hope, the Supreme Court has reaffirmed this principle. . . . The Supreme Court's recent decisions in Camreta v. Greene, 131 S.Ct. 2020 (2011), and Ashcroft v. al-Kidd, 131 S.Ct. 2074 (2011), do not overrule Hope, Lanier, or any case in that line. In fact, the majority in neither al-Kidd nor Camreta mentions them, and Justice Kennedy's concurrence in al-Kidd cites Lanier affirmatively as supporting the 'fair and clear warning' rule. . . . In sum, pursuant to the line of cases described above, I believe that certain official conduct may so obviously fall within the prohibition of a general or abstract rule of the Constitution that any reasonable official would have 'fair warning' that his actions are unconstitutional, even absent a prior court decision to that effect. However, I agree with Judge Benavides that this case does not present a situation where the defendants had fair warning that their actions were unconstitutional, for substantially the reasons given by Judge Benavides in his opinion.")

Swindle v. Livingston Parish School Bd., 655 F.3d 386, 401 (5th Cir. 2011), reh'g en banc denied, 662 F.3d 328 (5th Cir. 2011) ("[I]t has been clear since Goss that when state law directs local authorities to provide public education, a student's 'total exclusion from the educational process' must be accompanied by the procedural protections required by the Due Process Clause. . . In Nevares and Harris, this court made clear that no deprivation of the liberty and property interests associated with public education occurs when a student is removed from her regular school environment and transferred to an alternative education program. . . In a disciplinary alternative education model like those in Nevares in Harris–and like the Louisiana statutory scheme at issue here. . . a student's expulsion from her regular school does not deny her access to the educational process, because she continues to receive a public education in the form of alternative programming. . . Under these decisions, a constitutionally relevant deprivation occurs when an official denies a student access to alternative education to which she has an entitlement based on state law . . . . We conclude that these 'precedents ... placed ... beyond debate,' [citing Ashcroft v. Al-Kidd] the question of whether procedural due process safeguards had to be complied with in connection with Pope's refusal to permit Morgan access to alternative education.")

Good v. Curtis, 601 F.3d 393, 400-02 (5th Cir. 2010) ("In the instant case, Curtis is alleged to have intentionally secured a false identification that produced a wrongful conviction in retaliation for a suspect's failure to cooperate in an unrelated matter–a Malley 'knowing violation of the law.'. . . In keeping with Geter I and II, we conclude that knowing efforts to secure a false identification by fabricating evidence or otherwise unlawfully influencing witnesses constitutes a violation of the due process rights secured by the Fourteenth Amendment. A plaintiff need not undertake the impossible task of satisfying the Brathwaite test where an officer's intentional conduct was designed to artificially produce precisely the sort of witness certainty that otherwise justifies the admission of suggestive lineups and the criminal defendant has been exonerated in the meantime. Moreover, we find that any reasonable official would know that framing an individual for a crime they did not commit by securing such an identification represents a constitutional violation. Accordingly, the appeal must be dismissed on his Fourteenth Amendment claim. With respect to the Fourth Amendment, Curtis's efforts to secure Good's arrest notwithstanding the fact that Curtis affirmatively knew he manufactured probable cause constituted a clearly established violation of Good's Fourth Amendment rights at the time of the arrest such that the appeal on this claim must also be dismissed.").

Wernecke v. Garcia, 591 F.3d 386, 399, 400 (5th Cir. 2009) ("In the light most favorable to the Werneckes, a reasonable person would not believe that an immediate danger would be posed by JW and JW remaining in the home. Therefore, the Werneckes have asserted a Fourth Amendment violation by Garcia. Although the Werneckes have asserted a constitutional violation, the question whether the applicable law was clearly established remains. The Werneckes argue that the general contours of the Fourth Amendment sufficed to give 'fair warning' to reasonable officials of the alleged unlawfulness of the seizure of the boys. Although '[i]t could plausibly be asserted that any violation of the Fourth Amendment is Aclearly established,"' we recall that 'the right allegedly violated must be defined at the appropriate level of specificity before a court can determine if it was clearly established.'. . Therefore, we must consider the state of the clearly established law in 2005 and whether it gave TDFPS employees 'fair warning that their alleged treatment of [the plaintiffs was] unconstitutional.'. . As of June 1, 2005, Fifth Circuit precedent clearly established that the Fourth Amendment governs social workers' investigations of allegations of child abuse. . .We indicated in Roe v. Texas Department of Protective & Regulatory Services that '[s]ocial workers retain the power to seize a child if Aexigent circumstances" exist; if they Ahave reason to believe that life or limb is in immediate jeopardy," they need not obtain a court order.'. . . The quoted language from Roe, combined with the reference to 'evidence of danger' in Wooley, clearly established that, at the very least, some evidence of imminent danger to a child was required to justify a warrantless seizure. . . Officials do not receive the protection of qualified immunity when 'in the light of pre-existing law the unlawfulness [of the challenged act is] apparent,' and in the light of Roe and Wooley, Garcia's actions (as alleged by the Werneckes) were clearly unlawful. . . . On the facts as stated by the Werneckes, Fifth Circuit law clearly established in June 2005 that the warrantless seizure of the Wernecke boys–in the absence of any imminent danger–was a constitutional violation.").

DePree v. Saunders, 588 F.3d 282, 288 (5th Cir. 2009) ("Because this court has not formally applied Burlington to First Amendment retaliation claims, the interrelation among Harrington, Dorsett, and Burlington yields no 'clearly established law' that Saunders would have known she was violating by revoking DePree's teaching duties and access to the business school. At most, these cases create a fact issue [as] to whether DePree suffered a material adverse employment action. Similarly, no clearly established law dictated that Saunders could not impose discipline, notwithstanding a few references to DePree's 'speech,' in light of the uniform reports about his intimidating and disruptive behavior. In sum, this court cannot conclude that Saunders's action was objectively unreasonable, 'assessed in light of the legal rules that were clearly established at the time it was taken.'").

Brown v. Miller, 519 F.3d 231, 327, 238 (5th Cir. 2008) ("We . . . hold that the deliberate or knowing creation of a misleading and scientifically inaccurate serology report amounts to a violation of a defendant's due process rights, and that a reasonable laboratory technician in 1984 would have understood that those actions violated those rights. The district court did not err in denying qualified immunity on this theory. . . . Brown also alleges that Miller concealed, suppressed, or destroyed lab results that were conclusively exculpatory with respect to Brown. The Supreme Court held in Brady v. Maryland that a criminal prosecutor's failure to disclose exculpatory evidence to a criminal defendant violates a defendant's right to a fair trial. . . A police officer's deliberate concealment of exculpatory evidence violates this same right, and can give rise to liability under § 1983. . . By 1967, a public official's concealment of exculpatory evidence was a constitutional violation in this circuit. . . Therefore, the law was sufficiently clear in 1984 that a state crime lab technician would have known that suppression of exculpatory blood test results would violate a defendant's rights. Miller does not argue otherwise. We therefore hold that the district court did not err in denying the qualified immunity defense on this theory.")

Bolton v. City of Dallas, 472 F.3d 261, 266 (5th Cir. 2006) ("Although we now conclude that ' 5 of the Dallas City Charter creates a vested property right in employment at a former rank for executive-level officials, this decision is not apparent from Muncy. There we were considering a due process claim in the context of demotion, but we stated that executive rank officials are 'employees at will, and the city was free to discharge them without cause.'. . If we are to respect the principle underlying qualified immunity to the effect that officials must be able reasonably to 'anticipate when their conduct may give rise to damages,' we cannot hold an official liable for taking action that was arguably supported by decisions of this court. . . Bolton's claim against Benavides in his personal capacity must be dismissed based on qualified immunity, because reasonable public officials could have differed on whether discharging Bolton would violate his constitutional rights.").

Williams v. Ballard, 466 F.3d 330, 333 (5th Cir. 2006) ("The fundamental question is whether the state of the law gave defendants fair warning that their conduct was unconstitutional. . . Because at the time there was no binding precedent clearly establishing the right, we must determine if other decisions at the time showed 'consensus of cases of persuasive authority such that a reasonable officer could not have believed that his actions were lawful.'. . As the district court noted, in 1998 only the Ninth Circuit had recognized a non-sex offender's right against mandatory sex-offender registration and treatment as a condition of parole, . . . and it unsurprisingly held the law not clearly established . . . .Moreover, another Ninth Circuit panel that same year declined to recognize a non-sex offender's right against registration under a community notification statute as a condition of parole. . . We cannot conclude from this that Williams's right was clearly established.").

Porter v. Ascension Parish School Board, 393 F.3d 608, 620 (5th Cir. 2004) ("Because Adam's drawing was composed off-campus, displayed only to members of his own household, stored off-campus, and not purposefully taken by him to EAHS or publicized in a way certain to result in its appearance at EAHS, we have found that the drawing is protected by the First Amendment. Furthermore, we have found that it is neither speech directed at the campus nor a purposefully communicated true threat. However, a reasonable school official facing this question for the first time would find no 'pre-existing' body of law from which he could draw clear guidance and certain conclusions. Rather, a reasonable school official would encounter a body of case law sending inconsistent signals as to how far school authority to regulate student speech reaches beyond the confines of the campus. Given the unsettled nature of First Amendment law as applied to off-campus student speech inadvertently brought on campus by others, the contours of Adam's right to First Amendment protection in the present case cannot be deemed 'clearly established' such that it would be clear to a reasonable EAHS official that sanctioning Adam based on the content of his drawing was unlawful under the circumstances. Thus, Braud is entitled to qualified immunity. Even if Adam's rights were clearly established at the time of his expulsion, Braud's determination that the drawing was not entitled to First Amendment protection was objectively reasonable. The Supreme Court has observed that, even when a particular legal doctrine is clearly established, '[i]t is sometimes difficult for an [official] to determine how the relevant legal doctrine ... will apply to the factual situation the [official] confronts.' . . The record indicates that, at the time he recommended Adam for expulsion, Braud was aware that Adam was responsible for the drawing, that the drawing was two or three years old, and that the drawing had been brought to Galvez Middle School by Adam's younger brother. These facts raise the subtle but important legal questions of whether the drawing constitutes on-campus speech, or an intentionally communicated threat. Although we have answered both of these queries in the negative, we cannot say that all reasonable school officials facing these circumstances would reach the same conclusion.").

Collins v. Ainsworth, 382 F.3d 529, 544, 545 5th Cir. 2004) ("For essentially the same reasons we find no error in the district court's denial of qualified immunity against Ainsworth on the Fourth Amendment issue, this Court agrees with Plaintiffs. Plaintiffs presented evidence that after failing to dissuade the Concert sponsors from proceeding with their plans for the 2 Live Crew event, Ainsworth chose to erect an indirect (but fully effective) bar in the guise of a facially valid pair of driver's license checkpoints on either side of OPG Road, flanking the only entrance to Collins Field. By setting up these checkpoints to stop the Concert from taking place, Ainsworth abused his discretionary power to deny in advance the use of Collins Field for First Amendment-protected musical expression and association. No procedural safeguards were put in place to prevent censorship of legitimate speech and music. Therefore, we find Ainsworth's use of the driver's license checkpoints amounted to an impermissible prior restraint on the Concert. Most Plaintiffs thus have clearly alleged a constitutional violation by Ainsworth. As to most Plaintiffs, we find under these circumstances that no sheriff could reasonably believe his actions aimed at stopping the Concert were legal and would entitle him to qualified immunity.").

Hart v. Texas Dep't of Criminal Justice, No. 03-40274, 2004 WL 1682757, at *4, *5 (5th Cir. July 26, 2004) (not for publication) ("In fact, the Hope Court's discussion of 'clearly established' constitutional rights casts serious doubt on the continued viability of the rigid standard laid down in Pierce v. Smith and Thompson v. Upshur County. In Hope, the Supreme Court expressly disapproved of Eleventh Circuit precedent requiring that 'the facts of previous cases be 'materially similar' ' to the situation before the reviewing court, explaining that '[t]his rigid gloss on the qualified immunity standard ... is not consistent with our cases.' This is significant because Pierce, the foundation of our own rigid standard on the 'clearly established law' question, itself borrowed that standard from Lassiter v. Alabama A & M University, Board of Trustees–a case specifically noted by the Hope Court as being inconsistent with Supreme Court precedent. Thus, Hope pushes us toward a more general description of the constitutional right at issue both by describing a level of specificity lower than that we have used in the past, and by undermining the case law that originally established the more rigid standard and thereby eroding the foundations of our precedent on this point. It is in this context that we must consider whether the right at issue in the instant case was 'clearly established.' As we must take the facts in the light most favorable to the non-movant, the real question is whether a public official in charge of inmate medical care may ignore system-wide problems–especially when they are repeatedly brought to her attention by another similarly credentialed public official–that threaten the health and safety of inmates, thereby (as Hall has alleged) knowingly, i.e. consciously, pursuing a path of complete inactivity–affirmatively deciding to do nothing– in the face of these problems. We must ask rhetorically whether the more general formulations of the Eighth Amendment right to adequate medical care give 'fair and clear warning' that such inaction is impermissible, despite the 'novel factual circumstances' of the instant case. We think that they do. Were we to define the right at issue as narrowly as Dr. Adams urges, we would, in effect, be freezing the law as it exists today. No plaintiff could ever successfully allege a violation of a constitutional right, as long as the violation was perpetrated in even a slightly new and unusual way. This appears to be exactly the situation about which the Hope Court was concerned." [footnotes omitted]).

Kinney v. Weaver, 367 F.3d 337, 371, 372 (5th Cir. 2004) (en banc) ("While some of the relevant First Amendment retaliation precedents in place in the fall of 1998 involved schools . . . and others of them . . . have involved police departments, we concede that our past cases do not include one that has specifically addressed retaliation against instructors at a police academy. We do not see the absence of such a case as an embarrassment to our conclusion that the Police Officials are not entitled to qualified immunity. If we accepted the defendants' view of what it means for the law to be clearly established, qualified immunity would be available in almost every case, even those cases in which 'in the light of pre-existing law the unlawfulness [was] apparent,' Anderson, 483 U.S. at 640. As the Supreme Court has recently admonished, 'officials can still be on notice that their conduct violates established law even in novel factual circumstances.' Hope, 536 U.S. at 741. Although we are sensitive to the fact that reasonable officials might not always be able to predict the outcome of a balancing test such as that used in Pickering cases, . . . we believe that in this case the illegality of the Police Officials' conduct is sufficiently clear that they can fairly be said to have been on notice of the impropriety of their actions. Indeed, given the factual disputes identified by the district court and taking the plaintiffs' side of those disputes, this case does not require any real balancing at all, for the Police Officials do not have any relevant, legitimate interests to put on their side of the Pickering scales. Our cases show that it is entirely appropriate to deny qualified immunity when the balance of cognizable interests weighs so starkly in the plaintiff's favor.").

Kinney v. Weaver, 367 F.3d 337, 398 (5th Cir. 2004) (en banc) (Jolly, J., dissenting) ("I respectfully dissent and agree with Judges Jones and Barksdale that the defendant law enforcement officers are entitled to qualified immunity and should be released from personal liability. It seems disingenuous to hold that the law is clearly established when it takes 20,467 words to explain, and when six United States Court of Appeals judges sharply disagree about it. To my way of reasoning, the majority has turned the words, and the doctrine, of 'clearly established' on its head when it denies immunity in this novel case.").

Williams v. Kaufman County, 352 F.3d 994, 1007, 1011, 1012 (5th Cir. 2003) ("In sum, Ybarra, Stewart and Watt dispel any doubt that the law was clearly established by the night of the raid in April, 1995, that strip searching individuals, about whom the police had no individualized probable cause of weapon or drug possession, was unlawful. . . .Although we hold today that the prolonged detention of plaintiffs was unlawful, we nonetheless agree with the district court that qualified immunity shields Harris from liability. Even though Summers does not sanction Harris's conduct, neither did it establish a clear rule warning defendants that such conduct was illegal. . . . In the instant case, there is no doubt that the illegal strip search of plaintiffs corrupted the legality of their detention by extending it unnecessarily. Still, the objective unreasonableness of Harris's conduct in ordering a strip search of plaintiffs does not automatically make his conduct in unduly detaining plaintiffs for the duration of the search objectively unreasonable in and of itself. Whereas Ybarra established the clear rule that any full search of plaintiffs required individualized probable cause, Summers allows a seizure without probable cause when the proper balance is struck between law enforcement and personal security interests. Thus, Summers left the state of the law more ambiguous as to what constituted an unlawful detention in a premises search like the one here. In other words, under the law as it existed in April, 1995, Harris had fair warning that his generalized law enforcement safety interests did not justify strip searching plaintiffs; the law was less clear about whether these same interests were sufficient to permit detention of plaintiffs until the completion of the otherwise unlawful search. We agree with the district court's grant of qualified immunity on plaintiffs' unlawful detention claims.")

Barrow v. Greenville ISD, 332 F.3d 844, 848 (5th Cir. 2003) ("Brantley and Fyfe . . . confirm that the constitutional right of public-school employees to select a private-school education for their children was clearly established when Smith refused to consider Barrow for the position of assistant principal. Smith argues that Brantley and Fyfe does not give fair warning to all reasonable officials in his place that refusing to consider Barrow for the assistant principal position would be unconstitutional. Initially, we note that the question whether there was a clearly-established right does not turn on the existence of a court decision determining that conduct identical to that which is at issue here is unlawful.")

Austin v. Johnson, 328 F.3d 204, 210 (5th Cir. 2003) ("Defendants do not dispute the accuracy of Gipson's log, nor its literal interpretation. Before 3:00 p.m., defendants' conduct was perhaps only negligent, but their failure to call an ambulance for almost two hours while John E lay unconscious and vomiting rises to the level of deliberate indifference. Since Estelle v. Gamble . . . state officers have been on notice that deliberate indifference to a prisoner's serious medical needs violates the Eighth Amendment. Defendants' contention that no case has specifically proscribed the withholding of medical treatment for boot camp attendees reads the right too narrowly; officers need only have 'fair warning' that their conduct is unlawful. . . Given the serious medical consequences of dehydration, a reasonable person would not have waited nearly two hours to call an ambulance once John E became unconscious.")

Estep v . Dallas County, Texas, 310 F.3d 353, 360, 361 (5th Cir. 2002) ("Although we have stated that the constitutional right at stake is Estep's right to be free from a vehicle search unless an officer has a reasonable belief that he is in danger, we must further evaluate whether the contours of that right were 'clearly established' in a more particularized way. . . As applied to this case, we must consider whether it is clearly established law that a reasonable officer could not conclude that he was in danger when faced with a citizen who exited the car prior to the approach of the officer, continuously asked why he had been stopped, showed the officer a key chain with mace, possessed camoflauge [sic] gear, and possessed an NRA sticker? There is no Fifth Circuit case which directly addresses whether a reasonable officer could conclude, based on these specific facts, that a citizen posed a danger and could gain immediate control of a weapon. [footnote omitted] However, there does not have to be a case directly on point for the law to be 'clearly established.' . . Our cases make clear that a Long 'frisk' of a vehicle is only constitutional if there are specific, articulable facts from which a reasonable police officer could believe he was in danger. In our view, the constitutional violation in this case is clear-cut and obvious. No reasonable police officer could have really believed that a search was constitutional under the circumstances presented.").

McClendon v. City of Columbia (McClendon II), 305 F.3d 314, 331-33 (5th Cir. 2002) (en banc)("[I]n the instant case we must assess whether those cases from our sister circuits recognizing the existence of a substantive due process right to be free from state-created danger established the contours of that right with sufficient clarity to provide a reasonable officer in Detective Carney's position with fair warning that providing Loftin with a gun would violate McClendon's rights. . . . [W]hile a number of our sister circuits had accepted some version of the state-created danger theory as of July of 1993, given the inconsistencies and uncertainties within this alleged consensus of authorities, an officer acting within the jurisdiction of this court could not possibly have assessed whether his or her conduct violated this right in the absence of explicit guidance from this court or the Supreme Court. . . . [E]ven if a 'consensus' of circuits had adopted some version of the state-created danger theory in July of 1993, this consensus did not at that time establish the contours of an individual's right to be free from state-created danger with sufficient clarity to provide Detective Carney with fair warning that his conduct violated that right.").

McClendon v. City of Columbia (McClendon II), 305 F.3d 314, 341 (5th Cir. 2002) (en banc) (Robert M. Parker, J., joined by Judges Wiener and Harold R. DeMoss, Jr., dissenting) ([T]he majority contends that the numerous cases which had adopted the state-created danger theory by 1993 do not constitute a 'consensus of cases of persuasive authority' on this point of law because slight variations existed among the circuits concerning the level of culpability required to hold the state actor constitutionally liable. This conclusion strikes me as plainly inconsistent with the more liberal approach to the 'clearly established law' inquiry as set forth in Wilson. . . .By July of 1993, a consensus of cases of persuasive authority existed to put reasonable police officers on notice that they may violate the Constitution if (1) they create or increase a danger to a known victim; and (2) act with deliberate indifference towards the known victim during the creation of such danger.").

Roe v. Texas Dep't of Protective and Regulatory Services, 299 F.3d 395, 408-11 (5th Cir. 2002) ("In Hope, the Court recently elaborated on what is required for a particular right to be 'clearly established' in the context of qualified immunity. . . . On July 10, 1999, Supreme Court and Fifth Circuit precedent plainly established the following: (1) A strip or body cavity search raises serious Fourth Amendment concerns, Watt, 849 F.2d at 199; and (2) The Fourth Amendment governs the lawfulness of a social worker's entry into a dwelling to resolve a child custody dispute. Mary and Jackie need not prove that 'the very action in question has previously been held unlawful.' . . We had not, however, ever addressed whether the traditional test or the 'special needs' doctrine applies to a social worker's visual searches of naked juveniles. . . . The Supreme Court's previously vague test for finding a 'special need' caused the federal circuits to diverge over this precise substantive question and to disagree again as to whether the rights were 'clearly established' for purposes of qualified immunity. It is difficult to argue that a matter of law is clearly established for state actors in this circuit where this court has not opined on the issue in question and the other circuits are in disagreement as to whether the challenged acts constitute a constitutional violation. We need not even reach the question whether, or to what extent, the law of other circuits may be relevant to our qualified immunity jurisprudence, in the absence of plain guidance from our own circuit's caselaw, because here the other circuits were inconsistent in their treatment of the rights here alleged. . . . In July 1999, there was insufficient legal guidance, even under the standard enunciated in Hope, to inform a CPS worker that what Strickland did in reaction to the reports received about Jackie's conduct ultimately would be considered a constitutional violation." [footnotes omitted]) .

Thompson v. Upshur County, 245 F.3d 447, 460, 463 (5th Cir. 2001) ("As to the scope of clearly established law, the question is whether an unmarried adult, under no guardianship or finding of incompetency, who is a pretrial detainee at the jail of a small rural county, holding him on transfer from and as accommodation to a larger neighboring county where he is charged and was arrested for DWI, and who while at the smaller county jail becomes delusional and hallucinatory from DTs, has a clearly established constitutional right to have his jailers at the smaller county either force him to submit to medical care for his DTs against his clearly communicated refusal to do so, or make reasonable efforts to locate a substitute decision maker, in lieu of promptly returning him to the custody of the larger county's jail from which he was transferred and which has detoxification facilities the smaller county's jail lacks. . . . In these circumstances, and given the lack of precedent on the matter, we conclude that not all reasonable sheriffs situated similarly to either sheriff Cross or sheriff Tefteller would realize that the United States Constitution required them to have their jail personnel medically trained respecting the likely medical seriousness of an inmate suffering from DTs and the need to have such an inmate promptly receive medical care or respecting the inability of such an inmate to legally or competently refuse medical treatment despite being able to adequately communicate such refusal. The failure of the sheriffs to furnish such training cannot reasonably be analogized to welfare officials selling foster children into slavery . . . , at least not so long as the doctrine of qualified immunity is to retain any significance beyond the strictly aberrational or symbolic. "). (emphasis original)

Brown v. Nationsbank Corp., 188 F.3d 579, 592 (5th Cir. 1999) ("Applying the Lewis analysis to the FBI's alleged activity in this case, we conclude that the FBI made decisions which harmed the Plaintiffs after ample opportunity for cool reflection. In fact, they invested almost two years and thousands of man hours in developing the sting operation. Thus, the due process clause protects the Plaintiffs from any harm that arose from the officers' deliberate indifference. The facts, as pleaded, establish at least that level of federal agent culpability as Operation Lightning Strike evolved into a disastrous boondoggle. We therefore hold that Hodgson's allegations that federal agents inflicted damages on him, an innocent non-target, during this particular undercover operation and refused him compensation states a claim under Bivens. However, because we address today for the first time the parameters of due process protections afforded innocent third parties injured by law enforcement sting operations run amok, and because the Supreme Court's language that drives our analysis appeared in a case decided in 1998, we cannot say that the due process rights claimed by Hodgson were clearly established during 1992- 94. . . . We therefore affirm the district court's dismissal of Hodgson's Bivens claims on the alternative basis of qualified immunity.").

Harris v. Victoria Independent School District, 168 F.3d 216, 224 (5th Cir. 1999) ("The Defendants are not insulated from their unconstitutional conduct merely because a balancing test is involved in our analysis. While employee speech cases are a likely vehicle for varied fact scenarios, the law is clearly established that a 'mix of public and private speech' may be constitutionally protected.").

Petta v. Rivera, 143 F.3d 895, 899, 908, 911-14 (5th Cir. 1998), denying pet. for reh'g and superseding opinion at 133 F.3d 330 (5th Cir. 1998), ("[O]ur review of the record shows that Rivera is entitled to the defense of qualified immunity based on the undisputed fact that the Petta children alleged purely psychological harm as a result of Rivera's actions. At the time of these events, it was not 'clearly established' in our law that such non-physical harm gave rise to a constitutional tort. . . . Between July 5, 1989 and February 25, 1992 . . . Johnson v. Morel was 'clearly established law' regarding an excessive force claim brought under the Fourth Amendment. As we have noted above, this is the relevant 'legal window' within which we must look to determine whether Officer Rivera's actions on January 15, 1990 were 'objectively reasonable.' . . . Our inquiry here is very narrow. We are not asking whether the Petta children's psychological injuries were redressable under the Fourteenth Amendment in January, 1990. We are merely asking whether a § 1983 plaintiff at that time had a clearly established right under the Fourteenth Amendment to be free from purely emotional harm resulting from an officer's use of excessive force. We have already demonstrated . . . that such a right was not clearly established in January, 1990, under the Fourth Amendment. What we hold here is simply that the same right was equally 'unclear' (for qualified immunity purposes) under the Fourteenth Amendment. We do so for essentially two reasons: (1) our cases following Graham v. Connor do not clearly distinguish between Fourth and Fourteenth Amendment analyses in this context; we are thus persuaded that Johnson v. Morel and Dunn v. Denk. . . , although admittedly addressing the Fourth Amendment right, also affected the Fourteenth Amendment right to be free from excessive force; and, (2)

under the particular facts here, we see no principled reason for drawing an analytical distinction between the Petta children's due process claim and an arrestee's Fourth Amendment claim, given the substantially similar concerns implicated by the two claims (e.g., the right to be free from excessive force in an arrest situation and the need for a police officer to use reasonable force in effecting arrests). . . . [O]ur precedents, such as Johnson v. Morel . . . and Dunn v. Denk. . . interjected as much uncertainty into our Fourteenth Amendment jurisprudence as into our Fourth Amendment jurisprudence, regarding whether a purely non-physical injury rose to the level of a constitutional violation. . . . We must therefore hold that in January, 1990, the Petta children had no 'clearly established' constitutional right under the due process clause to be free from a police officer's use of excessive force where the only injuries allegedly suffered were psychological.").

Petta v. Rivera, 133 F.3d 330, 346, 347 (5th Cir.1998) (Dennis, J., dissenting) ("The contours of the right of helpless and innocent bystander children of tender years, such as the Petta children, to be free from potentially lethal assault, such as being fired upon with a .357 magnum, was sufficiently clear on January 15, 1990 that a reasonable official in Rivera's alleged position would have understood that what he was doing violated the Petta children's constitutional rights. Even in the absence of any analogous judicial precedent, a reasonable officer would or should have known that such egregious conduct was unlawfully excessive and unconstitutional. . . . I am persuaded that on January 15, 1990 a reasonable law enforcement officer knew or should have known that to attack a family suburban automobile occupied by an unarmed mother and her three and seven year old children by firing on the vehicle with a .357 magnum, bludgeoning its window, pointing the .357 magnum in the direction of the mother and three year old child while threatening to kill the mother, and other acts of excessive force and violence, in connection with minor traffic violations, was constitutionally impermissible. Rivera's misbehavior was simply too egregious to justify concluding that because of language in cases involving an entirely different context, i.e., the arrest, detention and seizure of adult suspects, offenders or prisoners, a reasonable officer in Rivera's situation would not know or should not know that his actions in assaulting helpless and innocent bystander children with deadly force for no justifiable reason violated the Petta children's Fourteenth Amendment substantive due process constitutional rights and subjected him to liability under § 1983 for their severe psychological damage."), pet. for reh'g denied and opinion superseded by 143 F.3d 895 (5th Cir. 1998). (In the superceding opinion, Judge Dennis adopts his original dissenting opinion. See 143 F.3d at 914)

Gutierrez v. City of San Antonio, 139 F.3d 441, 445-51 (5th Cir. 1998) ("[W]e have jurisdiction to consider the officers' contention that issues of law separable from the merits exist–namely, whether hog-tying violates clearly established law and whether their conduct was objectively reasonable. . . [Defendants] initially argue that the right to be free of hog-tying was not clearly established in November 1994 because neither the Supreme Court nor the Fifth Circuit (or any other circuit) had specifically held that hog-tying constituted excessive force. Such a dogmatic argument is unjustified. . . . [W]e will examine whether a reasonable police officer in November 1994 would have known whether hog-tying falls within the bounds of the Fourth Amendment's prohibition of the use of excessive force 'in the light of pre-existing law.'. . . Although guns represent the paradigmatic example of 'deadly force,' Garner failed to address whether other police tools and instruments can also be characterized as 'deadly force.' Lower courts since have struggled with whether to characterize various police tools and instruments as 'deadly force.' . . . These courts have generally described 'deadly force' as force 'carry[ing] with it a substantial risk of causing death or serious bodily harm.' . . . Although we have not had occasion to adopt this description, both the Texas statute and SAPD procedures in effect in November 1994 employed it. . . The Texas statute and SAPD procedures in effect in November 1994 also conformed to Garner's holding that an officer can use 'deadly force' only against a suspect who poses a threat of death or serious physical harm to the officer or to others. . . Accordingly, we find both the definition of 'deadly force' and Garner's holding to have been clearly established prior to November 1994. . . . The question thus becomes whether hog-tying in these circumstances creates a substantial risk of death or serious bodily injury, and hence, becomes deadly force. . . . Gutierrez thus presents sufficient evidence that hog-tying may create a substantial risk of death or serious bodily injury in these circumstances and thereby become deadly force. . . . Assuming this evidence to be true, hog-tying in these circumstances would have violated law clearly established prior to November 1994. . . . In arguing that their conduct was objectively reasonable, [Defendants] first present the affidavit of Commander Albert Rodriguez, who states that the official policies of the SAPD, the Texas Department of Public Safety, and the International Association of Chiefs of Police Use of Force Model Policy in November 1994 did not prohibit the use of hog-ties. He further avers that SCDS was not known to reasonably well-trained police officers in Texas at that time, and that hog-tying was reasonable under these circumstances. To counterbalance this affidavit, Gutierrez presents that of Lou Reiter, former Deputy Chief of the Los Angeles Police Department, who analyzes the facts of this case and states that [Defendants'] use of force and actions were unreasonable. Claiming that a 'battle of the experts' thus exists, [Defendants] assert that they are entitled to qualified immunity because 'if officers of reasonable competence could disagree on this issue, immunity should be recognized.' [citing Malley v. Briggs] We do not believe that the Supreme Court intended by this statement to mean that summary judgment must be granted in favor of the police whenever they can find an expert to testify that their actions were reasonable; in such a scenario, the police would virtually always win summary judgment. Moreover, an expert's opinion does not establish reasonableness as a matter of law, especially when directly contradicted by another expert's well-supported opinion. . . . [B]ased on the combination of the multiple factual issues in dispute and the evidence weighing against the officers, we cannot determine whether [Defendants'] conduct was objectively reasonable as a matter of law. . . .Accordingly, we dismiss the officers' appeal from the district court's denial of summary judgment on Gutierrez's Fourth Amendment claim for lack of jurisdiction.").

Sorenson v. Ferrie, 134 F.3d 325, 328, 330 n.12 (5th Cir. 1998) ("Sorenson cannot satisfy Siegert's first prong–the need to allege the violation of a clearly established constitutional right–merely by asserting that the right not to be arrested without probable cause is clearly established. Instead, she must show that the legality of her conduct was clearly established. That is to say, she must demonstrate that, at the time of her arrest, it was clearly established in Texas that one may lawfully possess a handgun in one's trunk. . . . We hold only that, for purposes of qualified immunity in this civil case, the law was not clearly established on this question as of the date of this incident. We do not mean to express a view as to whether ' 46.02 does or does not prohibit the possession of a weapon in one's trunk. That is for the state courts to decide.").

Dunn v. Denk, 79 F.3d 401, 402 (5th Cir. 1996) (en banc) ("This is a case controlled by the law applicable from 1989 to 1992, a window created by our decision in Johnson v. Morel, 876 F.2d 477 (5th Cir.1989) (en banc), and Hudson v. McMillian, 503 U.S. 1 (1992), the decision of the Supreme Court effectively overruling it. . . . Given the explicit language of Johnson, and its footnote 1 in particular, we conclude that the law at the time of this arrest was uncertain regarding whether 'a significant injury will be caused by unnecessary force without significant physical injury.' On the present facts, Denk was entitled to qualified immunity from the claims asserted in this case.").

Dunn v. Denk, 79 F.3d 401, 407 (5th Cir. 1996) (en banc) (Reavley, Circuit Judge, joined by Politz, Chief Judge, Wiener, Benavides, Stewart, Parker and Dennis, Circuit Judges, dissenting) ("Once an officer uses objectively unreasonable force to effect an arrest, he loses his qualified immunity, whether the other elements of an excessive force claim are clearly established or not.").

Kiser v. Garrett, 67 F.3d 1166, 1173 (5th Cir. 1995) ("[I]t is apparent that, although a substantive due process right to family integrity has been recognized, the contours of that right are not well-defined, and continue to be nebulous, especially in the context of a state's taking temporary custody of a child during an investigation of possible parental abuse. Even assuming that such a right exists under the circumstances involved here, it certainly was not clearly established when the appellees engaged in the conduct at issue.").

Foster v. City of Lake Jackson, 28 F.3d 425, 430 (5th Cir. 1994) ("[W]e hold that the right of access, as clearly established in 1985-1988, encompassed a right to file an action, but not the right to proceed free of discovery abuses after filing. . . . [E]ven assuming that the contours of the right of access have been expanded since 1988 to include the Fosters' definition, those contours were not clearly established at the time the claimed violations occurred.").

Doe v. Taylor Independent School Dist., 15 F.3d 443, 455 (5th Cir. 1994) (en banc) ("The 'contours' of a student's substantive due process right to be free from sexual abuse and violations of her bodily integrity were clearly established in 1987".).

Doe v. Taylor Independent School Dist., 15 F.3d 443, 465 (5th Cir. 1994) (en banc) (Higginbotham, J., and Politz, J., specially concurring) ("Justice Scalia pointed out in Anderson v. Creighton, [cite omitted] the hazards of framing the legal question at too great a level of generality. The error can be made in the opposite direction–a search so narrowed that legal nuance rises to uncertainty and ultimately confounds common sense. Qualified immunity reflects the judgment that an official ought not to be mulcted for choices made that only later prove to have been 'illegal.' I don't think we today put any school principal in peril or unfairly second guess this one. This was not an episodic act of an interloper to the school scheme nor the private act of a student. Rather, it was the persistent pattern of indefensible conduct of a school official, the principal's subordinate.").

Doe v. Taylor Independent School Dist., 15 F.3d 443, 467 (5th Cir. 1994) (en banc) (Garwood, J., joined by Jones, J., Smith, J., Garza, J., and DeMoss, J., dissenting in part) (finding it not clearly established that the Constitution protects a fifteen-year-old schoolgirl from being sexually fondled and having "consensual" sexual relations with a public schoolteacher.).

Colle v. Brazos County, 981 F.2d 237, 246 (5th Cir. 1993) ("We are persuaded that Sheriff Miller knew of or should have known that if he staffed the jail with persons having no authority to transfer a seriously ill detainee to a hospital, and if he pursued a policy of failing to monitor the critical medical condition of a detainee, these actions would be constitutionally impermissible. If the allegations in Plaintiffs' complaint are true, and they must be accepted as true, Miller should have known that such a policy would result in the deprivation of a detainee's right to reasonable medical care. At this stage of the proceeding, Miller is not entitled to a 12(b)(6) dismissal.").

White v. Taylor, 959 F.2d 539, 546 (5th Cir. 1992) ("...while we think the law was clearly established...that a warrantless misdemeanor arrestee had a right to a prompt determination of probable cause, we hold the contours of that right were not sufficiently clear so that a reasonable law enforcement officer would have known that such a person, arrested late at night in a city without a night magistrate, could not be held overnight before [being taken] before a magistrate.").

Dyer v. Fyall, No. 3:15-CV-2638-B, 2018 WL 2739025, at *9 (N.D. Tex. June 6, 2018) ("The confusion surrounding medical-inattention claims in the Fifth Circuit dooms the Dyers' medical-inattention claim. The officers in this case have qualified immunity, which means the Dyers can hold them liable for violations of only clearly established rights. A right is clearly established only if 'the contours of the right [are] sufficiently clear that a reasonable officer would understand what he is doing violates that right.'. . So, given that some Fifth Circuit cases require plaintiffs to show intent to cause harm in medical-inattention cases and other do not, there is no clearly established right in the Fifth Circuit to be free from medical inattention by officers who do not actually intend to cause harm. Here, the Dyers neither argue nor present evidence that any of the officers in this case actually intended to harm Graham by withholding medical care. Thus, because qualified immunity bars the Dyers' medical-inattention claim, the Court GRANTS the officers' motion for summary judgment on that claim.")

Luna v. Valdez, No. 3:15-CV-3520-D, 2018 WL 684897, at *14-15 (N.D. Tex. Feb. 2, 2018) ("The court concludes that, with respect to Luna's § 1983 claims against Sheriff Valdez based on the County's alleged policy of refusing to release on bail inmates with an immigration hold, or on the County's alleged policy of holding inmates with an immigration hold for 48 hours after they were otherwise eligible for release, Luna has failed to present evidence that would enable a reasonable jury to find that Sheriff Valdez's conduct was objectively unreasonable in light of Luna's clearly established constitutional rights. . . .Luna has failed to meet his summary judgment burden with respect to the second prong of Sheriff Valdez's qualified immunity defense. In his response brief, Luna contends that 'there can be no dispute that the extant jurisprudence at the time in question required the Defendants to have probable cause to believe Mr. Luna had committed another crime, which the Defendants did not have. The ICE detainer did not give the Defendants that required probable cause.'. . But the only authority Luna cites is Mercado II, which post-dates Luna's period of confinement by more than a year and a half. . . Luna does not point to any controlling authority (or to a 'robust consensus of persuasive authority') that would establish the following critical element: that at the time Luna was detained pursuant to the Immigration Detainer, all reasonable officials in Sheriff Valdez's position would have known that honoring federal immigration detainers by denying pretrial release to detainees with immigration holds, or by holding inmates subject to ICE detainers for up to 48 hours after they were otherwise eligible for release, resulted in a clear violation of Luna's constitutional rights under the circumstances. For example, in holding in Mercado II that 8 C.F.R. § 287.7(d) does not mandate that local law enforcement detain persons who are subject to detainers, it was necessary for this court to piece together out-of-circuit authority, relying on Galarza v. Szalczyk, 745 F.3d 634 (3d Cir. 2014), and the decisions of several district courts that agreed with Galarza. The court specifically noted that "the Fifth Circuit has not yet addressed the issue." Mercado II, 229 F.Supp.3d at 514. And the court held that, '[a]bsent Fifth Circuit authority to the contrary, [it would] follow Galarza and the district courts that rel[ied] on its reasoning or otherwise reach[ed] the same result.'. . The law does not require that, to be entitled to qualified immunity, reasonable officials accurately predict how the court might decide a new legal issue. . . Accordingly, under the second step of the qualified immunity analysis, the court holds that Sheriff Valdez is entitled to qualified immunity with respect to Luna's § 1983 claims asserted against her.").

Basler v. Barron, No. CV H-15-2254, 2017 WL 784895, at *3 (S.D. Tex. Mar. 1, 2017) ("In denying Deputy Barron's motion on the grounds of qualified immunity, this court analyzed the second prong and concluded that filming the police is a clearly established First Amendment right. . . However, later, in Turner, the Fifth Circuit noted divergent district court opinions in analyzing the second prong of the qualified immunity defense in determining whether filming the police is a 'clearly established right.'. . The Fifth Circuit's holding in Turner is directly applicable to Deputy Barron's assertion of a qualified immunity defense against Basler's First Amendment claim. . . In light of Turner, the court reconsiders the second prong of the qualified immunity analysis. . .Like the police officers in the Turner case, Deputy Barron asserted the defense of qualified immunity in his motion to dismiss. . . Basler responded that the right to film the police is a 'clearly established' First Amendment right. . . Basler was arrested in 2014, prior to Turner's 2015 arrest and prior to the Fifth Circuit's 2017 decision in Turner. Applying the Fifth Circuit's reasoning in Turner, the court concludes that First Amendment right to film the police was not clearly established 'at the time' of Basler's arrest.")

Estate of Gray v. Dalton, No. 1:15CV061-SA-DAS, 2017 WL 564035, at *1–2 (N.D. Miss. Feb. 10, 2017) ("The Court entered a Memorandum Opinion and Order on January 6, 2017 granting in part and denying in part the Defendants' Motion for Summary Judgment. Those Defendants have asked for a reconsideration of three points: (1) the Court's denial of qualified immunity for the individual officer, (2) the Court's lack of finding as to the County's liability under the Fourth Amendment, and (3) the Court's denial of summary judgment as to Plaintiffs' state law wrongful death and gross negligence claims. After reviewing the motion, responses, rules and authorities, the Court hereby GRANTS IN PART the request for reconsideration and alters its judgment as follows: As noted in the Memorandum Opinion, Wilburn Gray claimed that Defendants illegally detained him in violation of the Fourth Amendment at the Alcorn County Jail from December 23 until December 26 without a judicial hearing on probable cause being held.The Court held that based on the United States Supreme Court's general presumption that "[j]udicial determinations of probable cause within 48 hours of arrest will, as a general matter, comply with the promptness requirement of Gerstein", County of Riverside v. McLaughlin, 500 U.S. 44, 56, 111 S. Ct. 1661, 114 L. Ed. 2d 49 (1991), together with the state statute citing 48 hours as the threshold for probable cause hearings, and no explanation from the Defendants as to why there would be that delay, that the 'clearly established' prong of the qualified immunity analysis was satisfied. The Court then found that genuine issues of material fact as to whether Dalton's actions were objectively reasonable existed based on the absence of a factual record. Defendants now seek reconsideration based on a recent United States Supreme Court proclamation regarding the blanket of qualified immunity. [Court notes White v. Pauly] Instead of focusing on the more general constitutional issue regarding time, the Court should have, and now does, examine the facts and circumstances of this particular case to determine whether Wilburn Gray's constitutional rights were affected. Here, Wilburn Gray was physically arrested by Deputy Scott Dalton who immediately handed Gray over to Deputy David Harrison for transport to the Alcorn County Jail. Dalton was soon thereafter placed on administrative leave due to his role in the shooting incident. Dalton was not released from administrative leave until January or February of the next year. The record is undisputed in these regards. Plaintiff failed to put forth any case law showing facts approximating those present here. The United States Supreme Court recently admonished a lower court for 'fail[ing] to identify a case where an officer acting under similar circumstances ... was held to have violated the Fourth Amendment.' White, 137 S. Ct. at 552. The Supreme Court quoted the Circuit Court's pronouncement that the case 'presents a unique set of facts and circumstances' as indicative that the officer's conduct did not violate a clearly established right. . . . Under the qualified immunity standards as articulated, to demonstrate that Defendants unreasonably detained Gray, Plaintiff must present controlling authority that 'squarely governs the case here,'. . . and that would have put 'beyond debate,'. . . the question of whether Wilburn Gray's Fourth Amendment rights were violated. Plaintiff did not carry this burden. There is no controlling case law involving sufficiently similar circumstances that would apprise every objectively reasonable officer that he had further duties and obligations to ensure a probable cause hearing to a suspect once custody of that suspect is relinquished to another officer and even after he was placed on administrative leave. This case presents a 'unique set of facts and circumstances' which require the Court's reconsideration. Accordingly, Deputy Scott Dalton is entitled to the protections of qualified immunity.")

Sanders v. Vincent, No. 3:15-CV-2782-D, 2016 WL 5122115, at *11-12 (N.D. Tex. Sept. 21, 2016) ("Sanders alleges that Lt. Vincent, Officer Bagley, and Officer Jones deprived him of his 'constitutional rights under the First Amendment to videotape the activities of the Addison Police Department by harassing, detaining, seizing and arresting' him. . . Assuming arguendo that defendants' actions violated Sanders' First Amendment rights, defendants are nonetheless entitled to qualified immunity to the extent Sanders bases his § 1983 claim on these allegations because it was not clearly established at the time of the incident that the First Amendment protects an individual's right to videotape police activities. . . .Sanders has failed to point to any controlling authority that would establish that he had a constitutionally-protected First Amendment right to videotape police activity. Nor is there a 'robust consensus of persuasive authority,'. . . that such activity is protected. . . . [U]nder the second step of the qualified immunity analysis, the court holds that Lt. Vincent, Officer Jones, and Officer Bagley are entitled to qualified immunity to the extent Sanders bases his § 1983 claim on defendants' alleged deprivation of his First Amendment rights.")

Bishop v. City of Denton, No. 4:14-CV-608, 2015 WL 8273986, at *4 (E.D. Tex. Dec. 8, 2015) ("As discussed above, the Court concludes that Bishop has presented sufficient evidence to establish that a question of fact exists as to whether Porter violated Bishop's right to be free from the use of excessive force. However, Porter argues that his conduct was not a violation of clearly established law. To support this contention, Porter cites Justice Alito's dissent in Kingsley v. Hendrickson, which states that it has not been determined whether a pretrial detainee may bring a Fourth Amendment excessive force claim against a detention facility employee. . . However, the Fifth Circuit has allowed pretrial detainees to assert Fourth Amendment excessive force claims against detention facility employees. . . . If bystander liability for excessive force based on the Fourth Amendment was clearly established law as of January 2010, direct liability for excessive force was also clearly established. Therefore, within the Fifth Circuit, there was clearly established law at the time the event at issue occurred that detention facility employees could be held liable under the Fourth Amendment for using excessive force against pretrial detainees.")

Cauley v. Walker, No. CV 1:10CV326, 2015 WL 5521972, at *6 & n.4 (E.D. Tex. Sept. 16, 2015) ("Plaintiff has presented competent summary judgment showing that the amount of force used against him was objectively unreasonable and that he suffered more than a de minimis injury. Moreover, plaintiff's right to be free from having excessive force used against him was clearly established at the time of the incident in question. . . .The right of a pretrial detainee to be free from the use of excessive force was clearly established at the time of the incident in question. However, as indicated above, at that time courts considering an excessive use of force claim against a pretrial detainee asked whether force was used maliciously and sadistically, for the very purpose of causing harm, or in a good faith effort to maintain and restore discipline, rather than whether the force used was objectively unreasonable. As stated above, plaintiff's testimony at his deposition indicates that he was not presenting any threat while in the defendant's office and, accordingly, there was no need for any force to be used to maintain or restore discipline. Plaintiff

Modica v. Humphrey, 2007 WL 2777779, at *5 (W.D.Tex. Sept. 21, 2007) ("At the time of Modica's termination, the law regarding public employees' First Amendment rights was well-established, by Pickering, Givhan, and many other Supreme Court and appellate court decisions. All that Garcetti did was to reduce the class of plaintiffs who can prevail on such claims by making it clear that only public employees who are speaking outside of their official duties may bring retaliation claims. It otherwise did not change the general rule, set out in Pickering and countless other cases, that it is unlawful to terminate an employee for exercising their First Amendment rights. In other words, given the facts of this case, Humphrey cannot plausibly contend that she relied on law existing at the time she took actions against Modica, and then that law was changed by Garcetti to her detriment. Indeed, it is quite the opposite; Humphrey filed the instant motion because she contends that Garcetti changed the law in a manner favorable to her (i.e., to eliminate the Plaintiff's claim). Because Garcetti narrowed the class of people who may sue under the First Amendment, but that narrowing did not eliminate Modica's claim, nothing about the change affected by Garcetti is relevant to the question of whether Modica's right infringed upon by her harassment and firing was 'clearly established' at the time it took place.").

Caudillo v. Lubbock ISD, No. Civ.A. 5:03-CV-165-C, 2003 WL 22670934, at *6, *7 (N.D. Tex. Nov. 10, 2003) ("The Court finds the appropriate level of generality in this case relates to the issue of whether a school and its officials may deny a gay-straight student group access to the campus. In a more highly specific query relevant to this case, the issue presented here is whether a school superintendent may deny access to the school's bulletin boards, PA system, and group meeting areas if a prospective student group 1) lists as one of its goals that it will discuss subject matter relating to sexual activity and birth control other than abstinence–a subject matter the school's administration and board of trustees have declared inappropriate for the forum; and 2) seeks to advertise itself by posting fliers with the group's website address which has direct links to sites that contain explicit sexual material and discussions. . . . Under the circumstances of this case, this Court cannot say that the unlawfulness of Defendant Clemmons' particular actions should have been apparent to him in light of clearly established law at the time of the actions. The relatively few cases addressing the issue on a level of generality relevant to this case occurred not only outside of this circuit, but also in federal district courts. None of the cases consisted of opinions handed down by a circuit court. Such a fact seems relevant since the Fifth Circuit has stated that 'even if a Aconsensus" of circuits had adopted' the relevant rule, such an adoption still may not have provided a defendant with fair warning. McClendon, 305 F.3d at 332-33 (emphasis added to show that the consensus of cases should be from a higher level than obscure district court orders). Clemmons may have had fair warning that generalized limits on a student's free speech might violate the First Amendment; the law was less clear whether, in the context of secondary school students, limits on the speech of a group of minors whose goals included discussing safe sex and providing a website with direct links to materials that clearly discussed explicit sexual acts, might violate the First Amendment.").

SIXTH CIRCUIT

Morgan v. Fairfield County, Ohio, 903 F.3d 553, 560-65 (6th Cir. 2018) ("Government officials sued in their individual capacities for constitutional violations are free from liability for civil damages unless (1) they violate a constitutional right that (2) was clearly established at the time that it was violated. . . Courts can address these two elements in any order. . . And although this decision turns on the second element—whether the law was clearly established—we have the ability, if not the responsibility, to clarify the state of the law in this circuit so that government agents can understand the limits of their power and that citizens will be protected when those limits are transgressed. For that reason, we address both parts of the qualified-immunity analysis. . . . Because the area surrounding Morgan's and Graf's house was curtilage, and curtilage is treated as part of the home for Fourth Amendment purposes, the officers' entry onto the curtilage could be justified only by a warrant or one of the recognized exceptions to the warrant requirement. It is undisputed that the SCRAP unit had no warrant. As for exceptions to the warrant requirement, the county argues that the entry was justified for three reasons. None, however, is convincing. . . .The SCRAP unit was concerned about general drug activity at Morgan's and Graf's house. But the Fourth Amendment prohibited them from entering the property: they had no warrant, no exigent circumstances, and no other exception to the warrant requirement. A "knock and talk" by police was permitted 'precisely because that is "no more than any private citizen might do."'. . Thus, the officers' right to enter the property like any other visitor comes with the same limits of that 'traditional invitation': 'typically ... approach the home by the front path, knock promptly, wait briefly to be received, and then (absent invitation to linger longer) leave.'. . Certainly, '[a] visitor cannot traipse through the garden, meander into the backyard, or take other circuitous detours that veer from the pathway that a visitor would customarily use.'. . Neither can the police. By doing so here, the SCRAP unit violated Morgan's and Graf's Fourth Amendment rights. . . . In determining the contours of the right, there is a tension between defining the right at too high a level of generality, on one hand, and too granular a level, on the other. There does not need to be 'a case directly on point, but existing precedent must have placed the ... constitutional question beyond debate.'. . . In all, the most important question in the inquiry is whether a reasonable government officer would have 'fair warning' that the challenged conduct was illegal. . . For centuries, the common law has protected the curtilage of the house. . . And the Supreme Court long has held that the curtilage is 'considered part of the home itself for Fourth Amendment purposes.'. . That means that the police can enter the curtilage on the same terms that they can enter the rest of the home—no more, no less. . . Under those long-settled principles, warrantless searches 'are per se unreasonable under the Fourth Amendment—subject only to a few specifically established and well-delineated exceptions.'. . A reasonable officer thus would understand that without a warrant or an exception to the warrant requirement, entering the curtilage violates a clearly established right. Despite these long-settled standards, one case from this circuit, although incorrectly decided, requires that we grant qualified immunity. That case, Turk v. Comerford, decided within a month of the "knock and talk" in this case, found that the law was not clearly settled against a factual background that was, in every material way, the same as here. . . Central to Turk's analysis was our published decision in Hardesty, in which we held that '[if] knocking at the front door is unsuccessful in spite of indications that someone is in or around the house, an officer may take reasonable steps to speak with the person being sought out even where such steps require an intrusion into the curtilage.'. . Hardesty's extension of the knock-and-talk doctrine was, by its terms, limited to particular circumstances. . . And if our case law ended there, qualified immunity here would be improper. But in Turk, this court read Hardesty more broadly and reasoned that because some limited intrusions of the curtilage were allowed, it was not clearly established that surrounding a house for a "knock and talk" was in the category of unacceptable intrusions. . . Although Hardesty and Turk are outliers, Morgan and Graf cannot overcome their burden of showing that the law was clearly established at the time of the search in this case. In those two cases, this court should have reaffirmed long-settled Fourth Amendment principles. . . But it did not. And although unpublished cases do not upset the state of the law, in rare instances they can show that members of this court, during the same time period, facing the exact same question, did not think the law to be clearly established. And '[i]f judges ... disagree on a constitutional question, it is unfair to subject police to money damages for picking the losing side of the controversy.'. . For that reason we affirm the district court's grant of qualified immunity to the officers in their individual capacities. Nevertheless, in light of recent Supreme Court decisions, neither Hardesty nor Turk remains good law. . . Jardines and, more recently, Collins made clear that, outside of the same implied invitation extended to all guests, if the government wants to enter one's curtilage it needs to secure a warrant or to satisfy one of the exceptions to the warrant requirement. . . Our acknowledgment that those cases are no longer good law does not affect the qualified-immunity analysis here, which looks to the law at the time of the challenged action. . . But it does put officers on notice that principles of Jardines and Collins—and not Hardesty or Turk—should guide their actions going forward.")

Morgan v. Fairfield County, Ohio, 903 F.3d 553, 567 (6th Cir. 2018) (Stranch, J., concurring) ("I join the majority opinion in full. I write separately only to emphasize the unique circumstances that merit applying qualified immunity in this case. As the Supreme Court recently reaffirmed, it 'has long been clear that curtilage is afforded constitutional protection,' and 'officers regularly assess whether an area is curtilage before executing a search.'. . Despite this fundamental principle, our jurisprudence has evidenced some confusion related to the police action that we refer to as ' "knock and talk" investigations.'. . A materially indistinguishable case, Turk v. Comerford, 488 F. App'x 933 (6th Cir. 2012), demonstrates that, at the time of the search at issue, even federal appellate judges were struggling with assessments of curtilage in the limited context of knock-and-talk investigations. It is rare to have a contemporaneous circuit case revealing judicial confusion on the precise question confronted by police officers. The existence of one here supports finding the law sufficiently unsettled that the officers should receive qualified immunity. This case, moreover, presents different circumstances from even Wilson v. Layne, . . . referenced by the majority. There, the Supreme Court acknowledged that the 'state of the law' at the time of the constitutional violation was 'undeveloped' and that a circuit split had arisen between the alleged violation and that Court's ultimate decision. . . The Supreme Court therefore declined to punish the officers' lack of prescience. . . But the case before us is quite unlike the open question in Wilson, which had percolated up through the circuits on its way to final resolution by the Supreme Court. As explained in the majority opinion, Turk and Hardesty instead stand alone on a doctrinal spur. For purposes of this case, however, Turk is sufficient to show that the law surrounding knock and talk investigations was muddy at the relevant time. Though this is the unusual case in which an outlier may insulate officers from liability, today's decision forecloses that possibility for future cases.")

Morgan v. Fairfield County, Ohio, 903 F.3d 553, 574 (6th Cir. 2018) (Thapar, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("Turning to the officers, I agree with the majority that the constitutional violation was not clearly established. But, if I was writing on a clean slate, I would remand. And the question I would direct the district court to answer is whether the officers engaged in a purposeful, investigative act to find the marijuana plants. . . .As the county's policy did not direct a search in Morgan and Graf's case (and the original meaning approach to the Fourth Amendment would require a remand to determine whether the officers in fact 'searched'), the court need not go further.")

Bunkley v. City of Detroit, Michigan, 902 F.3d 552, 566 (6th Cir. 2018) ("The duty of law enforcement officers to intervene to prevent an arrest not supported by probable cause was stated in precedent 'clear enough that every reasonable official would interpret it to establish' this rule. . . . And the arresting officers here—Dennis, Tanguay, and Washington (and Lucas)—knew that they had not investigated the Knox shooting at all, knew that Knox and Bunkley did not reasonably match the descriptions that Ainsworth had given them, knew that they did not question Bunkley (or Knox) before arresting him, and knew that Bunkley did not have a probation violation (their asserted reason for arresting him). They identified Bunkley, left the room to call Lucas, and returned to arrest Bunkley. Any of these officers had time to stop, intervene, and prevent this arrest-without-probable-cause. Based on Sixth Circuit law, the court properly denied qualified immunity.")

Stillwagon v. City of Delaware, Ohio, No. 17-3873, 2018 WL 4055972, at *13 (6th Cir. Aug. 24, 2018) (not reported) ("Despite having different purposes, tight handcuffing and the tight hand taping both constrain the movement of a person's wrists. From an excessive-force analysis, both can cut off circulation and cause the restricted person's hands to go numb as a result of restricted blood flow. This court's tight-handcuffing precedent puts officers on notice that they cannot cut off the circulation to a suspect's wrists—regardless of how they do it. This means that the right was clearly established at the time Flynn allegedly taped Stillwagon's hands too tightly.We affirm the district court's finding that Officers Ailes and Flynn are not entitled to immunity from claims of excessive force.")

Brent v. Wayne Cty. Dep't of Human Servs., 901 F.3d 656, 685 (6th Cir. 2018) ("[I]f Wenk violated plaintiffs' clearly established constitutional rights when executing the removal order, she would not be entitled to qualified immunity from plaintiffs' claims. Plaintiffs first argue that Wenk violated clearly established law by executing a removal order that she knew to contain falsehoods, in contravention of the well-established Fourth Amendment principle that an officer 'cannot rely on a judicial determination of probable cause' to justify executing a warrant 'if that officer knowingly makes false statements and omissions to the judge such that but for these falsities the judge would not have issued the warrant.'. . Though we entirely agree—and now directly hold—that a social worker, like a police officer, cannot execute a removal order that would not have been issued but for known falsities that the social worker provided to the court to secure the order, this principle was not clearly established at the time Wenk executed the order in this case. Indeed, we held as recently as 2015 that 'general assertions that "the Fourth Amendment was violated as to [a child] when he was seized pursuant to [an] order" that he claims "was based on false statements and otherwise lacked probable cause" invoke no clearly established right.'. . As Barber concerned conduct that occurred after the allegedly unlawful actions in this case, . . . we must grant Wenk qualified immunity here.")

Hansen v. Aper, No. 17-2220, 2018 WL 3997321, at *5 (6th Cir. Aug. 21, 2018) (not published) ("Aper's reliance on Fettes, O'Malley, and Lee is misplaced because these cases are all distinguishable from Morrison. First, O'Malley is easily distinguishable because there, '[the plaintiff] did not have an obvious physical injury.'. . .Therefore, the plaintiff did not meet one of the essential elements of the Morrison test. Hansen, though, has presented medical records diagnosing him with a crush injury caused by handcuffing. Fettes and Lee, in addition to being unpublished and therefore non-precedential, are also distinguishable from both Morrison and this case. The plaintiff in Fettes was handcuffed for around ten minutes. . .and in Lee, the handcuffing lasted only between five to ten minutes[.] . . In contrast, the plaintiff in Morrison was handcuffed for forty to fifty minutes, . . and Hansen was handcuffed for thirty to forty minutes. Another pertinent distinction between Fettes and both Morrison and the instant case has to do with the officers' reactions to being told the cuffs were too tight. . . In both Morrison and the instant case, then, the defendant did not merely ignore the plaintiff's complaints but actively rebuffed them. Granting Aper qualified immunity here would thus directly conflict with Morrison, which controls in this circuit absent an intervening change in the law. . . Aper was on notice that handcuffing violates the Fourth Amendment if the arrestee is handcuffed, complains about the tightness, law enforcement ignores the complaint, and the arrestee suffers injury. Therefore, the district court correctly denied Aper qualified immunity.") Przybysz v. City of Toledo, No. 18-3139, 2018 WL 3993546, at *4-5 (6th Cir. Aug. 20, 2018) (not reported) (Gilman, J., concurring in part and concurring in the judgment) ("I fully concur in my colleague's disposition of Marcia Przybysz's Monell and state-law claims, as well as their decision to vacate the district court's sanction order. Where we part company is over their disposition of Marcia's § 1983 claim against Sgt. Karrie Williams, although in the end I agree (for different reasons) that we should affirm the judgment of the district court. The lead opinion holds that no clearly established law governs Marcia's claim against Sgt. Williams. . . I respectfully disagree. Although the facts of this case differ from those of Kallstrom v. City of Columbus, 136 F.3d 1055 (6th Cir. 1998), that case sets out a clear standard for constitutional torts premised on the state-created-danger theory. I believe that my colleagues' qualified-immunity analysis is overly rigid because it relies too heavily on factual differences between Marcia's claim and state-created-danger cases in which plaintiffs have prevailed. Nevertheless, I share my colleague's ultimate conclusion because the record contains insufficient evidence to show that Sgt. Williams acted with deliberate indifference to Thomas's safety. . . .True enough, the only similarly situated plaintiffs who have prevailed under the state-created-danger theory in our circuit are those in cases where the state official directly disclosed confidential information. . . In contrast, Sgt. Williams did not directly disclose Thomas's identity to his supplier, Scott Warnka, or to Warnka's associates. This fact alone appears to be enough, in my colleagues' view, to shield Sgt. Williams from liability. . .I disagree. The Supreme Court has warned the lower courts against placing too 'rigid [a] gloss on the qualified immunity standard' by 'requir[ing] that the facts of previous cases be "materially similar"' to those at hand. . . The unlawfulness of an official act 'must be apparent' to give rise to individual liability, but the doctrine of qualified immunity does not require that 'the very action in question ha[ve] previously been held unlawful.'. . Moreover, 'general statements of the law are not inherently incapable of giving fair and clear warning, and ... a general constitutional rule already identified in the decisional law may apply with obvious clarity to the specific conduct in question.'. .If a state actor is on notice that directly disclosing a confidential informant's name to violent third parties can give rise to liability, then I see no reason why that same actor lacks sufficient notice that affirmative acts that indirectly but unmistakably identify a confidential informant can do the same. Kallstrom and its progeny set forth 'a general constitutional rule' that 'appl[ies] with obvious clarity to the specific conduct in question' here. . . Accordingly, I would find that clearly established law is at issue in this case. But that is not the end of the qualified-immunity analysis. We must also consider whether the facts of the case, '[t]aken in the light most favorable to the party asserting the injury, ... show [that] the officer's conduct violated a constitutional right.'. . In my view, this prong of Saucier's two-part framework, not the clearly-established-law prong, is the insurmountable barrier to Marcia's claim against Sgt. Williams.")

Scott v. Becher, 736 F. App'x 130, ___ (6th Cir. 2018) ("[T]he inquiry into whether a right is clearly established asks whether a reasonable government officer would have 'fair warning' that the challenged conduct was illegal. . . The standard is 'fair warning' because the purpose of qualified immunity is not to protect malicious behavior that violates constitutional rights in a manner the precise likes of which have not yet been the basis of a lawsuit in this circuit. Instead, qualified immunity has a two-fold purpose: to ensure that government agents are not deterred from vigorous pursuit of their duties due to fear that an honest misstep will expose them to money damages and, at the same time, to provide citizens a remedy for constitutional injuries. . . After all, qualified immunity 'acts to safeguard government, and thereby to protect the public at large, not to benefit its agents.'. . To conclude otherwise in the Eighth Amendment context would 'encourage bad actors to invent creative and novel means of using unjustified force on prisoners.'. .Taking the allegations in Scott's complaint as true, we conclude that Becher was not entitled to qualified immunity at this stage of Scott's Eighth Amendment claim of deliberate indifference through reckless driving. According to the complaint and the attachments, Scott was one of a number of prisoners being transferred from Saginaw Correctional Facility to Bellamy Creek Correctional Facility. Becher was driving above the speed limit, swerving, and generally driving recklessly. When Scott and other inmates 'beg[ged] him to slow down, before [they] all die[d],' Becher refused, laughed, and instead accelerated. At some point, the speeding bus hit a bump, sending the front tires of the bus airborne. The inmates went airborne, too. One would assume that all the prisoners were handcuffed at the time, but apparently none were seat-belted. As a result, Scott was catapulted out of his seat, and was then slammed down onto his head, neck, and back. When the bus tires landed, the front tire of the bus went off the road, and in an apparent overcorrection, Becher swerved the bus into the lane of oncoming traffic before regaining control. Scott has alleged actions by Becher that no reasonable corrections official could believe were legal. Caselaw supports that conclusion. Scott points to factually similar cases out of the Eighth and the Fifth Circuits that analyzed under the Eighth Amendment allegations of reckless driving while transporting an inmate without a seatbelt. [discussing cases] Although a number of circuits have not addressed the specific reckless use of a vehicle to harm an inmate, 'there is a clear consensus among the circuits' that 'the Eighth Amendment protect[s] against the malicious and sadistic infliction of pain and suffering ... in a diverse range of factual scenarios.'. . And to use a vehicle maliciously to harm an inmate falls squarely into that category—especially when there is no risk posed by the inmate and no legitimate penal interest. . . A 'rough ride' is 'a peculiarly cruel means of punishment, as [it] is designed to place the victim in fear for his life. Not only is the prisoner not able to protect himself, but motor vehicles, unlike a controlled spray or direct applications of force, are not designed for use as a means of securing compliance or otherwise subduing a prisoner.'. . .[F]ailure-to-seatbelt cases 'involved mere negligence,' but 'all cases that have squarely dealt with intentional misconduct'—which Scott has alleged here—'have found an Eighth Amendment violation.'. .In light of the obviousness of the constitutional violation, Becher could not reasonably have believed that driving recklessly while Scott and the other prisoners were not wearing seatbelts was lawful. Accordingly, the district court erred in granting Becher qualified immunity on Scott's Eighth Amendment claim of deliberate-indifference by reckless driving.") Cummin v. North, 731 F. App'x 465, ___ (6th Cir. 2018) ("We determined that we did not need to resolve the issue in Johnson, and to date have not decided whether to adopt the 'continuing seizure' doctrine. . . Thus, even if the conditions of Cummin's release could constitute a seizure under this doctrine, Defendants 'would still be entitled to qualified immunity because the particularized right alleged—the right to be free from a "continuing seizure" by virtue of a pending criminal charge—is not clearly established.' Rapp v. Putman, 644 Fed.Appx. 621, 628 (6th Cir. 2016). Cummin cites several cases in support of his assertion that the right was clearly established. But the cases he cites are distinguishable. . . .Further, Cummin has cited no Sixth Circuit case finding the requirement that he attend five court appearances sufficient to constitute a seizure. In contrast, we have previously held, albeit in unpublished opinions, that requiring attendance at court proceedings does not constitute constitutional deprivation of liberty. [citing cases] In the absence of additional, onerous conditions, we cannot say the requirement to appear in court constitutes a clearly established seizure. This is consistent with many of our sister circuits. . . Because Cummin was not arrested, incarcerated, required to post bail or pay any bond, and was never subject to any travel restrictions, we cannot conclude that a reasonable government official would understand that the conditions of Cummin's release constituted a seizure under the Fourth Amendment.") Hopper v. Plummer, 887 F.3d 744, 754-56 (6th Cir. 2018) ("Defendants also argue that no clearly established law barred unreasonable force against civil contemnor detainees in 2012. Plaintiff relies primarily on this court's opinion in Champion v. Outlook Nashville, Inc., 380 F.3d 893 (6th Cir. 2004), as notice to defendants that their 'conduct was unlawful in the situation [they] confronted.'. . In Champion, we considered an excessive-force claim brought by the family of a severely autistic man who died after several arresting officers restrained him, prone on the ground and handcuffed behind his back, for seventeen minutes. . . Several witnesses described how the officers were 'laying on top of' the man while 'he was prone on the ground with his face towards the carpet.'. . We affirmed the denial of qualified immunity to the officers and explained that '[c]reating asphyxiating conditions by putting substantial or significant pressure, such as body weight, on the back of an incapacitated and bound suspect constitutes objectively unreasonable excessive force.'. . Although the man was also pepper sprayed, the application of asphyxiating force 'by itself violated a clearly established right.'. .Thus 'the prohibition against placing weight on [Richardson's] body after he was handcuffed was clearly established in the Sixth Circuit as of' May 2012. . . Although not every defendant may have placed his weight on Richardson's torso, we have cautioned against taking 'too cramped a view' of our precedent, and have explained that Champion 'proscribes the use of "substantial or significant pressure" that creates asphyxiating conditions in order to restrain a subject who does not pose a material danger to the officers or others.'. . Even though 'Champion arose in the context of an arrest, the conduct at issue, the risk of death to the detainee, and the minimal threat posed by a bound and incapacitated detainee to officer safety is the same in a' jail. . . In response to Champion's admonition, defendants maintain that the presence of medical personnel distinguishes this case because defendants claim they restrained Richardson only to facilitate his medical treatment. No medical personnel were present while force was used on Champion, but defendants do not explain how this distinction is material to our clearly-established analysis here. There is no dispute that Richardson was suffering a medical emergency, or that while he may have kicked and thrashed, defendants did not consider him a threat to anyone after he was handcuffed. Champion, who had created a disturbance in a store and 'kick[ed] violently' while on the ground, arguably posed a threat. . . In any event, neither the mere presence of a third party at the scene nor defendants' professed reason for using force would excuse defendants' use of an otherwise unreasonable amount of force or alter relevant, clearly established constitutional guarantees. . . We are cognizant that plaintiff must identify a case with a fact pattern similar enough to have given 'fair and clear warning to officers' about what the law requires. . . But such a case need not 'be on all fours in order to form the basis for the clearly established right.'. .Defendants also argue that they cannot be held liable for their actions because it was not clear in 2012 whether civil contemnor detainees fell within the Eighth or the Fourteenth Amendment. Although some district courts in this circuit may have applied the Eighth Amendment to civil contemnor detainee excessive-force claims, the Supreme Court long ago 't[ook] the position that the Eighth Amendment is inapplicable to [a civil contempt] sentence.'. . Moreover, it is well-established that 'the qualified immunity doctrine is an objective one[.]'. . We decline to accept the defense of qualified immunity based on defendants' 'dubious proposition that, at the time the officers acted, they were on notice only that they could not have a reckless or malicious intent and that, as long as they acted without such an intent, they could apply any degree of force they chose.' See Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 801 F.3d 828, 832–33 (7th Cir. 2015) (per curiam). Nor can defendants escape liability merely because the incident in question occurred before the Supreme Court made it clear that the standard of liability applicable to Fourteenth Amendment excessive-force claims is purely an objective one. . . As defendants acknowledge, we have rejected this argument before because 'a defendant is not entitled to qualified immunity simply because the courts have not agreed upon the precise formulation of the [applicable] standard.'. . Rather, the relevant question under the clearly established prong is whether defendants had notice 'that [their] conduct was unlawful in the situation [they] confronted.'. .We agree with the district court that Champion, among other precedent, gave such notice to defendants here. Accordingly, we affirm the district court's conclusion that it '[w]as unconstitutional' on May 19, 2012, to create asphyxiating conditions by 'forcibly restraining an individual in a prone position for a prolonged period of time' when that individual posed no material threat.")

Maben v. Thelen, 887 F.3d 252, 270 (6th Cir. 2018) ("Thelen . . . argues that there was no violation of a clearly established right because our cases dealing with the false issuance of misconduct charges deal with the issuance of major misconduct charges and not minor misconduct charges. We think Thelen's preoccupation with MDOC's label of major and minor misconduct is misplaced. Instead of focusing on that classification, Thelen should focus on the action of retaliating by issuing a misconduct ticket and the penalties that come with being found guilty of misconduct. We have made clear that a prison officer may not undertake adverse actions in retaliation for a prisoner's exercise of his First Amendment rights. . . We have also made clear that actions comparable in seriousness to the ones at issue in this case implicate a prisoner's First Amendment rights. . . .[W]e think that a reasonable prison officer would have been aware that issuing a misconduct ticket, even a minor misconduct ticket, in retaliation for the inmate's exercise of his First Amendment rights could give rise to constitutional liability.")

Enoch v. Hogan, 728 F. App'x 448, ___ (6th Cir. 2018) ("The Complaint alleges that the Deputies stopped and searched Enoch and Corbin because of their race and despite the fact that their behavior was entirely lawful. It has been the law of this circuit for decades that 'the reasonable suspicion requirement for an investigative detention cannot be satisfied when the sole factor grounding the suspicion is race.' United States v. Avery, 137 F.3d 343, 354 (6th Cir. 1997). Enoch and Corbin therefore plausibly allege that they were victims of an unconstitutional search and seizure. Because individualized suspicion is less demanding than probable cause, . . . the same race-related facts necessarily do not satisfy the higher probable cause standard. . . .As of June 2014, the published precedent of this court made clear that an officer may not stop, much less arrest and prosecute, an individual on the basis of her race. . . . Enoch and Corbin have plausibly alleged violations of their clearly established Fourth Amendment rights. The Deputies are not entitled to qualified immunity as a matter of law on these counts of the Complaint. . . .The Deputies could not constitutionally prevent Enoch and Corbin from or punish them for gathering news about matters of public importance when their actions violated neither rules nor laws. Enoch and Corbin have therefore plausibly alleged a violation of their First Amendment rights. Those rights were clearly established. Decades ago, the Supreme Court established with clarity that the First Amendment protects the rights of both the media and the general public to attend and share information about the conduct of trials, 'where their presence historically has been thought to enhance the integrity and quality of what takes place.'. . The Court linked the right of access to another fundamental First Amendment right, explaining that '[t]he explicit, guaranteed rights to speak and to publish concerning what takes place at a trial would lose much meaning if access to observe the trial could, as it was here, be foreclosed arbitrarily.'. . The same logic necessitates finding a constitutional violation in this case, where Enoch and Corbin's access to a press conference held immediately after a hearing was foreclosed on the basis of their race. The Supreme Court has likewise been clear for more than fifty years that state officials may not enforce rules or regulations that implicate First Amendment rights in a racially discriminatory manner. . . . [O]n the facts alleged, state officials purported to enforce state law in a racially discriminatory manner, stopping and arresting black citizens for engaging in behavior that was both protected by the First Amendment and permitted for their white counterparts. Based on the Complaint, the Deputy Sheriffs violated Enoch and Corbin's clearly established First Amendment rights. The Deputies are therefore not entitled to qualified immunity as a matter of law on this count of the Complaint.")

Richmond v. Huq, 885 F.3d 928, 948 (6th Cir. 2018) ("[I]t was clearly established at the time of Richmond's incarceration in Wayne County Jail that neglecting to provide a prisoner with needed medication, intentionally scrubbing her wound to cause unnecessary pain, and failing implement the prescribed plan of treatment could constitute a constitutional violation.")

Greer v. City of Highland Park, Michigan, 884 F.3d 310, 317-18 (6th Cir. 2018) ("In this case, the Greers claim that the officers did not knock or announce their presence before entering the residence, and—taking the Greers' factual allegations as true—exigent circumstances did not excuse the officers' disregard of the knock-and-announce rule. Although the search warrant listed controlled substances as items to be seized, which could potentially be destroyed, the presence of drugs alone did not vitiate the knock-and-announce requirement. . . Moreover, the Greers state that they were in bed when the officers arrived and that they presented no threat of violence. The warrant gives no indication that a person was in peril at the Greers' home. Finally, facts set forth in the complaint clearly allege that no person within the home knew of the searching officers' authority or purpose. These facts indicate a lack of exigent circumstances. Furthermore, '[n]ighttime searches have long been recognized as more intrusive than searches conducted during the day.'. . Consequently, the officers' failure to knock and announce their presence at the Greers' home at 4:00 a.m. absent exigent circumstances was clearly unconstitutional. As to the officers' refusal to show the Greers the search warrant, it is clearly established that the purpose of a search warrant—informing citizens that the searching agents are authorized—cannot be accomplished if executing officers withhold presentation of the warrant despite an occupant's requests to view it. . . The Greers claim that they repeatedly asked to see the warrant, and the officers refused.

Furthermore, they state that the officers failed to leave a copy of the warrant at the Greers' home after the search concluded. These alleged facts further support the Greers' claim that the officers violated their clearly established Fourth Amendment rights by conducting the search of their home in an unreasonable manner. Thus, taking the facts alleged in the second amended complaint as true, the district court properly found that the Greers stated a claim for relief that is plausible on its face. . . Even if the underlying search warrant was based on probable cause, the Greers have posed factual allegations that the officers violated their clearly established Fourth Amendment right to be free from unreasonably conducted searches. Consequently, the district court did not err in denying the officers' Rule 12(c) motion based on qualified immunity.")

Doe v. Miami University, 882 F.3d 579, 604 (6th Cir. 2018) ("John has. . . sufficiently alleged a claim under § 1983 that Vaughn violated his equal-protection and procedural-due process rights. . . . All of these rights were clearly established in the fall of 2014. John's 'right to freedom from invidious [gender] discrimination under the Equal Protection Clause was certainly clearly established at all times pertinent to this action ....' Rondigo, L.L.C. v. Twp. of Richmond, 641 F.3d 673, 681 (6th Cir. 2011). John's procedural-due-process right to an impartial adjudicator and access to the evidence used against him was also clearly established. First, viewing the allegations in the light most favorable to John, we conclude that a reasonable person in Vaughn's position should have known that she was partial and that she could not, therefore, sit on John's Administrative Hearing Panel. 'The impropriety of [Vaughn's] alleged conduct in failing to disqualify [her]self should have been apparent based on Goss [, 419 U.S. at 579–84], Newsome[v. Batavia Local Sch. Dist., 842 F.2d 920, 927 (6th Cir. 1988)], and other precedent directly on point.' Heyne, 655 F.3d at 568. Second, John's right to view all of the evidence against him is clearly established. . . Thus, we reverse the district court's holding that Vaughn is entitled to qualified immunity from John's equal-protection and procedural-due-process claims.")

Flanigan v. Panin, 724 F. App'x 375, ___ (6th Cir. 2018) ("[T]o withstand Panin's qualified immunity argument, Flanigan must also show that his right to be free from fifteen to twenty hits to the head was clearly established at the time of the claimed violation. 'In order for a right to be clearly established for the purposes of qualified immunity, "[t]he contours of the right must be sufficiently clear that a reasonable official would understand that what he is doing violates that right."'. . . Sixth Circuit case law supports Flanigan's 'right not to be struck ... gratuitously,' Shreve, 453 F.3d at 688, and Flanigan's version of events permits the court to draw the inference that he did not fight back against Panin's attempts to handcuff him. In such a scenario, Panin's blows to Flanigan's head were gratuitous. . . Thus, viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Flanigan, a reasonable jury could conclude that Panin used excessive force. . . Accordingly, at this point in the proceedings, Panin 'is not entitled to qualified immunity as a matter of law.'")

Flanigan v. Panin, 724 F. App'x 375, ___ (6th Cir. 2018) (Kethledge, J., dissenting) ("Qualified immunity protects all police officers except 'the plainly incompetent or those who knowingly violate the law.'. . Neither label fits Deputy Scott Panin. Hence I would reverse the district court's partial denial of immunity. The only question on appeal is whether Panin violated Joseph Flanigan's clearly established rights when he (allegedly) hit Flanigan in the head toward the end of their encounter. Our caselaw says that a police officer may use force to subdue a suspect who actively resists arrest—e.g., one who struggles with, threatens, or disobeys an officer. See Rudlaff v. Gillispie, 791 F.3d 638, 641-42 (6th Cir. 2015). By contrast, an officer may not use force against a suspect who is compliant or has stopped resisting. . . Although in this appeal we must accept Flanigan's story as true, we must also view it through the eyes of a reasonable officer on the scene. . . In Flanigan's telling, he ran away from Panin into someone's backyard, repeatedly ignoring Panin's orders to stop. After Panin had chased, tased, and maced Flanigan, Panin told him, 'Don't get up. Don't resist.' Yet Flanigan tried to get up. Only then did Panin hit Flanigan in the head. And only after that did Flanigan give up, follow Panin's commands, and submit to handcuffing. A reasonable officer in this hectic situation could have viewed Flanigan as actively resisting arrest until he was restrained. Since Panin used only the force necessary to subdue Flanigan—and used no further force thereafter—he is entitled to qualified immunity. . . In holding otherwise, the majority stresses that Panin used too much force to subdue Flanigan. Our cases are to the contrary. For example, we have granted qualified immunity to officers who struck a naked (and obviously unarmed) suspect with batons, maced him, and tased him 38 times, because they needed to use that much force to gain his compliance. See Williams v. Sandel, 433 F. App'x 353, 362-63 (6th Cir. 2011). So it is here. Tasing and macing Flanigan had proven ineffective, so Panin was justified in hitting him, and each blow was necessary to overcome Flanigan's resistance. See Jackson v. Washtenaw County, 678 F. App'x 302, 309 (6th Cir. 2017). The majority speculates that Panin could have arrested Flanigan with less force, but in Flanigan's own account, he did not give up until Panin had hit him 15 to 20 times. The majority also draws support from three cases in which we denied qualified immunity, but in those cases officers used force far beyond what was necessary to make prone suspects produce their hands for cuffing, or hit suspects who had already surrendered. See Griffith v. Coburn, 473 F.3d 650, 658 (6th Cir. 2007); Shreve v. Jessamine Cty. Fiscal Court, 453 F.3d 681, 686-88 (6th Cir. 2006); Baker v. City of Hamilton, 471 F.3d 601, 607-09 (6th Cir. 2006). Neither was true here. As shown above, Flanigan remained defiant throughout, refused to stay on the ground, and resisted being handcuffed. Moreover, Panin used only the force necessary to overcome Flanigan's resistance. Hence Panin did not violate Flanigan's clearly established rights. I respectfully dissent.")

Seales v. City of Detroit, 724 F. App'x 356, ___ (6th Cir. 2018) ("In light of these cases, we find Seales had a clearly established constitutional right to be free from continued detention after officers should have known that he was not the person named in the warrant. Accordingly, we find the district court correctly determined that Zberkot was not entitled to qualified immunity. It is for the trier of fact to decide whether Zberkot violated Seales' constitutional rights.")

Richmond v. Huq, 879 F.3d 178, 196-97 (6th Cir. 2017) ("'The proposition that deliberate indifference to a prisoner's medical needs can amount to a constitutional violation has been well-settled since Estelle in 1976.'. . This certainly includes the 'unnecessary and wanton infliction of pain.'. . It is also well-established that right of a prisoner to be free from deliberate indifference extends to psychological needs. . . Further, as noted above, this Circuit's precedent is clear that neglecting a prisoner's medical need and interrupting a prescribed plan of treatment can constitute a constitutional violation. . . Thus, it was clearly established at the time of Richmond's incarceration in Wayne County Jail that neglecting to provide a prisoner with needed medication, intentionally scrubbing her wound to cause unnecessary pain, and failing [to] implement the prescribed plan of treatment could constitute a constitutional violation.")

Nailon v. University of Cincinnati, 715 F. App'x 509, ___ (6th Cir. 2017) ("[V]iewing all these facts in the light most favorable to Nailon, she has demonstrated a causal connection between her termination and her niece's protected speech and established a First Amendment retaliation claim. She has thus satisfied the first prong of the qualified immunity analysis by showing a constitutional violation. . . . The Defendants argue that there is no clearly established law putting a university official on notice that terminating an individual in retaliation for speech made by her niece would be a constitutional violation. In their principal brief, they allege it is '[n]ot clear at all that a claim of retaliation for the speech of a family member fits under the First Amendment.' The district court determined that such a right was clearly established based on cases within this circuit that examined claims of First Amendment retaliation where the underlying speech was made by a relative, rather than the plaintiff herself. . . The Defendants revise this argument in their Reply. There they posit that even though there is precedent establishing that a First Amendment retaliation claim may be based on speech made by a relative, these cases involve a 'closer' relationship between the speaker and the plaintiff than aunt and niece. They cite Teare v. Independence Local School District Board of Education, No. 1:10-cv-01711, 2011 WL 4633105, at *5 (N.D. Ohio Aug. 18, 2011), in which the district court determined that the plaintiff, a thirteen-year-old girl, had not shown a clearly established right of familial association with her uncle. Again, Nailon does not assert a claim for violation of her associational rights—she alleges that the Defendants retaliated against her based on her niece's speech. Accordingly, Teare does not control our analysis. The Supreme Court has found that in the Title VII context, a third-party reprisal can form the basis of a retaliation claim. . . Moreover, the Court has explicitly 'decline[d] to identify a fixed class of relationships for which third-party reprisals are unlawful.'. . It recognized that there may be 'difficult line-drawing problems concerning the types of relationships entitled to protection,' and that 'the significance of any given act of retaliation will often depend on the particular circumstances.'. . .An examination of the facts in this case confirms that Nailon and Davis's relationship may form the basis for Nailon's retaliation claim. As in Ward and Henley, the close familial relationship between Nailon and Davis was known to the Defendants. . . . Given these facts showing the close relationship between Nailon and Davis, as well as the cases establishing that private citizens have a protected First Amendment right to criticize public officials, . . . it should have been clear to a reasonable University official that retaliating against Nailon for Davis's speech would be unlawful. The Defendants are therefore not entitled to qualified immunity.") Bays v. Montmorency Cty., 874 F.3d 264, 268-70 (6th Cir. 2017) ("Prison officials violate the Eighth Amendment when they act with 'deliberate indifference' to the 'serious medical needs' of inmates committed to their charge. . . The Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment provides the same guarantee to pretrial detainees. . . Two inquiries loom over every deliberate indifference case: Was the ailment a serious one? And was the official 'subjective[ly] reckless[ ],' such that she was actually 'aware of facts from which the inference could be drawn that a substantial risk of serious harm exist[ed], and ... also [drew] the inference'? . . . . Sigler adds that nothing in the record shows that she subjectively knew, then disregarded, that Shane was at risk of suicide. But the relevant question is not whether Sigler recognized that Shane might kill himself. It is whether Sigler recognized that Shane was suffering from a serious mental illness creating a host of risks and requiring immediate treatment during the fourteen days that Sigler treated him. . . Sigler argues that while she may have committed malpractice, her conduct was not deliberately indifferent to Shane's plight. If a prison medical official provides treatment, it is true, constitutional liability attaches only if the treatment is 'so cursory as to amount to a conscious disregard for [the inmate's] needs.'. . Taking the Bays' allegations as true, Sigler's care fell below this admittedly low bar. She scheduled an appointment weeks in the future despite symptoms that she, Nurse Pilarski, and the Bays' expert now all agree required immediate or near-immediate care. Yes, she eventually did try to schedule an earlier appointment. But the sum total of her efforts were two phone calls and a message, all while she had the option of getting immediate emergency room treatment or at least putting him on a watch list, and yet she chose to do neither. Sigler looks to Taylor v. Burkes, which held that inmates have no clearly established right to the proper implementation of suicide prevention procedures. . . But the Bays do not argue that Sigler violated Shane's right to procedures that might have prevented his suicide. They argue that Sigler violated Shane's right to have a serious psychological illness treated seriously. And that right is clearly established.")

Moody v. Michigan Gaming Control Bd., 871 F.3d 420, 430 (6th Cir. 2017) ("Under the conditions articulated with respect to the particular right at issue, a public employee 'may rightfully refuse to answer unless and until he is protected at least against the use of his compelled answers.'. . The Supreme Court has made clear that if a state wishes to punish an employee for invoking that right, 'States must offer to the witness whatever immunity is required to supplant the privilege and may not insist that the employee or contractor waive such immunity.'. . We therefore reverse the district court's grant of qualified immunity on the Fifth Amendment claim, and hold that the right articulated in Moody I was clearly established at the time of the violation.")

Moody v. Michigan Gaming Control Bd., 871 F.3d 420, 433, 436-37 (6th Cir. 2017) (Batchelder, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("At 'a high level of generality,'. . . a public employee or, in this case, a licensee may refuse to answer questions that may tend to incriminate himself unless and until he has immunity from prosecution on the basis of his answers to the State's questions. Moody I was correct to explain that ' "a governmental body may not require an employee to waive his privilege against self-incrimination as a condition to keeping his job ... even [when] no criminal proceedings were ever instituted against" an employee who was later successful in constitutional claims.'. . I part ways with the majority, however, because it does not—and cannot—point to 'clearly established law [that is] "particularized" to the facts of [this] case.'. . The majority finds clearly established Moody I's holding that MGCB violated the drivers' rights when it 'did not offer [them] immunity before the hearing.'. . Based on my understanding of the Supreme Court's precedent, I cannot agree. . . .I cannot agree that Turley, Gardner, and like cases provide the proper lens through which we should assess this case for purposes of qualified immunity. These cases address different situations from the one here. The question, then, is whether MGCB needed to 'offer' immunity in the form of notifying the drivers that their testimony could not be used against them. This is where Garrity, which is the progenitor of the other cases I have discussed so far, fits into the picture. . . .Interpreting Garrity to mean that coerced testimony cannot be used in a subsequent criminal proceeding, however, leaves an important question unanswered: is that effect of the Fifth Amendment privilege against self-incrimination a self-executing one, or must the public employer or agency affirmatively make its employee, contractor, or licensee aware of the immunity that Garrity affords? In Moody I, we concluded that MGCB had an affirmative obligation to notify the drivers that they were afforded immunity in exchange for being threatened with the loss of their licenses. In effect, we created a prophylactic rule, but this rule had not been in place before. The district court was therefore correct when it explained that '[w]hat was not clearly established in this Circuit [before Moody I] was whether the State was required to offer immunity in the first place.'. .This is the proper lens through which to analyze this case, so I cannot find that the right had been clearly established before Moody I. The Supreme Court has not directly addressed how this right plays out in non-prosecutorial administrative proceedings, as I discussed above. Nor has our circuit addressed this previously. And looking to the other circuits demonstrates precisely why I cannot find that the right announced in Moody I was clearly established, for it is the subject of a circuit split among the various United States Courts of Appeals. . . . This split of authority, although not acknowledged by the majority, supports my conclusion that the law was not clearly established prior to Moody I. To saddle MGCB with the unjustified holding that this issue was clearly established before Moody I runs counter to the qualified immunity doctrine. I therefore respectfully dissent.")

Brenay v. Schartow, 709 F. App'x 331, ___ (6th Cir. 2017) ("If an officer initiates an arrest in a public place, but the suspect flees into a private one, the officer may give chase without stopping for a warrant. . . In other words, a suspect may not defeat an arrest by simply running inside. . . Whether the hot pursuit doctrine applies to this case depends on whether Brenay, Jr. was standing in a public place when Officer Sierras told him that he was under arrest. We know that Brenay, Jr. was standing in the foyer, six inches from the open doorway, for most of his interaction with the officers. The Supreme Court has said that a person who stands in his front doorway stands in a public place because he is 'as exposed to public view, speech, hearing, and touch as if [he] had been standing completely outside [his] house.'. . But this circuit has not addressed whether a person who opens his door voluntarily to talk to police loses his reasonable expectation of privacy within the meaning of Santana. Our sister circuits are split on the issue. . . And how the analysis might change when the person is standing six inches back from the doorway is even less settled. If this appeal came down to these questions, it would be easy. Government officials are entitled to qualified immunity unless 'existing precedent ... placed the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate.'. . With so many answers outstanding, how Santana would apply to this case is hardly 'beyond debate.' That the officers violated the Brenays' constitutional rights when they entered the Brenays' home would not be clearly established. Unfortunately for Officer Sierras, the hot pursuit doctrine may not apply because Brenay, Jr. may have ended his interaction with the police before Officer Sierras told him he was under arrest. . . . Unless and until Officer Sierras initiated an arrest, the Brenays were free to shut the door and walk away.")

Kulpa for Kulpa v. Cantea, 708 F. App'x 846, ___ (6th Cir. 2017) ("Cantea argues that even if his conduct was objectively unreasonable, the law's contours were not clearly established at the time of the alleged violation with respect to the restraint of pretrial detainees. The gist of his argument is that because the events in this case took place before the Supreme Court adopted the objective reasonableness standard in Kingsley, no clearly established law barred unreasonable force against pretrial detainees. At the time of Kulpa's death in October 2011, we evaluated a pretrial detainee's excessive-force claim by asking 'whether the force was applied in a good-faith effort to maintain or restore discipline, or maliciously and sadistically to cause harm.'. . . Our pre-Kingsley caselaw put Cantea on notice 'that his conduct was unlawful in the situation he confronted.'. . Champion, decided seven years before Kulpa's death, clearly articulated that driving heavy pressure into a prone, handcuffed, incapacitated detainee's back was constitutionally impermissible because it posed a serious risk of asphyxiation to the arrestee and was unnecessary to protect the officers. . . . Although Champion arose in the context of an arrest, the conduct at issue, the risk of death to the detainee, and the minimal threat posed by a bound and incapacitated detainee to officer safety is the same in a pretrial detention center. Furthermore, it was clearly established in 2011 that 'pretrial detainees had a clearly established right not to be gratuitously assaulted while fully restrained and subdued.'. . Cantea argues that—notwithstanding Champion's clear admonition about this precise conduct—the law permitted him to plant significant weight into a prone, handcuffed detainee's back so long as he lacked malicious intent. For the reasons explained above, however, sufficient evidence exists that Cantea acted with malicious intent, given the extent of Kulpa's injury, the minimal threat Kulpa posed to officer safety, and Cantea's application of unnecessary force. In addition, as the Seventh Circuit recently explained, to buy Cantea's argument 'we would have to accept the dubious proposition that, at the time the officers acted, they were on notice only that they could not have a reckless or malicious intent and that, as long as they acted without such an intent, they could apply any degree of force they chose.' Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 801 F.3d 828, 833 (7th Cir. 2015). As we have noted, however, the law clearly established that the 'amount of force that was used' must be roughly proportionate to the 'need for the application of force.'").

Mills v. Barnard, 869 F.3d 473, 486-87 (6th Cir. 2017) ("In holding that Mills sufficiently pleaded his claims of fabrication of evidence, suppression of evidence, and malicious prosecution, we determine that at this time qualified immunity is not warranted. Again, in the factually similar Gregory case, we stated that it was clearly established by at least 1992 that knowing fabrication of evidence violates constitutional rights. . . Brady violations are, of course, clearly established violations of constitutional rights. And, as we stated recently, it is also clear that 'individuals have a clearly established Fourth Amendment right to be free from malicious prosecution by a defendant who has "made, influenced, or participated in the decision to prosecute the plaintiff" by, for example, "knowingly or recklessly" making false statements that are material to the prosecution either in reports or in affidavits filed to secure warrants.") Sumpter v. Wayne County, 868 F.3d 473, 478, 485-88 (6th Cir. 2017) ("The issue we face is whether periodically conducting group strip searches when the number of jail inmates waiting to be processed makes individual searches imprudent constitutes a violation of clearly established Fourth Amendment law. Under the facts of this case, we answer that question 'no' and therefore hold that the jail official who conducted the group searches, defendant Terri Graham, is entitled to qualified immunity. . . . To summarize, on one hand, the group strip searches plaintiff endured in the Registry were especially intrusive; on the other hand, defendants have asserted a legitimate penological justification for periodically conducting the searches. Typically, we would proceed to balance the nature of the intrusion against the penological justification to determine whether the searches were unreasonable under the Fourth Amendment. However, we need not go that far in order to determine that Graham is entitled to qualified immunity. Qualified immunity protects a constitutional tortfeasor from personal liability unless the contours of the constitutional right she violated 'were sufficiently definite that any reasonable official in the defendant's shoes would have understood that he was violating it.'. . The dispositive inquiry, 'undertaken in light of the specific context of the case, [and] not as a broad general proposition,' is 'whether the violative nature of particular conduct is clearly established.'. . Nowhere is that specificity as important as in the Fourth Amendment context, where, under the governing ad-hoc interest-balancing test, '[i]t is sometimes difficult for an officer to determine how the relevant legal doctrine ... will apply to the factual situation the officer confronts.'. . Because 'case-by-case, incremental decisionmaking of balancing tests ... infrequently will provide the "fair notice" that qualified-immunity precedent requires,'. . . '[c]ourts generally accord public officials wide latitude (for qualified-immunity purposes) when the constitutionality of their acts comes down to the subtleties of interest balancing[.]'. . . Thus, it is imperative that plaintiff rely on a decision that 'squarely governs' the outcome of the case. . . That she cannot do. . . .Both Stoudemire and Williams are distinguishable in one important respect: in both cases, there was no penological justification for the particular searches at issue. This critical difference makes Stoudemire and Williams poor templates for declaring the particularized right at issue in this case—freedom from a group strip search supported by a legitimate penological justification—clearly established. . . .Regardless of how the balancing actually plays out, one thing is clear: Stoudemire and Williams could not have predicted the result since neither case involved penological justifications to weigh against the nature of the intrusion. To put it in more descriptive terms: it is easy enough to predict how scales with one hundred apples on one end will balance out, but it is far more difficult to predict how many oranges must be added to the other side to bring it to equipoise. Tasked with making that second prediction, Graham would have found no clues in 'apples-only' cases like Stoudemire and Williams. The dissent starts with the wrong question. It asks whether our case law clearly establishes Officer Graham's justification for the group searches as a legitimate one. . . But that's not how qualified immunity works. To overcome an officer's request for immunity, the plaintiff must show that the 'right' she seeks to vindicate is clearly established, not that the officer's justification is not clearly established. . . The issue is the right to be free from a group strip search where the officer has an administrative need to process a large quantity of inmates at one time. The cases fail to address this situation, and so the right is not (and was not) clearly established. In focusing on only one half of the right at issue, the dissent inverts the burden, leaving the officer, rather than the plaintiff, in need of clearly established law to succeed. The dissent also focuses much of its energy on a question we do not address: whether the searches violate the Fourth Amendment. Its key points—that the jail later changed (or clarified) its policy, that Officer Graham had other alternatives available to her, and that she could have anticipated the situation and planned accordingly—all fail to address whether the law at the time clearly established the searches as Fourth Amendment violations. The absence of a decision that 'squarely governs' this situation is particularly detrimental to plaintiff's claim because, when the constitutional test is one of interest-balancing, the point at which the constitutional shades into the unconstitutional will necessarily be gray. . . Qualified immunity exists to give public officials breathing room to make close calls when the issue is not black-and-white. . . And this breathing room is especially appropriate when the legal standard is flexible and heavily dependent on on-the-ground judgment calls, as it is in this context. . . . Strip searches, even when conducted in the most private circumstances, are intrusive. But in the absence of bright lines and per se prohibitions, whether and when to subject inmates to increasingly intrusive searches depends on the facts confronting the corrections official in each particular case. For these reasons, we need not conduct the Fourth Amendment analysis to its completion in order to conclude that Graham is entitled to qualified immunity. Neither Stoudemire, nor Williams, nor any other case, would have put Graham on notice that conducting group strip searches when the volume of inmates made individual searches imprudent was unreasonable. Thus, regardless of whether Graham, in fact, violated the Fourth Amendment, no reasonable officer would have known that at the time. We therefore hold, as the district court did, that defendant Graham is entitled to qualified immunity.")

Sumpter v. Wayne County, 868 F.3d 473, 498-500 (6th Cir. 2017) (Clay, J., dissenting) ("The issue as the majority frames it is whether our cases clearly establish that a group strip search conducted to expedite access to medical treatment violates the Fourth Amendment. However, that is definitively not the issue in this case. Rather, the true issue is whether the justification provided by Graham sufficiently demonstrates a special, exigent, or emergency circumstance which necessitated that such an invasive and humiliating jail intake process be conducted in the presence of others who had no reason to view such things. . . . Because the three Registry group strip searches violated Plaintiff's clearly established Fourth Amendment rights, I would hold that Graham is not entitled to qualified immunity.")

Miller v. Maddox, No. 17-5021, 2017 WL 3298570, at *7 (6th Cir. Aug. 3, 2017) ("Maddox spends a considerable portion of his brief illustrating why it is not clear that he should be liable for malicious prosecution, thus reasoning that he is entitled to qualified immunity. Yet, his claim that the contours of our jurisprudence concerning malicious prosecution are not entirely clear misses the point. Our inquiry is whether Maddox's alleged actions—arresting and detaining Miller based on false pretenses and then seeking an arrest warrant based on these false statements—violated Miller's clearly established constitutional rights. We conclude that they did.")

Darrah v. Krisher, 865 F.3d 361, 374 (6th Cir. 2017) ("The first inquiry of the qualified-immunity analysis asks 'whether plaintiff has alleged facts which, when assumed to be true, show that the defendants' conduct violated a constitutional right.'. . This inquiry 'collapses into the analysis of whether [Darrah] has produced sufficient evidence to show that [Defendants] were deliberately indifferent to [Darrah's] medical needs under the subjective component' of the deliberate-indifference standard. . . We have already concluded that a jury could so find. Thus, we turn to the question of whether the right was clearly established. For a right to be clearly established, '[t]he contours of the right must be sufficiently clear that a reasonable official would understand that what he is doing violates that right.'. . Further, we are not required to 'find a case in which "the very action in question has previously been held unlawful,"'but, 'in the light of pre-existing law, the unlawfulness must be apparent.' . . Initially, '[t]he proposition that deliberate indifference to a prisoner's medical needs can amount to a constitutional violation has been well-settled since Estelle in 1976.'. . Furthermore, we have already noted that this Circuit's precedent is clear that neglecting a prisoner's medical need and interrupting a prescribed plan of treatment, even for a relatively short period, can constitute a constitutional violation. . . Thus, it was 'clearly established' in 2011, at the time of Darrah's transfer to MCI, that neglecting to provide a prisoner with needed medication, choosing to prescribe an arguably less efficacious treatment method, and continuing on a treatment path that was clearly ineffective could constitute a constitutional violation.")

Guy v. Nashville, No. 16-6100, 2017 WL 1476896, at *3–4 (6th Cir. Apr. 25, 2017) (not reported) ("Taking a different tack on appeal, Romines argues that this right was not clearly established at the time of the alleged violation. Although this argument was not made in the district court, we exercise our discretion to consider the issue because it is a legal question within our jurisdiction and resolution of the defendant's asserted qualified-immunity defense would further the progress of the litigation. . . The essence of this argument is that the use of force in this case occurred prior to the Supreme Court's adoption of the objective reasonableness standard in Kingsley. It is true that there was disagreement among the circuits prior to Kingsley about whether a claim of excessive force 'brought by a pretrial detainee must satisfy the subjective standard or only the objective standard.'. . But, a defendant is not entitled to qualified immunity 'simply because the courts have not 'agreed upon the precise formulation of the [applicable] standard.' Harris v. City of Circleville, 583 F.3d 356, 367 (6th Cir. 2009) (alteration in original) (quoting Saucier v. Katz, 533 U.S. 194, 202-03 (2001)). Rather, the question under the second prong of the qualified-immunity analysis 'is whether it would be clear to a reasonable officer that his conduct was unlawful in the situation he confronted.'. . Although there need not be a case directly on point, 'existing precedent must have placed the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate.'. . The right must not be defined at a 'high level of generality,' and the 'dispositive question is "whether the violative nature of particular conduct is clearly established."'. . . At the time of the use-of-force incident in September 2013, this court applied analogous standards to excessive-force claims brought under the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments. . . That is, under either amendment the question was whether the use of force was applied in a good-faith effort to maintain or restore discipline, or maliciously and sadistically for the purpose of causing harm. . . The force need not have been absolutely necessary, but we asked in Griffin 'whether the use of force could plausibly have been thought necessary.'. . In Griffin, this court held that the prison officials' use of a leg-sweep maneuver to gain control over a pretrial detainee who created a disturbance, resisted being moved, and struggled as two officers tried to guide her away from a nurse's station did not violate this standard. . . In Williams, prison officials used a chemical agent and assault team on an inmate who was ordered to 'pack up' his cell and responded by asking, 'What for, sir?' Williams v. Curtin, 631 F.3d 380, 384 (6th Cir. 2011). We concluded in Williams that the facts, if true, could permit a finding that the use of force was unnecessary, was not applied in a good-faith effort to maintain or restore discipline, and was possibly motivated by malicious purpose. . . Viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to plaintiff, we conclude that a reasonable officer would have been on notice in September 2013 that use of a chemical agent on a non-threatening pretrial detainee who did not comply with the officer's verbal orders and then passively resisted an open-handed escort by hesitating and stopping to turn to ask again about seeing a nurse would amount to constitutionally excessive force. The denial of qualified immunity with respect to this claim was not error.")

Evans v. Plummer, 687 F. App'x 434, ___ (6th Cir. 2017) ("In sum, Evans 'fail[s] to identify a case where an officer acting under similar circumstances as [Feehan] was held to have violated the Fourth Amendment.'. . Thus, 'in the light of pre-existing law,' it was not apparent that pointing a taser at Evans violated the Fourth Amendment. . . We therefore reverse the denial of qualified immunity to Feehan.")

Littlejohn v. Myers, 684 F. App'x 563, ___ (6th Cir. 2017) ("Myers' conclusion that Littlejohn constituted a threat rests entirely on a misplaced belief that Littlejohn was armed, and that he previously attempted a robbery. But at the moment that he was shot, it is hard to see what threat of serious harm Littlejohn posed to anyone in the alley. Upon resisting arrest by merely bucking his hips and evading Myers' grasp, Littlejohn never explicitly threatened Myers, never reached for a weapon, and never attempted to strike the officer. Instead, he immediately began to run. During his flight, Littlejohn did not reach to his side or make any comparable gesture that may have given a reasonable officer the impression that Littlejohn posed a serious threat. And the facts indicate that no one beside Myers was in the alley—removing any threat to an innocent bystander. Consequently, we conclude that a reasonable officer would not have exercised deadly force under the circumstances because Littlejohn did not constitute a threat to either the officer or to any bystanders. . . .Our conclusion is further buttressed by the fact Myers never warned Littlejohn that he might shoot, as required by Garner when feasible under the circumstances. . . Consequently, we agree that under Littlejohn's version of the facts, Myers violated Littlejohn's Fourth Amendment rights. . . .The district court held that an officer who employs deadly force against a fleeing suspect without reason to believe that the suspect poses a significant threat of serious physical harm to himself or others constitutes an excessive force violation. In so doing, the district court relied upon this Circuit's 2007 decision, Bouggess v. Mattingly, to say such a right was clearly established. The aforementioned case clearly establishes a constitutional violation when an officer shoots a fleeing suspect in the back without a basis for believing that the suspect poses an imminent threat, regardless of the previous felony the suspect committed. . . As we have previously explained, Littlejohn did not pose a threat to the officer or to any innocent bystanders. Accordingly, a reasonable officer in Myers' position would know that the use of deadly force was not authorized.")

Middaugh v. City of Three Rivers, 684 F. App'x 522, 529-30 (6th Cir. 2017), on remand from Piper v. Middaugh, 136 S. Ct. 2408 (2016) (per curiam) (vacating and remanding for further consideration in light of Mullenix) ("In light of this record, we affirm as a matter of law the district court's conclusion that the Officers acted unreasonably in violation of the Middaughs' Fourth Amendment rights. See Cochran, 656 F.3d at 308 (noting that "police officers [who] take an active role in a seizure or eviction" generally "are not entitled to qualified immunity ... when there is neither a specific court order permitting the officers' conduct nor any exigent circumstance in which the government's interest would outweigh the individual's interest in his property"). . . . In sum, Mullenix instructs that the qualified immunity inquiry must be formulated not based on general principles, but rather on officers' specific conduct, especially in the Fourth Amendment context. Whether the Middaughs' rights were clearly established depends on the 'objective legal reasonableness' of the Officers' specific conduct. . . This fact-specific analysis asks whether reasonable officials in the Officers' positions could have believed that their conduct was lawful at the time. . .We look to the totality of the circumstances here in light of then-existing precedent. For example, although we find the Officers' conduct here more similar to the physical interventions in Cochran and Hensley than the distant observation in Coleman, the conduct in both Cochran and Hensley includes some substantive distinctions from the Officers' conduct here. In those two cases, the officers engaged in direct confrontations with the plaintiffs. The officials in Cochran threatened to arrest the plaintiff, and in Hensley an official brandished his handgun, broke a car window, and pulled the plaintiff out of her car. Although the Officers here came onto the Middaughs' property, parked a patrol car between the Buick and the Middaughs' home, and stayed until Chrystal left with the Buick, the Officers neither threatened arrest nor used force. They had no direct interaction with the Plaintiffs. In light of the analysis in Mullenix, we find it not beyond debate that reasonable officers in their position could have believed their conduct was lawful under then-existing precedent. It is important to note that Mullenix does 'not require a case directly on point,' 136 S. Ct. at 308, and 'the very action in question' need not have 'previously been held unlawful,' Hope v. Pelzer, 536 U.S. 730, 739 (2002). For example, 'a general constitutional rule already identified in the decisional law may apply with obvious clarity to the specific conduct in question.'. . Mullenix does not undermine our circuit's longstanding holding that 'an action's unlawfulness can be apparent from direct holdings, from specific examples described as prohibited, or from the general reasoning that a court employs.'. . However, there is sufficient daylight between the Officers' conduct here and the conduct in Cochran and Hensley that those precedents may not 'apply with obvious clarity to [this] specific conduct.'. . Therefore, Officers Piper and Gipson are entitled to qualified immunity.")

King v. Harwood, 852 F.3d 568, 581-83 (6th Cir. 2017), cert. denied, 138 S. Ct. ___ (2018) ("[E]ven if King did impliedly concede probable cause by signing the Alford plea, that does not retroactively prove that there had been probable cause to support King's prosecution all along. . . .Nothing in Broaddus helps Defendants to use King's vacated Alford plea to prove, at summary judgment, that no reasonable trier of fact could find a lack of probable cause to support King's prosecution. Further, once the strength of the Alford plea is removed from the district court's probable-cause analysis, a genuine issue of material fact remains as to whether the 'facts and circumstances' known to Harwood would be 'sufficient to lead an ordinarily prudent person to believe' that King was guilty of murdering Breeden. . . . [I]n light of the fact that all reasonable inferences must be given to King at the summary-judgment stage, the district court erred in holding that King would be unable to prove the requisite lack of probable cause to win her malicious-prosecution claim. . . .[I]ndividuals have a clearly established Fourth Amendment right to be free from malicious prosecution by a defendant who has 'made, influenced, or participated in the decision to prosecute the plaintiff' by, for example, 'knowingly or recklessly' making false statements that are material to the prosecution either in reports or in affidavits filed to secure warrants. . . .Though our ultimate ruling is based on the written record, Defendants' arguments at oral argument reflect just how much of the dispute before us consists of contested facts. Summary judgment is therefore inappropriate for disposing of King's malicious-prosecution claim against Harwood. We therefore hold that the district court erred in granting summary judgment for Harwood on the issue of Harwood's qualified immunity from suit.")

Arrington-Bey v. City of Bedford Heights, 858 F.3d 988, 992-94 (6th Cir. 2017), cert. denied, 138 S. Ct. ___ (2018) ("The second prong resolves this case. Because no case clearly established the unlawfulness of the decisions made during Omar's arrest and detention, the officers involved are entitled to qualified immunity. Yes, 'a pretrial detainee's right to medical treatment for a serious medical need has been established since at least 1987.'. . . And yes, that right encompasses physiological and psychiatric ailments. . . But these principles do not suffice on their own. . . The Supreme Court recently reminded us that a plaintiff must identify a case with a similar fact pattern that would have given 'fair and clear warning to officers' about what the law requires. [White v. Pauly] The district court, we note, did not have the benefit of Pauly. But we do, and accordingly we must follow its lead. Immunity protects 'all but the plainly incompetent or those who knowingly violate the law.'. .Arrington-Bey has not pointed to, and we have not found, any case like this one—a case showing to 'all but the plainly incompetent' that the officers at the scene immediately needed to seek medical treatment or that the jailers had to do the same once he arrived at the prison. . . .Arrington-Bey's case citations are at least one step removed from this fact pattern. We begin with, and could end with, the reality that she points to no Supreme Court or Sixth Circuit case that requires officers to take a delusional arrestee like Omar to a hospital rather than a jail. Each of Arrington-Bey's cases fails to address this point, and not one involves remotely comparable facts. . . .In short, no clearly established law, here or anywhere else from what we've seen, required the arresting officers to drive Omar to a hospital rather than the jail under these circumstances. . . .Even if the jail officers knew that Omar was bipolar and delusional, no clearly established law required them to do more than what they did: They kept him in seclusion for everyone's safety, waited until he was calm to feed him and book him, asked him about any psychiatric diagnoses during the medical screening, and after eight hours of detention uncuffed him and released him from his cell to make a call to be released on bail. Because a reasonable officer in the situations confronted by officers Honsaker, Ellis, Chow, Hill, Lee, Mudra, Sindone, and Leonardi could have believed their treatment of Omar was lawful, they each are entitled to qualified immunity.")

Scott v. Kent County, 679 F. App'x 435, 441 (6th Cir. 2017) ("While Scott was being removed from a cell for disruptive conduct, he stepped towards Lyons in close quarters, unhandcuffed and with clenched fists. We have not found other Supreme Court or Circuit precedent that would have put Lyons on notice that his takedown was an excessive use of force in this situation. Because Scott has not met his burden on this inquiry, we affirm the district court's grant of summary judgment to Lyons on the basis of qualified immunity.")

Scott v. Kent County, 679 F. App'x 435, 441-42 (6th Cir. 2017) (Moore, J., dissenting) ("I disagree with the majority that Lyons is entitled to qualified immunity. There is ample evidence that 'the right which was violated was clearly established' in our circuit. . . We have held that an officer's conduct is not objectively reasonable where he performs a 'takedown' of an individual already in custody, who, despite being argumentative and possibly intoxicated, was not actually aggressive against any officers. . . .Although the video confirms that Scott was unruly and yelling in the holding cell, there is no indication that he was being physically aggressive toward any officers.")

Hermansen v. Thompson, No. 16-6197, 2017 WL 438225, at *3–4 (6th Cir. Feb. 1, 2017) (not published) ("As recently as last month, the Supreme Court unanimously and insistently reaffirmed its repeated admonition that, for purposes of qualified immunity, 'clearly established law' is not to be defined 'at a high level of generality,' but must be defined in a 'particularized' sense. . . The Court reiterated that although 'general statements of the law are not inherently incapable of giving fair and clear warning' to government officials, their conduct is protected by qualified immunity unless its unlawfulness was 'apparent' or 'obvious' in light of pre-existing law. . .Applying this teaching, we find the instant record devoid of support, in fact or law, for the notion that it should have been obvious to defendants that their provision of kosher food products to Hermansen, prepared in a separate kitchen facility, was nonetheless violative of his First Amendment free exercise rights because the same utensils used to prepare or serve otherwise approved meat products had also been used to prepare or serve otherwise approved dairy products, at some point, without having first been kashered and certified by a rabbi. Hermansen contends these defendants are without excuse because they were on notice of the Froman case, where Kosher Meal Program Guidelines were implemented by agreement at KSR as early as 2010. Yet, even if one or more of the individual defendants was actually aware of the guidelines implemented by agreement at KSR, the fact remains that no court had, in authoritative precedent, interpreted the First Amendment as requiring strict compliance with the guidelines, whether at KSR or elsewhere. Even though the Froman agreement was enforced by district court order, it never ripened into a precedential ruling on the merits of the free exercise claim. The Froman agreement simply did not become precedent defining the 'clearly established law.' Accordingly, there was no error in the district court's ruling that defendants are protected from damages liability by qualified immunity and are therefore entitled to summary judgment on Hermansen's First Amendment claim under 42 U.S.C. § 1983.")

Courtright v. City of Battle Creek, 839 F.3d 513, 520 (6th Cir. 2016) ("Having failed to establish that Courtright's factual allegations did not plausibly allege the violation of a constitutional right, the defendants argue, in the alternative, that it was not clearly established that handcuffing without physically injuring the suspect constitutes excessive force. The premise of this argument is flawed. As discussed, Courtright did suffer physical injury: he suffered pain as a result of the manner in which he was handcuffed. Moreover, the relevant clearly established right in our circuit is 'freedom from excessively forceful or unduly tight handcuffing.'. . 'Requiring any more particularity than this would contravene the Supreme Court's explicit rulings that neither a "materially similar," "fundamentally similar," or "case directly on point"—let alone a factually identical case—is required, and that the specific acts or conduct at issue need not previously have been found unconstitutional for a right to be clearly established law.'. . Therefore, we affirm the district court's order denying the motion to dismiss the excessive-force claim based on qualified immunity.")

Stamm v. Miller, 657 F. App'x 492 (6th Cir. 2016) ("We have held that '[i]t has been settled law for a generation that, under the Fourth Amendment, '"w]here a suspect poses no immediate threat to the officer and no threat to others, the harm resulting from failing to apprehend him does not justify the use of deadly force to do so."'. . Though Walker was decided after the events giving rise to this case, its principle was not new, as we explicitly noted. In that case, which involved a collision similar to the one here, we noted that '[i]t is only common sense—and obviously so—that intentionally ramming a motorcycle with a police cruiser involves the application of potentially deadly force.'. . Thus, it is clearly established law that an officer may not use his police vehicle to intentionally hit a motorcycle unless the suspect on the motorcycle poses a threat to the officer or others. The evidence, construed in the light most favorable to Mrs. Stamm, indicates a violation of a clearly established constitutional right. Under Mrs. Stamm's version of the facts, Miller intended to block Stamm's passage with his police cruiser, causing the deadly collision. As the district court observed, the risk to others at the time of Miller's use of force was minimal, as there were no other vehicles in sight, and Stamm's motorcycle posed little threat to Miller, who was inside a much-larger vehicle. Because the facts as interpreted in the light most favorable to Mrs. Stamm indicate a violation of a clearly established constitutional right, and material facts are in dispute, the district court properly denied summary judgment to Miller").

Gohl v. Livonia Public Schools School Dist., 836 F.3d 672, 680-81 (6th Cir. 2016) ("The head-grabbing incident here mirrors the head-grabbing incident in Domingo and involves far less illegitimate force than the act of binding a student to a gurney and gagging him. What was true in Domingo is true here. While Turbiak's 'educational and disciplinary methods ... may have been inappropriate' and 'insensitive,' they are not 'unconstitutional.'. . . The Fourteenth Amendment's right to be free from excessive force may include, we have said, protection from physical force that causes only psychological injury. . . But we have never said that purely psychological bullying can suffice to shock the conscience. And we certainly have not said so with clarity that 'place[s] the ... constitutional question beyond debate.'. . That necessarily means that the right Gohl asserts is not clearly established, making Turbiak eligible for qualified immunity.")

Gohl v. Livonia Public Schools School Dist., 836 F.3d 672, 698 (6th Cir. 2016) (Clay, J., dissenting) ("By fundamentally misapplying well-settled summary judgment standards, ignoring some of the most important facts, and disregarding evidence favorable to Gohl, the majority reveals how result-oriented it is in attempting to reach its own conclusions. The majority's approach to this case sidesteps the Supreme Court's clear direction that when reviewing a summary judgment decision, an appellate court must examine the evidence in the light most favorable to the nonmoving party and draw all inferences in that party's favor. This basic and fundamental principle of civil procedure seems lost on the majority in this case. All that matters here is that Gohl has presented enough evidence to create a genuine issue of material fact on each of her claims, and as a result, her case should go to a jury. For these reasons, this case should be reversed and remanded. I respectfully dissent.")

Gavitt v. Born, 835 F.3d 623, 648 (6th Cir. 2016) ("In Osborne, 557 U.S. at 68, the Supreme Court noted that 'nothing in our precedents' suggests that the prosecutor's obligation to disclose Brady material to the defendant before trial continues after the defendant is convicted and the case is closed. Gavitt has failed to cite any contrary authority. To the extent due process could be deemed to include such an obligation, it is not yet a matter of clearly established law and defendants are entitled to qualified immunity.")

D.E. v. Doe, 834 F.3d 723, 729, 733 (6th Cir. 2016) (Keith, J., concurring in the judgment) ("I cannot join the majority's interpretation of the Fourth Amendment. In holding that Customs and Border Protection ("CBP") officers may, without reasonable suspicion, search individuals who are not in the process of crossing an international border, the majority stretches the 'border search' exception to its breaking point. . . .While I am inclined to conclude that the right was clearly established, three other judges (the two on this panel, and the district court judge) have concluded—for whatever reason—that our unpublished decision in Humphries can be read as sanctioning the conduct in this case. While I disagree for the reasons explained above, Humphries' supposed muddling of the waters in this area compels me to conclude that it less likely that a reasonable official would have known that his conduct violated a clearly established right. See Sheets v. Moore, 97 F.3d 164, 168 (6th Cir. 1996) ("If federal district judges could reasonably disagree over the constitutionality of the regulation, then it can fairly be said that a reasonable official would not have known that his conduct violated a clearly established right."). Therefore, I concur in the judgment of the majority to dismiss D.E.'s civil rights complaint.")

Schattilly, ex rel A.F. v. Daugharty, 656 F. App'x 123, ___ (6th Cir. 2016)("With respect to her first claim, Schattilly has not identified any cases that support her contention that, in May 2011, it was clearly established that interviewing a juvenile about suspected parental abuse or neglect without parental consent violates a parent's First Amendment or Fourteenth Amendment rights. This is not surprising. First, these rights are typically grounded in the Fourteenth Amendment, not the First Amendment. . . And second, we recently held that as of January 2011, this right—as it pertains to the Fourteenth Amendment—was not clearly established. See Barber v. Miller, 809 F.3d 840, 842 (6th Cir. 2015). . . . Additionally, in an unpublished case, we held that, as of January 2010, it was not clearly established that interviewing a child in an abuse-and-neglect investigation without the parent's consent violated the parent's Fourteenth Amendment rights. Brent v. Wenk, 555 F. App'x 519, 530 (6th Cir. 2014). Schattilly does not provide any bases on which to distinguish Barber or Brent, nor does she point to any developments in the law from January 2011 to May 2011 that would warrant a different conclusion. . . Accordingly, we hold that officials do not violate clearly established First Amendment or Fourteenth Amendment rights by interviewing a child about suspected abuse or neglect by the parent without the parent's consent.")

Williams v. Morgan, 652 F. App'x 365, 374-75 (6th Cir. 2016) ("Officer Morgan also argues that the prohibition against this force was not clearly established. That is, under the facts established for purposes of this appeal, Officer Morgan is contending that he had no forewarning that it would be improper for him to accost a 13-year old girl, without provocation or resistance, use his size advantage to place her physically against a wall; verbally menace or threaten her while he twisted her arm behind her back and lifted her off the floor until he broke that arm; and then maintain pressure on that broken arm, despite her pleas for relief, as he forced her down the hall to the principal's office with further verbal threats. We disagree. This was clearly established. See Norton v. Stille, 526 F. App'x 509, 513-14 (6th Cir. 2013) (holding that the prohibition against gratuitous force was clearly established as of October 2010). But, even lacking a specific case on point, we conclude that this conduct, as alleged, was so gratuitous that Officer Morgan was nonetheless 'on notice that [this] conduct violate[d] established law even in novel factual circumstances.' See Hope, 536 U.S. at 741. Officer Morgan is not entitled to qualified immunity on this basis.")

Smith v. City of Wyoming, 821 F.3d 697, 711 (6th Cir. 2016) ("On the facts developed thus far, taken in a light favorable to Smith, the officers violated her Fourth Amendment rights when they made a warrantless entry into her home on March 9, 2012. The Supreme Court has consistently validated the right to retreat into one's home and avoid contact with the police. . . Any reasonable officer would have understood that to enter a private home after being expressly told the occupant could not speak with him, in the course of a routine child welfare check, flies in the face of this clearly established law. Qualified immunity does not protect the officers from liability for the constitutional violation under these circumstances. We therefore vacate the entry of judgment for the officers on this claim.")

Rapp v. Putman, 644 F. App'x 621, 627-28 (6th Cir. 2016) ("To state a valid Fourth Amendment malicious-prosecution claim, a plaintiff must establish four elements: (1) a criminal prosecution was initiated against the plaintiff and the defendant made, influenced, or participated in the decision to prosecute; (2) there was no probable cause for the criminal prosecution; (3) as a consequence of the legal proceeding, the plaintiff suffered a deprivation of liberty apart from the initial seizure; and (4) the criminal proceeding was resolved in the plaintiff's favor. . . . The sole basis for plaintiff's retaliation claim against Poston is his refusal to intervene and stop the prosecution. Even reading plaintiff's complaint generously, it alleges a merely 'passive[ ] or neutral [ ]' role in the prosecution, insufficient to state a claim for malicious prosecution. . . Finally, by far the most evident deficiency in plaintiff's complaint is his failure to allege the third element, a 'deprivation of liberty.'. . Nowhere in his complaint does plaintiff allege that he was 'seized' or otherwise detained following the issuance of the citation. . . .The closest he comes is alleging that he 'was subject to the authority of the 54–B District Court or appellate Courts as a direct and proximate result of the conduct of Defendants.' This allegation echoes Justice Ginsburg's 'continuing seizure' doctrine from her concurrence in Albright v. Oliver, 510 U.S. 266 (1994), in which she argued that 'a defendant [released pretrial] is ... indeed "seized" for trial, so long as he is bound to appear in court and answer the state's charges.'. . However, neither the Supreme Court nor this court has adopted the 'continuing seizure' doctrine. . . Thus, even if we assume that being 'subject to the authority of the [court]' constitutes a Fourth Amendment seizure, defendants would still be entitled to qualified immunity because the particularized right alleged—the right to be free from a 'continuing seizure' by virtue of a pending criminal charge—is not clearly established. . . .Having failed to adequately allege several elements of his malicious-prosecution claim, plaintiff has failed to show that defendants violated his constitutional rights. As a result, the district court was correct to dismiss the malicious-prosecution claim, not because it was untimely, but because defendants are entitled to qualified immunity.")

Brown v. Chapman, 814 F.3d 447, 460-62 (6th Cir. 2016) ("The heart of the parties' dispute is over the third factor—whether Brown was actively resisting arrest or attempting to evade arrest by flight. . . .The parties' dispute is resolved by the constraints placed on this court at this point in the litigation. We are obligated to take the plaintiff's facts as true and make all reasonable inferences from those facts in her favor. Accordingly, for the purposes of summary judgment, we assume that the facts show that Brown broke away from the officers in order to avoid further injury, that he was standing still at the time Chapman tasered him, and that therefore Brown was not actively resisting or evading arrest. Thus, a jury could find that Chapman's actions were not objectively reasonable in light of the facts and circumstances confronting him. . . . Mindful of the need to define the right narrowly, . . . we frame this question as whether Brown's right not to be tasered, after having broken away from police officers but while not threatening others or actively resisting arrest, was clearly established as of December 31, 2010. . . .In conducting this analysis, two lines of cases emerge. The first line of cases has held that there is no clearly established right not to be tasered when a suspect is actively resisting arrest. . . .The second line of cases has held that an individual's right to be free from a taser is clearly established when the individual is not actively resisting arrest or is already detained. . . .The right articulated above fits squarely within this second line of cases: as of December 31, 2010, it was clearly established that tasering a non-threatening suspect who was not actively resisting arrest constituted excessive force. Accordingly, Chapman is not entitled to summary judgment regarding the claimed Fourth Amendment violation based on his use of a taser.")

Gardner v. Evans, 811 F.3d 843, 846-48 (6th Cir. 2016) ("First, we address whether a constitutional violation occurred. The Tenants argue that the Inspectors violated their due process rights by failing to provide constitutionally sufficient notice of their ability to appeal the red-tag evictions. . . In response, the Inspectors assert that the telephone number and the offer to answer questions was sufficient to satisfy the constitutional notice requirement. . . They also assert that, because the Lansing Housing and Premises Code was extant and available to the public, the Tenants had constructive notice of the appeals process. . . The district court agreed with the Tenants, holding that our precedent in Flatford clearly established that direct and clear notice of an appeals process is necessary to satisfy the constitutional notice requirement. . . .For purposes of deciding this case, we need not determine whether the red-tags provided by the Inspectors meet the constitutional notice standard that we have just outlined. Even if we assume, without deciding, that the Tenants are correct and that the red-tags were constitutionally infirm, the Tenants cannot satisfy the second prong of the qualified immunity analysis, namely, whether this constitutional notice requirement was clearly established. . . .Flatford stands for the principle that the tenant is entitled to the same notice that is afforded to the landlord. But it does not clearly establish the particularity or specificity required for such notice. A diversity of precedent highlights this general lack of clarity regarding the notice requirement for a post-deprivation appeals process. . . . Flatford did not clearly establish that a notice of eviction must include an explicit reference to the availability of any post-deprivation appeals process and the manner in such an appeal may be pursued. The case law is not so clear on this point as to render the Inspectors' actions unreasonable.")

Snow v. Nelson, 634 F. App'x 151, ___ (6th Cir. 2015) ("Here, the State did not secure a criminal conviction by improperly withholding exculpatory evidence. On the contrary, the record is clear that the State was complying with discovery requests. Moreover, there is no question that before a plea was discussed or trial dates set, Snow's attorney learned of the allegedly exculpatory information. Perhaps Snow would have been released earlier had the alleged misidentification come to light sooner, but he can have no complaints about the ultimate outcome of his case. The fifty-two days Snow spent in jail awaiting a plea or a trial is simply not the type of deprivation Brady claims are intended to remedy. Even were we to recognize a Brady claim in this context, defendants would be entitled to qualified immunity. As we held in Robertson v. Lucas, our precedent does not support any clearly established right of criminal defendants to receive exculpatory Brady material before plea bargaining. . . There, the court found that while every reasonable officer 'would know that they were under an obligation to present Brady material to the prosecutors in time for its effective use at trial,' the officers were under 'no clearly established obligation to disclose exculpatory Brady material to the prosecutors in time to be put to effective use in plea bargaining.'. . Here, Snow's attorney was aware of the alleged misidentification prior to any plea bargaining. Thus, defendants are well within the ambit of qualified immunity.")

Devlin v. Kalm, 630 F. App'x 534, 538-39 (6th Cir. 2015) ("Devlin also must show that his First Amendment rights in this setting were clearly established when the agency fired him on July 24, 2008. This is rarely an easy question given the fact-specific nature of Pickering-balancing inquiries, but Devlin satisfies the test in this instance. It was well established that Devlin's speech on the regulation of tribes addressed a matter of public concern. . . And it was well established that he spoke outside the duties of his employment. . . As to the third question, our Pickering caselaw points in the same direction. It was well established by mid–2008 that Devlin's speech 'substantially involved matters of public concern' and thus the officers had to 'make a particularly strong showing that the employee's speech interfered with workplace functioning before taking action.'. . And a reasonable officer could not find that Devlin's speech was sufficiently disruptive of the internal workplace—which Pickering balancing is primarily focused on—to lose protection. . . . In scenarios such as this one—where the violation of a constitutional right is 'so obvious that a materially similar case would be unnecessary'—a case directly on point (which is lacking here) is not required. Paterek v. Vill. of Armada, 801 F.3d 630, 651–52 (6th Cir.2015). Devlin's First Amendment rights were clearly established.")

Stinebaugh v. City of Wapakoneta, 630 F. App'x 522, 531 (6th Cir. 2015) ("Rains and Krites argue that they are entitled to qualified immunity because reasonable officials could have believed that Stinebaugh's speech was not protected. We disagree. The district court properly found that reasonable officials in Rains's and Krites's positions could not have believed their conduct was lawful given the state of the law as it existed at the time of the events giving rise to this action. . . . Likewise, it is clearly established in this circuit that an off-duty public employee who speaks to city council members about city expenditures may be a private citizen for First Amendment purposes, even if those comments involve expenditures by his own agency or department. . .Thus, the district court properly denied qualified immunity.")

Bible Believers v. Wayne Cnty., Mich., 805 F.3d 228, 252, 257-60 (6th Cir. 2015) (en banc) ("The Supreme Court, in Cantwell, Terminiello, Edwards, Cox, and Gregory, has repeatedly affirmed the principle that 'constitutional rights may not be denied simply because of hostility to their assertion or exercise.'. . . If the speaker's message does not fall into one of the recognized categories of unprotected speech, . . . the message does not lose its protection under the First Amendment due to the lawless reaction of those who hear it. Simply stated, the First Amendment does not permit a heckler's veto. In this Circuit, a modicum of confusion is understandable with respect to the prohibition against the heckler's veto due to Glasson's discussion of a good-faith affirmative defense. However, this defense is inconsistent with subsequent Supreme Court precedent, with the strict scrutiny that must be applied to content-based discrimination, and with the superseding affirmative defense to a § 1983 suit—qualified immunity. . . Therefore, to the extent that *Glasson'*s good-faith defense may be interpreted as altering the substantive duties of a police officer not to effectuate a heckler's veto, it is overruled. . . . Whether Deputy Chiefs Richardson and Jaafar can be held liable for civil damages is a separate question from whether their actions violated the Constitution. . . Although Glasson spoke about a good-faith defense, qualified immunity—announced seven years after Glasson in Harlow v. Fitzgerald—is the presently available affirmative defense for government officials subject to liability under § 1983. . . . Deputy Chief Defendants Richardson and Jaafar contend that, 'no "clearly established" law existed on the subject of correct law enforcement response to a situation where speakers may or may not be engaged in protected speech, the audience in proximity to the speech reacts violently, and the deputies do not have sufficient manpower to restrain the audience, to protect the speakers, and to ensure their own safety.'. . The Deputy Chiefs' position is untenable and unsupported by the record. As is evident from the Supreme Court opinions detailed above, and as explicitly stated in Glasson, '[a] police officer has the duty not to ratify and effectuate a heckler's veto.... Instead, he must take reasonable action to protect from violence persons exercising their constitutional rights.'. . Defendants were specifically put on notice of this requirement, insofar as the Bible Believers quoted this precise language in a letter that was sent to Wayne County. To the extent that Glasson's discussion of a good-faith defense confused the issue of whether a heckler's veto constitutes a constitutional violation, the facts and analysis in Glasson nonetheless alerted Defendants that removing a peaceful speaker, when the police have made no serious attempt to quell the lawless agitators, could subject them to liability. . . .Defendants emphasize the fact that Glasson involved an officer tearing up a sign in response to agitated hecklers, as opposed to officers removing a speaker in an attempt to quell an angry crowd that was actually engaged in violent retaliation. These distinctions are immaterial. The violence here was not substantial, much less overwhelming, and speech, whether it be oration or words written on a poster, is speech nonetheless. Moreover, this case was also about removing from view signs that were considered offensive by a group of hecklers—as Israel informed the Deputy Chiefs, his group was no longer preaching during the latter portion of the onslaught against them. Finally, it should be noted that Glasson involved a more compelling state interest—protection of the President—yet the officers' actions were still deemed to be unreasonable. . . .Had the Bible Believers refused to leave, and consequently been arrested, charged, and convicted of disorderly conduct, the convictions could certainly be held invalid pursuant to Gregory. . . The Bible Believers' decision to comply with the police officers' demands, under threat of arrest for disorderly conduct—as opposed to the speaker's decision in Gregory to disregard the officer's command—cannot stand for the proposition that there was no clearly established law as to whether the police may threaten to arrest a peaceful speaker in order to calm a hostile crowd of hecklers. . . Gregory, like this case, involved protestors who used offensive language and, in response, were assaulted with debris by a violent crowd of hecklers. On facts such as these, state-sanctioned penalties for alleged breaches of the peace cannot withstand constitutional scrutiny.")

Welch v. Spaulding, 627 F. App'x 479, 484 (6th Cir. 2015) ("The legal question of immunity will ultimately depend on which version of the facts the jury finds most credible. Brandenburg v. Cureton, 882 F.2d 211, 216 (6th Cir.1989). Thus, we find as a matter of law that it is clearly established that the prison must provide adequate nutrition to prisoners, despite religious restrictions. Welch has demonstrated that his allegations—if accepted by a jury—give rise to a constitutional violation. He has therefore made Plumhoff's required showing to defeat defendants' claim of qualified immunity at this stage, and established a genuine issue of material fact regarding whether the particular restricted diet in his case was so lacking as to violate this established right. Accordingly, we AFFIRM the district court's order denying qualified immunity.")

Welch v. Spaulding, 627 F. App'x 479, 484-88 (6th Cir. 2015) (McKeague, J., dissenting) ("This qualified-immunity case presents two purely legal questions of constitutional interpretation. After taking the facts in the light most favorable to the plaintiff—i.e., that the prisoner (Welch) received only 1,300 calories a day for the month of his religious fast—we must decide (1) whether administering such a diet violated the Constitution; and (2) if so, whether that violation was clearly established at the time of the fast. . . . The majority answered 'yes' to both questions, affirming the district court's denial qualified immunity. I would answer 'no' to both, because Welch has not met his burden of producing evidence that shows a constitutional violation, much less a clearly established one. The majority, however, affirms the district judge's improper denial of qualified immunity—improper both because (A) Welch did not meet his burden of producing evidence that the officials violated the Constitution; and because (B) even if they did violate the Constitution, the right at issue was not clearly established. Accordingly, I respectfully dissent. . . . It all, then, boils down to this: The majority holds that the First Amendment requires a specific number of calories during a religious fast. That's the only possible way to understand its judgment. It doesn't matter that the lower number of calories didn't cause any substantial burden-none. All that matters is that the number of calories the plaintiff received was less than the other inmates or others in the plaintiff's age group. Lacking even an alleged substantial burden, Welch cannot make out a First Amendment violation. . . .As misguided as the majority's novel constitutional holding is, the error in its determination of the clearly established law is worse. Even assuming the defendants violated Welch's First Amendment right to a nutritionally adequate diet during a prison fast, how can we possibly hold that such a violation was clearly established? There is simply no way that 'every reasonable official would have understood' that administering a 1,300–calorie–per–day diet for thirty days during an inmate's religious fast—with no evident or even alleged adverse effects to the inmate—violates the First Amendment. . . These officials should not be subject to personal liability because, if nothing else, Welch has not met his burden of showing that they violated a 'clearly established' constitutional right. . . . I've already gone through all the cases the majority cites, and none of them establishes anything more than the generalized right to a 'nutritionally adequate diet' during a religious fast. That was enough for the district court, and it's apparently enough for the majority, too. But it shouldn't be. The Supreme Court has 'repeatedly told courts ... not to define clearly established law at a high level of generality.'. . Courts must instead define the law in a particularized sense, by looking for a body of law that 'squarely governs' the conduct at issue. . . The majority's cited cases no more 'squarely govern' this case than Graham v. Connor, 490 U.S. 386 (1989), 'squarely governs' all excessive-force cases. . . Indeed, until now, not one Sixth Circuit case has even allowed this kind of alleged violation to proceed to a jury. How, then, can the right be clearly established? The majority's telling silence on this issue—and its telling failure to even try to support its prong-two conclusion with caselaw—suffices to demonstrate its error. If anything is clearly established here, it's that this was not a clearly established constitutional violation. . . .To affirm on the ground that the defendants violated a clearly established First Amendment right is wrong both because of the startling lack of facts to prove such a violation and because of the even-more-startling lack of caselaw to clearly establish that right.")

Paterek v. Vill. of Armada, Mich., 801 F.3d 630, 650-51 (6th Cir. 2015) ("Defendants contend that Delecke is entitled to qualified immunity with respect to each of the constitutional claims, but they fail to offer any analysis on this point, other than to say that Delecke's actions did not offend the Constitution. This failure to address the clearly established prong of our inquiry is unsurprising given the complete absence of case law with remotely comparable fact patterns—a point, which at first glance, seems to weigh in favor of Delecke's claim for qualified immunity. . . However, 'a case directly on point' is not required to establish that the law is clearly established, Ashcroft v. al-Kidd, 563 U.S. 731, 131 S.Ct. 2074, 2083, 179 L.Ed.2d 1149 (2011), because '[s]ome violations of constitutional rights are so obvious that a materially similar case' would be unnecessary, Hearring v. Sliwowski, 712 F.3d 275, 280 (6th Cir.2013). At bottom, the dispositive inquiry is whether, at the time of injury, the law was 'sufficiently clear [such] that a reasonable official would understand that what he [was] doing violate[d]' the plaintiff's constitutional rights. . . The allegations in this case, if proven, would constitute an obvious violation of Plaintiffs' constitutional rights of which any reasonable official should have been aware. Viewed in the light most favorable to Plaintiffs, the facts suggest that Delecke used his government post to harass and retaliate against Plaintiffs by causing tickets to be issued and by denying Plaintiffs the rights bestowed to them under their SALUs. It is fundamental that the right to be free of such retaliation, arbitrary and capricious state action, and disparate treatment with no rational basis is clearly established.")

Baynes v. Cleland, 799 F.3d 600, 611-16 & n.3 (6th Cir. 2015) ("In Hope, the Supreme Court established that, for purposes of qualified immunity, the precise factual scenario need not have been found unconstitutional for it to be sufficiently clear to a reasonable official that his actions violate a constitutional right—that is, for the right to be 'clearly established.'. . In fact, the Supreme Court determined that government officials can still be on notice that their conduct violates established law even in novel factual circumstances. . . .To be sure, the Supreme Court also has also explained that generalizations and abstract propositions are insufficient to establish the law clearly. . . .Reading these cases together, the Supreme Court has made clear that the sine qua non of the 'clearly established' inquiry is 'fair warning.'. . While it is apparent that courts should not define clearly established law at a high level of generality, it is equally apparent that this does not mean that 'a case directly on point' is required. . . In fact, under Hope, a requirement that a prior case be 'fundamentally' or 'materially' similar to the present case would be too rigid an application of the clearly established inquiry. . . Rather, 'existing precedent must have placed the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate,' al-Kidd, 131 S.Ct. at 2083, although the specific conduct need not have been found unconstitutional. . . Our task, then, is to determine whether the contours of the right at issue have been made sufficiently clear to give a reasonable official fair warning that the conduct at issue was unconstitutional. This test has been applied, both explicitly and implicitly, in our own jurisprudence. . . In applying this test, both pre- and post-Hope, we have found that freedom from excessively forceful or unduly tight handcuffing is a clearly established right for purposes of qualified immunity. . . .The extent of case law in this Circuit suffices to put a reasonable officer on notice that excessively forceful or unduly tight handcuffing is a constitutional violation under the Fourth Amendment. The cases in this Circuit place it beyond peradventure that such a right exists; thus, the law is sufficiently clear for the purpose of the clearly established prong of the qualified immunity analysis. These cases define the right that is clearly established not at a high level of generality or on the basis of a broad historical proposition, . . . but rather, in a particularized context: excessively forceful or unduly tight handcuffing, a type of excessive force, is a type of Fourth Amendment violation, which, in turn, is a constitutional violation. This level of particularity in defining the constitutional right easily meets the standards set out by the Supreme Court, which requires that the contours of a right to be sufficiently clear under preexisting law. . . Although the court first found the constitutional right at issue clearly established in this Circuit, in its subsequent pursuit of what it called a 'more particularized inquiry,' it then determined that the law had not been clearly established, essentially because no prior case presented the exact factual circumstances present in this case. The factual nuances the district court noted to distinguish Baynes' case from this Court's extensive precedent on unduly tight handcuffing amount to precisely the kind of rigidity the Supreme Court foreclosed in Hope. Hope was unequivocal in mandating that precise factual similarity is not required . . . . In this case, under the guise of determining whether the law regarding excessively forceful handcuffing is clearly established, the district court essentially made a determination of whether it believed that Deputy Cleland's behavior was reasonable—in other words, whether the deputy should be liable for a claim of unduly tight or excessive handcuffing. But such a determination infringes on the province of the jury and is therefore improper. The trial court had already determined—appropriately so—that Baynes had adduced sufficient evidence to state a claim for excessively forceful handcuffing sufficient to survive a motion for summary judgment. Indeed, Baynes had established already that genuine issues of material fact exist as to whether the deputies acted objectively reasonably. Then, a few pages later, the district court decided that, based on its view of the facts, there was an 'absence of ... egregious, abusive, or malicious conduct' that 'support[ed] the reasonableness of the deputy's conduct.' Such a determination is inappropriate under a 'clearly established' analysis. Once a plaintiff demonstrates a genuine issue of material fact as to whether there has been a constitutional violation, by making out a claim of excessively forceful handcuffing sufficient to survive summary judgment, weighing the evidence and determining whether an officer should be liable are tasks exclusively for the jury. In this case, however, the district court turned the factual determinations best left to the jury into factors militating in favor of qualified immunity. That is not the role of the district court in analyzing the second prong of a qualified immunity analysis; rather, it is to determine whether the law was clearly established at the time of the allegedly unconstitutional conduct. As discussed, supra, while a right may not be 'clearly established' at a 'high level of generality' or by broad historical assertions, neither must the specific conduct at issue have been found unconstitutional for a reasonable officer to be on notice that the conduct is unconstitutional. Rather, the contours of the right must be sufficiently clear such that a reasonable officer has fair warning. . . Such is the case in the Sixth Circuit with respect to the law surrounding excessively forceful or unduly tight handcuffing under the Fourth Amendment. Because, in the Sixth Circuit, the right to be free from excessively forceful or unduly tight handcuffing under the Fourth Amendment is clearly established law, no more specificity in defining this right is required. We recognize, however, that the district court's error was based in part on reliance on our unpublished decisions in Fettes v. Hendershot, 375 F. App'x 528 (6th Cir.2010) and Lee v. City of Norwalk, Ohio, 529 F. App'x 778 (6th Cir.2013). We also note that the case of O'Malley v. City of Flint, 652 F.3d 662 (6th Cir.2011), would seem to disagree with our conclusion here.").

Coley v. Lucas Cnty., Ohio, 799 F.3d 530, 540-41 (6th Cir. 2015) ("The key inquiry is whether a defendant claiming qualified immunity 'was on notice that his alleged actions were unconstitutional.'. . The inquiry 'must be undertaken in light of the specific context of the case, not as a broad general proposition.'. . We look first to Supreme Court decisions, then Sixth Circuit case law in order to determine if the right claimed was clearly established when the events occurred. . . The plaintiff 'has the burden of showing that a right is clearly established,' while the defendant 'carries the burden of showing that the challenged act was objectively reasonable in light of the law existing at the time.'. . At the time of the incident, pretrial detainees had a clearly established right not to be gratuitously assaulted while fully restrained and subdued. . . Under the Fourteenth, Fourth, or Eighth Amendments, assaults on subdued, restrained and nonresisting detainees, arrestees, or convicted prisoners are impermissible. . . The facts alleged show that Schmeltz assaulted the fully restrained Benton so that he fell and hit his head on the cement floor. Schmeltz then attempted to cover up the assault by filing false reports and lying to federal investigators after Benton's death. These actions reasonably lead us to conclude that Schmeltz violated clearly established law and was 'on notice that his alleged actions were unconstitutional.'. . Schmeltz's argument that his actions did not violate clearly established law fails. . . . Having determined that Gray violated Benton's constitutional rights, we turn again to whether the right in question—to be free from deadly physical force such as a chokehold while fully restrained—was clearly established, providing Gray notice that 'what he [was] doing violate[d] that right.'. . Our cases make it abundantly clear that it is constitutionally impermissible to abuse a shackled prisoner to the point of death and then leave him to die in his cell. . . Chokeholds are objectively unreasonable where an individual is already restrained or there is no danger to others. . . Gray's actions as described in the complaint violated clearly established law: Gray put Benton in a chokehold and continued to choke him even after Gray heard him gurgling and another officer told Gray to stop, and Gray left Benton in his cell without medical care. Gray's efforts to hide evidence of his actions, by filing false reports and lying to federal investigators, reasonably lead to the conclusion that he knew he had violated the law. In short, like Schmeltz, Gray behaved like someone who 'was on notice that his alleged actions were unconstitutional.'. . Gray's argument that his actions did not violate clearly established law thus also fails.")

Gradisher v. City of Akron, 794 F.3d 574, 584-86 (6th Cir. 2015) ("Gradisher argues that his 'right to be free from a warrantless forced entry absent exigent circumstances was clearly established on September 2, 2011, and, therefore, these defendants are not entitled to qualified immunity.' But Gradisher frames the issue at too high a level of generality. . .The appropriate question to ask is whether, on September 2, 2011, it was clearly established that no exigent circumstance exists when officers enter a residence in response to multiple erratic 911 calls from there and when they believe that someone inside may have threatened the use of a gun. . . .Viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Gradisher, we are unpersuaded that the defendants violated any of his clearly established rights by entering his house. As our precedent establishes, such an entry may be justified if there is evidence that an individual in a residence has a gun and officials receive a 911 call from within that residence that was hung up. . . . The parties dispute whether or not Gradisher was resisting or refusing to be handcuffed. . . . Thus, whether Gradisher resisted or not and whether he was given an opportunity to comply with commands before, and while, being tased are material facts in dispute. 'Where, as here, the legal question of qualified immunity turns upon which version of the facts one accepts, the jury, not the judge, must determine liability.'. . Accordingly, we reverse the district court's grant of summary judgment to Officer Craft on Gradisher's excessive-force cause of action.")

Booker v. Lapaglia, 617 F. App'x 520, 525-26 (6th Cir. 2015) ("A remand here will result in the district court developing the factual record. Despite the dissent's contentions, Shelton's specific role in the search and his relationship to LaPaglia and the other officers involved in the hospital search cannot be determined on the present record. Despite the lack of record, the dissent improperly reads like an order granting summary judgment against Shelton in Booker's favor by focusing on various facts irrelevant to Shelton's liability, like events leading up to the hospital search not alleged to be constitutional violations. While the dissent suggests there is nothing to be gained from a remand, such factual development of the record may very well entitle Shelton to qualified immunity. At the very least, he will have been heard on that issue. But as it stands now, we cannot distinguish between Shelton's involvement and that of the other officers as is required by our precedent. . . We therefore vacate and remand for the district court to address Shelton's role in the search and to properly evaluate his qualified immunity defense.")

Booker v. Lapaglia, 617 F. App'x 520, 527, 532-35 (6th Cir. 2015) (Karen Nelson More, J., dissenting) ("This appeal is ripe for adjudication because there is nothing more for the district court to do; the record will not change, and neither will the law as of February 12, 2010. . . . When the record is viewed in the light most favorable to Booker, this search violated the Fourth Amendment. A reasonable jury could find that Shelton caused, watched, and was complicit in the unconstitutional searches, and therefore violated the Fourth Amendment. . . .Even if we were not bound by Booker I, however, I would have no trouble finding that the law was clearly established in February 2010 that an officer cannot use private parties to conduct illegal searches. . . . I also believe that it was clearly established that this search was far more invasive than other searches the Supreme Court and other circuits have found unconstitutional. The Supreme Court has declared that forcible surgery and induced vomiting are unreasonable investigative searches. . . I do not have to strain to conclude that penological goals do not justify anesthetizing, paralyzing, intubating, and anally probing someone if induced vomiting is 'too close to the rack and screw to permit constitutional differentiation.'. . Both Rochin and Winston significantly predate this search. . . . Finally, our holding that, on February 12, 2010, the right to be free from forced anesthetization, paralyzation, intubation, and warrantless rectal examinations to prevent a suspect from overdosing on drugs lodged in his rectum was clearly established is consistent with the Ninth Circuit. In George v. Edholm, the Ninth Circuit concluded that a warrantless digital rectal examination and forced sedation and intubation violated the Fourth Amendment. . . Not only was it a constitutional violation, but the right to be free of that procedure had been clearly established long before March 13, 2004. I see no reason to create a circuit split, and therefore would hold that no reasonable officer would believe that this search was reasonable under the circumstances apparent in this record.")

Rudlaff v. Gillispie, 791 F.3d 638, 641-44 (6th Cir. 2015) ("Our cases firmly establish that it is not excessive force for the police to tase someone (even multiple times) when the person is actively resisting arrest. . . Active resistance includes 'physically struggling with, threatening, or disobeying officers.'. . And it includes refusing to move your hands for the police to handcuff you, at least if that inaction is coupled with other acts of defiance. . .But active resistance does not include being 'compliant or hav[ing] stopped resisting,'. . . or having 'done nothing to resist arrest,' or having 'already [been] detained[.]'. . .A simple dichotomy thus emerges: When a suspect actively resists arrest, the police can use a taser (or a knee strike) to subdue him; but when a suspect does not resist, or has stopped resisting, they cannot. . . .A reasonable police officer observing this scene in the heat of the moment did not need to give Carpenter any more time to comply before tasing him. Because Carpenter 'actively resist[ed] arrest and refus[ed] to be handcuffed,'. . . a reasonable jury applying the law of our circuit could conclude only that the officers were constitutionally able to use the force they did to subdue him. . . .Now assume we got it completely wrong. On the constitutional point (prong one), assume Carpenter gets it right: The officers violated the Fourth Amendment because Carpenter did not resist enough to justify the knee strike or the one-time use of a taser. We would still have to reverse. . . .The district court wrote that 'this case do[es] not fall neatly into the[ ] categories' of clearly established taser law. . . That's a concession that it could find no clearly established constitutional violation, and the court should have stopped there—and held for the defendants. In fact, we have done the same in an excessive-force case that 'does not fit cleanly within' our taser case law . . . because qualified immunity operates in the 'hazy border between excessive and acceptable force.'")

Rudlaff v. Gillispie, 791 F.3d 638, 644, 647-48 (6th Cir. 2015) (Bernice Bouie Donald, J., concurring only in the judgment) ("In my view, the facts in this case—properly construed in Lawrence Carpenter's favor—did not justify the level of force employed by the officers. However, in light of the Supreme Court's recent heightening of the second prong of the qualified-immunity standard, I agree with the majority that the officers in this case are entitled to qualified immunity. Because I would hold that the officers' nearly immediate resort to the use of a taser constituted excessive force, I concur only in the judgment. . . . In its recent pronouncements on qualified immunity, the Supreme Court arguably has heightened the standard to clarify that a right is clearly established if it is 'sufficiently clear "that every reasonable official would [have understood] that what he is doing violates that right."'. . . Prior case law merely required a right to be 'sufficiently clear that a reasonable official would understand that what he is doing violates that right'—not every reasonable official. . . Nor was any identical case required to be on point . . . . Now, however, the law at the time of the officers' conduct must have placed the constitutional question 'beyond debate.'. . Here, as demonstrated by my disagreement with the majority regarding the constitutionality of the officers' use of a taser in this scenario, the constitutional question is not—as it must be—'beyond debate.'. . I would hold that the officers' practically immediate resort to the use of a taser in this 26–second encounter violated Carpenter's Fourth Amendment right to be free from the use of excessive force. But because the question is debatable, it cannot be said that the officers' mistaken belief in the justification of their actions signals that they are 'plainly incompetent' or 'knowing[ ] violat[ors of] the law.'. .Accordingly, I concur only in the judgment.")

Webb v. United States, 789 F.3d 647, 659-60, 662, 670 (6th Cir. 2015) ("To succeed on a malicious-prosecution claim under Bivens or § 1983, a plaintiff must prove the following: (1) the defendant made, influenced, or participated in the decision to prosecute the plaintiff; (2) there was no probable cause for the criminal prosecution; (3) as a consequence of the legal proceedings, the plaintiff suffered a deprivation of liberty apart from the initial arrest; and (4) the criminal proceeding was resolved in the plaintiff's favor. . . As there is no dispute that Webb and Price were deprived of their liberty as a result of criminal proceedings that were resolved in their favor, we focus on the first and second elements. Within the meaning of the first element, 'the term "participated" should be construed within the context of tort causation principles. Its meaning is akin to "aided." To be liable for "participating" in the decision to prosecute, the officer must participate in a way that aids in the decision, as opposed to passively or neutrally participating.'. . Webb and Price were arrested and charged following grand-jury indictments. As a general rule, 'the finding of an indictment, fair upon its face, by a properly constituted grand jury, conclusively determines the existence of probable cause.' . . An exception to this general rule applies when defendants knowingly or recklessly present false testimony to the grand jury to obtain the indictment. . . .A law-enforcement defendant is deliberately indifferent—and therefore not entitled to qualified immunity—if he mistakenly identifies an individual as a suspect when the individual does not match the suspect's description. . . . Because there is a dispute of material fact as to whether Webb and Conrad looked alike, we cannot determine that it was objectively reasonable for Lucas to believe that the person who sold him drugs on October 14, 2005, was Webb unless he undertook appropriate efforts to confirm Webb's identity in light of potential differences. Nothing in the record indicates that Lucas undertook such efforts. Accordingly, a jury could reasonably conclude that Lucas's grand-jury testimony contained knowing or reckless falsehoods as to the identity of the person who sold him drugs, and therefore the grand-jury indictment against Webb cannot be the basis for probable cause at summary judgment. . . . The district court held that all individual Defendants were entitled to qualified immunity with respect to Price's fabrication-of-evidence claims because there was independent evidence to support probable cause. . . But there are genuine issues of material fact as to the existence of probable cause against Price. More importantly, even if independent evidence establishes probable cause against a suspect, it would still be unlawful for law-enforcement officers to fabricate evidence in order to strengthen the case against that suspect. . . Accordingly, it was improper for the district court to grant summary judgment to Lucas, Metcalf, and Faith for fabricating evidence against Price on the basis that there was probable cause to charge Price.")

Northrup v. City of Toledo Police Dep't, 785 F.3d 1128, 1131-34 (6th Cir. 2015) ("In today's case, Officer Bright relies on two 'specific and articulable facts': Northrup's open possession of a firearm and the 911 call about what Northrup was doing. The Fourth Amendment no doubt permitted Bright to approach Northrup and to ask him questions. But that is not what he did. He relied on these facts to stop Northrup, disarm him, and handcuff him. Ohio law permits the open carry of firearms, Ohio Rev.Code § 9.68(C)(1), and thus permitted Northrup to do exactly what he was doing. While the dispatcher and motorcyclist may not have known the details of Ohio's open-carry firearm law, the police officer had no basis for such uncertainty. If it is appropriate to presume that citizens know the parameters of the criminal laws, it is surely appropriate to expect the same of law enforcement officers—at least with regard to unambiguous statutes. Heien v. North Carolina, 135 S.Ct. 530, 540 (2014). Clearly established law required Bright to point to evidence that Northrup may have been 'armed and dangerous.' Sibron v. New York, 392 U.S. 40, 64 (1968) (emphasis added). Yet all he ever saw was that Northrup was armed—and legally so. . . . This requirement and the impropriety of Officer Bright's demands are particularly acute in a State like Ohio. Not only has the State made open carry of a firearm legal, but it also does not require gun owners to produce or even carry their licenses for inquiring officers. . . .If Bright had no reason to stop and frisk Northrup, he violated clearly established law in handcuffing—fully seizing—Northrup in his squad car for thirty minutes. . . . Unlike Officer Bright, Sergeant Ray is entitled to qualified immunity. . . . Sergeant Ray did not arrive until after Northrup was handcuffed in the back of Officer Bright's police car. Ray was then told Bright's account of events, including of Northrup's 'furtive movement' toward his gun and his failure to produce identification when initially requested. . . With this information in hand, Ray contacted the Toledo Police Department detective's bureau to help determine the proper charge. A detective advised Ray to cite Northrup for failure to disclose personal information, Ohio Rev.Code § 2921.29, which Ray and Bright then did. Northrup has a claim against Sergeant Ray only if we infer that Officer Bright, in his initial conversation apprising Ray of recent events, confessed to an illegal seizure. There is no basis in the record for such an inference. . . . Accordingly, Ray should receive qualified immunity.") Wenk v. O'Reilly, 783 F.3d 585, 598-600 (6th Cir. 2015) ("Schott does not contest that the Wenks' right to be free from retaliation for exercising their First Amendment right to criticize school officials is clearly established. Rather, Schott argues that 'a reasonable governmental official in [Schott's] position would not recognize that, by following a mandatory obligation to report abuse, she is violating federal law.'. . Schott does not cite any federal case law to support her argument, and instead cites only Ohio's mandatory reporting statutory scheme. . . Schott points to the fact that Ohio imposes no good faith requirement on mandatory reporters and provides that they are absolutely immune from civil and criminal liability for those reports. Ohio Rev.Code § 2151.421(G)(1)(a). As an initial matter, we note that Schott does not take the facts in the light most favorable to the Wenks in framing the clearly-established-law inquiry, as she must do on appeal. . . The premise of Schott's argument is that Schott in fact believed herself to be following her mandatory duty to report child abuse under Ohio law when she reported the Wenks to FCCS. However, this argument ignores the factual disputes that the district court found as to whether Schott would have reported the Wenks absent their protected conduct. Reading those disputes in the light most favorable to the Wenks suggests that Schott did not think that the report she made to FCCS was required under Ohio's mandatory reporting law. . . . A reasonable official in Schott's position would have understood that what she did violated the Wenks' right to be free from retaliation for exercising their First Amendment rights. Our decision in Jenkins, decided in 2008, made clear that school officials can be liable if they make reports of child abuse to retaliate against parents for exercising their First Amendment rights. . . Although the report in Jenkins was false, the heart of a First Amendment retaliation claim, which we have reaffirmed numerous times before 2011, is that '[a]n act taken in retaliation for the exercise of a constitutionally protected right is actionable under § 1983 even if the act, when taken for a different reason, would have been proper.' Bloch, 156 F.3d at 681–82 (emphasis added). Under this rule, it is clear that the distinction between a completely false report and a partially false report does not matter. At oral argument, Schott appeared to frame the inquiry slightly differently, asking whether a reasonable school official would think that the immunity conferred under Ohio law for reports of child abuse made in bad faith would prevent liability for violating the Wenks' clearly established right not to be retaliated against for exercising their First Amendment rights. The Supreme Court has long held 'that a state law that immunizes government conduct otherwise subject to suit under § 1983 is preempted, even where the federal civil rights litigation takes place in state court, because the application of the state immunity law would thwart the congressional remedy, ... which of course already provides certain immunities for state officials.' Felder v. Casey, 487 U.S. 131, 139 (1988). . . .In sum, we hold that the Wenks' right to be free from retaliation for exercising their First Amendment rights was clearly established at the time of this case, and that a reasonable official in Schott's position would have understood that filing a child abuse report in bad faith violated the Wenks' rights.")

Flying Dog Brewery, LLLP v. Michigan Liquor Control Comm'n, 597 F. App'x 342, 352, 355 (6th Cir. 2015) ("We begin with the district court's analysis on the second part of the qualified immunity inquiry: whether the constitutional right the Administrative Commissioners are alleged to have violated was clearly established at the time the Commissioners acted. . . .By the time the Administrative Commissioners banned Flying Dog's beer label in 2009, the clear line of Supreme Court commercial speech precedents, coupled with our own decision in Sambo's and the persuasive opinion of the Second Circuit in Bad Frog Brewery, should have placed any reasonable state liquor commissioner on notice that banning a beer label based on its content would violate the First Amendment unless the Central Hudson test was satisfied. Consequently, we disagree with the district court's determination that applicable First Amendment law was not clearly established in 2009 and set aside the grant of qualified immunity to the Commissioners.")

Moore v. Money, 590 F. App'x 562, 565-66 (6th Cir. 2014) ("After the district court issued its opinion, the Supreme Court in Lane v. Franks, —— U.S. ——, 134 S.Ct. 2369, 2374–75, 189 L.Ed.2d 312 (2014), a case arising from the Eleventh Circuit, held that the First Amendment protects a public employee who provides truthful testimony under oath outside of his ordinary job duties. Nonetheless, the Court upheld qualified immunity for the defendant because at the time of Lane's 2008 and 2009 trial testimony, neither Eleventh Circuit nor Supreme Court precedent provided clear notice that a public employee's testimony, given under oath and outside the scope of his ordinary job duties, is entitled to First Amendment protection. . . In so holding, the Supreme Court determined that 'the relevant question for qualified immunity purposes' is whether the defendant could 'reasonably have believed, at the time he fired [the plaintiff], that a government employer could fire an employee on account of testimony the employee gave....'. . . To answer that question, the Supreme Court looked to Eleventh Circuit decisions addressing whether testimony, either in-court testimony or deposition testimony, is protected employee speech. . . Here, as the district conceded, at the time of Moore's testimony and the alleged retaliatory conduct, neither this Court nor the Supreme Court had addressed whether in-court testimony is protected public employee speech. . . Moreover, as highlighted by the Court in Lane, there was a circuit split among the other circuit courts that had decided this issue. . . Thus, at the time of Moore's testimony, there was no 'controlling authority' or a 'consensus of cases of persuasive authority' that could have put Defendants on notice that Moore's testimony was protected by the First Amendment.")

Roberson v. Torres, 770 F.3d 398, 407 (6th Cir. 2014) ("As a theoretical matter, spraying a chemical agent upon a sleeping prisoner might not violate clearly established law where the corrections officer, under the circumstances, reasonably believed that the prisoner was in fact awake but disobeying the order. But that is not Torres's claim here, nor does Roberson concede such a reasonable belief on Torres's part. We are required to 'take, as given, the facts that the district court assumed when it denied summary judgment.'. . On those facts, we agree that using a chemical agent in an initial attempt to wake a sleeping prisoner, without apparent necessity and in the absence of mitigating circumstances, violates clearly established law.")

Baker v. Union Twp., 587 F. App'x 229, 235-36 (6th Cir. 2014) ("The right at issue can be expressed as Baker's right not to be shot with a taser without warning, while offering no resistance to arrest, and while standing on an observably elevated surface. This articulation comports with al-Kidd's mandate that rights not be defined at 'a high level of generality' at the second step of qualified immunity analysis. . . Examining the incident under the facts conceded, it is fairly certain that a reasonable officer would have been 'on notice that [this] conduct violates established law' at the time Ventre tased Baker. . .Baker was suspected of, at most, a minor, non-violent misdemeanor at the time he was tased. The police were called to the scene of a disturbance at the VFW. It is unclear what, exactly, the police suspected him of at the time they gave chase. The police did not even positively identify Baker as the suspect of the reported incident, they merely chased someone they saw running away. This is a far cry from the scenarios implicitly contemplated by Graham in which a heightened level of caution may be warranted in the apprehension of someone suspected of a violent felony. Under the facts conceded, Baker did not resist arrest before Ventre deployed his taser the second time. . . In the past, this court has held that an officer violates a suspect's clearly-established Fourth Amendment rights when 'he pepper sprays a suspect who has not been told she is under arrest and is not resisting arrest.'. . Other courts have held similarly. . . . Here, Baker was not resisting arrest. . . A reasonable officer would have known that it was unlawful to deploy a taser against an un-resisting suspect standing stock-still in a well-lit hallway. Moreover, Ventre should not have tased Baker without a warning. The tasing of a suspect without warning is, at the very least, an additional factor useful in determining whether an officer violated a suspect's Fourth Amendment right to be free of excessive force. . .Here, Ventre's tasing of Baker before giving Baker an opportunity to comply with instructions was a violation of clearly established law.")

Bolick v. City of E. Grand Rapids, 580 F. App'x 314, 318-23 (6th Cir. 2014) ("The officers contend that a reasonable officer would have interpreted Matthew's actions as active resistance. . .We have jurisdiction when a defendant appeals the 'denial of a claim of qualified immunity,' . . . but the scope of our jurisdiction is narrow. We may only review the denial of qualified immunity based purely on issues of law, . . . meaning the officers must accept 'the plaintiff's facts, taken at their best[.]'. . . In other words, we do not have jurisdiction insofar as the officers solely contest 'whether or not the pretrial record sets forth a "genuine" issue of fact for trial.'. . . The officers in this case appeal the denial of qualified immunity as to two discrete police actions against Matthew on the night of his death: Parker's alleged use of a taser while Matthew lay handcuffed on his stomach, and Davis's alleged pressure against Matthew's back under the same circumstances. . . .Yes, Matthew assaulted Parker and attempted to evade arrest. But, taking the facts in his favor, Matthew could barely move, had stopped resisting, was under control, and thus posed little risk to himself or anyone else by the time he was in handcuffs—at which point Parker tased him and Davis (who knew Matthew suffered from a diminished mental state) put the weight of his body into Matthew's upper back. For these reasons, a reasonable jury could conclude that the officers' post-handcuff actions were not calibrated to the threat Matthew posed, and thus were objectively unreasonable uses of force. . . .We thus ask: whether it was clearly established in November 2009 that it was excessive for an officer to apply the weight of his body to the back of a handcuffed suspect who did not resist, all while the suspect lay on his stomach with another officer controlling his legs; and whether it was excessive for an officer to tase the arrestee in drive-stun mode under the same circumstances. The answer to both questions is yes. . . . Champion also applies to Parker's use of the taser in drive-stun mode. To be sure, Champion addressed the use of pepper spray (not a taser) on a hobbled and handcuffed suspect. But the Champion court did note that, as of 2004, we had 'consistently held that various types of force applied after the subduing of a suspect are unreasonable and a violation of a clearly established right.'. . . Here, if it was 'clearly established that the Officers' use of pepper spray against [an arrestee] after he was handcuffed and hobbled was excessive,'. . it was clearly established that Parker's tasing of Matthew under substantially similar conditions was also excessive. . . . The officers counter that not every reasonable officer in their position would have understood that Matthew did not struggle or resist. . . Again, this argument asks us to view the facts in a light most favorable to the officers, which we cannot do. A view of the record in Matthew's favor (which shows that he was barely able to move and did not resist) controls our analysis, not one that considers whether every reasonable officer would have acted differently under a situation drawn more in their favor. . . .In this case, even though the district court declined to grant summary judgment to the officers based on qualified immunity, it improperly dismissed qualified immunity as a defense. Reinforcing our conclusion is the fact that the officers complied with the only requirement necessary for them to invoke the defense at trial: raising qualified immunity as an affirmative defense from the outset. . . We thus reverse the district court's decision to dismiss qualified immunity as a defense to the police actions that remain at issue.")

Cordell v. McKinney, 759 F.3d 573, 587, 588 (6th Cir. 2014) ("To sum up, at this stage in the litigation, we must accept Cordell's version of events without weighing the evidence or assessing the credibility of prospective witnesses. The district court failed to do so and, thus, committed error. If we do accept Cordell's testimony and allegations as true—that Deputy McKinney rammed Cordell headfirst into the wall while he was handcuffed and controlled—a reasonable jury could conclude that Cordell suffered severe pain that objectively violated our contemporary norms of human dignity. Thus, Cordell has demonstrated that summary judgment on the objective component of his Eighth Amendment claim was inappropriate. . . .While there may be much sense in stating that it is inappropriate to grant qualified immunity whenever a jury could find that a jail official acted with malicious and sadistic intent, it seems that Plumhoff requires us to frame Cordell's Eighth Amendment right at a lower level of generality. In the past, we have held that 'if there is a genuine issue of fact as to whether an officer's use of force was objectively reasonable, then there naturally is a genuine issue of fact with respect to whether a reasonable jail official would have known such conduct was wrongful.' Kostrzewa v. City of Troy, 247 F.3d 633, 642 (6th Cir.2001). Under this standard, as discussed above, we conclude that any reasonable official would know that ramming a handcuffed and controlled prisoner headfirst into a concrete wall is an unreasonable method of regaining control of a prisoner in a hallway occupied only by other jail officials. . . Therefore, Cordell's rights were clearly established as of July 20, 2009, and granting qualified immunity at this time is inappropriate.")

Daily Services, LLC v. Valentino, 756 F.3d 893, 901-04 (6th Cir. 2014) ("The applicability of Parratt . . . is irrelevant to the clearly established prong of the qualified immunity analysis. As a colleague on our sister circuit noted, 'Granting immunity based on the lack of clarity as to whether the State bears responsibility would turn the qualified immunity doctrine on its head. The official would in effect be seeking immunity based on a "reasonable" belief that his conduct was so wrong—i.e., it was "random and unauthorized"—that it could not provide the basis for a procedural due process claim.' San Gerónimo Caribe Project, Inc. v. Acevedo–Vilá, 687 F.3d 465, 500 (1st Cir.2012) (en banc) (Lipez, J., concurring). Qualified immunity exists to shield actions reasonable in light of current law without protecting abuses of office. . . It would undermine that doctrine's purpose to find a due process violation but provide no remedy because the defendant could have thought that Parratt would let him (and the state) off the hook for his violation of clearly established due process law. San Gerónimo, 687 F.3d at 500 (Lipez, J., concurring). Indeed, the Supreme Court has never looked to the Parratt doctrine when assessing whether a defendant deserves qualified immunity because the claimed procedural due process right was not clearly established. Nor has our court ever held that uncertainty about whether Parratt applies gives rise to qualified immunity. . . Some of our sister circuits and other courts also have suggested that uncertainty about the Parratt doctrine does not affect the 'clearly established' inquiry. [collecting cases] A handful of other cases have discussed the Parratt doctrine while assessing whether the claimed procedural due process right was clearly established, but none have examined whether the Parratt doctrine is properly part of the clearly established law inquiry in the first place. [collecting cases] These cases therefore fail to provide meaningful guidance on the question before us. Thus, while courts may consider the Parratt doctrine to determine whether the plaintiff has alleged a procedural due process violation, courts should not consider the Parratt doctrine to determine whether the due process right at issue was clearly established. The doctrine simply has no place in assessing whether 'it would be clear to a reasonable officer that his conduct was unlawful in the situation he confronted.'. . Here, the district court erred when it granted qualified immunity based on its understanding that the law 'is unsettled as to whether the failure of a public official to follow established procedure constitutes "random and unauthorized" conduct, thereby triggering Parratt.' Simply put, the court focused on the clarity of the wrong law. The inquiry is not whether a reasonable official would understand that his wrongful denial of predeprivation process might not ultimately amount to a due process violation by the state under the Parratt doctrine. Rather, in the context of this procedural due process claim, the 'clearly established law' inquiry should ask whether a reasonable official would understand that the plaintiff was entitled to notice and an opportunity to be heard before the official filed a judgment or lien against the plaintiff. . . At the time of the defendants' actions, it was clearly established that 'even the temporary or partial impairments to property rights that attachments, liens, and similar encumbrances entail are sufficient to merit due process protection.'. . As the Supreme Court stated many years ago, 'the root requirement' of due process protection is 'that an individual be given an opportunity for a hearing before he is deprived of any significant property interest.'. . Ohio law recognizes these requirements by requiring the Bureau and its employees to provide notice and an opportunity to be heard before filing a judgment or lien for unpaid premiums. . .It is well-established and unassailable that 'a reasonably competent public official should know the law governing his conduct.'. . Thus, if Daily Services has alleged facts that make out a violation of its constitutional right to predeprivation process, discussed infra, the only basis for qualified immunity would be the defendants' reasonable uncertainty about whether the circumstances presented 'extraordinary situations where some valid governmental interest' justified postponing notice or the opportunity to be heard until after the deprivation. . . The facts of this case present no such uncertainty. Reasonable officials in the defendants' positions would know that predeprivation process—notice and an opportunity to be heard—was required before filing the judgments and liens against Daily Services.")

Burgess v. Fischer, 735 F.3d 462, 473, 474 (6th Cir. 2013) ("In the instant case, the district court applied the 'shocks the conscience' standard of the Fourteenth Amendment to find that there was no evidence that the deputies acted maliciously and sadistically. . . The district court found that the claim did not fall under the Fourth Amendment because the right to be free from excessive force as a pretrial detainee in the booking process was not clearly established until our decision in Aldini v. Johnson, 609 F.3d 858 (6th Cir.2010), well after Burgess' arrest. . . .However, a review of our case law, including Aldini, compels the opposite conclusion, and we find that the district court erred in not applying the Fourth Amendment's reasonableness standard to the facts of this case. . . .To be sure, Aldini did set forth a new principle. The Aldini court clearly established in 2010 that the dividing line between the Fourth and Fourteenth Amendment zones of protection was the probable cause hearing for warrantless arrests. . . However, the district court missed a critical point of the decision—it was already clearly established that the Fourth Amendment's reasonableness standard applied at least through the booking process. . . Indeed, the court held that the Fourth Amendment's reasonableness standard applied to a set of facts arising in May 2006, over two-and-a-half years before Burgess' car was stopped on January 23, 2009. . . Because it was a reversal, the Aldini decision necessarily held that the Fourth Amendment right was clearly established in 2006. Therefore, the right was no less established in January 2009 when Burgess was allegedly assaulted. Consequently, the district court erred in applying the Fourteenth Amendment's 'shocks the conscience' standard rather than the Fourth Amendment's reasonableness standard.")

Hidden Village, LLC v. City of Lakewood, Ohio, 734 F.3d 519, 529 (6th Cir. 2013) ("To defeat the qualified immunity defense, . . . Hidden Village must also show that precedents on the books when the defendants acted (in 2006 and 2007) clearly established that their conduct violated § 3617 even though it violated nothing else in the Fair Housing Act. That in turn requires pointing to either 'controlling authority' or 'a robust consensus of cases of persuasive authority.'. . Hidden Village does not have controlling authority on its side. Until today, the Sixth Circuit has never held that a defendant can violate § 3617 without violating §§ 3603–3606. To the contrary, we had left the question open. . . Nor was there a 'consensus' of cases of 'persuasive authority.' Just the opposite. By 2007, the Fifth Circuit had held that a violation of §§ 3603–3606 is indispensable to a § 3617 claim. . .The Seventh Circuit had twice reserved the question. . . Another Seventh Circuit opinion implied that the defendants' interpretation was right. . . Hidden Village, meanwhile, does not identify a single federal appellate court decision that had clearly come out on its side of this debate. The best we have found is dictum to that effect from the Ninth Circuit, see Smith v. Stechel, 510 F.2d 1162, 1164 (9th Cir.1975), and a handful of decisions from district courts. This state of affairs circa 2007 does not amount to the 'robust consensus' that the qualified immunity test demands. Hidden Village invokes Bloch v. Frischholz, which interpreted § 3617 as we do today. 587 F.3d 771, 781 (7th Cir.2009) (en banc). But that decision came out in 2009; it did not clearly establish anything in 2006 or 2007. More telling is Bloch's observation about the state of the law on whether liability under § 3617 depends on a violation of §§ 3603–3606: 'Courts are split on the issue.' Id. at 781. In the final analysis, Hidden Village may carry on with its Fair Housing Act lawsuit against the city. But the individual defendants are entitled to qualified immunity.")

Jasinski v. Tyler, 729 F.3d 531, 540, 544 (6th Cir. 2013)("Under the circumstances presented here, the contours of the substantive due process right to be free from government action increasing the risk of harm was not sufficiently clear under our case law that a reasonable official would understand that the state's actions in pursuing Oliver for use of the cattle prod and then failing to immediately remove Nicholas would violate Nicholas's substantive due process rights. Accordingly, Defendants are therefore entitled to qualified immunity [on substantive due process claim]. . . . Given the previous decisions of our court, we cannot say that a reasonable CPS official would understand that the failure to file a petition under § 722.638 would constitute a denial of procedural due process. No decision has yet found a procedural due process right in a similar context. In the future, CPS officials are on notice that if a petition is mandated based on a substantive predicate, the failure to file a petition when the predicate is met may constitute a denial of procedural due process under statutes similar to the instant one.")

Kovacic v. Cuyahoga County Dept. of Children and Family Services, 724 F.3d 687, 695-700 (6th Cir. 2013) ("The social workers argue that the district court erred in denying their motion for summary judgment based on qualified immunity, contending that exigent circumstances existed and that the relevant Fourth and Fourteenth Amendment rights were not clearly established as of March 26, 2002. . . . While there certainly remain unresolved issues relating to the Fourth Amendment, as noted by the dissent, . . . the issue at hand—whether a government official can seize children from their homes without a warrant or exigent circumstances—is simply not one of them. . . .In sum, there is an absence of pre–2002 case law specifically mentioning social workers, which under our binding precedent is insufficient to upset the presumption that all government searches and seizures are subject to the strictures of the Fourth Amendment. . .We thus agree with the district court that at the time of the social workers' actions, it was clearly established that Fourth Amendment warrant requirements, including the exigent-circumstances exception, apply to the removal of children from their homes by social workers. . . .Concerning the Fourteenth Amendment due-process right, we established in Doe that in the context of child removal, due process requires, among other things, that 'parents be given notice prior to the removal of the child ... stating the reasons for the removal ... [and that] [t]he parents be given a full opportunity at the hearing to present witnesses and evidence on their behalf.'. . . The district court did not err in concluding that the due-process right at issue was clearly established in 2002.")

Kovacic v. Cuyahoga County Dept. of Children and Family Services, 724 F.3d 687, 703, 708-10 (6th Cir. 2013) (Sutton, J., dissenting) ("The defense prompts a present-tense and a past-tense inquiry: Does the seizure violate the requirements of the Fourth and Fourteenth Amendments? If so, were those requirements clearly established at the time of the seizure—here in 2002? I would skip the first question, . . . and answer no to the second. . . . All appellate law considered, the social workers acted reasonably from the vantage point of 2002. Even had they consulted a lawyer at every turn, consider the many questions implicated by this case. Do the normal Fourth Amendment standards apply? Is there a special needs exception for child endangerment cases? Does it make a difference whether the state officials are engaged in investigating criminal conduct or protecting children? Does past abuse suffice? Must the evidence of danger be within the past 24 hours? Or will evidence over the last month suffice? The majority may have some confidence in answering some of these questions today. But in the face of our previous silence, the Supreme Court's continued silence and the conflicting signals sent by other circuits, I doubt even the most sophisticated social worker, accompanied by the most sophisticated attorney,could have distilled one framework for answering all of these questions in 2002. That is the purpose of qualified immunity, and that is why it applies here. . . . When a social worker has concerns that immediate removal is required and when a state court judge later vindicates those concerns after a hearing, it is a strange notion of qualified immunity that would permit the social workers to be found liable under § 1983. We should pause before making social workers retroactively liable for a three-day temporary seizure when the state court judge is insulated from liability for the ten months of custody that followed. No such oddity occurs if we respect the state court's contemporaneous finding that probable cause of an exigency existed, which confirms that the social workers at most made a mistake. In the end, these social workers faced two state laws allowing them to act, set against a murky backdrop of federal court precedent. And they had evidence of abuse, enough in fact to convince a magistrate that they acted correctly and that Nancy's children ought not stay in Nancy's care. Qualified immunity applies.") Villegas v. Metropolitan Government of Nashville, 709 F.3d 563, 569-71, 574, 575, 578-80 (6th Cir. 2013) ("Plaintiff predicates her first deliberate indifference claim on her being shackled during labor and postpartum recovery. In bringing such a claim, Plaintiff finds herself in the recent 'burgeoning movement to end the practice of shackling pregnant women prisoners, particularly during labor and delivery.'. . Though the push to end the practice is fairly new, sadly, it is a practice that has been around for at least a century. . . In spite of this history, the law on the shackling of pregnant women is underdeveloped, and this Court has not previously decided a deliberate indifference claim based on the practice. Therefore, we must at the outset determine a framework under which to analyze such a claim. . . .In dealing with deliberate indifference claims in the past, this Court has enumerated some specific types of claims for factual scenarios that frequently arise. These types include, but are not limited to, conditions-of-confinement, excessive-force, and medical-needs. . . The district court as well as the parties in their briefing discuss this as a medical-needs claim, . . . but as we explain below, the nature of Plaintiff's claim does not quite square with our medical-needs jurisprudence nor our other refinements of the general deliberate indifference principles. . . . A shackling claim does not necessarily involve the denial of or interference with medical treatment; rather, it may be premised on the notion that the shackles increase Plaintiff's risk of medical complications. We should hasten to add that there may be circumstances where shackling could interfere with medical treatment—where, for example, the shackles are not removed so that the medical treatment may proceed unimpeded; however, such were not the circumstances in this case. This problem led one court to analyze the shackling claim it faced as a conditions-of-confinement claim. . . .While a shackling claim does in some respects resemble some of our conditions-of-confinement cases, see, e.g., Barker, 649 F.3d at 434 (analyzing the use of handcuffs on a mentally ill prisoner under a conditions-of-confinement, as well as excessive-force, rubric), the nature of the medical proof offered by Plaintiff is different than we have previously addressed in the conditions-of-confinement context. Similarly, we believe that the excessive-force type of claim is also not well adapted for analysis of Plaintiff's claim. . . . In sum, it seems to us that none of the refinements we have made to the general deliberate indifference principles in order to more easily analyze common factual scenarios are particularly well-suited to the theory and proof offered by Plaintiff. The Eighth Circuit in Nelson v. Correctional Medical Services, 583 F.3d 522 (8th Cir.2009) (en banc), seems to have similarly recognized the crossover nature of a pregnant shackling claim. . . . [R]ather than attempt to pigeonhole Plaintiff's shackling claim into a more specific subcategory of deliberate indifference claims, we think it best to analyze her claim under the general deliberate indifference principles. . . . Consistent with the general principles discussed above, we analyze Plaintiff's claim in two steps, addressing first the objective component and then the subjective one. . . . On the objective component, we ask whether shackling pregnant detainees in the manner and under the circumstances in which Plaintiff was shackled creates a substantial risk of serious harm that society chooses not to tolerate. . . On the subjective component, the inquiry is whether the officers were aware and understood (or should have been aware and understood) that they were exposing Plaintiff to a substantial risk of serious harm. . . .Two things are clear from Plaintiff's evidence on the objective component. First, the shackling of pregnant detainees while in labor offends contemporary standards of human decency such that the practice violates the Eighth Amendment's prohibition against the 'unnecessary and wanton infliction of pain'—i.e., it poses a substantial risk of serious harm. . .The universal consensus from the courts to have addressed this issue as well as the chorus of prominent organizations condemning the practice demonstrates that, without any extenuating circumstances, shackling women during labor runs afoul of the protections of the Eighth Amendment. Second, it is equally clear, however, from both courts and commentators that the right to be free from shackling during labor is not unqualified. . . .To be sure, this evidence shows that the jail's classification procedures were followed in this case. However, because of Plaintiff's obvious, physical condition as a pregnant woman in labor, a reasonable factfinder could nonetheless conclude that Plaintiff was not a flight risk despite the jail's conformity with its classification procedures. This potential dispute renders summary judgment inappropriate. . . .In light of the material factual disputes surrounding whether Plaintiff was shown to be a flight risk, whether Defendant's officers had any knowledge about a no restraint order, and the conflicting expert testimony about the ill effects of Plaintiff's shackling, we conclude that the district court improperly granted summary judgment to Plaintiff on her shackling claim. On remand, a jury will need to determine whether Plaintiff was a flight risk in her condition and whether Defendant had knowledge of the substantial risk, recognized the serious harm that such a risk could cause, and, nonetheless, disregarded it, . . . recognizing that such knowledge may be established through the obviousness of the risk. . . . Absent proof that the breast pump was prescribed, as is necessary under a diagnosed medical-needs theory, Plaintiff must show that it was so obvious that even a layperson would recognize the need to provide Plaintiff with a breast pump. . . Unlike her shackling claim, where Plaintiff pointed to specific statements by outside organizations and testimony from Defendant's officer, Plaintiff on this claim has only pointed to the opinion testimony of Torrente and DeBona, who both opined that a breast pump was necessary to allow Plaintiff to express her milk and relieve her breast pain. Such testimony regarding the harmful consequences of being denied the breast pump does not specifically speak to the obviousness of the risk to Plaintiff. Therefore, Plaintiff has failed to produce sufficient evidence to make out the objective component of her breast pump claim, and therefore, the district court improperly granted summary judgment to Plaintiff on this claim as well.") Villegas v. Metropolitan Government of Nashville, 709 F.3d 563, 581, 582, 584 (6th Cir. 2013) (Helene N. White, J., dissenting) ("I respectfully dissent. The district court determined on the parties' cross-motions for partial summary judgment that shackling Villegas during labor and postpartum recovery absent any indication that she was a flight risk or posed a risk of harm to herself or others, and denying her the breast pump hospital staff provided her on discharge, constituted deliberate indifference to a serious medical need. The material facts-the facts that might affect the determination of Defendant's liability-were not in dispute. . . .Villegas was not being held for a crime of violence and had not been convicted of any crime. She was not individually assessed for flight risk or risk of harm to herself or others, and she had not engaged in any conduct evidencing such. . . . The subjective component of a deliberate indifference claim goes to whether Defendant's officers were deliberately indifferent to substantial risks of serious harm posed by shackling. Defendant's experts did not address several of the serious medical risks to which Villegas's experts attested and did not rebut that shackling Villegas while en route to the hospital, during labor and postpartum, increased the medical risks of serious harm to Villegas and her unborn child. . . I agree with the district court that no genuine or material factual dispute remained regarding whether Defendant's officers knew of and disregarded the substantial risks of harm posed by shackling Villegas during labor and postpartum and denying her the breast pump hospital staff gave her on discharge.")

McAdam v. Warmuskerken, Nos. 12–2330, 12–2331, 2013 WL 1092729, *2 (6th Cir. Mar. 15, 2013) (unpublished) ("First, may an officer tase an individual who is subdued on the ground and is not resisting arrest, even if the officer does so only once? No. See Hagans v. Franklin Cnty. Sheriff's Office, 695 F.3d 505, 509–10 (6th Cir.2012); Austin v. Redford Twp. Police Dep't, 690 F.3d 490, 497–98 (6th Cir.2012). A single tasing violates a plaintiff's clearly established rights if he is neutralized and is not resisting an officer's efforts to restrain him. The district court thus properly denied the officers' qualified-immunity defense. Second, may an officer tase an individual, who is handcuffed to a hospital bed and is verbally resisting medical treatment, but does not pose a safety risk to hospital staff or police officers? No. See Austin, 690 F.3d at 497–98. Again, the right of an individual to be free from an officer's force if he is cooperative and non-aggressive is clearly established. See Hagans, 695 F.3d at 509–10. Taking McAdam's factual description of the hospital tasing as true, the officers are not entitled to qualified immunity. Because McAdam has put forward plausible factual bases for his legal claims, he is entitled to a trial.")

Quigley v. Tuong Vinh Thai, 707 F.3d 675, 685 (6th Cir. 2013) ("Because a reasonable factfinder could conclude that Thai consciously exposed Quigley to a substantial risk of death through his medical treatment without so much as a warning, the estate has shown that Thai violated a clearly established right.That there is no federal case directly on point does not undermine this conclusion. The principle at issue—namely, that a doctor cannot 'consciously expos[e a] patient to an excessive risk of serious harm' while providing medical treatment—is enshrined in our caselaw. . . The estate has established that Thai violated a constitutional right and that the right was clearly established. Thai is therefore not entitled to qualified immunity.") Stoudemire v. Michigan Dept. of Corrections, 705 F.3d 560, 571, 575 (6th Cir. 2013) ("According to Stoudemire, the relevant constitutional question is not whether clearly established law proscribes same-sex strip searches in prisons, but whether clearly established law proscribes a strip search that served no legitimate penological purpose and was intended only to harass. [Defendant] focuses on whether the law regarding same-sex strip searches is 'clearly established' for qualified immunity purposes. However, the applicable inquiry is whether the strip search was reasonable under the circumstances and whether Stoudemire's constitutional rights in this regard were clearly established at the time of the search. We address both issues. [Defendant's] position is that inmates have no right to be free from same-sex strip searches. But that is not the right that Stoudemire is seeking to vindicate. Rather, Stoudemire has 'identified a well established right, the right not to be subjected to a humiliating strip search in full view of several (or perhaps many) others unless the procedure is reasonably related to a legitimate penological interest.'. . Based on the state of the law in existence at the time of the strip search, it was clearly established that suspicionless strip searches were permissible as a matter of constitutional law, but only so long as they were reasonable under the circumstances and performed pursuant to a legitimate penological justification.")

Sutton v. Metropolitan Government of Nashville and Davidson County, 700 F.3d 865, 877 (6th Cir. 2012) ("The district court summarily concluded that the law clearly established that an arrest without probable cause and a Terry stop without reasonable suspicion violate the Fourth Amendment. But the court's bare-bones analysis is far too general, failing to recognize that the right violated must be clear in a particularized context so that a reasonable official would be on notice that his actions were unconstitutional. . . Still, taking the facts alleged in the complaint as true, Sutton's constitutional rights were clearly established in this context and the court properly concluded that the qualified-immunity defense fails at this juncture.")

Andrews v. Hickman County, Tenn., 700 F.3d 845, 858-64 (6th Cir. 2012) ("The State Defendants argue that while the Andrews have asserted facts that taken as true, 'may establish a formulation of a general Fourth Amendment claim,' they have failed to assert sufficient facts to establish that 'a clear violation of the Fourth Amendment as it applies to social workers has occurred....' Although the State Defendants do not cite any authority for their contention, their argument seems to imply that social workers engaging in their statutorily mandated investigative functions are not governed by the same requirements of the Fourth Amendment that apply to law enforcement officers or other state actors.[footnote omitted] If their implication is that social workers are not state actors for the purposes of the Fourth Amendment, the Supreme Court has established that the Fourth Amendment's restrictions on unreasonable searches and seizures extend well beyond the police . . . . In other circuits, defendant caseworkers and social workers have unsuccessfully attempted to argue that the Fourth Amendment should not apply to their actions when entering homes to investigate allegations of child abuse. . . .Although this court has not yet had occasion to definitively address this issue, other courts have found that the Fourth Amendment governs entries and searches of homes made by social workers. [collecting cases] Given the presumption that state actors are governed by the Fourth Amendment and the sanctity of the home under the Fourth Amendment, we agree that a social worker, like other state officers, is governed by the Fourth Amendment's warrant requirement. This would simply mean that social workers would have to obtain consent, have sufficient grounds to believe that exigent circumstances exist, or qualify under another recognized exception to the warrant requirement before engaging in warrantless entries and searches of homes. . . . Given that the Fourth Amendment's strictures apply to social worker actions, the Andrews have asserted a violation of their constitutional right to be free from unreasonable searches unless an exception to the warrant requirement is established. Construing the facts in the light most favorable to the Andrews, the State Defendants have not demonstrated that an exception to the warrant requirement applies. . . .The State Defendants argue that it was not clearly established at the time of their actions that social workers may not enter a home without a warrant or an applicable exception to the warrant requirement. . . .The Supreme Court has not expressly held that the Fourth Amendment prohibition on warrantless searches of homes does or does not apply to social workers carrying out investigations regarding the welfare of children. . . . [W]e must examine whether our own decisions have addressed the issue in order to ascertain whether the law was clearly established at the time the State Defendants entered the Andrews' home. . .While Jordan is not binding precedent, it is the only case from our court that bears on the issue of whether the reasonable social worker, facing the situation in the instant case, would have known that her conduct violated clearly established law. Yet, Jordan fails to give clear guidance to the social worker faced with the decision to enter the Andrews home. First, the Jordan footnote referencing the views of other circuits does not endorse them, explicitly or otherwise. The footnote does not hint at whether the court believes a social worker exception to the application of the Fourth Amendment should apply. The footnote is merely an observation about the existence of an issue not explored in Jordan. Moreover, the court in Jordan concluded, using fairly broad language, that social workers should not 'have to second guess' the decisions of officers. . . . Although the court mentions that the officer told the social worker the children in the house were in immediate physical danger—a circumstance not present here—the opinion makes no effort to delineate the situations in which reliance on officers' decisions would be appropriate and those in which it would not. Consequently, a social worker could not determine, based on Jordan, whether she might reasonably rely on the officers' decision under the circumstances presented here. In fact, to the extent Jordan suggests an answer to the question of whether the social worker could rely on an officer's decision, it suggests that she could do so. . . . Quite simply, the reasonable social worker faced with the circumstances of this case could not ascertain from clearly established law the legality of her conduct. [footnote omitted] . . . . [G]iven the lack of clarity of Jordan, it was not objectively unreasonable for the State Defendants to enter the home. . . .As we have explained, the actions of social workers in entering a home are governed by the Fourth Amendment, and we have concluded that no social worker exception applies in such situations. Nonetheless, there is still a question, going forward, about whether social workers can rely upon the actions of police officers in deciding whether they can enter a home, although, to be sure, there is a question of fact in this case about whether reliance on the officers occurred. While we recognize that social workers have a duty to cooperate with police officers and, perhaps, a natural inclination to defer to their decisions, exempting social workers from the Fourth Amendment whenever they rely upon a police officer's actions is tantamount to recognition of a 'social worker exception' to the Fourth Amendment's requirements. We join other circuits in recognizing that Fourth Amendment standards are the same, whether the state actor is a law enforcement officer or a social worker. [collecting cases] Nonetheless, if social workers cannot be treated better than police officers under the Fourth Amendment, they should not be treated worse, either. Social workers are frequently asked to make decisions based on information provided to them, directly or indirectly, by the police. When social workers rely in good faith on information from police officers which suggests they can enter a home under an exception to the warrant requirement, or can reasonably infer that an exception applies from their actions, they are entitled to rely on that information. . . The social workers' position is the same as that of a police officer who reasonably relies on another police officer.")

Patrizi v. Huff, 690 F.3d 459, 465-67 (6th Cir. 2012) ("Construing the facts in Patrizi's favor, we conclude it is clear that Patrizi's actions did not constitute an affirmative act under the obstruction ordinance. Patrizi asked the officer questions in a calm and measured manner; she did not continuously interrupt so that the officer could not speak to the subjects of his investigations. She did not ignore instructions from him to cease her questioning—in fact, she was never even given such instructions—and she did not in any way exhibit aggressive, boisterous, or unduly disruptive conduct. . . In short, it is evident that Patrizi's actions were of the same nature as those held not to constitute an affirmative act by the Ohio Court of Appeals in Kristoff. Therefore, under clearly established law the officers lacked probable cause to arrest her. . . . [D]espite any arguable ambiguity in the Ohio state courts' jurisprudence, the U.S. Supreme Court has clearly established that nonaggressive questioning of police officers is constitutionally protected conduct. . . Patrizi's actions fall precisely within that protected ambit because, when the facts are viewed in her favor, her conduct did not cross the line into fighting words or disorderly conduct prohibiting the officers from conducting their investigation.")

McGlone v. Bell , 681 F.3d 718, 735 (6th Cir. 2012) ("State university officials in their individual capacities were not entitled to qualified immunity in § 1983 action by Christian evangelist challenging university's policy requiring nonaffiliated individuals to obtain permission before speaking on certain parts of its campus; evangelist had clearly established right to engage in his desired expression on campus free from requirements imposed by university.)

Clemente v. Vaslo, 679 F.3d 482, 492, 493 (6th Cir. 2012) ("What is clearly established is only that public employers may not coerce their employees to abdicate their constitutional rights on pain of dismissal, and that is not what happened here. . . . Defendants' actual conduct highlights the blurriness of the Fourth Amendment's contours in the context of an employer-employee relationship. Bartok and White acted on a gradient, applying more pressure at each step to obtain consent (simply asking, then citing to a city ordinance, then giving a direct order as supervisor), but never forced Plaintiffs to choose between letting them in or losing their jobs. Though we do not decide the issue, we note that a supervisor's direct order may be coercive in some situations, as it may be reasonable for an employee to believe that disobeying it will result in termination. The question, however, is not whether such conduct could possibly constitute a Fourth Amendment violation but whether, according to settled Supreme Court and Sixth Circuit precedent at the time, such conduct was so clearly violative of the Fourth Amendment that it is beyond debate. . .Short of threatening termination, what public employers could do to obtain an employee's consent to conduct an inspection was not clearly established. Duchane and Bartok are thus entitled to qualified immunity.")

Whitney v. City of Milan, 677 F.3d 292, 299 (6th Cir. 2012) (public employee's "right to speak publicly and participate in a lawsuit addressing workplace discrimination and public corruption in the City's government was clearly established.")

O'Neill v. Louisville/Jefferson County Metro Government, 662 F.3d 723, 731, 732, 735 (6th Cir. 2011) ("In concluding that the LMAS officers could constitutionally reenter the O'Neills' home without a warrant, the district court relied on the consent-once-removed doctrine. This doctrine allows government agents to enter a suspect's premises to arrest the suspect without a warrant if [undercover agents]: 1) entered at the express invitation of someone with authority to consent; 2) at that point established the existence of probable cause to effectuate an arrest or search; and 3) immediately summoned help from other officers. . .The O'Neills argue that this doctrine does not apply in the present case, where the undercover officers left the premises and then attempted to make a second entry. This court has previously held that, under the consent-once-removed doctrine, an undercover agent or informant in a suspect's home may signal to agents outside to come in and effectuate an arrest. . . But this court has not extended the doctrine to cover reentry after the undercover agent or informant has left the premises, or where there is no intent to effectuate an arrest, and we decline to do so here. . . .Applying the consent-once-removed doctrine to the LMAS officers' second entry, where no arrest was intended, would go well beyond the confines of this limited doctrine, which has yet to be adopted by the Supreme Court. See Pearson v. Callahan, 555 U.S. 223, 243-44 (2009) (declining to rule on whether the consent-once-removed doctrine is constitutional by instead resolving the issue of qualified immunity on the basis that no clearly established law was violated). We therefore conclude that the O'Neills have sufficiently pleaded a Fourth Amendment violation based on the second warrantless entry. . . . Given that we are reversing the court's rulings on the Class A kennel issue, the consent-once-removed doctrine, and procedural due process issue, the court's analysis of the O'Neills' Fourth Amendment and procedural due process claims will necessarily change, as will its determination of what law was or was not clearly established. We accordingly remand the qualified-immunity issue to the district court for further proceedings in light of our opinion.")

Wheeler v. City of Lansing, 660 F.3d 931, 941-43 (6th Cir. 2011) ("Although we refused to address whether Wheeler's first Fourth Amendment claim actually presented a constitutional violation, we must address the constitutionality of her second claim in order to determine whether Wirth is entitled to qualified immunity. . . . The warrant to search Wheeler's apartment listed broad categories of stolen property, providing no basis to distinguish the stolen items from Wheeler's own personal property. Moreover, it appears that officers had additional information about the stolen items to be seized that they could have included in the warrant. . . . Wirth is not entitled to qualified immunity from this aspect of Wheeler's claim, as it would be apparent to a reasonable officer that listing general categories of items to be seized even though further details are available violates the Fourth Amendment's specificity requirement. . . .Because a reasonable officer would have known that the warrant was deficient, Wirth is not entitled to qualified immunity on this portion of Wheeler's Fourth Amendment claim.")

Barker v. Goodrich, 649 F.3d 428, 435-37 (6th Cir. 2011) ("Defendants had fair warning in 2007 that their conduct was unconstitutional. Case law from the Supreme Court, this Court, and other circuits established at that time that each condition seen here-restraining an inmate in an uncomfortable position, denying access to water, and denying access to the toilet–could rise to an Eighth Amendment violation if allowed to persist for an extended period. These cases, taken together with the notice given by normal prison practice and the obvious cruelty inherent in the conduct, clearly established that Defendants' alleged conduct–subjecting Barker to all of these conditions at once for a period in excess of twelve hours-violated Barker's Eighth Amendment rights. . . . Although Ort and Gates come from the Eleventh and Fifth Circuits, respectively, and so are not binding on this Court, neither are they 'single idiosyncratic opinions' from other circuits. . . Moreover, these cases were thoroughly analyzed and served as the basis for the Supreme Court's decision in Hope–a decision that is certainly binding on this Court. . . They are thus sufficient to give the Defendants fair warning. A defendant's deviation from normal practice and prison policies can also provide notice that his actions are improper. . . In this case, the evidence establishes that normal procedure would have been to change Barker's clothing and remove his handcuffs before placing him in the observation cell, thus allowing him full use of his hands to rest comfortably and access the water fountain and toilet. Defendants argue that they deviated from this practice because Barker was resisting the removal of his handcuffs. However, for the purposes of qualified immunity, this Court must take the plaintiff's evidence as true. . . Thus, the fact that Defendants deviated from normal procedure, even though Barker was cooperating and removal of the handcuffs would have been simple, provides further evidence that Defendants knew their conduct was unconstitutional. Furthermore, Hope makes clear that the obvious cruelty inherent in a punishment can serve as notice that it is unconstitutional. . . . Taking Barker's evidence as true, he was handcuffed in an uncomfortable position for over twelve hours for no legitimate purpose, and denied even the basic dignity of relieving himself. The obvious cruelty in Defendants' actions warned them that they were violating the prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment. Accordingly, the constitutional right was clearly established and we REVERSE the district court's grant of qualified immunity to all Defendants.")

Gaspers v. Ohio Dept. Of Youth Service, 648 F.3d 400, 417(6th Cir. 2011) ("Here, as in Adkins and Sowards, plaintiffs' right of intimate association was clearly established by the Supreme Court as early as 1984 and by this court as early as 1993–long before William was terminated and Aldine was demoted and transferred. As a result, it was objectively reasonable to require the individual defendants to be aware of and to observe this constitutional right.")

Roth v. Guzman, 650 F.3d 603, 612, 617 (6th Cir. 2011) ("Even if we accept that the DPPA may be read to impose liability on a state official in his individual capacity when personal information disclosed for a purportedly permissible purpose was actually obtained for an impermissible purpose, we cannot agree that this right was clearly established at the time of the disclosures. . . . The district court acknowledged that there was (and is) no binding precedent from the Supreme Court, the Sixth Circuit, the district court itself, or other circuits deciding the issues raised in this case such as would render the asserted right 'clearly established.'. . . To the extent that the plaintiffs could prove a violation of the DPPA based on the allegation that Shadowsoft misrepresented itself as having a proper purpose under § 2721(b)(3) or that the disclosures were made in bulk under § 2721(b)(3), we find the contours of such rights were not sufficiently clear that a reasonable official would have understood at the time that the disclosures would violate such rights.")

Roth v. Guzman, 650 F.3d 603, 617-21 (6th Cir. 2011) (Clay, J., dissenting) ("While I do not take issue with the majority's conclusion that nothing in the Drivers Privacy Protection Act . . . prohibits the bulk disclosure of personal information contained in drivers' records, I respectfully dissent from the majority's determination that the disclosure of such records to Shadowsoft by officials at the Ohio Department of Public Safety and the Ohio Bureau of Motor Vehicles . . . without reasonably inquiring into whether Shadowsoft was a legitimate business using the records for a permissible purpose, was not a violation of a clearly established statutory requirement. While, as the majority notes, we have no binding case authority to guide us in addressing the claims raised in this case, we do have the statutory language of the DPPA. Under the factual scenario and procedural posture of the case now before us, I agree with the district court that the language of the DPPA is, in itself, sufficient to defeat qualified immunity for Defendants . . . .Even if it were true, as the majority contends, that BMV Officials' obligation of reasonable inquiry into a requester's permissible use begins and ends with a check in a box on a standardized form, it cannot be the case that a state official fulfills his legal obligations, under 18 U.S.C. § 2721(b)(3), when he releases drivers' personal information with absolutely nothing to indicate that he is releasing the information to a 'legitimate business.' Under the facts as pleaded in this case, any reasonable official would have been on notice that to disclose the information requested by Shadowsoft in response to Shadowsoft's facially deficient request would violate the DPPA. Finally, it must be emphasized that the exceptions outlined in 18 U.S.C. §§ 2721(b)(1)-(14) are permissive, not mandatary. Holding that a state official must perform a reasonable minimal inquiry before releasing sensitive personal information to anyone with a fax machine, a pencil and two dollars does not impose an unreasonable burden. BMV Officials may decide that they do not want to face the threat of DPPA liability for disclosing drivers' information without first inquiring into whom and for what purpose they are being asked to disclose. The solution is simple: when in doubt as to whether the purpose of the request comports with the requirements of the Act, BMV Officials may choose not to release drivers' information for non-mandatory uses. After all, the purpose of the DPPA is to encourage state officials to do what they should strive to do anyway, which is to protect the personal information of state residents.")

Pritchard v. Hamilton Township Bd. of Trustees, 424 F. App'x 492, 2011 WL 2039066, at *13 (6th Cir. May 25, 2011) ("At first blush it might seem unduly harsh to have an expectation that law enforcement officers should know the intricacies of criminal statutes, but this position finds support in other areas of the qualified immunity doctrine that regularly impute knowledge of statutes and caselaw to officers. Indeed, it is a touchstone of qualified immunity doctrine that 'a reasonably competent public official should know the law governing his conduct.'. . For instance, we impute knowledge of state-law definitions and state-court interpretations of a statute to police officers when we decide whether an officer could reasonably conclude that probable cause exists under a given set of circumstances. . . .In light of these principles, and the abundantly plain language of the statute at issue here, we hold that the Defendant officers did not have probable cause to arrest Christman for underage drinking because the facts and circumstances known to the officers established a statutorily affirmative justification of the suspected criminal act.")

Kennedy v. City of Villa Hills, Ky., 635 F.3d 210, 214-19 (6th Cir. 2011) ("For purposes of this appeal, Schutzman concedes that a genuine issue of material fact exists about the amount of noise that Kennedy made, and therefore whether Schutzman violated Kennedy's constitutional right to be free from wrongful arrest. At stake is the second question: whether Kennedy's constitutional right to be free from wrongful arrest in these circumstances was clearly established such that Schutzman should have known of it. We conclude that Kennedy's right was clearly established. . . . In the context of qualified immunity, preexisting, clearly established law refers to 'binding precedent from the Supreme Court, the Sixth Circuit, the district court itself, or other circuits that is directly on point.'. . . Given the context of the arrest as Kennedy has portrayed it, a reasonable officer could not conclude that Kennedy's outburst provided probable cause for his arrest. . . . Regardless of why Schutzman made the arrest, the relevant inquiry is whether an officer with no ill will toward Kennedy could have believed that he had probable cause to arrest Kennedy. We answer no, rendering qualified immunity inappropriate on the claim of wrongful arrest. . . . In contrast to its role in the Fourth Amendment context, motive is relevant to Kennedy's claim that Schutzman arrested Kennedy in retaliation for Kennedy's exercise of his First Amendment rights. . . . At the summary-judgment stage, this evidence suffices to show that the content of Kennedy's speech may have been a motivating factor for Schutzman to arrest Kennedy. Finally, Kennedy's right to be free from retaliatory arrest after insulting an officer was clearly established.")

U.S. v. Buford, 632 F.3d 264, 276 n.10 (6th Cir. 2011) ("Gant itself underscored the reasonableness of an officer's reliance on settled law, even if that law is later overturned. The Court noted that qualified immunity will shield officers from liability in civil suits challenging unconstitutional vehicle searches conducted before Gant because such officers acted in 'reasonable reliance' on the then-prevailing and 'widely accepted' understanding of Belton. . . That observation directly supports the conclusion that the good-faith exception to the exclusionary rule applies in criminal prosecutions because the qualified immunity test turns on the same standard of reasonableness as the good-faith exception.")

Ellison v. Balinski, 625 F.3d 953, 959 (6th Cir., 2010) ("While police generally are entitled to rely on a judicially secured warrant for immunity from liability for unconstitutional searches, qualified immunity is not appropriate 'where the warrant application is so lacking in indicia of probable cause as to render official belief in its existence unreasonable.'. . Here, a jury could reasonably determine that this affidavit–mentioning no specific crimes thought probably committed, making no link between Plaintiff's residence and any crime, yet seeking broad authority for a search of Plaintiff's entire residence for any document 'pertaining to' Plaintiff–was so lacking in indicia of probable cause to render Defendant's belief in its existence objectively unreasonable. Accordingly, the district court was correct to deny Defendant's motion for judgment as a matter of law.")

Elkins v. Summit County, Ohio, 615 F.3d 671, 676, 677 (6th Cir. 2010) ("Having assumed that the officers received the Mann memorandum and did not divulge it, we must next determine whether that failure violated Elkins' constitutional right to due process. . . .[I]n Moldowan, we held that 'the due process guarantees recognized in Brady also impose an analogous or derivative obligation on the police [to disclose to the prosecutor evidence whose materially exculpatory value should have been 'apparent' to him at the time of his investigation].'. . Thus, Elkins had a constitutional right to have favorable evidence disclosed to the prosecution and court. . . In Moldowan, we found that 'at least three circuits recognized prior to August 1990 ... this right was clearly established,'. . and that the right may have been clearly established as early as 1964. . . Thus, Elkins' right to have the Mann memorandum disclosed was clearly established on January 5, 1999.")

Knisley v. Pike County Joint Vocational School Dist., 604 F.3d 977, 982, 983 (6th Cir. 2010) ("The United States Supreme Court has asked us to reconsider this case in light of Redding, in which the Court invalidated a strip search of a female student when looking for ibuprofen tablets. Redding, 129 S.Ct. at 2642-43. The Court, however, found that the officials at issue were nevertheless protected by qualified immunity because (1) there was no clearly established law finding unconstitutional the strip searching of students under materially similar circumstances from the Supreme Court and (2) the appellate courts who had ruled in factually similar circumstances were not in concert. Id. at 2643-44. Essentially, the Redding defendants were entitled to qualified immunity because neither the Supreme Court nor the Ninth Circuit had clearly established case law on point . . . and there was no national consensus on this issue among the Circuits at the time of the Redding search. . . However, this Circuit's law on student strip searches was clearly established as early as 2005, when we published our opinion in Beard. We read Redding to affirm our constitutional holding in Beard. Thus, because Beard remains good constitutional law and because that law was clearly established at the time of the strip search in this case, Redding does not require a result contrary to that reached in Knisley I. . . Our Circuit's clearly established case law on this issue put the school and its employees on notice that this search was unconstitutional, so defendants are not entitled to qualified immunity protection.").

Harris v. City of Circleville, 583 F.3d 356, 367 (6th Cir. 2009) ("Defendants contend that the law was not clearly established because the law was unclear about what standard applies to Harris's excessive force claims (i.e., the Fourth or Fourteenth Amendment). We reject that argument because even if there were some lingering ambiguity as to whether the Fourth or the Fourteenth Amendment applies in this precise context, the 'legal norms' underlying Harris's claims nevertheless were clearly established. A defendant is not entitled to summary judgment on the basis of qualified immunity simply because the courts have not 'agreed upon the precise formulation of the [applicable] standard.'. . Under this circuit's existing case law, there undoubtedly is a clearly established legal norm precluding the use of violent physical force against a criminal suspect who already has been subdued and does not present a danger to himself or others. . . . Thus, even if it were unclear whether the Fourth or Fourteenth Amendment governs Harris's excessive force claims, the legal norms underlying those claims were nevertheless clearly established.").

Moldowan v. City of Warren, 578 F.3d 351, 378, 381-84, 386-89 (6th Cir. 2009) ("Because prosecutors rely so heavily on the police and other law enforcement authorities, the obligations imposed under Brady would be largely ineffective if those other members of the prosecution team had no responsibility to inform the prosecutor about evidence that undermined the state's preferred theory of the crime. As a practical matter then, Brady's ultimate concern for ensuring that criminal defendants receive a 'fundamentally fair' trial . . . demands that A*Brady's* protections also extend to actions of other law enforcement officers such as investigating officers," White v. McKinley, 519 F.3d 806, 814 (8th Cir.2008). Although this Court has not yet directly addressed the issue, a number of our decisions support this conclusion. . . . If the police can be expected to recognize what evidence must be preserved, certainly it is not too burdensome to demand that they simply turn that same information over to the prosecutor's office. . . . For most of the same reasons we have laid out here, virtually every other circuit has concluded either that the police share in the state's obligations under Brady, or that the Constitution imposes on the police obligations analogous to those recognized in Brady. . . . Although our recognition of this type of a claim is more recent and less specific, the overwhelming number of decisions from other circuits recognizing this type of claim satisfies us that any reasonable police officer would know that suppressing exculpatory evidence was a violation of the accused's constitutional rights. . . . Notwithstanding the concurrence's argument to the contrary, the cases in this area clearly establish that police actions taken in bad faith are not the only species of police conduct that can deprive criminal defendants of the due process guaranteed by the Constitution. We acknowledge that a number of courts, including the Supreme Court, have held that a showing of bad faith is required to prevail on a claim that the police deprived a defendant of due process by concealing or withholding evidence that is only 'potentially useful.' But, where the police are aware that the evidence in their possession is exculpatory, the Supreme Court's decisions in this area indicate that the police have an absolute duty to preserve and disclose that information. The critical issue in determining whether bad faith is required thus is not whether the evidence is withheld by the prosecutor or the police, but rather whether the exculpatory value of the evidence is 'apparent' or not. . . . In other words, the critical issue in determining whether government conduct deprived a criminal defendant of a fair trial is the nature of the evidence that was withheld; it emphatically is not the mental state of the government official who suppressed the evidence. . . . Simply put, where the evidence withheld or destroyed by the police falls into that more serious category, the defendant is not required to make any further showing regarding the mental state of the police. . . . The only difference in the requisite inquiry is that, where the police are concerned, the 'exculpatory value' of the evidence must be 'apparent.' . . . Where the exculpatory value of a piece of evidence is 'apparent,' the police have an unwavering constitutional duty to preserve and ultimately disclose that evidence. . . . The reason no further showing of animus or bad faith is required is that, where the police have in their possession evidence that they know or should know 'might be expected to play a significant role in the suspect's defense,'. . . the destruction or concealment of that evidence can never be done 'in good faith and in accord with their normal practice,' Killian v. United States, 368 U.S. 231, 242 (1961). Consequently, requiring a criminal defendant or § 1983 plaintiff to show a 'conscious' or 'calculated' effort to suppress such evidence would be superfluous.")

Back v. Hall, 537 F.3d 552, 557 (6th Cir. 2008) ("[Defendants] argue that any constitutional protection Back enjoyed could not have been clearly established because, as in Cope, 'there was no published decision ... holding that political compatibility is not ... an appropriate requirement for [her former] position.' . . In one sense, they are right. Neither we nor the Supreme Court has ever held that the Internal Policy Analyst III job in the Kentucky Office of Homeland Security is a nonpolitical job. But in a more fundamental way, they are wrong. The absence of such a precise holding does not prevent the relevant law from being clearly established, even in the particularized sense that our case law requires.").

Parsons v. City of Pontiac, 533 F.3d 492, 504 (6th Cir. 2008) ("Detectives Martin and McKinney . . . are entitled to qualified immunity unless their actions 'were objectively unreasonable in light of the clearly established right.'. . But viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to Parsons, a jury could find that their actions were not objectively reasonable. The problem is not that they ignored exculpatory evidence in arresting a suspect as in Gardenhire, . . . but that a genuine issue of material fact exists as to whether they possessed sufficient inculpatory evidence to reasonably believe that Parsons shot Frantz. We therefore conclude that the decision of the district court with regard to qualified immunity for Martin and McKinney must be reversed.").

Jacob v. Township of West Bloomfield, 531 F.3d 385, 391, 392 (6th Cir. 2008) ("Because the warrantless searches at issue in this case began in 1999, there is no question that the Fourth Amendment's protection of the intimate area surrounding Plaintiff's home was clearly established at the time of Defendant's entry upon the property. Indeed, the Supreme Court's longstanding precedents show that it was clearly established at the time of Defendant's intrusion onto Plaintiff's land that such a criminal investigation is constrained by the Fourth Amendment's warrant requirement.").

El Bey v. Roop, 530 F.3d 407, 421 (6th Cir. 2008) ("Reasonable officers presented with the circumstances as alleged by El Bey should have known that a warrantless search of El Bey's home, and an arrest based on an outstanding warrant that was discovered only as a result of the warrantless search, would be unconstitutional.").

Lanman v. Hinson, 529 F.3d 673, 689 (6th Cir. 2008) ("The facts viewed in the light most favorable to plaintiff demonstrate that defendants knew because of their NAPPI training that restraining a patient face-down on the floor and putting pressure on a patient's back posed a substantial risk of asphyxiation. Despite knowledge of this risk, defendants chose to restrain Lanman using these dangerous restraint techniques. Their actions were objectively unreasonable given the fact that plaintiff's eyewitness testified that defendants continued to restrain Lanman in this dangerous position five minutes after he wasn't resisting at all and looked like he was passed out. It would have been clear to defendants that it was not necessary to continue restraining a patient who looked like he was passed out with techniques that pose a substantial risk of asphyxiation. A reasonable official in defendants' positions would understand that his actions violated Lanman's constitutional right to freedom from undue bodily restraint.").

Jones v. City of Cincinnati, 521 F.3d 555, 559, 560 (6th Cir. 2008) ("The complaint alleges that the six officers who subdued Jones (1) savagely beat him with batons, striking him at least 33 times without giving him a chance to comply with their orders; (2) sprayed chemical irritant in his face after they had placed him in handcuffs; and (3) used their combined weight to hold him prone on the ground after he had stopped struggling. Such use of force is not objectively reasonable, and hence a violation of Jones's Fourth Amendment rights. . . . The right of an unresisting suspect to be free from baton strikes, 'significant pressure on [his] back,' and a dose of chemical irritants was clearly established over three years before Jones died. . . Therefore, the officers who subdued Jones are not entitled to qualified immunity on the excessive force claim. . . . The defendants argue that this case should be analyzed under the heightened malice standard because there was little time between taking Jones into custody and the time he stopped breathing. We disagree. The complaint alleges that the officers left Jones on the ground for a prolonged time and that they 'stood there and discussed the absence of fire personnel' after they noticed Jones was not breathing. These facts are similar to those in Owensby, in which this Court ruled that the deliberate indifference standard was appropriate because the six minutes between taking the suspect into custody and the time medical care was provided gave the officers 'time to fully consider the potential consequences of their conduct.' . .The complaint alleges that each of the officers present–the six who subdued Jones and the three sergeants who arrived afterwards–knew that the handcuffed Jones was not breathing. Therefore each knew of a substantial risk of serious harm to Jones's safety while he was in their custody and disregarded that risk by failing to provide aid. The right of a suspect in custody to receive adequate medical care, even if the suspect had been fleeing and resisting before the officers placed him in custody, was clearly established almost three years before Jones's death. . . Therefore, the officers who subdued Jones and the sergeants who arrived soon after are not entitled to qualified immunity on the failure to provide medical care claim.").

King v. Ambs, 519 F.3d 607, 615 (6th Cir. 2008) ("The undisputed facts of this case are that King repeatedly interfered with an ongoing criminal investigation, that after King had done so twice, Officer Ambs warned King that 'if he said one more word' he would be arrested for so doing, and that King continued to interfere with the officer's attempt to interview Klein. Based on these facts, and regardless of whether King actually 'spoke over' Officer Ambs, it is clear that King was arrested for the act of disrupting the officer's investigation, and not for the content of his speech. . . . [A]s with our analysis of King's Fourth Amendment claim above, while King's arrest did not violate any constitutional right, and the first step of the qualified immunity analysis is not met, even if the holding in Hill could be extended to apply to King's arrest under the particular facts of this case, Officer Ambs would still be entitled to qualified immunity as to the alleged First Amendment violation. For a violation to be clearly established, '[t]he contours of the right must be sufficiently clear that a reasonable official would understand that what he is doing violates that right.'. . Because a reasonable officer would not have known that enforcement of the Columbia Township obstruction ordinance in the context of this case violated the First Amendment, the right was not clearly established and Officer Ambs would be entitled to qualified immunity at the second step of the Saucier analysis.")

King v. Ambs, 519 F.3d 607, 615, 625 (6th Cir. 2008) (O'Malley, District Judge, dissenting) ("The majority, much like the district court before it, appears loathe to allow a civil rights action to proceed where that action would give voice to the complaints of an obnoxious, disrespectful and likely intoxicated young man, whose own classless conduct led to his arrest. I certainly sympathize with that apparent concern. Established First Amendment jurisprudence counsels against indulging such concerns, however, especially in the context presented here. . . . Put simply, the majority concludes that the First Amendment right was not clearly established because no protected First Amendment conduct occurred. Putting aside its circularity, the ultimate conclusion that the right at issue here was not clearly established can not be squared with the state of the law when the arrest occurred.At least twenty years ago, the Supreme Court made clear that, within reason, individuals may not be subject to arrest merely because they interrupt or challenge police conduct. . . . The majority's decision today provides a broad shield to police officers who seek to enforce obstruction statutes against those engaged in speech-related challenges to police activity. It simply cannot be squared, however, with well-established, and, indeed, important First Amendment jurisprudence.").

Dorsey v. Barber, 517 F.3d 389, 394, 400 (6th Cir. 2008) ("[A]lthough the district court couched its ruling in terms of factual disputes, the pure legal issue legitimately before us on appeal concerns whether Begin's display of his firearm in conjunction with ordering plaintiffs to lie face-down on the ground for a period of time undisputedly no greater than two minutes–until additional law enforcement support arrived and control of the scene was assumed by a superior officer–constituted an unreasonable seizure or an excessive use of force in violation of plaintiffs' clearly established rights, of which a reasonable officer would have known. . . . [W]e have no trouble concluding that Begin made a mistake. Considering that the suspects were wanted in connection with an auto theft investigation, . . . and that plaintiffs did not manifestly pose an immediate threat to anyone's safety or a risk of flight, Begin should have been able to 'stop and hold' them without brandishing his firearm and ordering them to lie face-down on the pavement. Begin's response to the apparent demands of the situation seems to have been exaggerated and the resultant seizure, though supported by reasonable suspicion, was, due to the unnecessarily intrusive means employed by Begin, at least arguably unreasonable. . . . Yet, it does not follow that Begin's mistake necessarily disqualifies him from qualified immunity. Qualified immunity protects 'all but the plainly incompetent or those who knowingly violate the law.'. . There is no support for the notion that Begin knowingly and deliberately violated plaintiffs' right to be free from unreasonable seizure. Nor can his mistake be fairly characterized as so egregious as to suggest outright incompetence. At worst, Begin made an error of judgment, erring on the side of public safety. Not knowing the seriousness of the criminal activity for which the suspects were wanted, but knowing that the persons before him, who matched the BOLO description, had first disregarded and then resisted his orders to stop, Begin chose to stabilize the situation by acting with a preemptive show of authority. This approach turned out to be unnecessary, but cannot be said to have been plainly incompetent or objectively unreasonable.").

Brannum v. Overton County School Board, 516 F.3d 489, 494, 495, 498, 499(6th Cir. 2008) ("Before explaining our Fourth Amendment analysis, we think it might be useful to explain why we do not assess the students' privacy claims under the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. This court has held that the constitutional right to privacy, which includes the right to shield one's body from exposure to viewing by the opposite sex, derives from the Fourth Amendment, rather than the Due Process Clause. . . We are aware that some circuits have found that the same privacy right is located in the Due Process Clause. . .. However, since the Fourth Amendment approach is the precedent in this circuit, and the Supreme Court seems to prefer it, . . . we will follow our precedent. . . . Neither the Supreme Court nor this court has ever addressed the applicability of video surveillance to the Fourth Amendment's proscription against unreasonable searches. However, the Supreme Court has applied the amendment's guarantees to practices that were not in existence at the time the amendment was enacted and has instructed that in such cases, the ultimate measure of the constitutionality of such searches is one of 'reasonableness.'. . . We are satisfied that both the students' expectation of privacy and the character of the intrusion are greater in this case than those at issue in Vernonia and T.L.O. We conclude that the locker room videotaping was a search, unreasonable in its scope, and violated the students' Fourth Amendment privacy rights. . . . In analyzing whether a constitutional right is clearly established, we look 'principally to the decisions of the United States Supreme Court and this circuit to determine whether the law was clearly established at the time of the action.'. . The Supreme Court has left it to the lower federal courts to decide, case by case, what 'clearly established' means when applied to factual situations not previously confronted by the Supreme Court. The Court provided some guidance in Brosseau v. Haugen, 543 U.S. 194, 199 (2004), when it announced that the specific constitutional right at issue must be clearly established when considered at an appropriate level of specificity and cannot be asserted at a high level of generality. . . . Some personal liberties are so fundamental to human dignity as to need no specific explication in our Constitution in order to ensure their protection against government invasion. Surreptitiously videotaping the plaintiffs in various states of undress is plainly among them. . . Stated differently, and more specifically, a person of ordinary common sense, to say nothing of professional school administrators, would know without need for specific instruction from a federal court, that teenagers have an inherent personal dignity, a sense of decency and self-respect, and a sensitivity about their bodily privacy that are at the core of their personal liberty and that are grossly offended by their being surreptitiously videotaped while changing their clothes in a school locker room. These notions of personal privacy are 'clearly established' in that they inhere in all of us, particularly middle school teenagers, and are inherent in the privacy component of the Fourth Amendment's proscription against unreasonable searches. But even if that were not self-evident, the cases we have discussed, supra, would lead a reasonable school administrator to conclude that the students' constitutionally protected privacy right not to be surreptitiously videotaped while changing their clothes is judicially clearly established.").

Figel v. Overton, 263 F. App'x 456, 2008 WL 341458, *3 (6th Cir. Feb. 6, 2008) ("At the time of the alleged conduct, one circuit had already concluded that the RULPA [sic] was constitutional, see Mayweathers v. Newland, 314 F.3d 1062 (9th Cir.2002), and five circuits, including the Ninth, had concluded that the identical operative language in RFRA did not violate the Establishment Clause. . . Thus, at the time of Defendants' alleged unconstitutional acts, the RULPA [sic] was presumptively constitutional, and no federal appellate authority was to the contrary. Thus, at the time of the conduct in question, the constitutionality of the RULPA [sic] was clearly established and Defendants are not entitled to qualified immunity on Figel's RULPA [sic] claim. . . . Defendants' reliance on Key is misplaced. In Key, this Court addressed the applicability of the Americans with Disabilities Act and the Rehabilitation Act to prisoners, noting that prison officials were entitled to qualified immunity during the time that there was uncertainty on this issue. . . Unlike those statutes, it is clear from the face of the state that the RULPA [sic] applies to prisoners. Further, as noted above, until November 7, 2003, when Cutter was decided by this Circuit, the RULPA [sic] was valid law requiring compliance by prison officials.").

Logsdon v. Hains, 492 F.3d 334, 346 (6th Cir. 2007) ("The contours of the First Amendment public forum doctrine are sufficiently clear. Here, Defendants ostensibly arrested Plaintiff for violating Ohio's criminal trespass law. However, if instead, as Plaintiff appears to allege, Defendants arrested him because of the content of his speech, then Defendants acted in violation of the First Amendment in ways that should have been clear to a reasonable officer. Viewing the allegations in the light most favorable to Plaintiff, the district court erred in dismissing Plaintiff's First Amendment claims. We reverse because Plaintiff stated a claim, but express no opinion as to whether Plaintiff will ultimately succeed on his claim following discovery.").

Peete v. Metropolitan Government of Nashville and Davidson County, 486 F.3d 217, 219, 221, 223 (6th Cir. 2007) ("We find no case authority holding that paramedics answering a 911 emergency request for help engage in a Fourth Amendment 'seizure' of the person when restraining the person while trying to render aid. Hence there is no 'clearly established law' creating federal liability for a constitutional tort under these circumstances. The district court, therefore, erred in failing to grant qualified immunity to the paramedics. . . . [W]here the purpose is to render solicited aid in an emergency rather than to enforce the law, punish, deter, or incarcerate, there is no federal case authority creating a constitutional liability for the negligence, deliberate indifference, and incompetence alleged in the instant case. The Eighth Amendment 'Cruel and Unusual Punishment' Clause raising a 'deliberate indifference' standard does not apply here because Becerra was not incarcerated and the purpose of the alleged wrong was not punishment. . . . Assuming arguendo that the restraint techniques used by the EMT's were excessive or medically unreasonable, the plaintiff may be entitled to recovery under the state law of negligence, but improper medical treatment by a government employee, standing alone, does not violate the Fourth or Fourteenth Amendment. . . . The custody exception imposes on state officials a 'constitutional duty to provide adequate medical care to incarcerated prisoners ... and those under similar restraint of personal liberty.'. . The court in Jackson held that a constitutional duty was not triggered where paramedics placed an individual wounded by a gunshot into their ambulance and began transporting him to the hospital. The District Court had held that moving an unconscious patient into the ambulance constituted custody, but we held that 'the concept of custody does not extend this far.'. . The facts in the present case similarly fail to allege that Becerra was taken into custody. He was restrained while he was unconscious, and the defendants' actions were undertaken in an effort to render medical treatment. This is easily distinguished from the archetypical custody exception case where jail or prison officials fail to provide medical treatment to an incarcerated individual.").

Koulta v. Merciez, 477 F.3d 442, 448 (6th Cir. 2007) ("Even if we assumed for the sake of argument that the officers' actions violated Koulta's substantive due process rights, his estate cannot show that these rights were 'clearly established' at the time of the accident. Not just in 2002, but since then as well, our cases have failed to recognize a 'state-created danger' claim unless the State indeed created the danger-either by increasing the risk of harm to third parties by its affirmative conduct or by doing something that endangers a discrete member or group of the public. . . The estate has not identified a case from our circuit or any other that clearly establishes the contours of a substantive-due-process right of action on facts like these.").

Center for Bio-Ethical Reform, Inc. v. City of Springboro, 477 F.3d 807, 830, 831 (6th Cir. 2007) ("Here, the 'contours' of Plaintiffs' Fourth Amendment rights were 'sufficiently clear that a reasonable official would understand' that detaining Plaintiffs over two hours after they dispelled any reasonable suspicions ripened the investigatory stop into an arrest absent probable cause. . . Although Defendants confronted novel factual circumstances, the unlawfulness of their conduct should have been apparent in light of well-settled precedent of the Supreme Court and of this Circuit.")

See also Center for Bio-Ethical Reform Inc. v. City of Springboro, 2007 WL 4322234, at *2, *3 (S.D. Ohio Dec. 7, 2007) ("The Court agrees with Defendants Morris and Shaw that there is a reasonable probability that four Justices of the Supreme Court would grant certiorari in this case and a majority of at least five would vote to overturn the decision of the Sixth Circuit. The Supreme Court in recent years has been particularly solicitous of the doctrine of qualified immunity; it has taken many cases raising that issue and not infrequently reversed courts of appeals on the issue. See, e.g., from the 2006 Term, Morse v. Frederick, 127 S.Ct. 2618, 168 L.Ed.2d 290 (2007)(the "bong hits for Jesus" case); Scott v. Harris , 127 S.Ct. 1769 (2007). These were two out of only sixty-eight cases, the smallest Supreme Court docket since the mid-19th century. However, Defendants Morris and Shaw cannot demonstrate that they will suffer any substantial harm from denial of the stay. They argue, correctly, that the doctrine of qualified immunity protects public officials not only from liability, but also from suit and the inconveniences attendant on defending litigation. . . Because qualified immunity is an immunity from suit as well as from damages, a public official who pleads a qualified immunity defense is entitled to have that defense decided before the case proceeds even to discovery. . . Had Defendants Morris and Shaw sought such relief, they would have been entitled to have their qualified immunity defense decided before any discovery took place and could have taken an interlocutory appeal from an adverse decision. However, they did not exercise that right in this case, but permitted the case to proceed to discovery without objection. They are not now faced with any additional discovery burden: discovery was completed in this case before the pre-appeal summary judgment motions were filed. After remand, the Court conducted a scheduling conference and no party suggested the need for any additional discovery in the case (See Scheduling Order, Doc. No. 102). Thus the only immediate burden Defendants Morris and Shaw face is the burden of briefing the currently pending Motion for Summary Judgment. That burden will fall entirely on the shoulders of their counsel and the performance of their important duties as special agents of the F.B.I. will in no way be impacted. A different situation might be presented if the case were set for immediate trial, but in fact the trial date is not until August, 2008. As Plaintiffs note, the Supreme Court is very likely to decide any petition for certiorari by that time. Of course, if the Court grants certiorari, this Court will then stay its proceedings. Thus Defendants Morris and Shaw will not suffer the harms which the doctrine of qualified immunity shields them from by denial of the stay. Moreover, the stay will work harm to others. The asserted interference with Plaintiffs' constitutional rights occurred in June, 2002; even without a stay, it will be more than six years before they receive a trial. The other Defendants in the case also deserve finality and have not sought a stay . . . Even without a stay, the Court was unable in September, 2007, to confirm a trial date in less than eleven months because of counsels' trial calendars. Unless the Supreme Court decides to grant certiorari, this Court is loathe to lose the currently set trial date.").

Haynes v. City of Circleville, Ohio, 474 F.3d 357, 364, 365 (6th Cir. 2007) ("In lodging his protests to Chief Gray against the training cutbacks, Haynes was acting as a public employee carrying out his professional responsibilities . . . Haynes's speech is therefore unprotected as a matter of law because all of the speech at issue in this case, like the speech at issue in Garcetti, was made pursuant to his official duties. . . . . As a police officer, Haynes had developed the standard operating procedure for the canine unit and worked with his dog as part of his day-to-day professional activities. His memo to Chief Gray, made pursuant to these professional duties, is not protected under the First Amendment. . . . . At the time that Haynes sent his memo in February of 2003, he was simply speculating that someday there could be a negative incident that might result from the reduction in canine training. Haynes's memo focused on his discontent with the new program, which he later admitted in his deposition was in compliance with Ohio law. The memo thus reflects nothing more than 'the quintessential employee beef: management has acted incompetently.'. . Haynes's invocation in his memo of legal terms such as 'deliberate indifference' and 'failure to train' do not, without more, render Haynes's speech a matter of public concern. . . In short, the district court erred in concluding that Haynes's memo constituted protected speech even under the law of this circuit prior to Garcetti. Haynes thus has no First Amendment cause of action even if Chief Gray did fire him as a direct result of either the memo or the ill-fated 'Christmas gift.'. . . Because Haynes's speech took place pursuant to his official duties as a police officer, he cannot establish that a constitutional violation took place. . . . Haynes is a fortiori unable

Carver v. City of Cincinnati, 474 F.3d 283, 287 (6th Cir. 2007) ("There are no cases that present facts similar to Carver's situation that would make it 'clear to [an objectively] reasonable officer that his conduct was unlawful in the situation he confronted.'. . . The district court, citing to Beck v. Haik, 377 F.3d 624, 643 (6th Cir., 2004), found it clearly established that the officers violated Carver's constitutional rights. Beck, however, stands for the proposition that the state may not cut off access to private rescue without providing an adequate state alternative of aid. In this case, unlike Beck, there were no allegations of any attempted private rescue. There are no other cases from this circuit or the Supreme Court with analogous facts to the one before us. Therefore, the law was not clearly established at the time of the alleged constitutional violation.").

Perez v. Oakland County, 466 F.3d 416, 427-29 (6th Cir. 2006) ("Here, we have already determined that there is a genuine issue of fact as to whether Rice violated Perez's Eighth Amendment constitutional right. Thus, though it is a close case, we cannot hold that Rice is entitled to qualified immunity (on summary judgment) based on the first step of the qualified immunity analysis. We thus move to the second step of the qualified immunity test; we determine whether the right violated was 'clearly established' at the time of the violation. . . . In the context of a prisoner's Eighth Amendment medical-care claim, such precedent had to alert Rice that her conduct was deliberately indifferent to a strong likelihood that Perez would try to kill himself. . . . In Comstock v. McCrary, 273 F.3d 693 (2001), this court held that once a prisoner has been deemed suicidal, it is clearly established that the prisoner is entitled to continuing medical treatment. Here, Perez was not deemed to be suicidal at the time he was moved to the single cell. Additionally, Perez was not generally deprived of medical treatment involving his mental health needs. Thus, Perez Sr. would have to prove that his son's right to have his serious medical needs treated without deliberate indifference encompassed a right to a correct assessment of his suicide risk or an effective suicide-monitoring arrangement. . . . Perez identifies no pre-November 2002 published decision of the U.S. Supreme Court or this court requiring such a determination, nor have we found any. If no binding precedent is available that directly holds that conduct materially or fundamentally similar to Rice's was unlawful in October-November 2002 under the circumstances, as is the case here, the court may still find that Rice violated a clearly established right through one other avenue: showing 'a generally applicable principle from either binding or persuasive authorities whose Aspecific application to the relevant controversy" is Aso clearly foreshadowed by applicable direct authority as to leave no doubt in the mind of a reasonable officer that his conduct was unconstitutional."'. . However, Perez Sr. failed to show such a principle. On the contrary, by October 2002 this circuit's published case law had established that inmates have no general right to be correctly screened for suicidal tendencies. . . The circuit's published case law also held that 'the generalized right of a prisoner to be free from deliberate indifference [to a known serious medical need] cannot support a finding that there was a clearly established right to be protected from committing suicide.'").

Baranski v. Fifteen Unknown Agaents of the Bureau of Alcolhol, Tobacco and Firearms, 452 F.3d 433, 447-50 (6th Cir. 2006) (en banc) ("Doubtless, the agents would have been wiser to bring a written summary of the items to be seized (presumably signed by the magistrate) or to list the items to be seized in the warrant itself. There seems to be little doubt (and none has been offered by the United States) that agents who choose to rely on an incorporated affidavit typically have good reason and ample means to avoid complaints like this one. But the question is whether the Fourth Amendment demands these things, even when the purposes of doing them have been satisfied and even when the failure to do them has not prejudiced the property owners. On this record and under these circumstances, we hold that no constitutional violation occurred. . . But even if that were not the case, even if the search violated the Fourth Amendment, it did not violate 'clearly established' law. . . . Even aside from this mirror-image precedent from another circuit, the prevailing law in this circuit would have led reasonable agents to believe that their conduct was legal at the time they conducted the search. [discussing cases] . . . Groh does not alter this conclusion. The Court could criticize that search as warrantless because the warrant contained a 'glaring deficiency' upon issuance recognizable by 'any reasonable police officer[.]'. . . Absent any evidence on the face of the warrant that it incorporated the attached affidavit, the Court concluded, the warrant was 'manifestly invalid,' 'warrantless' and thus 'constitutionally fatal.' . . . Today's facts offer a poor analogy. At the time of issuance, this warrant specifically incorporated the affidavit ('See Attached Affidavit'), which in turn particularly described the items to be seized. Far from invalidating incorporated affidavits, Groh recognized that they may satisfy the particularity requirement, and in this case no one disputes that the warrant upon issuance appropriately incorporated the affidavit and that the magistrate reviewed, approved and signed the warrant and affidavit. At the time of issuance, in marked contrast to Groh, no amount of study by the agents or the magistrate would have revealed a constitutional infirmity in the warrant. Nor did Groh say that it was clearly established that a warrant valid upon issuance becomes invalid upon execution if the incorporated affidavit does not accompany the search. The words of the Constitution, to which the Court referred in concluding that the Groh warrant was facially invalid, establish particularity requirements that apply by their terms upon the 'issu[ance]' of a warrant, not upon the execution of it. Whether a particularized warrant at the time of issuance may become an unparticularized warrant when a cross-referenced affidavit does not accompany the search remains a matter of continued debate among the circuits and remains an issue that neither the text of the Fourth Amendment nor Groh resolves. We thus conclude that even if this search had violated the Fourth Amendment right, it did not violate 'clearly established' constitutional law, and accordingly the agents should receive qualified immunity.").

Silberstein v. City of Dayton, 440 F.3d 306, 316, 317 (6th Cir. 2006) ("The Board Members do not dispute that a City of Dayton employee in the classified service had a clearly established right to a pre-termination hearing at the time of Silberstein's termination; rather, they argue that Silberstein's status as a classified employee is disputable such that a reasonable person would not know that he or she was violating Silberstein's rights. . . . No reasonable official reading the plain language of the Charter would reach the conclusion that Silberstein was an unclassified employee. Although some cases reveal disagreement or ambiguity regarding an employee's status as classified or unclassified, these cases address whether an employee's position falls within the particular statutory language defining the categories of unclassified service. . . . Silberstein's position was clearly established as classified not only by the plain language of the Charter but also by general understanding and practice.").

Caudill v. Hollan, 431 F.3d 900, 913, 914 (6th Cir. 2005) ("We believe that Hall, Heggen, and McCloud make the law in this circuit with respect to patronage dismissals of these types of county employees clearly established with the requisite specificity to satisfy the Supreme Court's requirement that the law 'clearly establish[ ] in [a] more particularized sense' that the act was unconstitutional. . . The duties of the deputy sheriffs described in Hall are little different from the duties of the deputy clerks here. Deputy sheriffs duties were described in Heggen as 'including road patrol, serving arrest warrants and civil papers, taking complaints and 'working' auto accidents, ... transport [ing] prisoners[,] and providing courtroom security.' . . Heggen described all of these duties as 'nonpolicymaking duties .'. . Deputy clerks, whose work is essentially clerical work, also perform nonpolicymaking duties. Although deputy sheriffs and deputy clerks engage in different tasks, their respective levels of responsibility and the nature of their jobs are not so different as to cause this court to find that the law with respect to deputy sheriffs is clearly established, but that the law with respect to deputy clerks is not clearly established. In addition, Hager's duties are also best described as nonpolicymaking duties. It is difficult to understand how a reasonable official could believe that it would be constitutionally permissible to terminate a clerical employee like a deputy clerk through political patronage, when this court has held that it is not constitutionally permissible to terminate a deputy sheriff or a teacher and administrator of a gifted and talented program through political patronage. Furthermore, were this court to hold that Hall, Heggen, and Hager did not make the law clearly established for deputy county clerks, we would be ignoring the Supreme Court's rule that 'officials can still be on notice that their conduct violates established law even in novel factual circumstances.'. . Were this court to require position-specific findings before it found that the law was clearly established, we would be, in effect, requiring a previous finding on the constitutionality of patronage dismissals for every government position before holding that the law was clearly established for that position. Such a finding could lead to the result that similarly situated county officials could engage in political patronage dismissals at least once with impunity, unless and until a court ruled on the constitutionality of political patronage for that particular position. Such a result is not warranted by logic or precedent. . . . In sum, by virtue of McCloud, Heggen, and Hager, Defendant had sufficient notice that patronage dismissals in Kentucky were constitutionally suspect. These cases alone are enough to find that the rule prohibiting patronage dismissals of deputy county clerks was clearly established. The memo from the Boyd County Attorney warning new county executives against patronage dismissals further solidifies our holding that a reasonable official would be on notice that patronage dismissals would violate the constitutional rights of county employees in most circumstances.").

Evans-Marshall v. Bd. of Education of the Tipp City Exempted Village School District, 428 F.3d 223, 232, 233 (6th Cir., 2005)("Evans-Marshall has made allegations sufficient to satisfy the first prong of qualified immunity, that 'the officer[s'] conduct violated a constitutional right[.]'. . Since the Complaint adequately alleges a claim of First Amendment retaliation, there are sufficient allegations to support a claim that the individual defendants violated Evans-Marshall's constitutional rights by terminating her. . . Evans-Marshall's claim also satisfies the second prong of qualified immunity, that 'the right was clearly established.'. . Under a liberal reading of the Complaint, Evans-Marshall was terminated due to a public outcry engendered by the assignment of protected material that had been approved by the Board. Such a claim dovetails with previous, meritorious claims in this circuit. . . The dissent calls our attention to the comments by several of our sister circuits to the effect that constitutional rights discovered only pursuant to a balancing of interests have special implications for qualified immunity. . . . Yet Cockrel is clearly analogous to the facts at bar. In Cockrel, a teacher was fired because of a public outcry over material she presented in class that had been approved by the school. . . We held that her presentation of material in class constituted speech that dealt with a matter of public interest.. . We assumed that the concerns of the school did not outweigh Cockrel's interest in speaking because the school had approved the very material that gave rise to the disruption. . . Even were this circuit to adopt the reasoning of some of our sister circuits, surely the fact that Evans-Marshall assigned books, whereas Cockrel brought in a guest lecturer about industrial hemp, does not obscure the constitutional right at issue.")

Evans-Marshall v. Bd. of Education of the Tipp City Exempted Village School District, 428 F.3d 223, 234-38 (6th Cir., 2005)(Sutton, J., concurring) ("Individual defendants likewise will only rarely be able to establish that the right was not 'clearly established' at this stage of the dispute. The case-by-case, incremental decisionmaking of balancing tests, it is true, infrequently will provide the 'fair notice' that qualified-immunity precedent requires, as each case may contain unique employee interests in speaking and unique employer concerns in restricting the speech. . . But just as these considerations frequently will make it difficult for a plaintiff to surmount a qualified-immunity defense after discovery, so they make it difficult for a defendant to claim qualified immunity on the pleadings before discovery and before the parties (much less the courts) know what is being balanced against what. . . Absent any factual development beyond the allegations in a complaint, a court cannot fairly tell whether a case is 'obvious' or 'squarely govern[ed]' by precedent, which prevents us from determining whether the facts of this case parallel a prior decision or not. Third, while I am prepared to accept these conclusions in this case, I respectfully believe that our circuit should re-think the way it has applied Connick and Pickering to in-class curricular speech. The Supreme Court has never held that the First Amendment applies to a teacher's classroom speech, and there is good reason to think that it would not do so. In Connick, the Court said that 'when a public employee speaks not as a citizen upon matters of public concern, but instead as an employee upon matters of personal interest, absent the most unusual circumstances, a federal court is not the appropriate forum in which to review the wisdom of a personnel decision taken by a public agency allegedly in reaction to the employee's behavior.'. . Connick, then, draws two dichotomies: (1) between speech by public employees acting as 'employees' and speech by public employees acting as private 'citizens'; and (2) between speech 'on matters of public concern' and speech 'upon matters of personal interest.' When public school teachers speak as 'employees,' even when they speak on 'matters of public concern,' the First Amendment thus does not protect their speech under Connick, a conclusion that respects the reality that it is the employer (not the employee) who bears ultimate responsibility for what goes on in the classroom, the reality that virtually all speech by public school teachers in the classroom involves speech in the teacher's capacity as an employee and the reality that many public school teachers (consider English, History and Government teachers) speak about 'matters of public concern' virtually every day of the school year. Only when teachers speak as private citizens on matters of public concern does the First Amendment and the Pickering balancing test apply. . . Submitting issues of this sort to the federal courts is not a sensible way to make decisions about the books that children read in public school or about the way books are taught in school, and it is not something that the Constitution mandates. Because it is the method that our circuit's case law appears to have adopted, however, I respectfully concur in today's opinion.")

Evans-Marshall v. Bd. of Education of the Tipp City Exempted Village School District, 428 F.3d 223, 238 (6th Cir., 2005) (Zatkoff, District Judge, concurring, in part, and dissenting, in part) ("I concur in Judge Cole's majority opinion, which faithfully applies this circuit's precedent in Cockrel v. Shelby County School District, 270 F.3d 1036 (6th Cir.2001) to the present facts. In addition, I concur in Judge Sutton's concurring opinion, which calls for a re-examination of this circuit's First Amendment jurisprudence regarding in-class curricular speech. I disagree with the majority insofar as it would deny qualified immunity to the individual defendants. Because I find that the alleged Constitutional violation was not 'clearly established,' I would grant qualified immunity to the individual defendants.").

Cagle v. Headley, No. 04-6162, 2005 WL 2108367, at *6 (6th Cir. Sept. 1, 2005) (not published) ("No case 'squarely governs' the outcome here. Although the generalized right to be free of a patronage demotion was clearly established at the time of Headley's actions, the qualified-immunity inquiry 'must be undertaken in light of the specific context of the case, not as a broad general proposition.'. . As our discussion of the Williamson County lieutenants' duties fairly indicates, the position at best falls on the 'hazy border' between Hall and Heggen. . . Although Cagle need not identify 'a separate patronage dismissal decision by the Supreme Court or the Sixth Circuit involving a particular position before qualified immunity can be denied,' . . . he has failed here to identify a case from the Supreme Court or the Sixth Circuit that treats as nonpolicymaking a position that is similar for constitutional purposes to a lieutenant's position with these particular responsibilities. Indeed, there is considerable disagreement among the federal courts of appeals as to whether a deputy sheriff–a position that in most sheriffs' departments involves fewer responsibilities than a Williamson County lieutenant–falls on the policymaking side of the First Amendment divide.[comparing cases] This division of opinion, as the Supreme Court has explained in a related context, by itself indicates that the 'cases taken together undoubtedly show that this area is one in which the result depends very much on the facts of each case.' [citing Brosseau] Neither can we say that Cagle's right to be free of a patronage dismissal was so 'obvious' as to be clearly established by a 'general test[ ] ... even without a body of relevant case law.' . . He thus also cannot prevail under this option for showing the existence of a clearly established right.").

Schultz v. Sillman, No. 04-1507, 2005 WL 2175942, at *8 (6th Cir. Aug. 10, 2005) (not published) ("Once we have established that Plaintiff's version of the facts demonstrates a violation of his constitutional right, the court next decides whether at the time of the suicide, in December 2001, a reasonable officer would have known that his conduct was unlawful. . . While this analysis is particularized and fact-specific, the plaintiff does not have to show that the court has had a 'fundamentally similar' or 'materially similar' case in order for a clearly established right to apply here. . .The jurisprudence of the Sixth Circuit has established a clear right of a prisoner not to have his psychological medical needs, in the form of suicidal tendencies, treated with deliberate indifference. . . Based on this case law, a reasonable officer would know that recklessly disregarding a known risk of an inmate's suicide would violate the inmate's Eighth Amendment right. Importantly, Sillman does not contest that there is clearly established law that would hold a corrections officer liable for deliberate indifference to the risk of suicide if an inmate demonstrates a strong likelihood that he would commit suicide. Therefore, if a jury determines that Schultz demonstrated a strong likelihood of suicide, and that Sillman was aware of this likelihood but chose to disregard it, Sillman's actions would constitute a violation of Schultz's clearly established Eighth Amendment right to receive medical treatment for his suicidal tendencies.").

Knott v. Sullivan, 418 F.3d 561, 571 (6th Cir. 2005) ("In light of the extensiveness of the search warrant defects at issue in this case, we conclude that the constitutional infirmity of the search warrant executed by the Defendants was clearly established at the time they searched Knott's 1988 Plymouth Horizon. . . . The Fourth Amendment obviously forbids relying on a warrant to search one vehicle when all of the vehicle-specific descriptors refer to another vehicle, and thus we conclude that the constitutional invalidity of the search warrant at issue in this case was clearly established at the time Knott's vehicle was searched.").

Fisher v. Harden, 398 F.3d 837, 846-49 (6th Cir. 2005) ("The specific question at issue is whether it was clearly established at the time of Fisher's arrest that a law enforcement officer may not affect a mental health seizure without probable cause. As we have already noted, in 1997 this court specifically held that '[t]he Fourth Amendment requires an official seizing and detaining a person for a psychiatric evaluation to have probable cause to believe that the person is dangerous to himself or others.' . . . The seizure in this case was not specifically for purposes of a professional psychiatric evaluation. This difference, however, is of no effect. Viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to Fisher, we must reject the sentiments of the dissent that the deputies were 'merely securing the scene.'. . . This record evidence reveals that the officers seized and detained Fisher, not merely to secure the scene, but for purposes of a mental health evaluation. Under our Fourth Amendment jurisprudence, that action requires probable cause. We have not found any case in which this court has stated that officers may restrain an individual's liberty on the sole basis that they have a reasonable suspicion that the individual suffers from a mental illness. In addition, the other circuits that have examined this issue have similarly held that probable cause is the correct standard. . . . Fisher has alleged facts sufficient to establish a violation of his constitutional rights. It is clearly established that an officer may not affect a mental health seizure without probable cause. Viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Fisher, we conclude that the Alexanders engaged in conduct that violated a clearly established constitutional right. Accordingly, we find that qualified immunity does not shield them from civil liability." [footnotes omitted]).

Barrett v. Steubenville City Schools, 388 F.3d 967, 973, 974 (6th Cir. 2004) ("In this case, Barrett made a decision to send his son to private school. Barrett's choice in directing his son's education is activity shielded by his constitutionally protected right of liberty. The Defendants do not dispute that. Because it has been clearly established that one's involvement in constitutionally protected activity cannot be the sole basis for denying public employment, any reasonable official would know that denying employment based on a parent's constitutional right to direct his child's education is a violation of the law. Nevertheless, Defendants argue that '[t]here is no clearly established line of cases out of the Supreme Court or this Circuit which establish that dictating where public school employees send their children to school violates the employees' parental rights.' Defendants would have us find that the district court erred by relying on other circuits in its analysis. . .The cases referenced by the district court point unmistakably to the unconstitutionality of the conduct complained of and are clearly foreshadowed by applicable direct authority in the Supreme Court. . . While it was therefore permissible for the district court to rely on these cases in finding that the law was clearly established, it was unnecessary. We do not adopt the district court's analysis, . . .for we need not rely on law outside of our jurisdiction to find that a clearly established right exists. The Supreme Court has instructed that qualified immunity does not require 'the very action in question [to] ha[ve] previously been held unlawful,' but rather 'in the light of pre-existing law the unlawfulness must be apparent.'. . .Defendants cannot escape liability by arguing that no precedent exists that specifically enunciates a law that a public school official cannot deny someone employment solely because that person chooses to his child to a private school. . .As aforementioned, Barrett has a constitutionally protected fundamental right to educate his child at the school of his choice. There is also a clearly established law that forbids employers from denying one employment based only on 'person's involvement in activity shielded by the constitutionally protected rights of privacy and liberty.' In accordance with these fundamental principles of law, Lucci cannot obtain qualified immunity by claiming that no clearly established right existed.").

Barrett v. Steubenville City Schools, 388 F.3d 967, 975, 976 (6th Cir. 2004)(Rogers, J., dissenting) ("The majority concludes that 'any reasonable official would know that denying employment based on a parent's constitutional right to direct his child's education is a violation of the law.' And yet, such a right has not been articulated in the Supreme Court or this circuit. Rather, the majority constructs this right from the parts of two others: the fundamental right of a parent to raise his or her children and direct their education, which is clearly established, and a right the majority describes as a right not to be denied government employment because of a decision to exercise a fundamentally protected right. This second 'right' is not a right in all contexts, and has certainly not been clearly established in the context presented by this case. . . . On the facts of this case, it is not clear that 'every like-situated, reasonable government agent' would have clearly understood that the right to direct the education of one's children should be combined with a balancing test used to determine what rights a public employer can require a public employee to give up, with the result that a public school can not require a public school teacher to send his or her child to that public school.").

Champion v. Outlook Nashville, Inc., 380 F.3d 893, 902-05 (6th Cir. 2004) ("Our caselaw and the evidence presented at trial about the training that the Officers received demonstrate that the force exerted against Champion violated his clearly established Fourth Amendment rights. . . . The particular type of physical force exerted against Champion was unreasonable, and the Officers should have been aware that they were violating Champion's rights. First, it is clearly established that the Officers' use of pepper spray against Champion after he was handcuffed and hobbled was excessive. . . . In addition to prior precedent, the Officers' training demonstrates that they were aware of Champion's clearly established right to be free from this type of excessive force. The Officers were taught that pepper spraying a suspect after the individual was incapacitated constitutes excessive force. Sergeant Robert Allen, who testified about the training the Nashville Police Officers received, agreed that if Champion were handcuffed and hobbled, spraying him with pepper spray would be excessive. Second, it also clearly established that putting substantial or significant pressure on a suspect's back while that suspect is in a face-down prone position after being subdued and/or incapacitated constitutes excessive force. This appeal gives us no cause to consider whether leaving a bound suspect on his or her stomach without more constitutes excessive force that violates a suspect's clearly established Fourth Amendment rights. This is neither a 'positional asphyxia' case nor a case in which the officers lightly touched or placed incidental pressure on Champion's back while he was face down. The asphyxia was caused by the combination of the Officers placing their weight upon Champion's body by lying across his back and simultaneously pepper spraying him. Creating asphyxiating conditions by putting substantial or significant pressure, such as body weight, on the back of an incapacitated and bound suspect constitutes objectively unreasonable excessive force. . . . Additionally, the Officers' training outlined the boundaries of excessive force and made clear that lying on a suspect can cause asphyxiation. All three Officers admitted that they were aware of the potential danger of putting pressure on an individual's back or diaphragm. . . Additionally, Sergeant Allen testified that he taught his officers that lying across an individual's back when that person is on his or her stomach increases the possibility of asphyxia. Just as the Supreme Court determined that the Alabama Department of Corrections Regulations and the communications between the U.S. Department of Justice and the State of Alabama put the state on notice about what constituted cruel and unusual punishment, so too here the training these Officers received alerted them to the potential danger of this particular type of excessive force. . . It cannot be forgotten that the police were confronting an individual whom they knew to be mentally ill or retarded, even though the Officers may not have known the full extent of Champion's autism and his unresponsiveness. The diminished capacity of an unarmed detainee must be taken into account when assessing the amount of force exerted. . . . Consequently, the right to be free from the two types of excessive force exerted against Champion was clearly established by the law of this circuit and by the training of the Officers. Either action by itself violated a clearly established right, and the combination of the actions bolsters the conclusion that no reasonable officer could believe that excessive force was not being used. We recognize that the Officers perhaps did not intend to harm Champion; indeed, they may have believed they were helping him. Such a consideration is immaterial, however, because the qualified immunity doctrine is an objective one; motive is irrelevant. The evidence presented in the light most favorable to Champion, and in the light accepted by the jury, demonstrates that the Officers unreasonably applied excessive force to Champion after he had been incapacitated in violation of Champion's clearly established rights. No reasonable officer would have continued to spray a chemical agent in the face of a handcuffed and hobbled mentally retarded arrestee, who was moving his or her head from side to side in an attempt to breathe, after the arrestee vomited several times. No reasonable officer would continue to put pressure on that arrestee's back after the arrestee was subdued by handcuffs, an ankle restraint, and a police officer holding the arrestee's legs.").

Dean v. Byerley, 354 F.3d 540, 558 (6th Cir. 2004) ("Dean had a constitutionally protected right to engage in peaceful targeted residential picketing, in the absence of an applicable time, place, or manner regulation, and retaliation against Dean for exercising that right would violate Dean's First Amendment rights. Therefore, Dean has satisfied the first hurdle necessary to survive summary judgment based upon qualified immunity by pointing to evidence showing that Byerley violated Dean's First Amendment rights. The Sixth Circuit precedent holding that a § 1983 claim can be predicated upon retaliation for exercising First Amendment rights and the Supreme Court precedent holding that peaceful picketing is constitutionally protected predate the March 27, 2001 confrontation, and thus the right to engage in peaceful targeted residential picketing, free from such retaliation, was clearly established at the time of the confrontation. . . Therefore, Dean has satisfied the second hurdle necessary to survive summary judgment based upon qualified immunity by showing that the constitutional right was clearly established. Finally, through his complaint and Doolittle's deposition, Dean has presented evidence that Byerley's alleged conduct was objectively unreasonable in light of Dean's clearly established First Amendment rights. Therefore, Dean has satisfied the third hurdle necessary to survive summary judgment based upon qualified immunity by pointing to evidence showing that what Byerley did was objectively unreasonable in light of clearly established constitutional rights.").

Akers v. McGuinnes, 352 F.3d 1030, 1042, 1043 (6th Cir. 2003) ("Having found no constitutional violation, we must answer the qualified immunity question in the affirmative. While this disposes of this question, we note that for a plaintiff to defeat a defense of qualified immunity, he must not only prove the violation of a right, but of a clearly established right. . . Indeed, the right must be 'so clearly established when the acts were committed that any officer in the defendant's position, measured objectively, would have clearly understood that he was under an affirmative duty to have refrained from such conduct.' . . However, in the present case the district judge found no violation of a constitutional right at all. Thus, for the plaintiffs to prevail here on the question of qualified immunity, the situation would have to be such that any MDOC official when promulgating the Rule would be aware of the fact that it violated the Constitution, but a United States district judge, given the benefit of decades of legal training and practice, years of hearings and adversarial briefings by able counsel, was unable to find such a violation. While such a situation is not logically impossible, and doubtless has occurred from time to time, it certainly must be a very rare one, implicitly casting some doubt on the minimum competency of such a trial judge. Therefore, in cases such as this, unless counsel are prepared to contend that such an extreme and unusual situation occurred, they will not be able to succeed in reversing a grant of qualified immunity.").

Akers v. McGuinnes, 352 F.3d 1030, 1055 n.3 (6th Cir. 2003) (Clay, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("I do take issue with the majority's statement that Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity because "a United States District Court Judge, given the benefit of decades of legal training and practice, years of hearings and adversarial briefings by able counsel, was unable to find ... a violation." With all due respect, my brethren in the district courts have been known to commit legal error, including plain error through the failure to cite and apply clearly established legal precedent. If a district judge's opinion of the state of the law were somehow dispositive of the qualified immunity issue, the Courts of Appeals rarely would have occasion to reverse a district judge's ruling on qualified immunity. Thus, whether a district judge failed to find a constitutional violation should not control this Court's analysis of the issue.").

Toms v. Taft, 338 F.3d 519, 526, 527 (6th Cir. 2003) ("Because the case law fails to show that an inmate's right to marry was so clearly established that an official reasonably would believe that declining to assist an inmate in obtaining a marriage license is unconstitutional, the [Plaintiffs] have failed to meet their burden. We affirm the finding of qualified immunity. [footnote omitted] However, in order to provide more guidance to officials in the future, we note that Turner's test extends to situations in which an inmate's right to marry will be completely frustrated without prison officials' affirmative assistance. Although it was not previously clearly established, we now hold that the distinction between actively prohibiting an inmate's exercise of his right to marry and failing to assist is untenable in a case in which the inmate's right will be completely frustrated without officials' involvement. Therefore, where an inmate will be unable to marry without prison officials' affirmative assistance, Turner's strictures apply. The inmate's right to marry may be curtailed only where the officials' refusal to assist the inmate is reasonably related to legitimate penological interests.").

Gean v. Hattaway, 330 F.3d 758, 775-77(6th Cir. 2003) ("The law in the Sixth Circuit is not settled regarding whether Rehabilitation Act claims are properly brought pursuant to § 1983. [citing cases] Moreover, federal courts outside of this circuit are not in agreement as to whether Congress intended the remedies available under the Rehabilitation Act to preclude a suit brought under § 1983 to enforce rights created by the Rehabilitation Act. [citing cases] Because, as we explain below, a § 1983 claim to enforce the plaintiffs' rights under the Rehabilitation Act is barred by qualified immunity in this case and therefore has no chance of success even if it is not precluded by the remedial scheme of the Act, we need not pick a side in that debate. . . . The plaintiffs . . .

fail to allege that the defendants' use of plaintiffs' Social Security benefits to pay for part of their current maintenance 'excluded [them] from the participation in, ... denied [them] the benefits of, or ... subjected [them] to discrimination under any program or activity' on the basis of their disability. 29 U.S.C. § 794(a). Rather, as with their claim under the Medicaid Act, their Rehabilitation Act claim alleges discrimination only in highly general terms. In order to overcome the defense of qualified immunity, the plaintiffs must show that the right allegedly violated was 'clearly established in a more particularized ... sense,' Anderson v. Creighton, 483 U.S. 635, 640 (1987), which they have wholly failed to do. Therefore, the plaintiffs may proceed directly under the Rehabilitation Act against the defendants in their official capacities, but plaintiffs' § 1983 claim against the defendants in their individual capacities, were that claim allowed to proceed, would be barred by qualified immunity. . . . Only with respect to the plaintiffs' claim brought under the Rehabilitation Act against the defendants in their official capacities–for which sovereign immunity has been waived–may this suit go forward.")

Thacker v. City of Columbus, 328 F.3d 244, 259, 260 (6th Cir. 2003) ("Although no case has explicitly sanctioned an entry into a private home under circumstances identical to those presented here, such precedent is not required for qualified immunity purposes. . . . It was not apparent that entering plaintiffs' apartment to secure the safety of the paramedics was unlawful. In fact, reasonable officials at the scene would likely disagree over whether the entry into plaintiffs' home violated plaintiffs' rights. . . .Thus, we cannot find that it was clearly established that entering a home without a warrant to secure the safety of paramedics under the circumstances presented in this case would violate the Fourth Amendment.")

Feathers v. Aey, 319 F.3d 843, 850, 851 (6th Cir. 2003) ("[T]he rights at issue here were clearly established when the incident occurred. Under Hope v. Pelzer, a right can be clearly established even if there is no case involving 'fundamentally similar' or 'materially similar' facts. . . We see no exception in this analysis for the admittedly 'somewhat abstract' problem of determining when the reasonable suspicion requirement is met, Arvizu, 534 U.S. at 274, because Hope specifically states that a right is clearly established when '[t]he reasoning, though not the holding,' of a prior court of appeals decision puts law enforcement officials on notice, or when the 'premise' of one case 'has clear applicability' to a subsequent set of facts. . . Here, this standard is met. Terry, which requires reasonable suspicion for investigative detentions, had been clearly established since 1968. The Supreme Court had emphasized the importance of establishing the reliability of anonymous tips in 1990 in White and had re-affirmed that principle in J.L., decided just a few months before this incident. And the principle that an officer may rely on a dispatch for reasonable suspicion only to the extent that the dispatch is itself based on sufficient information had been established since Hensley in 1985. These premises clearly apply to the case at hand, and a reasonable officer would have been aware of the relevant rights. Nonetheless Feathers cannot overcome the officers' qualified immunity. Aey's and Donohue's behavior was not objectively unreasonable, even in light of the clearly established rights, as Williams v. Mehra, 186 F.3d at 691, requires before a plaintiff can overcome qualified immunity. Based on the information that Aey and Donohue had themselves, the Terry stop was reasonable. The dispatcher informed the officers of a suspicious person who was possibly intoxicated and supposed to be carrying a weapon. Although this information was from an anonymous tipster, whose information was not sufficient to create reasonable suspicion under J.L., the officers knew only what had been reported from the dispatch, and efficient law enforcement requires–at least for the purposes of determining the civil liability of individual officers– that police be permitted to rely on information provided by the dispatcher. If the dispatcher's information were accurate and reliable, as the police presumed, the totality of circumstances would justify the Terry stop. . . . So although the stop violated the Fourth Amendment because the authorities' collective information did not amount to reasonable suspicion, Feathers cannot prevail in a § 1983 suit because the individual defendants had a sufficient factual basis for thinking that they were acting consistently with Terry. Although there might be a legitimate question about whether the City should be held liable for a policy that does not inform dispatched officers of the reliability of their tip, the dismissal of the claims against the City is not before us.").

Burchett v. Kiefer, 310 F.3d 937, 945, 946 (6th Cir.2002) ("Burchett claims that his detention in the police car with the windows rolled up in ninety degree heat for three hours constituted excessive force. We agree that unnecessary detention in extreme temperatures, like those that could be reached in an unventilated car in ninety-degree heat, violates the Fourth Amendment's prohibitions on unreasonable searches and seizures. The Supreme Court has noted that under certain circumstances 'unnecessary exposure to the heat of the sun, to prolonged thirst and taunting, and to a deprivation of bathroom breaks' can violate the Eighth Amendment's prohibition on 'unnecessary and wanton infliction of pain.' . . Such actions a fortiori violate the Fourth Amendment, which requires a showing of objective unreasonableness rather than any particular subjective motivation. . . Further, the government's interest in effecting the seizure in this case did not justify the imposition of extreme heat on the individual. The officers had many equally effective alternative ways of detaining Burchett that would not have subjected him to excessive heat, but their denial of his request that they roll down the windows to allow him air indicates a wanton indifference to this important safety factor. They could have left the windows slightly open, for example, or utilized the car's cooling or ventilation devices. If the detainee did spit upon officers or passers-by or otherwise disrupted the officers' search, and the officers could not otherwise effectively separate the detainee from passers-by, a reasonable officer might conclude that closing the windows was necessary. Resolving factual disputes in Burchett's favor, however, those circumstances were not present here. Thus we conclude that those responsible for detaining Burchett for three hours in ninety-degree heat with no ventilation violated his Fourth Amendment right against unreasonable seizures. We also conclude that, under the Supreme Court's recent guidance in Hope v. Pelzer, this right was clearly established for qualified immunity purposes. In Hope, the Court made clear that a right can be clearly established even if there is no case involving 'fundamentally similar' or 'materially similar' facts. . . Rather, a right is clearly established when '[t]he reasoning, though not the holding,' of a prior court of appeals decision puts law enforcement officials on notice, or when the 'premise' of one case 'has clear applicability' to a subsequent set of facts. . . Here, this standard is met. We have long recognized, for instance, that the Fourth Amendment permits detention using only 'the least intrusive means reasonably available.' . .

Similarly, we have recognized that 'claims of excessive force do not necessarily require allegations of assault,' but rather can consist of the physical structure and conditions of the place of detention. . . These premises have clear applicability to this case, and the reasoning of those cases should have alerted reasonable officers to the constitutional violations inherent in subjecting a detainee to excessive heat.").

Farm Labor Organizing Committee v. Ohio State Highway Patrol, 308 F.3d 523, 539, 541, 542 (6th Cir. 2002) ("[E]ven if Trooper Kiefer is correct that the record reveals that he possessed some race-neutral basis for initiating the investigation of the plaintiffs, this fact alone would not entitle him to summary judgment on qualified immunity as long as the plaintiffs can demonstrate that he was partly motivated by a discriminatory purpose. Of course, Trooper Kiefer can still argue, based upon Mt. Healthy and Arlington Heights, that his race-neutral reasons would have caused him to investigate the plaintiffs regardless of any discriminatory motive that may have existed. The question of whether Trooper Kiefer's allegedly discriminatory motive played a determinative role in the decision to investigate the plaintiffs, however, is a factual dispute best suited for resolution at trial. . . . We disagree with the defendant's characterization of the state of the law in 1995. While Travis may have been the first case to reach the merits of such an equal protection claim, we expressly acknowledged in a 1992 en banc case, United States v. Taylor, that an equal protection claim could be based upon evidence that law enforcement officers targeted minorities for consensual interviews on the basis of race. . . . We conclude, therefore, that a reasonable officer at the time of the events in question would have known that the Constitution forbade embarking on an investigation of someone for a particular offense on the basis of that person's race.").

Bell v. Johnson, 308 F.3d 594, 612, 613 (6th Cir. 2002) ("In sum, we conclude that the plaintiffs' allegations, if proven, would establish a violation of the law that was clearly established in 1994. Our review of the relevant case law reveals that it was not until McLaurin was issued in 1997 that a reasonable official might expect to escape liability for retaliatory acts falling short of conscience-shocking abuses of power. Prior to that opinion, the published authority in our circuit made it clear that the "shocks the conscience" test did not apply to retaliation claims expressly brought under the First Amendment. We therefore determine that defendants are not entitled to qualified immunity.").

Waller v. Trippett, No. 01-2716, 2002 WL 31296347, at *4, *6, *7 (6th Cir. Oct. 10, 2002) (unpublished) ("In this Circuit, we have recognized the possibility of using the 'state-created danger' theory to hold a state or state actor liable under the Fourteenth Amendment for private acts of violence. See, e.g., Jones v. City of Carlisle, 3 F.3d 945, 949-50 (6th Cir.1993); Gazette v. City of Pontiac, 41 F.3d 1061, 1965 (6th Cir.1994); Sargi, 70 F.3d 907 at 912-13; Stemler, 126 F.3d at 868. However, it was not until Kallstrom that we actually held a state actor liable for private acts of violence under the 'state-created' danger theory. . . . We conclude that the district court described the right that the Defendant allegedly violated too broadly. . . . Contrary to the district court's conclusion, we do not believe that the relevant 'legal rule,' here, the 'state-created danger,' was articulated in a particularized sense at the time of the Defendant's challenged conduct in May 1998. To be sure, in 1989 in DeShaney, the Supreme Court suggested, but did not hold, that state actors may be liable if they help create the danger that causes an individual's injury by a private party or if they render an individual more vulnerable to injury by a private party. The DeShaney Court did not specify how a state might create the danger causing an individual's injury, what actions of a state would render an individual more vulnerable to danger, or by how much the state must increase an individual's risk of injury from a third party before that individual's substantive due process rights are violated. . . . . While each of these cases generally suggests that a state actor might be liable if he or she renders a victim more vulnerable to danger, not one of them convinces us that, in the period after DeShaney and before Ms. Taylor's death, the Defendant should have known that, by acting as he did, he would violate Ms. Taylor's substantive due process rights. Absent law that would have put the Defendant on notice that his particular conduct offended the Constitution, we find that he is entitled to qualified immunity.").

Thomas v. Cohen, 304 F.3d 563, 580, 581 (6th Cir. 2002) (" We do not believe that Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity with respect to Plaintiffs' procedural due process claim. The Supreme Court had decided Fuentes and Good Real Prop. long before Plaintiff's eviction. As we stated in Flatford, "it was sufficiently clear at the time of the eviction that [Plaintiffs] were entitled to pre-eviction judicial oversight in the absence of emergency circumstances." . . . Furthermore, Kentucky laws forbidding self-help evictions without judicial process and providing for preeviction notice and forcible detainer actions were well-established. As trained police officers, Defendants should have known that self-help evictions are prohibited in the state of Kentucky, and that the eviction they facilitated was therefore 'patently unlawful.'").

Sheets v. Mullins, 287 F.3d 581, 589, 590 (6th Cir. 2002) ("In denying relief to Mullins, the district court wrote: 'Based upon the state of the law in February 1997, this Court concludes that a reasonable official in the position of Sergeant Mullins should have known that a party's right to substantive due process is violated by a public actor whose conduct significantly increases the risk of injury from a third party.' We think the district judge described the right that Mullins allegedly violated too broadly. As the Supreme Court explained in Anderson v. Creighton, . . . the 'clearly established' standard becomes meaningless if the relevant 'legal rule' is defined in abstract or general terms. Instead, the relevant 'legal rule' must be articulated in a particularized sense, such that the contours of the rule are sufficiently clear to put a reasonable official on notice that what he is doing is probably unlawful. . . . The district court determined that it was clearly established in February, 1997, that an officer would violate the substantive due process clause by significantly increasing an individual's risk of injury from a third party. To be sure, in 1989 in DeShaney, the Supreme Court suggested, but did not hold, that state actors may be liable if they help create the danger that causes an individual's injury by a private party or if they render an individual more vulnerable to injury by a private party. The DeShaney Court did not specify how a state might create the danger causing an individual's injury, what actions of a state would render an individual more vulnerable to danger, or by how much the state must increase an individual's risk of injury from a third party before that individual's substantive due process rights are violated. . . . In Kallstrom, decided in February of 1998, a year after Mullins responded to the call about Sheets, we noted that no court within the Sixth Circuit had yet held the state or a state actor liable for private acts of violence under the state-created-danger theory. Indeed, before Kallstrom was decided and before Mullins acted in February of 1997, there was only one reported decision from a court within this circuit that had even allowed a private-act-of-violence case to survive a motion for summary judgment. Smith v. City of Elyria, 857 F.Supp. at 1203. . . . Absent law that would have put Mullins on notice that his particular conduct offended the Constitution, we find that he is entitled to qualified immunity.").

Comstock v. McCrary, 273 F.3d 693, 711 (6th Cir. 2001) ("The right at issue in this case is not, as defendants argue, the right to be diagnosed accurately for one's propensity to commit suicide; Montgomery had already been correctly identified as suicidal by McCrary and the prison staff. As we have discussed above, the right that plaintiff claims on Montgomery's behalf is the more basic right to continuing medical treatment once a prisoner has been determined to be suicidal. This circuit has consistently recognized a prisoner's established right to medical attention once the prisoner's suicidal tendencies are known. . . . Based on case law from the Supreme Court and our circuit, we conclude that a reasonable prison psychologist in 1995 'would have clearly understood that [he] was under an affirmative duty' to offer reasonable medical care to a prisoner whom he knew to be suicidal, in the circumstances confronted by McCrary. . . Because, viewed in the light most favorable to plaintiff, McCrary's conduct violated Montgomery's constitutionally protected right to medical care for his serious medical needs under the Eighth Amendment, and the constitutional right was clearly established such that a reasonable official, at the time McCrary acted, would have understood that his behavior violated that right, we AFFIRM the district court's denial of summary judgment with respect to McCrary.").

Rippy v. Hattaway, 270 F.3d 416, 425 n.4 (6th Cir. 2001) ("The right to representation by counsel in a proceeding affecting custody of one's child was a clearly established requirement of procedural due process in 1995. . .The right to be informed of the right to representation by a social worker, who performs a role like that of a prosecutor in that proceeding,was not clearly established at that time, however. The distinction is that Aaron and Janet Rippy do not allege that Appellant Bryant deprived them of their right to counsel, but that she failed to inform them of that right. A reasonable official in Appellant Bryant's position in May 1995 would not have clearly understood that she bore an affirmative duty to inform Aaron and Janet Rippy of their right to representation by counsel at the May 25, 1995 hearing.").

LeMarbe v. Wisneski, 266 F.3d 429, 440 (6th Cir. 2001) ("It is clearly established that, if a doctor knows of a substantial risk of serious harm to a patient and is aware that he must either seek immediate assistance from another doctor to prevent further serious harm or must inform the patient to seek immediate assistance elsewhere, and then fails to do in a timely manner what his training indicates is necessary to prevent such harm, that doctor has treated the patient with deliberate indifference.")

Rodgers v. Hawley, No. 99-2219, 99-2311, 2001 WL 798618, at *5 & n.5 (6th Cir. June 22, 2001) (unpublished) ("In this case, the alleged retaliatory conduct occurred in 1995 and 1996. At that time, the law of this Circuit required that actionable retaliation shock the conscience or involve an egregious abuse of government power. . . In his dissent, Judge Clay suggests that the shocks-the- conscience test did not govern Kedzierzawski and Kirkwood's conduct in 1995 and 1996. He says the new standard for retaliation claims adopted in Thaddeus-X 'did not effect a profound change in the law ...,' but merely recognized the standard for retaliation claims 'long ago established' by the United States Supreme Court's decision in Graham v. Connor, 490 U.S. 395 (1989). We disagree. . . Unlike the Fourth Amendment involved in Graham, the First Amendment does not express any substantive standard governing intrusions on the rights guaranteed thereunder. Including no explicit standard, the First Amendment could not have alerted Kedzierzawski and Kirkwood that they were violating Irvin's First Amendment rights.").

McCurdy v. Montgomery County, 240 F.3d 512, 525, 526 (6th Cir. 2001) (Engel, J., dissenting) ("The majority holds that the district court erred in its conclusion that when Officer Cole acted, it was not clearly established that the First Amendment prohibited an officer from effectuating an otherwise valid arrest if that officer was motivated in part by a desire to retaliate against the arrestee's assertion of First Amendment rights. The majority reasons that because it was well-established then that McCurdy had a constitutional right to challenge verbally Officer Cole's surveillance, the district court erred in granting Officer Cole qualified immunity on the retaliation claim. . . . Whether a plaintiff may recover for a deprivation of First Amendment rights caused by an allegedly retaliatory arrest which the officer had probable cause to effect was not a matter of clearly established law in 1996. Indeed, it is still an issue that is subject to debate in the federal courts. The majority cites no Supreme Court or published Sixth Circuit cases discussing retaliation claims in the context of an arrest, and I am aware of none.").

Sowards v. Loudon County, 203 F.3d 426, 439, 440 (6th Cir. 2000) ("Neither the Supreme Court nor the Sixth Circuit has evaluated whether a jailer at the LCSD, or a jailer possessing the same duties as those mandated by Tennessee law, falls under the Elrod/Branti exception . . . .[H]owever, the position of a jailer is analogous to the position of a prison guard, and the Supreme Court concluded that political considerations are inappropriate for the employment decisions concerning a prison guard in 1990. . . It was objectively unreasonable for Guider to believe that political considerations were appropriate for the position of a jailer in 1995 in light of the Supreme Court's 1990 Rutan decision. Because the law was so clearly established that he could not reasonably take political considerations into account when terminating Sowards, Guider is not entitled to qualified immunity in his individual capacity for Sowards's political association claim.").

Gable v. Lewis, 201 F.3d 769, 771, 772 (6th Cir. 2000) ("We believe that the law is clearly established that the 'public concern test' does not apply to the petitioning activity in the instant case. . . . [T]here is no basis in our First Amendment jurisprudence for applying Connick's public concern test to petitioning activity by a private business woman who is simply supplying services to a governmental agency as an independent contractor. . . .[W]e conclude that the law interpreting the petition clause protects the plaintiff in filing a complaint with the Ohio Highway Patrol claiming sex discrimination, and this law was clearly established prior to the retaliatory conduct found by the jury in the present case. We also conclude that the law was clearly established that the 'public concern' test does not apply to plaintiff's petitioning activity. Hence the doctrine of official immunity is inapplicable . . . .").

Gable v. Lewis, 201 F.3d 769, 773 (6th Cir. 2000) (Nelson, J., dissenting) ("[I]f reasonable members of this court could disagree in March of 1997 over the applicability of the public-concern test in the Petition Clause context, how can we say that the law was so clearly established seven months earlier that there was no room at that time for disagreement among reasonable Highway Patrol officials?").

Blake v. Wright, 179 F.3d 1003, 1008, 1010, 1011, 1013 (6th Cir. 1999) ("Although we acknowledge that the Fourth Amendment warns of inherent dangers with wiretapping, we agree with Wright that the case law, when examined with the relevant Ohio statute, was sufficiently uncertain regarding the unlawfulness of implementing the DigiVoice system in a police department's official phones in Ohio. . . . In sum, we hold that Wright is entitled to qualified immunity under § 1983 because the law regarding the administrative monitoring of police phone lines was sufficiently unclear at the time of the alleged violations that a "reasonable" officer in Wright's position would not have known he was violating clearly established law. . . . Ultimately, we believe that the Court intended to apply qualified immunity to statutory violations and we thus hold that a defendant may claim qualified immunity in response to a Title III claim. We fail to see the logic of providing a defense of qualified immunity to protect public officials from personal liability when they violate constitutional rights that are not clearly established and deny them qualified immunity when they violate statutory rights that similarly are not clearly established.").

Key v. Grayson, 179 F.3d 996, 997, 1002 (6th Cir. 1999) ("[W]e conclude that the defendants are entitled to qualified immunity because, prior to 1996, it was not clearly established that the ADA and the Rehabilitation Act applied to prisoners. . . .[T]he language of the ADA and the Rehabilitation Act indicates the statutes' applicability to prisons but, prior to 1996, there is no published court decision so holding from the Supreme Court, this court or a court within this circuit. At least one circuit has held that, prior to 1994, the statutes did not apply to state prisons. [citing Torcasio] Finally, in a similar–albeit distinguishable–situation, the Eighth Circuit determined that qualified immunity was available to defendants because it was not clearly established that the ADA and the Rehabilitation Act applied to the transportation of arrestees.").

Bloch v. Ribar, 156 F.3d 673, 686, 687 (6th Cir. 1998) ("Despite what appears to be a possible violation of the Blochs' privacy interests in this case, their claim against Ribar on this ground must fail because, as the district court held, a reasonable public official would not be on notice that the release of such intimate details of a rape constituted an actionable violation of a rape victim's privacy interests. A reasonably prudent sheriff should have refrained from unnecessarily releasing the highly confidential and embarrassing personal information, but in light of the dearth of case law on this issue and the complexities stemming from the nature of crimes of sexual violence, it would be unfair to conclude that a reasonable official would have been aware that releasing these details violated a clearly established constitutional right to privacy. . . . In light of our ruling in the present case, however, public officials in this circuit will now be on notice that such a privacy right exists. Therefore, any future violation will not allow an official such as Ribar to claim the lack of reasonable notice that is necessary to sustain a defense of qualified immunity.").

Daughenbaugh v. City of Tiffin, 150 F.3d 594, 603 (6th Cir. 1998) ("[T]he illegal search occurred before this court's decision in United States v. Jenkins, 124 F.3d 768 (6th Cir.1997) (holding that one's backyard is definitely part of the curtilage). In light of Jenkins and the instant case, however, the police will be precluded in the future from relying on qualified immunity as a defense to warrantless searches of garages and backyards in situations similar to those herein.").

Gravely v. Madden, 142 F.3d 345, 348, 349 (6th Cir. 1998) ("While it was clear in 1987 that Tennessee v. Garner governed the use of excessive force by law enforcement officers on free citizens, it was not clearly established that Garner applied in excessive force cases involving escaped convicts. The use of excessive force to recapture an escaped convict creates a different problem than the use of force to apprehend a nonviolent fleeing felony suspect. The Fourth Amendment is not triggered anew by attempts at recapture because the convict has already been 'seized,' tried, convicted, and incarcerated. . . . Although Whitley involved the use of deadly force during the suppression of a prison riot, the factors relied on by the Court in that context are also relevant in evaluating the use of force in the apprehension of an escaped felon. Applying these factors in the present case, and viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, we conclude that a reasonable officer in Madden's position may well have deemed it permissible to use deadly force under the circumstances.").

Gravely v. Madden, 142 F.3d 345, 350, 352-53 (6th Cir. 1998) (Kennedy, J., concurring in the result) ("The cases upon which the majority relies all involve actions taken against convicted persons in the prison context. Because I believe that a convicted person whom prison officials are not hotly pursuing is more analogous to a fleeing felon than to a confined prisoner, I would apply the Fourth Amendment to the claims of escapees. I then would find that the prison officials' actions violated the decedent's rights under this Amendment. However, I too believe summary judgment is appropriate because the Fourth Amendment's applicability to an official's use of deadly force during an attempt to apprehend an escaped, convicted felon was not clearly established in 1987, when the relevant actions took place. . . . I would hold that the Eighth Amendment applies so long as the officials are in 'hot pursuit,' or 'immediate and continuous pursuit,' of the escapee. . . The Eighth Amendment should apply so long as the officials are in 'hot pursuit' because we cannot expect prison guards to know, or take the time to learn, for what crime the escapee was imprisoned. In addition, applying the lesser constitutional standard throughout the 'hot pursuit' of an escapee would be a deterrent to other prisoners contemplating an escape attempt. This deterrent interest is served when other prisoners are prevented from witnessing successful escapes. Once a convicted person is no longer being hotly pursued, his eventual recapture is less likely to affect other inmates' decision to attempt escape. At that point, the policy reasons militate in favor of Fourth Amendment protection.").

Cope v. Heltsley, 128 F.3d 452, 460 (6th Cir. 1997) ("Would it have been possible, at the end of 1993, for a reasonable person, newly-elected a Kentucky county clerk, to believe that the law entitled her to take political compatibility into account in deciding whom to retain as her deputy clerks? The answer, we think, is 'yes.' . . . [T]here was no published decision of the United States Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit–and certainly no decision of the United States Supreme Court–holding that political compatibility is not, in the words of Rutan, 'an appropriate requirement for the position involved.'. . . '[I]n the circumstances' of the present case, pre-existing law did not 'truly compel' the conclusion that in selecting her staff–the public face of the county clerk's office–the clerk could not take political compatibility into account.").

Hall v. Tollett, 128 F.3d 418, 429-30 (6th Cir. 1997) ("[A]n absence of cases directly on point does not indicate that the constitutionality of a patronage based discharge has yet to be established. In McCloud, we developed a categorical approach to help establish and define which public offices fall within the Branti exception. This approach, however, will not remove all uncertainty. . . . Although Elrod seemingly established that low-level sheriff's department employees fall outside this exception, we held in Cagle v. Gilley, 957 F.2d 1347 (6th Cir.1992), that it was not clearly established that deputy sheriffs were protected from patronage based dismissals. Unfortunately, we granted a sheriff qualified immunity, without first determining whether there had actually been a constitutional violation. 957 F.2d at 1349. Therefore, Cagle effectively established only that in 1992 the state of the law regarding patronage dismissals of sheriffs' deputies was not clearly established. In the time between Cagle and September 1, 1994, no further cases added clarity to the status of deputy sheriffs. The split among circuits regarding this issue also indicates the unsettled nature of the law regarding the status of deputy sheriffs. . . For these reasons, we agree with the District Court that defendant is entitled to qualified immunity in this case.").

Stemler v. City of Florence, 126 F.3d 856, 866-67, 870 (6th Cir. 1997) ("[T]he district court reviewed the relevant case law dealing with claims that state actors violated substantive due process by allowing individuals to become subject to an indirect harm, and found much of that law to be confused and in conflict. It then appeared to reason that, since the doctrine of substantive due process was unclear in its entirety, no such claim could ever survive a motion to dismiss on the ground of qualified immunity . . . . This was error. While. . . there is a good deal of uncertainty with regard to the precise contours of substantive due process, it does not follow that state actors are insulated from liability on all such claims, no matter what the underlying facts may be. The fact that the law may have been unclear, or even hotly disputed, at the margins does not afford state actors immunity from suit where their actions violate the heartland of the constitutional guarantee, as that guarantee was understood at the time of the violation. Stated differently, it is simply irrelevant that the definition of the right to substantive due process has been in flux if, under any definition found in the case law at the time, the defendants should have known in February 1994 that their actions violated that right. . . . The very notion that police officers should not have known that they could not force an incapacitated woman to drive off with an obviously drunk man who they had reason to believe had beaten her betrays a chilling and unacceptable vision of the role of the police in our society.").

Sandul v. Larion, 119 F.3d 1250, 1255, 1256 (6th Cir. 1997) ("In 1990 when Sandul was arrested for his use of the "f-word," it was clearly established that speech is entitled to First Amendment protection with the exception of fighting words. . . . While the Livonia ordinances are presumptively valid as they have not been challenged, Sandul's § 1983 claims are unaffected by his failure to challenge the constitutionality of the ordinances.").

Saylor v. Bd. of Educ. of Harlan County, 118 F.3d 507, 516 (6th Cir. 1997) ("We are aware of no pre-existing law 'dictat[ing]' the conclusion that a disciplinary paddling administered by a school teacher in violation of school regulations would ipso facto violate federal constitutional law." citing Lassiter).

Martin v. Heideman, 106 F.3d 1308, 1312-13 (6th Cir. 1997) ("The district court found that at the time of the plaintiff's arrest, the law was not clearly established that the overly tight application of handcuffs was a violation of an arrestee's constitutional right not to have excessive force applied during an arrest, citing conflicting cases from around the country. . . . This circuit, however, has chosen to view an 'excessively forceful handcuffing' claim under the general excessive force rubric. . . . Because clearly established law in 1991 . . . prohibited an officer's use of excessive force, and because a genuine issue of material fact exists as to whether Officer Paul used excessive force under the circumstances, the district court erred by granting Paul qualified immunity on the handcuffing issue.").

Doe v. Claiborne County, 103 F.3d 495, 507 (6th Cir. 1996) ("We . . . hold that Doe had a clearly established right under the substantive component of the Due Process Clause to personal security and to bodily integrity, that such right is fundamental, and that Davis's sexual abuse of Doe violated that right.").

McBride v. Village of Michiana, 100 F.3d 457, 461 (6th Cir. 1996) ("The possible scenarios involving retaliatory treatment of persons engaged in protected speech are too numerous to begin to list. . .[I]t is not essential that a Supreme Court or Sixth Circuit case discuss each of those imaginable possibilities before finding that the right to be free from retaliation for exercise of First Amendment freedoms is clearly established. At the time of the alleged retaliatory actions, Supreme Court and Sixth Circuit precedent had clearly established that retaliation aimed at chilling fundamental rights was improper. Although no Supreme Court or Sixth Circuit decisions had...applied time-honored First Amendment principles to a situation specifically involving governmental retaliation against a news reporter, relevant pre-existing case law made the illegality of such retaliation apparent.").

McCloud v. Testa, 97 F.3d 1536, 1547, 1557 (6th Cir. 1996) ("We conclude that it is improper to grant qualified immunity to every defendant who has taken an adverse employment action against a plaintiff occupying or previously occupying a public office that the Supreme Court or the Sixth Circuit has not yet explicitly held falls into or outside of the Branti exception. In doing so, we give more precise content to the Branti exception, so that we can better delineate those public positions that as a general matter should receive First Amendment protection, and those that should not. . . . We reject the notion that there must be a separate patronage dismissal decision by the Supreme Court or the Sixth Circuit involving a particular position before qualified immunity can be denied in such a case. The lack of specific precedent holding that a particular position is outside the Branti exception is a necessary condition to arguing that the First Amendment right to be free from patronage dismissal is unclear as to a particular position, but the lack of such precedent is not a sufficient condition for concluding that the law is unclear on the subject and so qualified immunity must be granted to a defendant. . . . It simply cannot be true that there must be a specific patronage dismissal case in the Supreme Court or Sixth Circuit before qualified immunity can be denied to any otherwise eligible defendant in such a case. If this were true, qualified immunity would be converted into a nearly absolute barrier to recovering damages against an individual governmental actor in patronage cases because the reported case law classifies new positions very slowly. . . . we believe that certain categories of positions falling into the Branti exception can be specified with reasonable certainty. We set these categories out below so that the district courts may apply them in future patronage cases, especially those involving issues of qualified immunity . . . .").

Durham v. Nu'Man, 97 F.3d 862, 867 (6th Cir. 1996) ("Although there has not yet been a case in this Circuit specifically holding that a hospital security officer can be held liable under § 1983 for failing to protect a patient or inmate from being beaten by another hospital security officer, it is not necessary that there be a specific holding in order to find that a constitutional rule in the § 1983 area has been 'clearly established.'").

Sheets v. Moore, 97 F.3d 164, 168 (6th Cir. 1996) ("If federal district judges could reasonably disagree over the constitutionality of the regulation [prohibiting prisoners from receiving free advertising and other bulk mail], then it can fairly be said that a reasonable official would not have known that his conduct violated a clearly established right.").

Hughes v. City of North Olmstead, 93 F.3d 238, 243 (6th Cir. 1996) ("In this case, it is clear that there was a generally established right to privacy and free association at the time of the police investigation. However, at that time, those rights were not so clearly established by the Supreme Court or this Circuit that police department officials would have realized their actions were violating the law. Thus, in the absence of more fact-specific authority defining how an investigation into private sexual matters invades the realm of privacy and free association, the department investigation could not have infringed upon clearly established constitutional rights.").

Smith v. Williams, 78 F.3d 585 (Table), No. 94-6306, 1996 WL 99329, *5 (6th Cir. March 6, 1996) ("[T]he right to be free from malicious prosecution is a clearly established right, although prior to January of 1994, this circuit analyzed the right as accruing under the Fourteenth rather than the Fourth Amendment.").

Adams v. Yontz, 73 F.3d 361 (Table), 1996 WL 5563, *2 (6th Cir. Jan. 5, 1996) ("[T]he relevant inquiry for the purposes of our qualified immunity analysis is whether the law clearly established supervisory liability on principals for the unconstitutional actions of their subordinates at the time that the alleged incidents occurred. We believe that it did.").

Foy v. City of Berea, 58 F.3d 227, 229 (6th Cir. 1995) ("On May 3, 1990, neither the Supreme Court nor this court had held that police officers commit a substantive due process violation if, after receiving complaints from the owner of property that intoxicated persons are causing a disturbance on that property, the officers command these individuals to leave the property and the intruders are injured later by their own actions or those of other private parties. In fact, we find no controlling authority holding that such action by police under generally similar circumstances would constitute a due process violation.").

Thomas v. Whalen, 51 F.3d 1285, 1292 (6th Cir. 1995) ("[Plaintiff] did not have a clearly established right to invoke the name of the Cincinnati Police Division or display the police department's insignia in order to enhance his own credibility in advocating [the NRA position against gun control].").

Cameron v. Seitz, 38 F.3d 264, 275-76 (6th Cir. 1994) ("We hold that, at the time of the relevant actions underlying the complaint in this case, the constitutional protection of the right of marital association did not clearly extend to a dating relationship or to engagement, and qualified immunity attaches to Seitz's interference with Cindy's and Larry's relationship by his employment actions. Whether an engagement to marry is a right protected by the Constitution against any adverse action is a question we need not decide today. The fact that the contours of such protection simply have not been clearly extended to engagements compels the conclusion that qualified immunity is mandated here.").

Buckner v. Kilgore, 36 F.3d 536, 540 (6th Cir. 1994) ("[A]n officer violates a clearly established right under Brower if he pulls his squad car onto a highway with knowledge or reason to know that an approaching motorcyclist will not have time or the ability to stop or otherwise safely avoid collision with the car.").

Williams v. Commonwealth of Kentucky, 24 F.3d 1526, 1537 (6th Cir. 1994) ("Defendants argue that because particularized balancing is necessary under Pickering and its progeny, they are entitled to qualified immunity because the contours of a public employee's free speech rights are unclear . . . . We agree that in many public employee free speech cases it would be unclear to a reasonable official what the outcome of the balancing inquiry should be. However, the instant case presents a situation where the employee has spoken out on matters of great public concern, and these statements apparently had only minimal effect on the efficiency of the office. . . [T]his is not a case where the imprecision of the standard makes a difference.).

Centanni v. Eight Unknown Officers, 15 F.3d 587, 592 (6th Cir. 1994) ("[W]e conclude that it has been clearly established that–regardless of any exigent circumstances–the seizure and removal to the station house of an individual who is not suspected of any criminal activity constitutes a de facto arrest requiring probable cause."), cert. denied, 114 S. Ct. 2740 (1994).

Walton v. City of Southfield, 995 F.2d 1331 (6th Cir. 1993) ("[A]t the time of [plaintiff's] arrest in 1988, there was no clearly established right to personal security forbidding the police from abandoning passengers. . . . [T]he 'contours of the right,' if there is such a right, were not sufficiently clear so that a reasonable officer would have known that leaving the children in the parking lot violated that right.").

Heflin v. Stewart County, 958 F.2d 709, 717 (6th Cir. 1992) ("There can be no doubt that in 1987 existing law clearly established the right of pretrial jail inmates to receive care for their serious medical needs. At least as early as 1985 we recognized this right as the basis for section 1983 claims involving jail suicides by hanging....The unlawfulness of doing nothing to attempt to save [the inmate's] life would have been apparent to a reasonable official in [defendants'] position in light of pre-existing law."), rehearing granted in part on reconsideration, 968 F.2d 1 (6th Cir. 1992).

Rich v. City of Mayfield Heights, 955 F.2d 1092, 1096-97 (6th Cir. 1992) ("[G]eneralized right of a prisoner to be free from deliberate indifference cannot support a finding that there was a clearly established right to be protected from committing suicide....The 'right' at issue in the instant appeal is the right of a pretrial detainee to be cut down by police officers when discovered hanging in a jail cell.").

Daugherty v. Campbell, 935 F.2d 780 (6th Cir. 1991) (where very action in question, visual body cavity search of prison visitor without reasonable suspicion, had been held unlawful by every circuit considering the issue since 1982, and where cases from other circuits were similar enough to merit reasonable reliance upon them, the contours of the right were clearly established).

City of Warren*, No. 16-CV-11707, 2018 WL 878879 (E.D. Mich. Feb. 14, 2018) ("The parties cite conflicting cases from within this circuit regarding whether the First Amendment clearly establishes a right to film police officers carrying out their duties. . . The existence of conflicting caselaw suggests that an absolute right to record is not clearly established. Furthermore, the court in the Crawford case cited by Plaintiff subsequently reversed its position and held that 'The Supreme Court and Sixth Circuit have not ruled specifically on the right of the public openly to film police officers and their actions in a public setting.' Crawford v. Geiger (Crawford II), 131 F. Supp. 3d 703, 714 (N.D. Ohio 2015). Finally, the Glik case, cited by Plaintiff, holds that any recording of police officers must be done from 'a comfortable remove' and without interfering with the performance of the officers' duties. . .As several officers testified, Plaintiff was arrested for remaining 'too close' to the scene and interfering with the investigation, despite several officers directing Plaintiff to 'leave,' 'back up,' and/or 'walk away.' Officers testified that this was a safety concern. Accordingly, the Court should find that there is no clearly established right to videotape police officers under the circumstances of this case.")

S.R. v. Kenton County Sheriff's Office, No. 215CV143WOBJGW, 2017 WL 4545231, at *9–11 (E.D. Ky. Oct. 11, 2017) ("[U]nder the totality of the circumstances, the Court concludes as a matter of law that Sumner's manner of handcuffing S.R. and L.G. was an unconstitutional seizure and excessive force. . . . On the facts of this case, qualified immunity is a close call. Neither party points to a Supreme Court or Sixth Circuit decision directly on point that would have alerted a reasonable officer in 2014 to the unlawfulness of his actions under these circumstances. In New Jersey v. T.L.O., 469 U.S. 325 (1985), which involved searches of children in a school setting, the Court recognized that public school students' rights under the Fourth Amendment are not as broad as those of the public and adopted a 'reasonableness' test based on all the circumstances. . . .At a general level, one might argue that T.L.O. put police officers on notice that they would be subject to a reasonableness standard in determining whether their search or seizure of a school child passes constitutional muster. However, the Sixth Circuit has rejected such an application of T.L.O. in the qualified immunity context, reasoning that T.L.O. merely established basic principles of law without guidance as to their application in specific situations. Beard v. Whitmore Lake Sch. Dist., 402 F.3d 598, 607 (6th Cir. 2005). In Beard, high school students who were strip searched sued school officials and a police officer alleging Fourth Amendment violations. The Sixth Circuit held that the searches did violate the students' constitutional rights, but that the defendants were entitled to qualified immunity because, notwithstanding the general principles set forth in T.L.O., the lack of factual context similar to the case before the Court meant that T.L.O. could not have 'truly compelled' defendants to realize that they were acting illegally in conducting the strip searches. . . Similarly here, the broad principles set forth in T.L.O. would not have alerted Sumner to the unlawfulness of his actions under the specific facts of this case. . . . .The parties cite no Sixth Circuit authority that would have alerted Sumner to the illegality of his actions. However, at least two other Circuits had denied qualified immunity to police officers who handcuffed young school children. See C.B. v. City of Sonora, 769 F.3d 1005, 1039-40 (9th Cir. 2014) (officer who handcuffed calm, compliant but nonresponsive 11-year-old child not entitled to qualified immunity); Gray v. Bostic, 458 F.3d 1295, 1306 (11th Cir. 2006) (handcuffing of nine-year-old student who had threatened to hit coach was unlawful seizure; incident was over, student posed no threat, and handcuffing by sheriff's deputy was attempt to punish student and change her behavior in the future). Under the Sixth Circuit's teaching in Beard, however, these out-of-circuit cases are insufficient to satisfy the 'clearly established' requirement. . . . Here, the two out-of-circuit cases cited above both rely on T.L.O., which Beard held is insufficiently generalized to constitute 'applicable direct authority.' Therefore, plaintiffs have not shown that it was 'clearly established' in 2014 that Sumner's handcuffing of S.R. and L.G. was unconstitutional, and Sumner is thus entitled to qualified immunity." [Note that the court did find the County liable as a matter of law for the unlawful handcuffing. See Blum, "Overview Outline"])

O'Brien v. City of Mason, No. 1:16-CV-391, 2017 WL 2805165, at *4 (W.D. Mich. June 29, 2017) ("Marcia's First Amendment claim fails because she has not cited a case clearly establishing a First Amendment right to observe the police. A number of circuits have addressed the existence of a First Amendment right to observe and record the police activity, and some have found that right to be clearly-established. See, e.g., Gericke v. Begin, 753 F.3d 1, 7 (1st Cir. 2014); ACLU of Ill. v. Alvarez, 679 F.3d 583, 600 (7th Cir. 2012); Smith v. City of Cumming, 212 F.3d 1332, 1333 (11th Cir. 2000). But the Sixth Circuit has yet to join those courts, and the only district courts in the Sixth Circuit to address that issue have found otherwise. *See Williams v. Guertin v. State of Michigan, No. 16-CV-12412, 2017 WL 2418007, at *23 (E.D. Mich. June 5, 2017) ("Taking plaintiffs' allegations as true and in the light most favorable to them, as the Court must, the violation of plaintiffs' clearly established rights is adequately pleaded against defendants City of Flint [and individual defendants]. Plaintiffs plead (with particularity as to which defendant did what) that these defendants were the decision makers responsible for knowingly causing plaintiffs to ingest water tainted with dangerous levels of lead, which has no therapeutic benefits, and hiding the danger from them. The emergency managers and individual state employees switched the source of Flint's water from the Detroit River to the Flint River, then knowingly took deliberate action that violated federal and state, civil and possibly even criminal law, which caused the lead levels in Flint's water to rise to dangerous levels. . . They knew that their actions were exposing the residents of Flint, including plaintiffs, to dangerous levels of lead. Lead poisoning caused plaintiffs to suffer from severe medical problems with their hair, skin, digestive system, and organs, as well as brain and other developmental injuries including cognitive deficits, among other issues. . . And when the evidence confirmed that, in fact, the lead levels in the water and in residents' blood were rising, these defendants worked to discredit the evidence and knowingly and proactively made false statements to the public to persuade residents that the water was safe to consume. They did so, even though their own testing revealed the opposite. Many residents, plaintiffs included, continued to consume the water in reliance on defendants' false assurances. It cannot be that such actions are not 'so egregious, so outrageous, that [they] may fairly be said to shock the contemporary conscience.'. . Nor can it be said that reasonable officials would not have had fair notice that such actions would violate the Constitution, i.e., that defendants were violating plaintiffs' clearly established right to bodily integrity and to be free from arbitrary, conscience shocking executive action. As recently reiterated by the Sixth Circuit, immunity does not extend to 'the plainly incompetent or those who knowingly violate the law.'. . And particularly with respect to the individual governmental defendants who are facing felony and misdemeanor criminal charges pursuant to the Michigan Attorney General's Flint Water Investigation, qualified immunity cannot and should not protect them from civil liability for the constitutional violations that are pleaded against them.")

Cummerlander v. Patriot Preparatory Acad. Inc., No. 2:13-CV-0329, 2015 WL 519308, at *14-15 (S.D. Ohio Feb. 9, 2015) ("At the time of the search at issue, the prior law of the Supreme Court and this Circuit involving searches of students for suspected drug use and possession all clearly establish that Smith's determination that JT should be subjected to a drug test was unconstitutional. A reasonable principal should have known that students have a Fourth Amendment right against unreasonable searches and seizures, and that the standard for a reasonable search of students is reasonable suspicion. . . The Supreme Court standard for free and voluntary consent to a search under the Fourth Amendment is also well-established. Further, the Supreme Court cases T.L.O. and Safford, as well as the Sixth Circuit case Williams, and the District Court case Fewless, puts Smith on notice as to the indicia of drug use and possession that should be considered in an investigation for and determination of reasonable suspicion of drug use. While it is unfortunate that Smith may have acted in conformity with a school policy to which he was bound, as will be discussed in the following section, such a school policy is unconstitutional and provides no protection to Smith in the individualized qualified immunity analysis. Thus, this Court concludes that it was objectively legally unreasonable for Smith to believe that JT and his mother gave voluntary and free consent to a urinalysis, and unreasonable for him to believe that his investigation into JT's alleged drug use met the well-established standard of reasonable suspicion under the circumstances. As the Sixth Circuit has explained, '[l]ike police officers, school officials need discretionary authority to function with great efficiency and speed in certain situations, so long as these decisions are consistent with certain constitutional safeguards.'. . While questioning 'an official's every decision with the benefit of hindsight would undermine the authority necessary to ensure the safety and order of our schools,' coercing a student under threat of expulsion to take a drug test without establishing reasonable suspicion under the circumstances is akin to a student shedding his or her constitutional rights at the school gate. . . Accordingly, the Court does not find that qualified immunity precludes personal liability for Smith.")

Hoskins v. Cumberland Cnty. Bd. of Educ., No. 2:13-CV-15, 2014 WL 7238621, at *12-13 (M.D. Tenn. Dec. 17, 2014) ("Although neither the Court nor the parties has identified a Sixth Circuit case directly on point, at least two courts of appeal have held that law enforcement officers were not entitled to qualified immunity for handcuffing children. [discussing C.B. v. City of Sonora (9th Cir.) and Gray ex rel Alexander v. Bostic (11th Cir.)] The record in this case does not demonstrate whether the principal and the officer actually continued to be afraid for their safety at the time the handcuffs were placed on [8 year-old] T.H., how much time elapsed between T.H.'s threats and rearing back of his fist and the officer's putting him in handcuffs, what T.H.'s demeanor was at the time the handcuffs were put on, or what his demeanor was for any of the forty-five minutes that he sat with handcuffs on in the principal's office. . .Based on the record before the Court, Plaintiffs have not demonstrated that Officer Tollett is not entitled to qualified immunity. Accordingly, Officer Tollett's motion for summary judgment on Plaintiff's claim of unlawful seizure will be granted on the basis of qualified immunity.") Combs v. City of Birmingham, No. 12–14528, 2013 WL 4670699, *1, *8, *9, *11, *12 (E.D. Mich. Aug. 30, 2013) ("Michigan is not among the 25 states with a law requiring its citizens to provide identifying information to police officers during a lawful Terry stop. . . .This case is not about the legality of Mr. Combs carrying his rifle openly, or any right he may have to do so. In this 42 U.S.C. § 1983 case, Mr. Combs claims that his unquestionable Fourth Amendment right to be free from seizure without probable cause was violated through false arrest and false imprisonment. But, even in the absence of a mandatory state identification law in Michigan, the Court finds that under the totality of the circumstances, including Mr. Combs' youthful appearance, the police officers' request for proof that Mr. Combs was 18 constituted a lawful command; and, Mr. Combs' refusal to provide such proof gave the police officers probable cause to arrest him for resisting their lawful command under Birmingham, Mich., Code of Ordinances part II, ch. 74, art. II, § 74–27 and Mich. Comp. Laws § 750.479. The principles of Terry v. Ohio require a suspect to supply proof of his age when the suspected criminal activity is a minor carrying a loaded weapon in public. And, the failure to supply such proof can lead to charges, including resisting a lawful command, breach of the peace, and brandishing. However, even if the Court had found an absence of probable cause to arrest Mr. Combs, these police officers would be entitled to the protection of qualified immunity because Mr. Combs' right is not clearly established in the contours of this particular situation: the police officers could have mistakenly concluded that it was reasonable to require Mr. Combs to prove his age so that they could assure themselves that a minor was not openly carrying a loaded assault rifle on a public street. . . . Accordingly, even in the absence of a stop and identify law in Michigan, the police officers' request that Mr. Combs provide identification that would prove his age was a lawful command, based on this Court's finding that: (1) Hiibel stands for the proposition that identifying information can be required of suspects during a Terry stop; and (2) a police officer can require proof to dispel reasonable suspicions of underage violations of the law during a Terry stop. The police officers' requests were reasonably related to the circumstances justifying Mr. Combs' legal Terry stop; they investigated a suspected violation of the underage weapon statute, based on a reasonable suspicion that Mr. Combs was not 18. . . . Although Hiibel has been the law of the land since 2004, one could argue it only applies in states with stop and identify laws. This case involves a request for identification to verify age in a state without a stop and identify law, but with a law requiring compliance with police officers' commands. The Supreme Court has only addressed the legality of an arrest for failure to provide a name during a Terry stop. Consequently, probable cause may not be sufficiently clear in the contours of this particular situation, such that police officers would understand that their request for Mr. Combs to prove his age may violate the law. In other words, while police officers always need probable cause to arrest, it may be arguable that Mr. Combs' failure to supply proof of his age amounted to probable cause to arrest him. Because reasonable police officers could disagree, Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity on Mr. Combs' false arrest and false imprisonment claims, even if the Court found an absence of probable cause to arrest him.")

Ayers v. City of Cleveland, No. 1:12–CV–753, 2013 WL 775359, *7, *8, *10-*12 (N.D. Ohio Feb. 25, 2013), appeal not considered by Ayers v. City of Cleveland, 773 F.3d 161 (6th Cir. 2014) ("[T]his Court has previously held that Brady's application against police officers who fail to disclose material and potentially exculpatory evidence is clearly established law. . . Defendants do not contend otherwise. Therefore, Defendants Cipo and Kovach do not enjoy qualified immunity as to Plaintiff Ayers's due process Brady claim, and the claim survives summary judgment. . . . A § 1983 claim for malicious prosecution is cognizable, although 'the contours of such a claim remain uncertain.'. . To succeed on such a claim, Ayers must prove the following: first, that a criminal prosecution was initiated against him and that the defendants made, influenced, or participated in the decision to prosecute; second, that there was a lack of probable cause for the criminal prosecution; third, that as a consequence of the proceeding, Ayers suffered a deprivation of liberty; and fourth, that the criminal proceeding was resolved in Ayers's favor. . . Neither a lack of malice, nor the intervention of a prosecutor, works to absolve an individual officer of liability. . . . The Court therefore finds that, viewing the evidence in a light most favorable to Ayers, there is sufficient evidence that Defendants Cipo, Kovach, and Donaldson violated Ayers's constitutional right to be free of malicious prosecution under the Fourth Amendment. Further, the Court finds that through deposition testimony and affidavits, Ayers has created a genuine issue of material fact. Finally, the Court finds that the acts in question—stating falsehoods in warrant affidavits and mischaracterizing key evidence—is well-understood by reasonable officers to be violative of a suspect's rights. . . .Certainly, the right to Brady material, to a constitutionally sufficient indictment, or to counsel during important criminal proceedings is clearly established. But with the failure to intervene claim, the Court must ask whether there was a clearly established constitutional right that a law enforcement officer was required to intervene to prevent another law enforcement officer from violating these rights. For there to be a failure to intervene, there must be a corresponding duty. There is ample Sixth Circuit caselaw regarding police officers' duty to intervene in excessive force cases. . . But the Court finds no such caselaw (nor does Ayers provide any) regarding a duty to intervene in the situations described in Ayers's complaint. . . '[G]iven the absence of any case law that has imposed a duty of protection under even roughly analogous circumstances,'. . . it could not be 'clear to a reasonable officer that his conduct was unlawful in the situation he confronted.'. . Therefore, the Court concludes that the failure to intervene claim is independent of the other claims and that there is insufficient authority to show that Detectives Cipo and Kovach violated clearly established law.")

Colebrook v. Kentucky Dept. of Motor Vehicle Enforcement, No. 08-110-JGW, 2010 WL 4979072, at *5 (E.D. Ky. Dec. 2, 2010) ("Officer Scott is entitled to qualified immunity because, at the time of the incident in question, Gant had not yet been decided. Rather, at the time of the incident Belton controlled and a reasonable officer would have believed that the search of the vehicle was permissible. As the Court in Gant itself anticipated, '[b]ecause a broad reading of Belton has been widely accepted, the doctrine of qualified immunity will shield officers from liability for search conducted in reasonable reliance on that understanding.'")

Ambris v. City of Cleveland, No. 1:12CV774, 2012 WL 5874367, *8-*10 (N.D. Ohio Nov. 19, 2012) ("Here, if we decided to follow Scarbrough and determine that the plaintiff has plead a prima facie constitutional violation, our inquiry would turn to whether the existence of Scarbrough is enough to determine that Plaintiff's right to be free from discrimination based on her sexual orientation was 'clearly established.' While the Sixth Circuit's most recent decision is Scarbrough and there have been cases, both in other circuits and the United States Supreme Court, that have showed a trend to giving homosexuals such protection, the heavily conflicting case law in the Sixth Circuit would tend to show that there is no 'clearly established right.' The Courts have been all over the place with regard to treating such claims for disparate treatment based on sexual orientation, so it would be difficult to say that Defendant Bahhur knew, or should have known, that he was violating a clearly established right. Plaintiff points to the United States Supreme Court's decision in Romer v. Evans, 517 U.S. 620 (1996) for the proposition that Defendants should have been on notice that their actions violated Plaintiff's 'clearly established rights.'. . . Romer is distinguishable from the facts in the present case. Romer was decided outside of an employment context. There is no mention of Title VII throughout the entire opinion, which this Court is required to implement in an employment discrimination analysis. . .Were the facts to show that this discrimination happened outside of an employment context, the holding and analysis of Romer would serve to put Defendants on notice that their actions were violating a 'clearly established right,' as is required to negate qualified immunity. However, there is no binding case law that would 'clearly establish' Plaintiff's rights under this fact pattern, and as such, Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity.")

Cline v. City of Mansfield, No. 1:07-CV-1070, 2010 WL 3860735, at *27 (N.D. Ohio Sept. 30, 2010) ("In this case, that prior Sixth Circuit caselaw does not name which specific law enforcement official must review the affidavit underlying a search warrant does not immunize the very person responsible for planning and executing a search. It was clearly established that some member of Mack's team needed to perform that review and it is reasonable to conclude that Mack was charged with either doing it himself or assuring it was done. . . There need not be a Sixth Circuit or Supreme Court case specifically stating that a supervisor has the responsibility to supervise to make it so. . . To the contrary, it was clearly established as of September 12, 2006 that some officer needed to at least look at the affidavit attached to this search warrant . . . and it was objectively unreasonable in view of that clearly established law for Team Leader Mack to fail to ensure that someone did so. . . Again, the Court's determination rests squarely on the fact that even a simple glance would have revealed the defect in this document.")

Wilson v. Columbus Bd. of Educ., 589 F.Supp.2d 952, 964, 965 (S.D. Ohio 2008) ("There is no Sixth Circuit case law involving materially similar facts to this case. However, although Sisco confronted a novel factual circumstance, well-settled precedent of the Sixth Circuit recognizes that in a non-custodial setting, a governmental actor can be held responsible for an injury committed by a private person if that governmental actor increases the risk of harm to the plaintiff and acts with deliberate indifference. . . Therefore, it would have been clear to a reasonable person in Sisco's position that her issuance of the suspension, which placed Jane Doe in a dangerous environment, could subject Sisco to constitutional liability.").

Hendrickson v. Caruso, No. 1:07-cv-304, 2008 WL 623788, at *10 (W.D. Mich. Mar. 4, 2008) ("The Sixth Circuit has never held that a prisoner has a statutory cause of action for monetary damages under RLUIPA. RLUIPA creates a private cause of action for a prison inmate if section 3 is violated, and further provides that the complaining party, if successful, may 'obtain appropriate relief against a government.' 42 U.S.C. § 2000cc-2(a). The Eleventh Circuit recently observed, 'To put it mildly, there is a division of authority on th[e] question [of whether RLUIPA authorizes an award of monetary damages].' Smith v. Allen, 502 F.3d at 1270 (collecting cases). Assuming arguendo that RLUIPA authorizes a cause of action for damages, qualified immunity is undoubtedly an appropriate defense. . . Plaintiff has not addressed much less demonstrated how defendants' actions violated any 'clearly established' rights under RLUIPA. Plaintiff has not identified any authority that clearly established his right to official MDOC recognition of Satanism as a religion, and every court that has considered Anton LaVey's books on Satanism has determined that they are fundamentally incompatible with prison safety, security, and prisoner rehabilitation. Accordingly, I find that defendants are entitled to summary judgment on plaintiff's claims for monetary damages on the alternative basis of qualified immunity.")

Yamaha Motor Manufacturing Corp. of America v. Commonwealth of Kentucky, 403 F.Supp.2d 601, 607 (W.D. Ky. 2005) ("The court must first determine whether the plaintiff has alleged the deprivation of a constitutional or statutory right at all and then, and only then, determine whether the right was clearly established at the time of the alleged violation. . . .Here, the plaintiffs have alleged violations of statutory rights under the ADA and the Rehabilitation Act, so the court will turn to the second prong. . . . Here, the plaintiffs argue that the 'clearly established right' is 'meaningful access' to the Commonwealth's golf courses. As of the date in question, the requirement that certain types of golf cars must be provided to constitute 'meaningful access' to state golf courses was not clearly established. . . Consequently, the plaintiffs cannot maintain their claims for monetary damages against the Commonwealth Defendants in their individual capacities. There is thus no need for the court to consider the third element of the qualified immunity test.").

Hainey v. Parrott, No. 1:02-CV-733, 2005 WL 2397704, at *8 (S.D. Ohio Sept. 28, 2005) ("There is no dispute in this case that the coroner's office retained and then disposed of Plaintiffs' decedents' brains without any notice to Plaintiffs. As explained above in Part III.A, Plaintiffs have established uncontested facts which demonstrate that Defendants violated their constitutional right to receive notice prior to the disposal of their decedent's body parts. The Court also finds that this right was clearly established at the time the coroner's office committed the acts in question here. As the Court stated above, supra, at 10-15, in 1991, Brotherton very broadly and very clearly held that family members have a property interest in their decedent's body parts which is protected by the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. Finally, a reasonable coroner in this judicial circuit would have known that disposing of body parts without notice to the decedent's next of kin would have violated that right. That seems especially true where, as Plaintiffs observe, this same coroner's office was involved in the case that established the right at stake here.").

May v. City of Springfield, No. 3:03 CV 293, 2005 WL 2338785, at *6 (S.D. Ohio Sept. 23, 2005) ("Immediately before Emmel took Plaintiff to the pavement, she had resumed her vandalism of Hatter's truck by kicking it. Thus, Emmel had a reason for his actions, to wit: preventing Plaintiff from continuing to damage Hatter's truck. Moreover, Plaintiff's ability to resume her destructive acts towards Hatter's truck, even though she was handcuffed at the time, demonstrates beyond cavil that she had not been completely restrained. Plaintiff has not cited a case which would demonstrate that it was clearly established in December, 2001, that an officer violates the Fourth Amendment by using force to bring a suspect to the ground, in order to prevent her from resuming her vandalism of the private property of another. Nevertheless, Plaintiff argues that the evidence raises a genuine issue of material fact concerning the question whether the Fourth Amendment right she relies upon herein was clearly established, because, after a post-incident investigation, Springfield found that Emmel had violated the use of force policy for its Police Department. It bears emphasis, however, that the right must be clearly established at the time the alleged constitutional violation occurred. . . Simply stated, after the fact conclusions by Springfield concerning Emmel's compliance with its use of force policy do not demonstrate that a constitutional right had been clearly established before the incident giving rise to the investigation. Accordingly, the Court concludes that the evidence fails to raise a genuine issue of material fact as to whether the particulars of Plaintiff's Fourth Amendment right to be free from an unreasonable seizure through the use of excessive force had been clearly established before December 15, 2001.").

Cahill v. Walker, No. 3:03-CV-00257, 2005 WL 1566494, at *4 (E.D. Tenn. July 5, 2005) ("Certainly, a reasonable police officer would understand that sexually harassing and assaulting an individual violates a constitutionally-protected right; however, this court does not now address Officer Walker's conduct. Here, the conduct at issue is Chief Montgomery's inaction, failing to discipline Officer Walker for his alleged prior sexual misconduct. The appropriate question is whether a reasonable supervisor would have understood that, by failing to discipline Officer Walker, he was allowing the misconduct to continue and thus proximately causing Plaintiff's constitutional right to be violated. . . In Lynn v. City of Detroit, the court found that this question 'turns on whether the defendant[ ] knowingly acquiesced in [the] subordinates' unconstitutional conduct, to the plaintiffs' injury.' . . In this case, the question of whether Chief Montgomery 'knowingly acquiesced' in Officer Walker's alleged misconduct is dependent on the question of whether he knew of that misconduct. When genuine issues of material fact remain as to an element of qualified immunity, summary judgment on qualified immunity is not appropriate. . . Here, the factual issue of whether Chief Montgomery knew of Officer Walker's prior misconduct is intertwined with the second prong of the qualified immunity inquiry. Chief Montgomery is therefore not entitled to summary judgment on the issue of qualified immunity.")

Shahit v. Tosqui, No. 04-71538, 2005 WL 1345413, at *9 (E.D. Mich. June 1, 2005) (not reported) ("The Court finds it impossible to conclude that Defendants, police officers who are required to make split-second decisions on the street, violated a 'clearly established' right to be stopped only upon probable cause that a civil traffic violation occurred when only a few months later, in Weaver, a trio of federal appellate judges clearly believed that probable cause was not required. Accordingly, given that the Supreme Court and the Sixth Circuit had not directly addressed the issue of whether probable cause is always required to stop a vehicle for a civil traffic offense, and Sixth Circuit in Weaver upheld a traffic stop based upon reasonable suspicion shortly after the events of this case occurred, the Court finds that the right to be stopped only upon probable cause that a civil traffic offense occurred was not clearly established when Defendants stopped Plaintiffs' vehicle.").

Rose v. Saginaw County, 353 F.Supp.2d 900, 924 (E.D. Mich. 2005) ("In this case, the right to be free from unreasonable seizures is clearly established. But the qualified immunity defense requires the Court to look beyond the right in the abstract. . . .The Court finds that the contours of the right to reasonable seizures pertaining to pretrial detainees was not sufficiently clear to impose liability on individual actors following the County's policy in effect during the period at issue in this case. Issues relating to strip and body cavity searches, viewing of naked inmates by guards of the other gender, and removal of clothing from unruly detainees have troubled courts over the past several years and have not yielded a uniform set of decisions on the subject. . . . At the time of the detentions in this case, there was no clear precedent that would have provided guidance to the individual defendants, who were attempting to walk the line between protecting detainees from harming themselves and violating their rights to personal privacy. That they transgressed that 'hazy border' here will not forfeit their qualified immunity from suit.").

Magrum v. Meinke, 332 F.Supp.2d 1071, 1082 (N.D. Ohio 2004) ("Defendant directs the Court to Ferguson v. Leiter, 220 F.Supp .2d 875 (N.D.Ohio 2002), Hale v. Vance, 267 F.Supp.2d 725 (S.D.Ohio 2003), and Joy. . . for the proposition that a reasonable officer in Meinke's position would have concluded that the amount of force employed was lawful. In Hale, the court determined that the use of a choke hold, or escort position, in the context of a Terry stop might give rise to an excessive force claim. The officer, however, was still entitled to qualified immunity because the court could not 'say that it was clearly established as of February 20, 2001, that a police officer may not detain an individual exiting a house reportedly providing sanctuary for at least one suspect in an investigation of gunshots by placing her arm behind her back and holding her in a choke hold.' . . Likewise, in Ferguson, though the use of a neck hold under the circumstances presented therein might have constituted excessive force, the officer was still entitled to qualified immunity. . . . In reaching its conclusion, this Court observed that the '[p]laintiffs have not presented relevant, controlling authority from this jurisdiction, or a consensus from other jurisdictions, regarding the constitutionality of neckholds.' . . Subsequently, however, the Fultz court, relying on Hope, declined to follow Ferguson, even though 'there was no direct precedent from the Sixth Circuit or Supreme Court directly dealing with the constitutionality of neck restraints.'. . Instead the Fultz court focused on general excessiveness of the conduct in light of the circumstances presented, and noted that '[a]t the time of the incident in question, the law was clearly established that a police officer should use no more force than necessary to effect an arrest.'. . Upon further consideration, and in light of Hope, the Court agrees with Fultz's analytical framework. If, as Defendant contends, he employed a takedown maneuver together with a head or neck repositioning technique, then Meinke did not act contrary to any clearly established standards. However, under Plaintiff's version of events, in which Meinke flipped Magrum to the ground and choked him two times, the second time while Magrum was not resisting, Defendant acted in violation of clearly established law.")

Watkins v. The Millennium School, 290 F.Supp.2d 890, 902, 903 (S.D. Ohio 2003) ("Applying the Williams test, the Court has already determined that a constitutional violation may have occurred. The next issue then is whether the right was 'clearly established' such that a reasonable official would have known about it. In this case, a reasonable teacher should have known that students have Fourth Amendment rights against unreasonable searches and seizures. The Supreme Court decided T.L.O. in 1985, clarifying that the Fourth Amendment applies to searches conducted by school officials. . . . The third prong–whether the official's actions were objectively unreasonable in light of clearly established rights–is the most contentious because there are no comparable cases such that it could be said that Defendant Apley should have understood that what she was doing violated Plaintiff Watkins' privacy rights. Even Thomas, to the extent that it is analogous, was decided after the events in question took place. However, the Williams test is in accord with Anderson v. Creighton, where the Supreme Court considered not whether the defendant should have known, but whether the official's actions were 'objectively unreasonable' in light of the clearly established right. This Court finds that Plaintiffs have presented a genuine issue of material fact regarding whether Defendant Apley is entitled to qualified immunity. As explained by the Court in Anderson v. Creighton, the official is not protected by qualified immunity just because this very action previously has not been held unlawful. . . A reasonable jury could find Defendant Apley acted objectively unreasonable in requesting Plaintiff Watkins to accompany her alone, and into a supply closet, to conduct a second search, despite having no apparent basis to search further. A reasonable jury also could conclude that Defendant Millennium's School Policy 425 put Apley on notice that her actions in contravention of that policy would be objectively unreasonable.").

Fultz v. Whittaker, 261 F. Supp.2d 767, 776 & n.6 (W.D. Ky. 2003) ("[T]he fact that there was no direct precedent from the Sixth Circuit or Supreme Court directly dealing with the constitutionality of neck restraints does not necessarily mean that the right to be free from certain types of restraints under these circumstances was not clearly established for purposes of qualified immunity. . . . The Court is aware that this is contrary to the holding of Ferguson v. Leiter, 220 F.Supp.2d 875, 881 (N.D.Ohio 2002), upon which Defendants heavily rely. In Ferguson, the Court concluded that the right to be free from an unconstitutional excessive neck restraint was not clearly established. Id. The Ferguson court, however, did not reference the Hope opinion. The Court believes that Ferguson defines the issue too narrowly, and that based on Hope a court must look generally at the excessiveness of the conduct in light of the circumstances instead of focusing on whether the precise conduct at issue has previously been held unconstitutional. . . . The appropriate inquiry in this case is whether a reasonable officer could have objectively believed that using a neck restraint in which pressure or force is applied is an acceptable method by which to maintain control over a handcuffed individual not actively resisting arrest or physically threatening the Officers or others under these particular circumstances.").

Smartt v. Grundy County, Tennessee, No. 4:01-CV-32, 2002 WL 32058965, at *4 (E.D. Tenn. Mar. 26, 2002) ("Shooting a fleeing car thief when the officer was not in physical danger, if proven, would violate clearly established law of which a reasonable person should have known.").

Fewless v. Bd. of Education of Wayland Union Schools, 208 F. Supp.2d 806, 822, 823 & n.17 (W.D. Mich. 2002) ("The Court could not find any cases involving school officials attempting to obtain legally valid consent from youths with disabilities like ADHD. [Relying on Hope v. Pelzer,] [t]his Court finds that Schneckloth gave 'fair warning' that Joseph's personal characteristics, as they affected the totality of the circumstances, rendered him unable to voluntarily consent to be searched. . . . As to the reasonableness of the strip search, a Sixth Circuit case on point, Williams v. Ellington, held the school officials protected by qualified immunity only after an investigation much more extensive and reliable than the one that was conducted here. . . . Thus, the decision to strip search Joseph Fewless was not objectively legally reasonable. Moreover, the decision was highly questionable in light of common sense and general experience. Qualified immunity does not bar the personal liability of Defendants Cutler and Medendorp.").

SEVENTH CIRCUIT

Lovett v. Herbert, No. 17-1668, 2018 WL 5316552, at *3-5 (7th Cir. Oct. 29, 2018) ("Although questions of (1) Fourth Amendment liability and (2) qualified immunity both involve an analysis of the 'reasonableness' of a defendant's conduct, the objects of those analyses are different. As we have explained in prior cases, ' "the substantive constitutional standard protects [a defendant officer's] reasonable factual mistakes [whereas] qualified immunity protects [the officer] from liability where [he] reasonably misjudge[d] the legal standard.". . . This distinction allows us to work around the factual disputes identified by the district court by assuming that the Officers knew Martin was severely intoxicated and that cells without upper bunks were available. Making these assumptions, we can properly exercise jurisdiction to determine whether providing a severely intoxicated person access to an upper bunk, in a cell where the lower bunk was occupied, violates clearly established law for qualified immunity purposes. . . .Here, the right at issue is a pre-arraignment detainee's Fourth Amendment right to 'objectively reasonable' treatment. We have explained that this right is assessed with reference to the defendant officer's notice of the detainee's medical need, the seriousness of the medical need, the scope of the alleged required treatment, and police interests. The Estate argues that the Officers obviously violated this right by giving a severely intoxicated person access to an upper bunk. The Officers argue that only analogous precedent could have put them on notice that their conduct was unreasonable, but that no such precedent exists. Examination of the specific context of the Officers' conduct in this case shows that it was not 'egregiously' or 'obviously' unreasonable. Martin's severe intoxication did not necessarily indicate imminent or ongoing danger, such that giving access to an upper bunk was patently unreasonable. Although severe intoxication impairs a person's physical and mental abilities, the level of impairment varies by individual, and it is undisputed that Martin was communicating with the Officers and moving around under his own capacity prior to being left in the cell. Further, impairment from intoxication eventually decreases with time. We and the Supreme Court have required a much higher level of obvious risk to deny qualified immunity based on the Fourth Amendment's general requirement of reasonable conduct with respect to detainees. . . . [Court distinguishes cases relied on by the Estate and concludes that] even drawing all factual inferences in its favor, the Estate has failed to show that the Officers' conduct violated clearly established law. For that reason, the Officers are entitled to qualified immunity.") Muhammad v. Pearson, 900 F.3d 898, 901, 904-07 (7th Cir. 2018) ("Law enforcement officers who discover that a search warrant does not clearly specify the premises to be searched must ordinarily stop and clear up the ambiguity before they conduct or continue the search. . . If they do not, they may lose the legal protection the warrant provides for an invasion of privacy and accompanying restraints on liberty. As we explain below, however, we conclude that summary judgment for the officer was appropriate here. Defendant Pearson testified that he did not know there were two apartments, including an apartment 1B, and he has offered undisputed, reliable, and contemporaneous documents confirming his after-the-fact testimony that the address searched was in fact the correct target of the search authorized by the ambiguous warrant. Summary judgment on the unlawful entry claims was correct. Also, Officer Pearson had arguable probable cause to arrest plaintiff Muhammad for suspected drug trafficking, though Pearson quickly confirmed that Muhammad was not the right suspect and released him within fifteen minutes. Summary judgment based on qualified immunity was also correct on that unlawful arrest claim . . . . We approach this illegal entry claim through the lens of qualified immunity and ask whether Officer Pearson's actions violated clearly established law. More precisely, since the district court granted summary judgment for Pearson, the question is whether the undisputed facts show that Pearson did not violate clearly established law. . . .With th[e] qualified immunity standard in mind, we take a closer look at Fourth Amendment law where search warrants have errors or key ambiguities. We have held that officers executing a search warrant can rely on what they know and see independent of the documents to make sure they search the correct premises, at least where the circumstances show there is no reasonable chance that the officers will search the wrong location, meaning a location other than the one the issuing magistrate authorized. . . . Search first, check later, is not a sound policing strategy. Jones teaches that officers need to read the warrant before executing it, and they should call a judge if there is a discrepancy between the affidavit and the warrant. . .This case, however, is different from Jones in a critical way. Unlike the officer in Jones, who knew there were two apartments, knew that the warrant was ambiguous, and essentially took his best guess about which one to search, Officer Pearson testified that when he applied for the warrant he did not know there was an apartment 1B in the building. He also testified that the omission of 'A' from the warrant was a clerical omission. Pearson used his knowledge of the case, including information from his source, to search the correct apartment, the one for which he had probable cause. So Officer Pearson relies on the line of cases cited above that allow executing officers to rely on what they know to make sure they search the correct locations, despite errors or ambiguities in search warrants. The critical question for this case is whether it was proper to resolve Pearson's defense in his favor on summary judgment. In civil litigation about searches that turned out to involve mistakes or ambiguities in warrants, there can be plenty of room for material factual disputes about what the executing officers actually knew and did. Parties and courts can reasonably question the credibility of officers' after-the-fact attempts to explain away their mistakes. Such cases may well present factual issues that require a full trial to resolve. In this case, however, summary judgment was justified. Officer Pearson has offered undisputed evidence, in the form of reliable, contemporaneous documents, confirming that the correct target apartment—the one he intended to search and had probable cause to search—was apartment 1A. The LEADS report (dated the day before the warrant) and the deconfliction submission (dated the same day the warrant was executed) both listed apartment '1A' as the target of the search. Those documents remove reasonable grounds for disputing Pearson's claim that he used his knowledge to ensure that he searched the intended location. This contemporaneous evidence distinguishes this case from others where we held that officers could not have concluded that a plaintiff's apartment was the appropriate target of the search warrant. . . .Given the case law that allows an executing officer to use his or her own knowledge to resolve ambiguities, at least where there is no chance that the wrong location might be searched by mistake . . . and the contemporaneous documentation that corroborates Pearson's testimony, we affirm the district court's grant of summary judgment. Plaintiffs have not identified a precedent that should have alerted Officer Pearson that he could not proceed to search the apartment that he knew, beyond reasonable dispute, was the intended target.")

Thompson v. Cope, 900 F.3d 414, 420-24 (7th Cir. 2018) ("The plaintiff estate has not cited any cases holding that a paramedic could violate a patient's Fourth Amendment rights by rendering medical treatment. We have found just two opinions allowing such cases to go forward. . . Given the undisputed facts here, we doubt that the reasoning of those cases applies. In any event, the second prong of the qualified immunity analysis is dispositive here, so we decline to decide the first. . . .We have appellate jurisdiction to review the legal issue at the second step of qualified immunity analysis: whether the constitutional right that Heishman's estate asserts was clearly established at the time Cope administered the sedative. . . . [H]ow should courts analyze whether a right is clearly established? The Supreme Court has 'repeatedly told courts ... not to define clearly established law at a high level of generality.'. . Defining the right too broadly 'may defeat the purpose of qualified immunity.'. . On the other hand, defining the right too narrowly is equally problematic. That error 'may defeat the purpose of § 1983.'. . The Second Circuit has said that the 'Goldilocks principle' illustrates the 'middle course' between the two extremes—not too broad, not too narrow, but just right. [citing Golodner, 770 F.3d at 206] Can we be more specific? Precedent tied to particularized facts can indicate that law is clearly established, but the Supreme Court does 'not require a case directly on point.'. . 'Of course, there can be the rare "obvious case," where the unlawfulness of the officer's conduct is sufficiently clear even though existing precedent does not address similar circumstances.'. . As we view this case, the question for qualified immunity is whether it was clearly established in 2014 that a paramedic 'seizes' an arrestee and is subject to Fourth Amendment limits on excessive force by sedating the arrestee—who appears to the paramedic to be suffering from a medical emergency—before taking the arrestee by ambulance to the hospital. It was not. The district court defined the asserted right too broadly. It said that 'officers cannot use excessive force in effectuating an arrest.'. . That 'lofty definition of the right' is just 'one floor down from the words of the Fourth Amendment itself ("the right to be free of 'unreasonable ... seizures'") and two floors down from the highest level of generality possible ("the right to be free from a constitutional violation").'. . The district court's formulation suggests that it tried to treat this case as an obvious one, evident from broad principles in excessive force cases. But we do not think a paramedic (or his lawyer) reasonably familiar with circuit and Supreme Court precedent would have understood that the Fourth Amendment prohibition of unreasonable searches and seizures applies to treatment in the field during a medical emergency. Fourth Amendment restrictions are almost wholly alien to that situation, where paramedics are subject to a distinct set of professional standards and goals aimed at responding to medical emergencies. . . The district court's formulation 'defines the qualified immunity inquiry at a high level of generality ... and then fails to consider that question in "the specific context of the case."'. . Neither the plaintiff estate nor the district court cited any case where a court found that conduct like Cope's—administering a therapeutic drug in response to a medical emergency—violated the Fourth Amendment. The cases cited by plaintiff and the district court involved excessive force cases brought against police officers. . . .Qualified immunity exists to avoid or at least to reduce the risk of the kind of catch-22 that would result from accepting the estate's position: treat the arrestee or don't treat him, but face a lawsuit either way. Suppose we put aside for a moment the human and professional ethics and responsibilities of paramedics and police officers when confronting a person in dire straits. Let's focus only on legally enforceable duties. If the officers and paramedic had not responded to Heishman's excited delirium, they could easily have found themselves defending against a deliberate indifference claim for ignoring his obvious and serious medical needs. . . .That dilemma helps to explain why the right the plaintiff estate asserts here was not clearly established under the circumstances. To treat the right as clearly established, the district court boiled away key circumstances of the situation here—especially the fact that Cope was a paramedic confronting a patient suffering from a life-threatening emergency. Those facts take this case out of the realm of clearly established Fourth Amendment law. It was not clearly established that a paramedic effects a 'seizure' within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment and subjects himself to an excessive force claim by sedating an arrestee who is suffering from a medical emergency to take the arrestee to the hospital. Defendant Cope was entitled to summary judgment on the Fourth Amendment claim.") Mitchell v. Kallas, 895 F.3d 492, 499-501 (7th Cir. 2018) ("Dr. Kallas urges that he is entitled to qualified immunity because no binding decision guarantees inmates the right to a speedier gender dysphoria evaluation or short-term hormone therapy prior to release. That formulation, however, frames the right too narrowly. Dr. Kallas has conceded (consistently with other cases) that Mitchell's gender dysphoria was a serious medical need. . . The first question is thus whether a prison doctor would have known that it was unconstitutional never to provide a person with the appropriate treatment for her particular case (and for many others)—hormone therapy. . . Prison officials have been on notice for years that leaving serious medical conditions, including gender dysphoria, untreated can amount to unconstitutional deliberate indifference. . . .Because circuit precedent clearly established that a total absence of treatment for the serious medical needs created by gender dysphoria is unconstitutional, Dr. Kallas may not claim qualified immunity for the denial of Mitchell's request for care. . . .To the extent that Mitchell may be complaining about the length of time it took for the assessment to be completed, as opposed to the lack of treatment, our answer is different. It is true that delays in care for 'non-life-threatening but painful conditions may constitute deliberate indifference if the delay exacerbated the injury or unnecessarily prolonged an inmate's pain.'. . Yet prisons have limited resources, and that fact makes some delay inevitable. For a delay in treatment to qualify as deliberate indifference, we must weigh 'the seriousness of the condition and the ease of providing treatment.'. . As we have said, the serious nature of gender dysphoria is not disputed here. But the ease of evaluating the appropriateness of hormone therapy remains to be considered. There is little evidence about the typical length of these evaluations, either in prisons or in the community. The few courts that have considered this question (some after the events in question) have determined that even longer delays in evaluating an inmate's candidacy for hormone treatment did not amount to deliberate indifference. . . Because Dr. Kallas was not on notice that a 13–month evaluation would violate Mitchell's Eighth Amendment right, he is entitled to qualified immunity on any possible claim of unreasonable delay. That is not to say that this delay cannot be criticized. Far from it. The lack of any sense of urgency, or even of the need for prompt follow-through, is quite disturbing. But on these facts, no clearly established law would have signaled to Dr. Kallas that this delay amounted to deliberate indifference.")

Comsys, Inc. v. Pacetti, 893 F.3d 468, 474 (7th Cir. 2018) ("As an IT specialist, Comsys surely knew that it could acquire its own domain name and set up an email server on its own equipment, for the greatest possible security. Instead it chose to use the City's servers, without any contractual guarantee of privacy. This puts it in a middle ground: it did not consent to the search (expressly or by implication), but neither did it arrange privacy by contract. Clearly established law does not tell us what expectation of privacy a contractor has in such a situation, which means that the appellants are entitled to qualified immunity. ualified immunity protects public employees who do not violate clearly established law. Unless we accept highly general statements—such as 'do not invade reasonable expectations of privacy without probable cause'—as clearly establishing the law when the existence of a reasonable privacy interest is itself debatable, these appellants prevail. We have been told by the highest authority not to take general principles as clearly establishing how novel situations must be resolved. It follows that Mayor Bosman, Administrator Pacetti, and Manager St. Peter cannot be ordered to pay damages under 42 U.S.C. § 1983.")

Comsys, Inc. v. Pacetti, 893 F.3d 468, 474-76 (7th Cir. 2018) (Gilbert, District Judge, concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("I join with my colleagues on the Fourth Amendment question. The majority's holding on the First Amendment issue, however, is problematic. . . .The majority then holds that Pacetti gets qualified immunity for his actions because he did not violate any clearly established rights of the appellees. What the majority is effectively saying is that you do not have a clearly established right to report a crime against you or your privately-held business to the police. That cannot be correct. The First Amendment expressly protects 'the right of the people ... to petition the government for a redress of grievances.' U.S. Const. amend. I. This clause has been incorporated against the states through the Fourteenth Amendment's due process clause. . . .It should be clear that the First Amendment protects your ability to report to the police that you are the victim of a crime. And although the Supreme Court 'does not require a case directly on point for a right to be clearly established,' Kisela v. Hughes, —— U.S. ——, 138 S.Ct. 1148, 1152, 200 L.Ed.2d 449 (2018), there are numerous published opinions at both the district and circuit court levels coming to the same conclusion. . . .There is one final matter: the majority is correct that the Supreme Court continues to move the ball on when law is 'clearly established' for a qualified immunity analysis, but the majority takes this principle too far. My colleagues rely chiefly on Trigillo v. Snyder, 547 F.3d 826 (7th Cir. 2008) to indicate that the right to report a crime against you or your personally-held business is not clearly established at the moment. But Trigillo dealt with a public service administrator trying to ensure that the Illinois Department of Corrections was proceeding appropriately, and when the employee became more concerned with what was going on at the Department, she filed a report with the Illinois Attorney General. . . . The employee wrote the report on a department letterhead and signed it as the 'Chief of Procurement.'. . So it should not be a surprise that the speech in Trigillo fell within the scope of Garcetti v. Ceballos. . . considering the speaker was undoubtedly speaking as an employee rather than as a citizen in her private capacity. That is far different from our case, where McAuliffe learned that someone was stealing trade secrets from her privately-held business and reported as much to the authorities. And the fact that McAuliffe's privately-held business had a contract with the city cannot mean that suddenly McAuliffe loses her right to report those computer crimes simply because 'performance of the contract' may be at play. Because it is clearly established that McAuliffe had a First Amendment right to report a crime against herself and her privately-held business to law enforcement, and Pacetti retaliated against her for doing so, Pacetti should not be entitled to qualified immunity on that claim. I respectfully dissent as to the majority's holding on the First Amendment question.")

Broadfield v. McGrath, 737 F. App'x 773, ___ (7th Cir. 2018) ("[A] defendant who is denied qualified immunity at summary judgment may not immediately appeal whether the evidence was sufficient to show a genuine issue of fact for trial. . . And accepting the defendants' argument would require disrupting the district court's conclusion that Broadfield's level of cooperation was sufficiently disputed. Because the court's ruling on this step of the qualified immunity inquiry turns on factual questions, we lack jurisdiction to review this issue. We do have jurisdiction to decide the second step of the qualified-immunity inquiry: whether Broadfield's right to be free from the type of excessive force described by the district court was clearly established. The Supreme Court has stressed that this right must be defined with adequate specificity. Kisela v. Hughes, 138 S. Ct. 1148, 1151 (2018). The question, then, is not whether the law forbids the use of excessive force, but whether the law clearly established as excessive force the pressing of a non-resisting detainee's neck against the concrete in a manner that prevented him from breathing, carrying him hog-tied to his cell, and severely twisting his wrist in the process. . . In making this determination, we do not require a case be directly on point, but existing precedent must be sufficiently analogous to place the officers on notice that their conduct was unlawful. . . The Supreme Court has held that a pretrial detainee can succeed on an excessive force claim by showing only that the force used against him was objectively unreasonable. . . And our precedent makes clear that the actions of McGrath and Durham were objectively unreasonable if Broadfield was not resisting. . . Thus, we will not disturb the district court's denial of McGrath and Durham's qualified-immunity defense.")

Hurt v. Wise, 880 F.3d 831, 844-47 (7th Cir. 2018) ("Introducing an involuntary confession in a criminal prosecution violates the protection against compelled self-incrimination. . . Vantlin raises two preliminary legal arguments, which if accepted would entitle all three defendants to qualified immunity. First, he argues that Deadra's confession was never introduced against her in a criminal trial, and so she was never compelled to testify against herself. We have already rejected such a cramped understanding of what it means to 'use' a confession against someone in a criminal case. . . It is enough that the statement was used against Deadra in a probable cause affidavit and in a pre-trial hearing. . . .False confessions are a real problem, as both the majority and dissenting opinions in Dassey recognized. . . Even though William and Deadra 'confessed,' if a trier of fact could conclude that the officers knew that the confessions were false, then the officers are not entitled to qualified immunity for their actions. . . .We acknowledge, as we did in Dassey, that '[t]he Supreme Court's many cases applying the voluntariness test have not distilled the doctrine into a comprehensive set of hard rules.'. . Nonetheless, when the facts must be taken in the light most favorable to the plaintiffs, and when an interrogation is infected with numerous problems, a full trial may be necessary before a final characterization of the process is possible. This is not the place for an in-depth look at psychological coercion and false confessions, because we are not charged with making the final decision on the admissibility of William's and Deadra's statements. We must decide only whether, taking the facts and inferences favorably to the plaintiffs, any reasonable officer would have known that he was applying impermissible pressure. The district court concluded that the answer to this more limited question is yes, and we agree with it.")

Kemp v. Liebel, 877 F.3d 346, 351-52 (7th Cir. 2017) ("Before we can determine if the law was clearly established, 'the right allegedly violated must be defined at the appropriate level of specificity.'. .The Supreme Court has expressly rejected over-general formulations of clearly established law in the Fourth Amendment context. . . . In recent years, the Court has repeatedly stressed that Graham and Garner 'lay out excessive-force principles at only a general level.'. . . Thus, the Court held that 'Garner and Graham do not by themselves create clearly established law outside "an obvious case."'. . Here, plaintiffs ask us to define the relevant clearly established law as 'the right of prisoners not to have their religious practices interfered with and prevented absent a legitimate penological basis.' This formulation is too broad. In fact, it simply restates the standard for analyzing prisoners' constitutional claims created by the Court in Turner v. Safley[.] . . . Just as Garner and Graham create a generalized excessive force standard, Turner creates a generalized framework to analyze prisoners' constitutional claims. Both describe a multi-factor reasonableness test used to determine whether a defendant's actions violated the Constitution. Thus, like the Garner and Graham standard, the Turner test cannot create clearly established law outside an obvious case. . . Instead, as the district court stated, the proper inquiry is whether there existed a 'clearly established constitutional right on the part of prisoners to congregate services and study absent appropriate leadership and supervision at the time of an interfacility transfer.' . .Under this framework, it is clear that Liebel is protected by qualified immunity. Plaintiffs cite no case where we held that the Free Exercise Clause provides prisoners the right to group worship when outside volunteers were unavailable to lead or train inmates. Likewise, they cite no case where we held that a prison official violates the Free Exercise Clause by transferring inmates to a facility that does not provide congregate worship and study, or by failing to delay a transfer until the new facility provides congregate worship and study.")

Smith v. Anderson, 874 F.3d 966, 968 (7th Cir. 2017) ("Qualified immunity bars Smith's claim. No court has held that the Fourth Amendment compels the release of sex offenders who lack lawful and approved living arrangements. Brown v. Randle, 847 F.3d 861, 864 (7th Cir. 2017). Thus, when sex offenders lack these arrangements, their continued detention does not violate clearly established rights. In such circumstances, the officers responsible for their detention are entitled to qualified immunity. . . That is the situation here. Indeed, Illinois law requires the Department to ensure that inmates have proper and approved residences before releasing them on parole. . . It also authorizes the Department to hold inmates until it has approved their living arrangements. . . As of his release date, Department had not approved Smith's host site. Thus, Smith's continued detention did not violate a clearly established right.")

Estate of Perry v. Wenzel, 872 F.3d 439, 460 (7th Cir. 2017), cert. denied, 138 S. Ct. 1440 (2018) ("The defendants urge us to narrowly define Perry's right. But, in doing so, they are essentially urging us to conclude that because there is no case with the exact same fact pattern, qualified immunity applies. That is not what the qualified immunity analysis requires us to do. Rather, we find that in September 2010, it was clearly established that the Fourth Amendment governed claims by detainees who had yet to receive a judicial probable cause determination. . . In 2007, in Williams, we identified the four factors later articulated in Ortiz, and upon which we have relied to evaluate the merits of Perry's claims. And, if by 2010, it was clearly established that an officer or prison nurse's actions were judged by the objectively reasonable standard of the Fourth Amendment, the failure to take any action in light of a serious medical need would violate that standard. Because Perry has met his burden at summary judgment of establishing that there was a violation of his constitutional rights and that that right was clearly established in 2010, his claims must be submitted to a jury for consideration.")

Orlowski v. Milwaukee Cty., 872 F.3d 417, 422-23 (7th Cir. 2017) ("Defendants' construction of the 'clearly established' law at issue here is narrow to the point of meaninglessness. Defendants assert that there is no clearly established right for 'a convicted prisoner to be awoken and told that he is snoring or breathing irregularly' or 'to receive immediate medical attention simply because he is snoring or breathing inconsistently in his sleep.' This inaccurately construes the Estate's claim. We cannot assume the Defendants' version of the facts that Orlowski was only snoring. The Estate provides evidence that Alexander knew, and told Manns, that Orlowski was breathing irregularly, appeared to have a severe sleeping disorder, and could not be woken up. Any reasonable officer would know that these observations indicated a serious medical condition and the law required them to seek medical attention. But, Alexander and Manns instead ignored Orlowski's condition. Because the facts proffered by the Estate could demonstrate a violation of Orlowski's clearly established Eighth Amendment rights, factual disputes prevent a finding that Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity.")

Houlihan v. City of Chicago, 871 F.3d 540, 546-49 (7th Cir. 2017) ("Given the 'considerable uncertainty [that] exists in the area of patronage law,' it is often difficult to prove that a government official violated a clearly established right by considering politics when making an employment decision. . . The reason for this uncertainty is that determining whether it is permissible to consider politics is a highly fact-specific inquiry—one that requires considering 'a wide range of government positions, which in turn involve an endless variety of job responsibilities and varying degrees of discretion and autonomy.'. . Between the low-level government worker (who typically receives protection from patronage hiring and firing) and the confidential employee (who receives no such protection), there are numerous government positions for which the pro-priety of patronage-based employment decisions 'has depended largely on the courts' juggling of competing constitutional and political values.'. . For that reason, 'it is difficult to imagine how any plaintiff ... could have a clearly established right to be free from patronage dismissal unless a nearly identical case had already been decided.'. . .Although the Shakman decrees reflect one of the First Amendment's proscriptions—that is, the general prohibition of patronage-based employment decisions—the decrees are not an edict encapsulating the contours of the constitutional rule; the decrees instead are the result of settlement between the parties to litigation. . . .The evidence shows that a reasonable person not only could debate whether the security-specialist position is a confidential one, but in fact could conclude so. And because the position is arguably confidential, a patronage-based employment decision regarding the position—although illegal under Shakman—does not necessarily entail a First Amendment violation. Accordingly, at the time of the plaintiffs' reassignment, Hillard and Thompson did not have notice that it is an obvious constitutional violation to consider politics when appointing security specialists. Hillard and Thompson are thus entitled to qualified immunity.")

Archer v. Chisholm, 870 F.3d 603, 620 (7th Cir. 2017) ("In sum, Garcetti might support either side: Archer, because the defendants were not her employer; the defendants, because Archer's activities were part of her job as a public employee. This uncertainty means that Archer has not shown that her asserted right was 'clearly established'—a stringent standard that demands that 'every reasonable official would have understood that what he is doing violates that right.'. . . [T]he existence of probable cause and the judicial supervision of the John Doe investigation further counsel in favor of finding that qualified immunity applies. No case we have seen has considered how to treat public employee speech that draws the attention of a John Doe judge or a grand jury for purposes of the First Amendment. . . And we know from Hartman that probable cause (or the lack thereof) is relevant to a claim of retaliatory prosecution. . . There is no clearly established rule of law under which an official pursuing a lawful investigation, based on probable cause, has been found liable under the First Amendment to a target.")

Green v. Newport, 868 F.3d 629, 634-35 (7th Cir. 2017) ("Green counters that, while Gentry and Packer may not have expressly proscribed Officer Newport's conduct, these cases provided him 'fair warning' that his conduct was unlawful. . . It is not clear on what legal basis Green asserts this argument, but as we have already concluded, Gentry and Packer are too factually dissimilar to control this case. The inquiry into whether a right is clearly established 'must be undertaken in light of the specific context of the case, not as a broad general proposition.'. . Green ignores the context of the situation which Officer Newport confronted: the auto store's recent robbery; the 'casing' behavior reportedly carried out by the driver of the Marquis; and the proximity to the store's closing hour. These facts make this case wholly distinguishable from Gentry and Packer, in which officers lacked any information to warrant suspicion of criminal conduct, and consequently these cases cannot provide Officer Newport 'fair warning' that his conduct was unlawful. Accordingly, the district court erred in its determination that Officer Newport's Terry stop violated clearly established law, and we find that Officer Newport is entitled to qualified immunity.")

Estate of Clark v. Walker, 865 F.3d 544, 552-53 (7th Cir. 2017) ("Walker argues that the Supreme Court's decision in Taylor v. Barkes shows that Clark's rights were not clearly established. . . . Taylor is readily distinguishable from this case. First, Clark's estate is not suing supervisory officials who did not know about Clark's risk. The estate contends that Walker and Kuehn actually knew Clark's risk and disregarded it. Second, in Taylor the Supreme Court reversed the Third Circuit in part because the right at issue was not clearly established in the Third Circuit. Here, the right at issue has long been clearly established in this circuit, as explained above. Finally, Walker argues that the clearly established prohibition on deliberate indifference to prisoners' and jail inmates' risk of suicide is too general to be enforceable for purposes of qualified immunity. Walker urges us to consider Clark's rights at a very high level of specificity: whether a jail inmate had a right 'to be placed immediately on a special watch in a suicide cell despite no outward signs of suicidal ideation during an initial intake assessment, when the intake officer knew that trained medical personnel would conduct a follow-up assessment and ultimately determine the inmate's proper observation and housing status.' This very specific right, Walker argues, 'has never been clearly established by the Supreme Court.' Courts may not define clearly established law at too high a level of generality, . . . but there is no such problem here. The Supreme Court has long held that prisoners have an Eighth Amendment right to treatment for their 'serious medical needs.'. . For purposes of qualified immunity, that legal duty need not be litigated and then established disease by disease or injury by injury. Risk of suicide is a serious medical need, of course. . . .Walker should have taken action based on this knowledge, yet he chose to do nothing. Our precedent establishes that 'particular conduct' such as this violates clearly established law. . . To the extent Walker argues that our prior cases are factually distinguishable from this case, our limited jurisdiction precludes considering that argument.")

Lewis v. McClean, 864 F.3d 556, 565-66 (7th Cir, 2017) ("[W]e reject the defendants' claim that they are entitled to qualified immunity from Lewis's suit. Qualified immunity protects government employees from liability for civil damages for actions taken within the scope of their employment unless their conduct violates 'clearly established ... constitutional rights of which a reasonable person would have known.'. . Viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Lewis, we ask whether the defendants violated a clearly established constitutional right. . . In establishing whether a constitutional right has been clearly established, it is unnecessary for the particular violation in question to have been previously held unlawful. . . Instead, we ask whether the 'contours of the right [are] sufficiently clear that a reasonable official would understand that what he is doing violates that right.'. . It has long been clear that deliberate indifference to an inmate's serious medical needs violates the Eighth Amendment. As for whether Cichanowicz and McLean's delay in assisting Lewis ran afoul of that clearly established right, as the discussion above makes clear, when viewed in the light most favorable to Lewis, his factual allegations could demonstrate a constitutional violation. Thus, the defendants are not entitled to immunity from suit.")

Karow v. Fuchs, 695 F. App'x 966, ___ (7th Cir. 2017) ("Public officials are entitled to qualified immunity unless their acts violate clearly established law. See, e.g., White v. Pauly, 137 S. Ct. 548 (2017). Neither the Supreme Court nor any court of appeals has held that prisoners are entitled to place advertisements in an effort to attract support for a proposal to change a prison system's policies. To the contrary, many decisions have held that a prisoner's efforts to speak directly to the public at large or to the press are subject to restrictions by wardens and other officials. . . Karow had every right to contact lawyers who might have been willing to help him and to initiate litigation seeking an injunction requiring the prison system to recognize Asatru. By choosing a different route—one that could have entailed gang code, even if it did not in fact—Karow invited a reaction by the prison system. The district court was right to conclude that the defendants are entitled to qualified immunity from damages.")

Karow v. Fuchs, 695 F. App'x 966, ___ (7th Cir. 2017) (Rovner, J., dissenting) ("Thaddeus Karow placed an ad in a religious newsletter, seeking 'ideas' for how to have his religion recognized as 'legitimate' in the Wisconsin prison system. Officers viewed the ad as a prohibited call for collective action, placed Karow in segregation, and issued him a conduct report. Even though a hearing committee exonerated Karow of violating prison rules, the officers continued to threaten Karow with punishment if he ran the ad again. The majority, in concluding that the officers are entitled to qualified immunity on Karow's claim that the officers violated the First Amendment, misframes the issue by asking whether prisoners have a clear right to advertise. But it is Karow's message, not its medium, that matters. I view Karow's speech as a request for legal assistance that, because no reasonable officer would believe it threatened legitimate prison interests, was clearly protected speech. I would therefore deny the officers qualified immunity on Karow's First Amendment claim.")

Isby v. Brown, 856 F.3d 508, 529-30 (7th Cir. 2017) ("It is well established that whenever process is constitutionally due, no matter the context, it must be granted in a meaningful manner. . . That said, we must also be cautious about defining the due process violation at issue here 'at the appropriate level of specificity.'. . There is no Seventh Circuit or Supreme Court case establishing exactly that periodic reviews of administrative segregation like those at issue here violate due process. 'However, a case holding that the exact action in question is unlawful is not necessary.'. . After all, prison officials have been on notice since Hewitt that periodic reviews of administrative segregation are constitutionally required, and it is self-evident that they cannot be a sham. Although some appellate courts that have considered this issue have concluded that qualified immunity applied, see, e.g., Toevs, 685 F.3d at 916 ("we cannot conclude that the state of the law from 2005 to 2009 gave defendants fair warning that the [Quality of Life Level Program] review process [for prisoners in administrative segregation] was not meaningful, or that the lack of reviews at QLLP Levels 4 through 6 was a due-process violation"), in the case at hand, the various factual disputes discussed above preclude summary judgment on the basis of qualified immunity. . . .As Isby may be able to convince the trier of fact that defendants-appellees have been deliberately giving him meaningless 'reviews,' without any intention of ever releasing him from the SCU, qualified immunity may not apply.")

Gill v. City of Milwaukee, 850 F.3d 335, 341 (7th Cir. 2017) ("The right 'to be free from coercive interrogation' is highly generalized. Therefore, it cannot be the basis for defeating a qualified immunity defense, unless there is closely analogous precedent that is 'particularized' to the facts of the instant case. . . . Gill has not cited, and we have not identified, any precedent from the Supreme Court or this Circuit that puts the unconstitutionality of the officers' conduct here 'beyond debate.'. . When no such precedent exists, we look outside our Circuit 'to determine whether there was such a clear trend in the case law that we can say with fair assurance that the recognition of the right by a controlling precedent was merely a question of time.'. . Gill relies exclusively on two cases from the Eighth Circuit that he argues clearly establish the contours of the right violated here. See Livers v. Schenk, 700 F.3d 340 (8th Cir. 2012); Wilson v. Lawrence Cty., 260 F.3d 948 (8th Cir. 2001). In both cases, the court denied officers summary judgment after determining that there were questions of fact as to whether the interrogation methods in question violated the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendment rights of a mentally disabled suspect. . . In our view, however, these two cases from another circuit are insufficient to establish a 'clear trend' indicating that recognition of this right as clearly established in this Circuit is 'merely a question of time.'. . . This is particularly true in light of our recent holding in Cairel, where we rejected a closely similar substantive due process claim based on the interrogation of a suspect with a cognitive disability. . . There, the officers interrogated the suspect without a lawyer present, despite the fact that they were 'aware of [the suspect's] disability and knew that he might not have been fully able to understand what was going on.'. .In sum, Gill has failed to demonstrate that his right to be free from the interrogation tactics used here is clearly established. There is no precedent that places the constitutionality of the detectives' actions 'beyond debate.'. . For that reason, Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity on Gill's Fifth and Fourteenth Amendment claims.")

Brown v. Randle, 847 F.3d 861, 863-64 (7th Cir. 2017) ("No matter how the Due Process calculus may come out, Brown insists, he had a right under the Fourth Amendment to release as soon as his prison sentence ended. Yet as of 2009, when he was kept in prison, no court had held that the Fourth Amendment entitles a sex offender to release even though it appears likely that, as soon as he steps outside the prison's front door, he will be in violation of the terms of release. Indeed, no federal court has so held to this day. Under the circumstances, therefore, the defendants are entitled to qualified immunity from damages. And so we concluded with respect to Wisconsin's system of keeping sex offenders in prison until they have a lawful post-prison residence. See Werner v. Wall, 836 F.3d 751 (7th Cir. 2016). In a supplemental brief filed after argument, Brown asks us to put Werner to one side because Illinois and Wisconsin do not use identical systems, and he emphasized the Fourth Amendment while Werner relied principally on the Eighth Amendment. These distinctions are true but beside the point. The core conclusion of Werner is that the federal judiciary has not clearly established that sex offenders who lack a lawful place to live must nonetheless be released from prison. That conclusion does not depend on the particulars of the state systems or the constitutional provision a given plaintiff emphasizes. Brown does not identify any decision of a federal court establishing that sex offenders without approved living arrangements must be released. Instead he states the constitutional rule at a high level of generality (the Fourth Amendment forbids unreasonable seizures) and contends that this suffices. No, it doesn't. As the Justices reiterated earlier this month:

'clearly established law' should not be defined 'at a high level of generality.'. . As this Court explained decades ago, the clearly established law must be 'particularized' to the facts of the case. . . Otherwise, '[p]laintiffs would be able to convert the rule of qualified immunity ... into a rule of virtually unqualified liability simply by alleging violation of extremely abstract rights.'. . [citing White v. Pauly] Federal courts have not particularized the sort of right Brown asserts, so the defendants are entitled to immunity from liability in damages.") Catledge v. City of Chicago, 666 F. App'x 558, ___ (7th Cir. 2016) ("That probable cause was so lacking in this case—at least if the evidence is viewed in the light most favorable to Catledge—also forecloses the defendants' reliance on their defense of qualified immunity. On this question we disagree with the district court. A police officer loses the shield of qualified immunity if the facts, viewed in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, demonstrate that the officer's conduct constituted a violation of a clearly established constitutional right. . . The constitutional right to be free from unreasonable searches, including being free from searches of one's vehicle if the police lack probable cause to conclude that it contains evidence of a crime, has been long established. And on this record a jury readily could conclude that Martin and Kappel, who have yet to offer their version of events, knew that they did not have probable cause to believe that Catledge had engaged in stalking or disorderly conduct. Instead a jury could find that the officers searched Catledge's car knowing full well that he had done nothing more than pretend to be engaged in lawful use of a video camera on a public street. The officers argue that they have qualified immunity because there wasn't yet a clear interpretation of the Illinois disorderly conduct statute. Again, they base this argument on Reher's statement that it was unclear what type of 'other suspicious circumstances' would push 'mere videotaping' over the line into disorderly conduct. . . . But as we just explained, the officers have not identified any suspicious circumstances, so it is irrelevant that ambiguity may exist regarding the kinds of suspicious circumstances that might suggest disorderly conduct. And as we have noted repeatedly, after the Terry investigatory stop, the officers knew that Catledge was not engaged in videotaping at all.")

Williams v. Hansen, 837 F.3d 809, 810-11 (7th Cir. 2016) ("Williams asserted in his deposition and affidavit that he had ordered the death certificate for use in state post-conviction proceedings rather than to save as a trophy of his crime, and the defendants have presented no contrary evidence to support their assumption that Williams wanted a trophy. And the prison could have avoided this controversy in the first place by holding on to the death certificate except for the short time needed to include it (or indeed just a xerox copy of it) in Williams's court filing. The remaining defendants argue however that even if Williams has stated a claim for relief, they are insulated from liability because the right that he asserts was not clearly established when they violated it. Ashcroft v. Al–Kidd, 563 U.S. 731, 735 (2011). Wrong. The right of a prison inmate to read the mail he receives, provided that his reading it would not infringe the prison's legitimate interests, is, as noted above, clearly established.")

Rebirth Christian Academy Daycare, Inc. v. Brizzi, 835 F.3d 742, 746-49 (7th Cir. 2016) ("We. . .begin with the question whether the law clearly established that Rebirth had a property interest in its registration as a child care ministry. We conclude that the answer is yes. This question is not a close one, as the law on this issue has been clearly established for decades. . . . Thus, any reasonable government official would have understood that Rebirth had a property interest in its registration as a child care ministry. . . .Numerous Supreme Court decisions reinforce our conclusion that, because Rebirth was entitled to retain its registration unless it violated state law, Rebirth's ability to operate a registered child care ministry was a clearly protected property right at the time that the defendants revoked its registration. . . .These decisions thus demonstrate that the question whether Rebirth had a protected property interest in its registration was beyond debate. . . . It has long been clearly established that the 'root requirement' of due process is that a person 'be given an opportunity for a hearing before he is deprived of any significant property interest, except for extraordinary situations where some valid governmental interest is at stake that justifies postponing the hearing until after the event.'. . .Rebirth was clearly entitled to a pre-deprivation opportunity to challenge the proposed loss of its registration. We agree with the district judge's assessment—unchallenged by the appellees—'that the interest at stake here, to wit, [Rebirth's] interest in the continued operation of its child care business, is an important one.'. . Moreover, the appellees have not identified any governmental interest that might have arguably justified their failure to provide Rebirth with an opportunity to be heard before depriving it of this significant property interest. The fact that the Bureau did not revoke the registration until two weeks after it gave Rebirth notice of the revocation further undermines any potential argument that the Bureau was responding to some perceived emergency necessitating that it quickly rescind Rebirth's registration without first giving it a chance to challenge the Bureau's allegations. We therefore conclude that, by revoking Rebirth's registration without first providing the organization with an opportunity to be heard, the appellees violated clearly established law and are not entitled to qualified immunity. The appellees argue that the proper inquiry is not whether Rebirth had a clearly established right to be heard before its registration was revoked but whether it had a clearly established right to an administrative appeal of the type available to license holders. We reject this argument. Contrary to the appellees' assertions, this is not a case about 'what amount of process is due.' Rather, this is a case in which due process clearly required some pre-deprivation opportunity to be heard and the appellees provided no opportunity for a hearing, though nothing prevented them from doing so. . . .[A]lthough the appellees are correct that no statutory provision requires an administrative appeal before the revocation of a registration, this does not mean that Brizzi and Gargano are excused from providing Rebirth with due process. True, the statutory scheme did not require that registered child care ministries receive an administrative appeal of the type afforded to license-holders, but neither did it prohibit the appellees from providing registered child care ministries with some type of pre-deprivation hearing. The issue then is whether Rebirth adequately alleged that the appellees personally decided to withhold from Rebirth the pre-deprivation hearing that they could have provided. We conclude that Rebirth's complaint plausibly alleges that Brizzi and Gargano were personally involved in depriving Rebirth of an opportunity for a pre-deprivation hearing, and thus the complaint satisfies the requirements of notice pleading. . . . In sum, we do not decide the type of pre-deprivation hearing that Rebirth was entitled to or that Rebirth shall now recover damages. We conclude only that Rebirth's complaint alleges that the appellees personally violated clearly established law by depriving Rebirth of a property interest (its registration) without first providing Rebirth with any opportunity to be heard. Rebirth will, of course, need more than allegations to prevail on these claims; it will need evidence proving that these defendants were personally involved in the constitutional violation. Given the procedural posture of this case, the district court should, if necessary, provide Rebirth with an opportunity for additional discovery so that it may obtain such evidence.")

Kristofek v. Village of Orland Hills, 832 F.3d 785, 798-99 (7th Cir. 2016) ("We have 'long recognized that an employer may not retaliate against an employee for expressing his views about matters of public concern.'. . . However, we typically conduct qualified-immunity inquiries by focusing on the 'specific context in the case,' rather than on a 'broad general proposition.'. . Nevertheless, 'general statements of the law are not inherently incapable of giving fair and clear warning, and in [certain] instances a general constitutional rule already identified in the decisional law may apply with obvious clarity to the specific conduct in question.'. . As discussed above, Kristofek has adequately demonstrated that Scully terminated him in retaliation for speaking out about potential political corruption involving senior officials within the police department. In addition, it was clearly established at the time of Scully's actions that the First Amendment prohibited retaliating against a public employee because he had spoken with colleagues and with the FBI about public corruption. [citing cases] . . . .So Scully is not entitled to qualified immunity on Kristofek's First Amendment retaliation claim.")

Figgs v. Dawson, 829 F.3d 895, 905-06 (7th Cir. 2016) ("Fishel contends that 'no clearly established constitutional rule established that [she] violated the Eighth Amendment by failing to recalculate Figgs's sentence in response to his concerns or by referring it to' the chief record office. This argument is flawed because it does not address the broader deficiencies with Fishel's chosen course of action, which we have discussed above. The appropriate inquiry here is whether it was clearly established that Fishel's failure to investigate the substance of Figgs's complaints violated his constitutional rights by requiring him to serve more time than his sentence required. . . At the time Figgs presented his complaints, it was clearly established by decisions in closely analogous cases that the failure to investigate a claim that an inmate is being held longer than the lawful term of his sentence violates the Eighth Amendment if it is the result of indifference. . . While, to be clearly established, 'a right must be specific to the relevant factual context of a cited case and not generalized with respect to the Amendment that is the basis of the claim,' the 'very action in question' need not have previously been held unlawful for a public official to have reasonable notice of the illegality of some action. . . Viewing the record in the light most favorable to Figgs, the evidence supports his claim that Fishel's conduct violated his established constitutional right to be free from cruel and unusual punishment. Thus, Fishel is not entitled to qualified immunity.")

Becker v. Elfreich, 821 F.3d 920, 926-30 (7th Cir. 2016) ("[W]e are not holding the 'bite and hold' technique is per se deadly force. . . Rather, whether a 'bite and hold' technique constitutes deadly force 'depends on how [the dog] is trained to behave when confronting a suspect.'. . . [B]ased on the record, we cannot say whether the use of the 'bite and hold' constituted deadly force. But the force was clearly force at the higher end of the spectrum, and the government's intrusion on Becker's rights was thus significant. . . . Reading the facts in the light most favorable to Becker, after his mother told him police were there to arrest him, Becker got dressed and started down the stairs within two minutes with his hands above his head. And just two seconds after he released Axel, Officer Elfreich encountered Becker toward the bottom of the stairs with his hands above his head. At this point, Officer Elfreich should have recognized that Becker was not hiding in the house but was in the process of surrendering. Further, when Officer Elfreich saw Becker on the stairs Becker had his hands in full view over his head and kept his hands there even while being bitten by Axel. Becker did not exhibit any sort of aggressive behavior toward Officer Elfreich or anyone else. . . Nor was Becker actively resisting arrest or attempting to evade arrest by flight. Accordingly, while the initial release of Axel to find Becker may have been justified because the officers believed Becker was concealing himself in the house, once it became clear that Becker was not concealing himself, but was actually near the bottom of the staircase about 30 seconds after Officer Elfreich purportedly told him to come down, the force used by Officer Elfreich was no longer reasonable. . . .Under the facts as a whole, it was unreasonable for Officer Elfreich to pull Becker down three steps and place a knee in his back while allowing Axel to violently bite his leg. . . . Case law makes clear that officers cannot use significant force on a nonresisting or passively resisting suspect. Further, as we have often said, 'a case directly on point is not required for a right to be clearly established and "officials can still be on notice that their conduct violates established law even in novel factual circumstances."' Thus, the relevant case law did not need to involve a police dog in order to clearly establish the principle that you cannot allow a dog to violently attack such a suspect. . . .When Evansville police attempted to arrest Jamie Becker, Officer Elfreich released his police dog under the belief that Becker was hiding in the house. However, two seconds later, Officer Elfreich discovered Becker had been descending the stairs to surrender with his hands above his head. Nonetheless, Officer Elfreich continued to allow the police dog to bite Becker, while pulling him down three steps and placing his knee on his back and handcuffing him. And Becker suffered serious bodily injury as a result of the dog bite. While it is unclear from the record whether Axel presented a substantial risk of serious risk bodily harm (and thus deadly force), the force was clearly at the more severe end of the force spectrum. A jury could reasonably find such force was excessive. Further, because it was clearly established at the time of Becker's arrest that no more than minimal force was permissible to arrest a non-resisting, or passively resisting, suspect, Officer Elfreich was not entitled to qualified immunity on this record.") Alicea v. Thomas, 815 F.3d 283, 290-92 (7th Cir. 2016) ("Applying the Graham factors to Alicea's account, we do not find that Alicea, standing in broad daylight with his hands up at gunpoint and enclosed by a five-foot pool, posed a sufficient threat to Thomas to justify ordering Leo to attack and hold him. The district court erred in holding it was reasonable to command a dog to attack a suspect who had ceased flight, was effectively trapped, and who immediately complied with police orders. . . . We see even less of a basis to grant summary judgment to Officer Alvarez, taking all facts in a light most favorable to Alicea. At the point at which Alvarez first saw Alicea, Alicea's arm was in the jaws of a seventy-two pound dog. Two other officers were already at the scene. A reasonable officer would not think that punching, kicking, and stomping on Alicea was required to control the situation. It is true that Alicea was screaming, but there is no dispute that he was crying for help. . . . Officer Alvarez came upon Alicea when he was already seriously injured. Alicea was agitated, to be sure, but the source of his agitation was clear: he had just been attacked by a dog, and needed medical attention. Alicea testified at his deposition that he was already face-down, on the ground, when Alvarez began to punch, kick and stomp on him. At this point, however loudly Alicea was screaming, under his version of events, he simply did not present a threat that justified kicking, stomping, and punching him. . . . In sum, Alicea's factual account creates a material dispute as to whether Officer Alvarez used excessive force. Lack of medical documentation of his injuries, while potentially relevant to Alicea's credibility, is immaterial to the threshold question of whether Officer Alvarez's use of force was reasonable when the facts are viewed and reasonable inferences are drawn in Alicea's favor. . . . As explained above, we conclude that the evidence, taken in a light most favorable to Alicea, would permit a reasonable jury to find excessive force in violation of the Fourth Amendment. So we turn to the question of whether Thomas's and Alvarez's actions violated clearly established law. . . .At the time of Alicea's arrest, it was clearly established that an officer may not use excessive force against an individual during an arrest. . .It was also clearly established that using a significant level of force on a non-resisting or a passively resisting individual constitutes excessive force. . . Commanding a dog to attack a suspect who is already complying with orders clearly violates the principles set forth in Holmes and Rambo. Punching, stomping and kicking a suspect who is on the ground and seriously injured similarly violates clearly established law. There is a material dispute as to whether Alicea was resisting arrest, both at the moment that Thomas commanded Leo to attack him, and at the moment that Alvarez arrived at the scene of the arrest and removed Alicea from the pool. There is also a material dispute as to the level of force that Alvarez used, described in detail above. . . . It was improper to grant qualified immunity to Thomas and Alvarez prior to a jury determining whether Alicea was, as he contends, fully complying with orders before the defendants used force to arrest him.")

Gustafson v. Adkins, 803 F.3d 883, 892 (7th Cir. 2015)("[T]he Supreme Court and this Circuit had clearly established the right of employees to be free from unreasonable employer searches by the time Adkins installed the hidden surveillance equipment in 2007. Adkins also claims that Gustafson failed to satisfy her burden of setting forth 'existing precedent [that] placed the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate.'. . However, a broad constitutional test, such as the O'Connor plurality's reasonableness test, is sufficient to clearly establish the law 'in an obvious case ... even without a body of relevant case law.'. . Because this is an obvious case that presents a flagrant Fourth Amendment violation, identification of a body of relevant case law is unnecessary. In sum, we find that O'Connor clearly established the contours of the Fourth Amendment violation Gustafson alleges. Therefore, the district court properly denied Adkins's motion for summary judgment on the basis of qualified immunity.")

Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 801 F.3d 828, 831-33 (7th Cir. 2015) (on remand) ("The defendants next suggest that they should be able to avoid retrial because they are entitled to qualified immunity. Their argument is a nuanced one. In their view, the decision of the Supreme Court, resolving a circuit split in its decision in this case, altered the substantive law of liability. Because there was a division among the circuits on the state of the law at the time that they acted, they contend that they cannot be held liable for their actions. Although the matter of qualified immunity was brought to the attention of the Court, its instructions to us make no mention of our returning to this issue. In any event, we do not believe that this defense is a viable one here. . . .[I]n this case, the scope of the right in issue must be drawn more narrowly than the right of a pretrial detainee to be free from excessive force during his detention; instead, we must examine whether the law clearly established that the use of a Taser on a non-resisting detainee, lying prone and handcuffed behind his back, was constitutionally excessive. Here, the facts surrounding the underlying incident are in sharp dispute. When those facts are construed in the light most favorable to Mr. Kingsley, see Saucier v. Katz, 533 U.S. 194, 201 (2001), a reasonable officer was certainly on notice at the time of the occurrence that Mr. Kingsley's conduct did not justify the sort of force described in his account. According to Mr. Kingsley, he was not resisting the officers in a manner that justified slamming his head into the wall, using a Taser while he was manacled, and leaving him alone after use of that instrument. Our precedent makes clear that when the officers applied the Taser to Mr. Kingsley in May 2010, use of the Taser violated Mr. Kingsley's right to be free from excessive force if he was not resisting. . . If we were to accept the defendants' argument here, we would untether the qualified immunity defense from its moorings of protecting those acting in reliance on a standard that is later determined to be infirm. Here, before and after the Supreme Court's decision in this case, the standards for the amount of force that can be permissibly employed remain the same. To accept the defense of qualified immunity here, we would have to accept the dubious proposition that, at the time the officers acted, they were on notice only that they could not have a reckless or malicious intent and that, as long as they acted without such an intent, they could apply any degree of force they chose. As we have noted, however, the law clearly established that the amount of force had to be reasonable in light of the legitimate objectives of the institution. Accordingly, the judgment of the district court is reversed, and the case is remanded for further proceedings in accordance with this opinion.")

Gevas v. McLaughlin, 798 F.3d 475, 485 (7th Cir. 2015) ("On the record before us, construed in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, the defendants were aware that Gevas was in danger of being harmed by Adkins, who was threatening to stab him, and yet did nothing to address that danger other than having previously made him aware that he had the option to refuse housing, be ticketed in response, and have himself transferred into disciplinary segregation. Expecting a prisoner to defy an order in pursuit of his own safety runs counter to the essential nature of incarceration as well as to cases emphasizing the need for order and discipline in the prison environment. . . . A prison official could not logically believe, in view of the duty imposed on him by the Eighth Amendment, Farmer, and other deliberate indifference cases, that requiring a prisoner to violate a prison directive (including his cell assignment) is a reasonable response to a substantial risk of the prisoner's cellmate attacking him. And the defendants may not now find refuge in the doctrine of qualified immunity simply because no case had previously rejected the specific defense that they have creatively fashioned, when the logic (or illogic) of that defense is so at odds with the respective duties that existing case law imposed on prisoner and prison official.").

Davis v. Wessel, 792 F.3d 793, 803-05 (7th Cir. 2015) ("Wessel and Lay contend that they are entitled to judgment as a matter of law on the basis of qualified immunity. . . Wessel and Lay contend that the intent requirement for a substantive due process claim was unsettled at the time of the restroom incident. They argue that a reasonable official could have believed at the time that the Eighth Amendment's 'malicious and sadistic' excessive-force standard applied to a due process claim such as that asserted by Davis. . . They assert that '[t]here was insufficient evidence for a reasonable jury to infer that Wessel and Lay acted with the requisite subjective intent.'. . In making this determination, we must view the evidence in the light most favorable to Davis. . . Viewing the evidence in that light, a reasonable jury could have found that Wessel and Lay knew that Davis could not effectively use the restroom while wearing the hand restraints; they refused to remove the hand restraints despite knowing that Davis was old, frail, and not a security risk while in the windowless restroom; and they laughed at Davis as he urinated on himself and then refused to allow him to clean himself. . . Taken together, these findings allowed the jury to conclude that Wessel and Lay refused to remove Davis's hand restraints for the purpose of humiliating and causing psychological pain to Davis, and not for any legitimate security reason. At the time of the incident at issue, it was clearly established that the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment prohibited the unreasonable use of bodily restraints in a manner that serves to punish a civilly committed individual. . . . The evidence viewed in the light most favorable to Davis demonstrates that Wessel and Lay violated the clearly established law governing substantive due process claims for excessive use of restraints. Even under the Eighth Amendment standard advocated by Wessel and Lay, the evidence viewed in the light most favorable to Davis demonstrates that Wessel and Lay violated clearly established law by refusing to remove Davis's hand restraints for the purpose of humiliating and ridiculing Davis.")

Armstrong v. Daily, 786 F.3d 529, 532-33, 556-57 (7th Cir. 2015) ("[A]t the time of the original investigation, it was clearly established under Killian v. United States, 368 U.S. 231, 82 S.Ct. 302, 7 L.Ed.2d 256 (1961), and then Brady v. Maryland, 373 U.S. 83, 83 S.Ct. 1194, 10 L.Ed.2d 215 (1963), that bad-faith destruction or loss of exculpatory evidence would violate a suspect's due process rights. Brady made clear that the police and prosecution could not suppress exculpatory evidence. A reasonable police officer or prosecutor would not have concluded that he could instead destroy evidence to avoid disclosing it to the defense. . . . [W]hile there is some disagreement among courts about the conditions for obtaining a civil remedy for destruction of exculpatory evidence, those disagreements do not support a qualified immunity defense. It was clearly established in 2006 that the defendants' alleged conduct of destroying the evidence would violate defendant's due process rights. That is sufficient to defeat the qualified immunity defense. . . .Defendants argue that reasonable officials would not be aware that they violated a constitutional right in these circumstances—destroying evidence that would or could exculpate a criminal defendant detained in preparation for retrial. This argument is built on a basic misunderstanding about qualified immunity. The issue is not whether issues concerning the availability of a remedy are settled. The qualified immunity defense focuses instead on whether the official defendant's conduct violated a clearly established constitutional right. . . . This point is consistent with the way the Supreme Court has repeatedly described the defense of qualified immunity, in terms of whether the defendant official's 'actions' or 'conduct' violated clearly established law, not in terms of whether a defendant should have realized he would be held civilly liable for his actions or conduct. . . . Debate about the need for a trial or conviction goes to the question of injury, which is essential to proving liability but not relevant to qualified immunity. Focusing on the defendants' conduct—destroying a semen stain that had previously tested negative for Armstrong's DNA—it is clear that they had fair warning that this exculpatory evidence had to be preserved. Their alleged actions were objectively unreasonable in defying that command. The fact that their actions were so egregious as to cause dismissal of the charges before a retrial does not protect them from liability for injuries they caused. The district court correctly denied their motion to dismiss on the ground of qualified immunity.")

Doe v. Vill. of Arlington Heights, 782 F.3d 911, 916 (7th Cir. 2015) ("Even though dismissal under Rule 12(b)(6) on qualified immunity grounds may be inappropriate in many cases, . . . in some cases it is proper; indeed, we have reversed the denial of qualified immunity at the pleading stage where appropriate, see, e.g., Chasensky v. Walker, 740 F.3d 1088, 1095–97 (7th Cir.2014) (holding that the plaintiff failed to establish a clearly established right and the district court erred in denying the defendants' motion to dismiss on qualified immunity grounds); Steidl v. Fermon, 494 F.3d 623, 633 (7th Cir.2007) (reversing denial of motion to dismiss plaintiff's access-to-the-courts claim because officials were entitled to qualified immunity). The district court correctly determined that it was not clearly established that calling off another police officer or falsely reporting to dispatch that the scene was clear violates a constitutional right of a victim of private violence. Doe has not shown that it was clearly established that any other conduct or inaction of Del Boccio violated a constitutional right. Even assuming that the complaint alleges that Del Boccio violated Doe's constitutional right, the law was not clearly established such that he should have known he was violating her rights. Therefore, Del Boccio is entitled to qualified immunity and Count IV against him was properly dismissed.")

Beaman v. Freesmeyer, 776 F.3d 500, 509-10 (7th Cir. 2015) ("Beaman argues that Brady 'has been on the books since 1963 and easily qualifies as clearly established law.'. . The withholding of materially exculpatory evidence violates the Due Process Clause. . . He contends that the novelty of the factual circumstance cannot excuse the Brady violation where it is well-established that investigators who withhold exculpatory evidence violate the defendant's constitutional due process right. While it is true that the idea that police officers must turn over materially exculpatory evidence has been on the books since 1963, it certainly has not been on the books since 1963 that polygraph reports are materially exculpatory evidence. That is because in most states, polygraph reports are inadmissible at trial. . .And a few months after Beaman's trial concluded, the Supreme Court decided Wood v. Bartholomew, 516 U.S. 1, 116 S.Ct. 7, 133 L.Ed.2d 1 (1995). In Wood, the Court held that because polygraph results were not admissible at trial, the state's failure to disclose the fact that a witness failed a polygraph test did not deprive a defendant of 'material' evidence under Brady, absent a reasonable likelihood that disclosure of the polygraph test could have had a direct effect on the outcome of the trial. . . .Even if the relevant inquiry was what the Illinois Supreme Court decided, that court's determination in 2008 that the polygraph test could have affected the trial does not answer the question of whether, in 1995, it was clearly established that the officers needed to turn over inadmissible polygraph reports. . . Beaman points to no cases pre–1995 where the Illinois Supreme Court, or any Illinois court for that matter, found that inadmissible polygraph tests, or any other type of inadmissible evidence, could constitute Brady material. Without such a case, it cannot be said that it was clearly established in 1995 that inadmissible polygraph reports were Brady material in Illinois. . . Beaman also argues that it was clearly established in 1995 that evidence inculpating another suspect was Brady material. While that is true as a general matter, Beaman forms the question too broadly. In its broadest form, the relevant inquiry is whether inadmissible information inculpating another suspect could be Brady material. Again, Beaman points to no pre–1995 case from Illinois or the Supreme Court, and we are unable to find one, establishing that inadmissible evidence inculpating another suspect (to frame it broadly) or polygraph tests (to frame it narrowly) is Brady material. During the relevant time period, it was not clearly established that the results of a polygraph test, inadmissible at trial, constituted Brady material. Arguably, it was not until Wood—decided three months after Beaman's trial concluded—that it became clearly established that inadmissible polygraph tests stood any chance of ever being Brady material. The question of whether and when inadmissible evidence can be Brady material remains an open question in many jurisdictions today. . . Therefore we find that the defendants are entitled to qualified immunity for their failure to turn over the Murray polygraph report to the prosecution and Beaman's defense counsel.")

O'Keefe v. Chisholm, 769 F.3d 936, 942 (7th Cir. 2014) ("Plaintiffs' claim to constitutional protection for raising funds to engage in issue advocacy coordinated with a politician's campaign committee has not been established 'beyond debate.' To the contrary, there is a lively debate among judges and academic analysts. The Supreme Court regularly decides campaign-finance issues by closely divided votes. No opinion issued by the Supreme Court, or by any court of appeals, establishes ("clearly" or otherwise) that the First Amendment forbids regulation of coordination between campaign committees and issue-advocacy groups—let alone that the First Amendment forbids even an inquiry into that topic. The district court broke new ground. Its views may be vindicated, but until that day public officials enjoy the benefit of qualified immunity from liability in damages. This makes it unnecessary for us to consider whether any defendant also enjoys the benefit of absolute prosecutorial immunity, which depends on the capacities in which they may have acted at different times.")

Seiser v. City of Chicago, 762 F.3d 647, 658 (7th Cir. 2014) ("At the point that the breathalyzer test was administered to Seiser, a reasonable police official would have believed in light of Carey and like cases that so long as there was probable cause to justify a breathalyzer examination, there was no need to consider seeking a warrant first. By the time Seiser was being processed at the Ninth District, nearly two and one-half hours had transpired since he was seen drinking from the liquor bottle, and an attempt to obtain a warrant, through whatever means, would have portended at least some further delay. Carey suggested that dispensing with a warrant application was a sound course. And as the McNeely decision recognizes, there was a prior division of authority among courts on this very point. . . Conflicting precedents present the very sort of uncertainty as to what the law requires that entitles a public official to qualified immunity.")

Volkman v. Ryker, 736 F.3d 1084, 1090, 1091 (7th Cir. 2013) ("The qualified immunity analysis . . . traditionally involves a two-part inquiry. The first question is whether the defendants' conduct violated a constitutional right. . .The second question is whether that particular constitutional right was 'clearly established' at the time of the alleged violation. . .We may consider the two questions in either order. . . In this case, we begin by asking whether the right alleged to be violated is 'clearly established.'. . .The cases Volkman has put forward demonstrate little more than that the First Amendment right against retaliation, writ large, is clearly established. But this is not so easy a case that citing to a general proposition of law is enough to show that any reasonable official would have known that to restrict or punish Volkman's speech was unconstitutional. . . There are fact-intensive considerations at play, including whether Volkman spoke as a private citizen or in his capacity as a public employee, whether he spoke on a matter of public concern, and whether IDOC had an adequate justification for treating Volkman differently from any other member of the general public. . . The defendants highlighted the weakness of Volkman's effort to show that his rights were clearly established in their response brief, but he did nothing to buttress his position in his reply. As a result, we need not say at exactly what level of specificity Volkman was required to show that his rights were clearly established on these facts; it is enough to note that what he has done is plainly not enough.")

Hardaway v. Meyerhoff, 734 F.3d 740, 745 (7th Cir. 2013) ("As Hardaway admits in his appeal, 'there is ambiguity among various Seventh Circuit cases regarding the proper baseline against which to measure conditions of disciplinary confinement.' Although the district court would benefit from a bright-line rule on the types of conditions and duration of segregation give rise to a prisoner's liberty interest, no such guidance has yet to be specifically addressed by this Court. Hence, even if Hardaway's segregation amounted to the violation of a liberty interest, the Defendants should not be held responsible for incorrectly guessing otherwise due to the ambiguity of the parameters of the law. In sum, the right to avoid disciplinary segregation in a cell with a solid metal door and a confrontational cell mate for 182 days with weekly access to the shower and recreational yard was not a clearly established right in September 2009 when the conduct occurred. Therefore, the Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity.")

Hobgood v. Illinois Gaming Bd., 731 F.3d 635, 648 (7th Cir. 2013) ("First, as we have described, the facts make out a violation of Hobgood's right to be free from retaliation for exercising his First Amendment rights. Second, it was clearly established at the time of the Gaming Board's actions that the First Amendment prohibited investigating and then suspending and terminating a public employee because he had helped another employee pursue a lawsuit aimed at uncovering and proving public corruption.")

Currie v. Chhabra, 728 F.3d 626, 628-32 (7th Cir. 2013) ("Currie filed her initial complaint on October 14, 2009, naming as defendants various jail officials, Williamson County, Chhabra and Reynolds, and Health Professionals, Ltd. The initial iterations of her complaint alleged that the defendants acted with 'deliberate indifference' to Okoro's medical needs, suggesting a claim that the defendants violated Okoro's due process rights under the Fourteenth Amendment. . . At the close of discovery, however, in response to the defendants' motion for summary judgment, Currie argued for the first time that the Fourth Amendment's 'objectively unreasonable' standard should govern. . . . Upon receipt of Currie's revised complaint alleging 'objectively unreasonable' conduct, Chhabra, Reynolds, and Health Professionals filed a motion to dismiss, asserting qualified immunity 'because the Fourth Amendment has not been applied to licensed medical professional[s] subcontracted to care for state detainees.' The court denied this motion. Only Chhabra and Reynolds are before us on appeal. . . . The defendants' real argument is that the Fourth Amendment never governs constitutional claims alleging inadequate provision of medical care to an arrestee by a nurse or doctor, regardless of the defendant's employment arrangement. Although the Supreme Court has provided relatively little guidance regarding the constitutional rights of arrestees and pretrial detainees, . . . this court's cases foreclose the defendants' argument. [discussing cases] The defendants attempt to distinguish Ortiz, Williams, and Sides as cases involving the objectively unreasonable denial of medical care by jailers, not the objectively unreasonable provision of medical care by doctors and nurses. A jailer might violate an arrestee's Fourth Amendment rights by unreasonably denying the arrestee access to insulin, the defendants urge, but a health care professional who unreasonably withholds insulin does not. This argument lacks support in law or logic. . . . True, the named defendants in our earlier Fourth Amendment medical-care cases were 'lockup keepers' (Ortiz and William) and police detectives (Lopez), but from the perspective of the arrestee, it matters not a whit whether it is the jailer or the doctor whose conduct deprives him of life-saving medical care. This is why our Fourth Amendment cases speak broadly of claims involving the 'provision of medical care,'. . . not simply the 'denial of medical care by a jailer' (as the defendants would have it). . . . The defendants next argue that even if their conduct violated Okoro's Fourth Amendment rights, qualified immunity is proper because no previous decision 'applied the Fourth Amendment to analyze the reasonableness of health care provided by contracted medical professionals to arrestees being held by the police in jail.' If there is any lack of clarity in our previous cases, however, it is only with respect to the threshold issue whether the defense of qualified immunity is ever available to private medical care providers like the defendants. . . .The Supreme Court recently considered the question whether 'an individual hired by the government to do its work is prohibited from seeking [absolute or qualified] immunity, solely because he works for the government on something other than a permanent or full-time basis.'. . It held that 'immunity under § 1983 should not vary depending on whether an individual working for the government does so as a full-time employee, or on some other basis.'. . On the other hand, the Filarsky Court reaffirmed the holding of Richardson categorically rejecting immunity for the private prison employees there; in so doing, the Court emphasized that the incentives of the private market suffice to protect employees when 'a private firm, systematically organized to assume a major lengthy administrative task ... for profit and potentially in competition with other firms,' assumes responsibility for managing an institution. . . In a detailed opinion tracking the Court's analysis in Filarsky, the Sixth Circuit recently held that a doctor providing psychiatric services to inmates at a state prison is not entitled to assert qualified immunity. McCullum v. Tepe, 693 F.3d 696 (6th Cir.2012) (discussing the historical roots of immunity for similarly situated parties and the history and purpose of § 1983); see also Hasher v. Hayman, 2013 WL 1288205 (D.N.J. Mar. 27, 2013) (private medical employees failed to establish that they are entitled to assert a qualified immunity defense, 'even after Filarsky'). We find the Sixth Circuit's reasoning persuasive, though we need not definitively decide the issue today; even if our defendants were entitled to seek qualified immunity as a general matter, we would conclude that the defense is not applicable here. The contours of Okoro's Fourth Amendment rights were 'sufficiently clear that a reasonable official would understand that what he is doing violates that right' throughout the period of Okoro's detention. . . . As we already have explained, nothing in our opinions hints at some special Fourth Amendment exemption for health care professionals . . . . It was 'quite clear' in 2004, we said, 'that the Fourth Amendment protects a person's rights until she has had a probable cause hearing.'. . It was no less clear in December 2008, when Okoro collapsed in his cell, that the same Fourth Amendment standard applies to the wrongdoing alleged here.") Chrzanowski v. Bianchi, 725 F.3d 734, 742, 743 (7th Cir. 2013) ("Given our rationale in the Fairley line of cases, we have little trouble concluding that reasonable officials in the defendants' shoes would understand that retaliating against Chrzanowski for giving truthful grand jury and trial testimony would violate the First Amendment. . . . Defendants point out that Morales involved testimony in the civil context, whereas this case involves testimony in criminal proceedings, but this is a distinction without a difference: providing eyewitness testimony regarding potential wrongdoing, civil or criminal, was never 'part of what [Chrzanowski] was employed to do.' Chrzanowski's rights were clearly established at all relevant times.")

Humphries v. Milwaukee County, 702 F.3d 1003, 1004, 1007 (7th Cir. 2012) ("Although Humphries maintains that the denial of her application violated her right to due process, we agree with Muniz and his supervisor that qualified immunity protects them from any liability for this decision. They had no involvement whatsoever in the investigation or determination of the 1988 finding of substantiated abuse, and no case law clearly establishes that they violated Humphries's constitutional rights when they relied on that finding to deny her child care provider renewal application. Therefore, we affirm the district court's grant of summary judgment to Muniz and his supervisor on the basis of qualified immunity. . . . None of the case law to which Humphries points holds that persons without a role in the abuse determination may not later rely on such a determination without first independently ensuring the determination was made in accordance with due process.")

Betker v. Gomez, 692 F.3d 854, 864 (7th Cir. 2012) ("The question is whether, at the time of the violation in this case, a 'reasonably well-trained police officer would have known that the arrest was illegal.'. . In 1985, we held in Olson that immunity does not extend '[w]here the judicial finding of probable cause is based solely on information the officer knew to be false or would have known was false had he not recklessly disregarded the truth.'. . In 1992, in Juriss v. McGowan, we stripped an officer of qualified immunity where only his false and misleading statements provided probable cause to arrest a woman for aiding a fugitive. . . We reiterated this point in Knox, 342 F.3d at 658 ('We have held in previous cases that a warrant request violates the Fourth Amendment if the requesting officer knowingly, intentionally, or with reckless disregard for the truth, makes false statements in requesting the warrant and the false statements were necessary to the determination that a warrant should issue.'). And this principle has been firmly established in the criminal context since the Supreme Court decided Franks v. Delaware, 438 U.S. 154 (1978). . . . In the civil context, the plaintiff need only 'point to a closely analogous case decided prior to the challenged conduct in order to defeat qualified immunity.'. . We think there are plenty. So Officer Gomez is not entitled to qualified immunity as a matter of law.")

Levin v. Madigan, 692 F.3d 607, 622 (7th Cir. 2012), cert. dismissed as improvidently granted by Madigan v. Levin, 134 S. Ct. 2 (2013) ("Because the ADEA does not preclude Levin's § 1983 equal protection claim, we now turn to the issue of qualified immunity. . . . At the time of the alleged wrongdoing, it was clearly established that age discrimination in employment violates the Equal Protection Clause. . . Although age is not a suspect classification, states may not discriminate on that basis if such discrimination is not 'rationally related to a legitimate state interest.'. . Whether or not the ADEA is the exclusive remedy for plaintiffs suffering age discrimination in employment is irrelevant, and as Judge Chang noted, it is 'odd to apply qualified immunity in the context where the procedural uncertainty arises from the fact that Congress created a statutory remedy for age discrimination that is substantively broader than the equal protection clause.'. . Because Levin's constitutional right was clearly established, the Individual Defendants are not entitled to qualified immunity.") Estate of Miller, ex rel. Bertram v. Tobiasz, 680 F.3d 984, 991 (7th Cir. 2012) ("Having established that plaintiff has alleged facts that, if proven, show the defendants violated a constitutional right, we must evaluate whether they would be entitled to qualified immunity under the second prong of the qualified immunity analysis; that the constitutional right must be clearly established. The defendants urge this Court to apply a very high threshold for this prong. They argue for an examination of this prong in such a specific manner that virtually nothing besides intentionally harmful actions could be 'clearly established.' Under defendants' analysis, for a right to be clearly established there must be precedent holding that a prisoner has a constitutional right specific to the conduct alleged. However, the cases in this circuit have understood the term 'right' in a broader sense. For example, in Cavalieri v. Shepard, we stated that the right that Cavalieri was asserting is 'the right to be free from deliberate indifference to suicide.' 321 F.3d 616, 623 (7th Cir.2003) (citing Hall v. Ryan, 957 F.2d 402, 406 (7th Cir.1992). Here, plaintiff asserts the same right. We therefore conclude that that right was clearly established in 2009 as it was in 1998.")

Grayson v. Schuler, 666 F.3d 450, 451, 455 (7th Cir. 2012) ("Inmates' complaints that prison authorities have infringed their religious rights commonly include a claim under the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act, 42 U.S.C. §§ 2000cc et seq., which confers greater religious rights on prisoners than the free exercise clause has been interpreted to do. . . The plaintiff doesn't mention the Act, but he is proceeding pro se and in such cases we interpret the free exercise claim to include the statutory claim. . . But the Act can no longer do him any good. Although his complaint is none too clear, he appears to be seeking damages against the defendant in both the latter's official capacity and his personal capacity, and the former claim is barred by the state's sovereign immunity, Sossamon v. Texas, 131 S.Ct. 1651, 1658–61 (2011); Vinning–El v. Evans, 657 F.3d 591, 592 (7th Cir.2011), and the latter claim cannot be based on the Act because the Act does not create a cause of action against state employees in their personal capacity. . . It does authorize injunctive relief, which the plaintiff initially sought along with damages, but he's since been released from prison, so his injunctive claim is moot and he is left with his personal-capacity damages claim under section 1983. . . . Since, however, '[qualified] immunity protects public employees who make reasonable errors in applying even clearly established law,' Vinning–El v. Evans, supra, 657 F.3d at 594, the defendant is entitled to immunity if he committed a reasonable error in failing to apply clearly established law—that is, if he reasonably thought the plaintiff insincere in his religious belief, or a security threat. But there is no suggestion that the defendant ordered the plaintiff's dreadlocks shorn because of a reasonable belief in either of these possibilities. He seems just to have been applying the Rastafarian exception, which could not reasonably be thought constitutional. So neither on substantive nor immunity grounds can the grant of summary judgment be upheld. The judgment is reversed and the case remanded for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.")

Surita v. Hyde, 665 F.3d 860, 873, 874 (7th Cir. 2011) ("Here, Hyde's purpose in silencing Surita is apparent from his words at the city council meeting: he demanded that Surita apologize to Figueroa before he would be allowed to speak. A reasonable person in January 2004 would have known that silencing Surita for that purpose was constitutionally impermissible. Thus, the denial of qualified immunity on this theory is affirmed. . . . Recently, in Greene v. Doruff, 660 F.3d 975 (7th Cir.2011), we addressed the tension in our cases between motivating-factor causation and but-for causation, clarifying that First Amendment cases are governed not by Gross but by Mt. Healthy City School District Board of Education v. Doyle, 429 U.S. 274 (1977). Greene, 660 F.3d at 977. We noted that Spiegla and Fairley are correct to an extent because the burden of proof relating to causation is divided between the parties in First Amendment cases. . . To meet the prima facie burden regarding causation in a First Amendment case, a plaintiff needs to show only that the defendant's conduct was a motivating factor, i.e., a 'sufficient factor,' meaning when something present makes something else bound to happen. . . The defendant can then rebut that showing, but only by establishing that his or her conduct was not a but-for or 'necessary condition' of the harm, i.e., that the harm would have occurred anyway. . . .Thus, Judge Shadur was not wrong in referencing a burden-shifting test that included a plaintiff's burden to show a motivating factor. Moreover, at the summary judgment stage the burden-shifting test is used to determine whether a plaintiff makes it to trial. Even as we stated in Fairley, if evidence exists upon which a reasonable jury could find but-for causation, no more is necessary to overcome a defendant's summary judgment motion. Here, viewing the facts in Surita's favor, his speech at the Belvidere Mall was protected. Hyde argues that he was not motivated to suppress Surita's point of view but only the threatening manner in which Surita's view was delivered. However, Hyde's comments during the city council meeting indicate that Surita was silenced to induce him to apologize for the Belvidere Mall speech; by Hyde's own words, excluding Surita from speaking was a reaction to what Surita said at the Belvidere Mall. Thus, Hyde's comments at the meeting provide evidence that the Belvidere Mall speech was the cause (whether motivating or but-for) that prevented Surita from expressing his views at the city council meeting. Even before January 2004 an official's act taken in retaliation for the exercise of free speech under the First Amendment was recognized to violate the Constitution. Vukadinovich and Abrams, decided in 2002, made clear that Hyde could not retaliate against someone for protected First Amendment speech, whether acting pursuant to a but-for motive or a substantially motivating one. Hence, a reasonable official in January 2004 would have known he could not retaliate.")

Hernandez ex rel. Hernandez v. Foster, 657 F.3d 463, 486, 487 (7th Cir. 2011) ("At the time of Jaymz's removal, our case law did not put a reasonable DCFS investigator, supervisor, or manager on notice that removing Jaymz without a pre-deprivation hearing violated the plaintiffs' clearly established procedural due process rights. Jensen had indicated that the removal was lawful as long as there was probable cause to believe that Jaymz would be subject to the danger of abuse if not removed, and a post-deprivation hearing was held within two business days. We have concluded that a reasonable DCFS worker could have believed there was probable cause to remove Jaymz. . . . . [T]he defendants are entitled to qualified immunity on the due process claim arising from Jaymz's initial removal. But the process due with respect to the allegedly coerced safety plan is another matter. Due process 'requires that government officials not misrepresent the facts in order to obtain the removal of a child from his parents.'. . This conclusion applies equally in the context of obtaining parental consent to a restrictive safety plan. Under Dupuy, the state may not threaten to infringe parental custody rights when the state has no legal right to carry through on the threat. . . If Foster misrepresented the facts and Crystelle's and Joshua's legal rights in order to obtain their consent to the safety plan, their agreement to the safety plan was not voluntary and they were illegally coerced into signing the plan. Hence, they would have been denied due process. . . The plaintiffs have created a triable issue as to whether a reasonable parent in their situation would have felt free to refuse to sign the safety plan. Therefore, they have enough evidence to raise a genuine issue as to whether they were coerced into agreeing to the safety plan.")

Ortiz v. City of Chicago, 656 F.3d 523, 538, 539 (7th Cir. 2011) ("In light of our decision to reverse the grant of summary judgment in favor of the seven defendants mentioned above, we must address the defendants' qualified immunity defense. They argue that the uncertainty over whether the 'deliberate indifference' or 'objectively unreasonable' standard governs the medical care claim entitles them to qualified immunity. They argue that until 2007, when we decided Williams v. Rodriguez, 509 F.3d 392 (7th Cir. 2007), and Sides v. City of Champaign, 496 F.3d 820 (7th Cir. 2007), no decision had applied the Fourth Amendment to analyze the reasonableness of the provision of medical care to arrestees. While that may be true, we have long held that the Fourth Amendment protects a person's rights until she has had a probable cause hearing. . . The multifactor test announced in Sides and clarified in Williams was unannounced at the time of Molina's death, yet it was quite clear that the Fourth Amendment applied to her stage of the criminal process. But even if we were to assume that the standard we have applied in this case was not clearly established at the time Molina died, the outcome of this case would be unaffected. To survive summary judgment, Ortiz would then be required to satisfy the more stringent deliberate indifference standard. This, however, is not a case that turns on the difference between the two standards. Ortiz's argument, if credited by a jury, satisfies the deliberate indifference standard because she argues that defendants were subjectively aware that Molina had a serious medical condition that needed care and they failed to respond adequately. . . The defendants do not argue that Molina did not suffer from an objectively serious medical condition. The question is only whether the officers' failure to act was not only negligent, but deliberately indifferent. Yet it is well settled that providing no medical care in the face of a serious health risk constitutes deliberate indifference. . . This is not a case where prison officials provided substandard medical care and we must decide whether they crossed the line from medical malpractice (negligence) to deliberate indifference (recklessness). Ortiz's claim is that each of the defendants knew that Molina suffered from a serious medical condition, yet they failed to take any step in response. At this stage, she has done enough to defeat summary judgment even if the higher standard applied. We therefore conclude that the defendants are not entitled to qualified immunity on this claim.")

Ammons v. Washington Dept. of Social and Health Services, 648 F.3d 1020, 1026-34 (9th Cir. 2011) ("Courts are given the discretion to decide 'which of the two prongs of the qualified immunity analysis should be addressed first in light of the circumstances in the particular case at hand.'. . Here, it is difficult to assess whether the facts alleged by Ammons establish the alleged constitutional violation without setting forth the governing law. Therefore, we first examine the clearly established law with respect to the alleged Fourteenth Amendment violation, and then determine whether the facts before us support such a violation. . . .[A]t the time the events alleged in this case took place, it was clearly established that LaFond and Webster, as state officials, had a duty to exercise professional judgment to provide safe conditions for Ammons and the other patients at CSTC. . . .In light of the clearly established law that hospital officials must provide safe conditions for involuntarily committed patients, we now examine the circumstances under which state hospital officials may be held responsible for failing to do so. . . . Youngberg and Neely serve as pre-existing, clearly established law as to what conduct supports infringement of the Fourteenth Amendment rights of involuntarily committed hospital patients. At the time of the alleged events, then, it was clear that the actions of LaFond and Webster violated the Constitution if they ran afoul of the objective Youngberg professional judgment standard as applied in Neely. . . . Under Neely, a jury could find that a reasonable administrator, exercising professional judgment with respect to providing safe conditions, would have taken Resident A's allegation into account when assigning and supervising staff members in cottages where female patients resided. While LaFond had no cause to discipline Grant, because he had been exonerated of the molestation charge, she certainly had reason, in light of her duties with respect to the safety of her patients, to manage and monitor his duties more carefully. Instead, LaFond allowed Grant to gain unfettered and unmonitored access to the female residents, and to spend time with them on a one-on-one basis. . . . We hold that, under the facts alleged and produced, LaFond's apparent inaction and poor supervision with respect to the safety of Ammons and the other female patients support a finding that she failed to exercise professional judgment, and thereby violated the Fourteenth Amendment."[footnotes omitted])

Florek v. Village of Mundelein, Ill., 649 F.3d 594, 601(7th Cir. 2011) ("Florek points to no case where a court has held that police acted unreasonably when they summoned emergency medical personnel instead of supplying non-prescription medication to an arrestee, nor has she pointed to other authority that might help her in making the argument. We located no helpful authority on her behalf, and a straightforward application of our precedent militates against her position. Thus, summary judgment on the merits was appropriate as to Hansen, and that means that judgment for the Village was proper as well.")

Vodak v. City of Chicago, 639 F.3d 738, 746, 747 (7th Cir. 2011) ("The underlying problem is the basic idiocy of a permit system that does not allow a permit for a march to be granted if the date of the march can't be fixed in advance, but does allow the police to waive the permit requirement just by not prohibiting the demonstration. . . The defendants' lawyer at oral argument was unable to come up with a reason for such a rule. As a result not of the rule itself but of the failure to plug the hole in it, the police did not know what the route of the march would be and, reacting ad hoc and perhaps in some panic, resorted to mass arrests without justification. Or so at least a trier of fact could find on the record compiled to date. The district judge ruled that it was not clearly established law on March 20, 2003, that police cannot upon revocation of a permit arrest any demonstrator who does not immediately cease demonstrating and leave the scene. If this is right, then the judge's ruling that the police are protected by the doctrine of qualified immunity from liability in damages to any demonstrator or suspected demonstrator who was arrested is also right. But the premise is wrong. The Supreme Court had held decades earlier that police must give notice of revocation of permission to demonstrate before they can begin arresting demonstrators. . .No precedent should be necessary, moreover, to establish that the Fourth Amendment does not permit the police to say to a person go ahead and march and then, five minutes later, having revoked the permission for the march without notice to anyone, arrest the person for having marched without police permission. . . . So this is one of those cases in which a defense of immunity would fail even in the absence of a precedent that had established the illegality of the defendants' conduct. . .The absence of a reported case with similar facts may demonstrate nothing more than widespread compliance with well-recognized constitutional principles.")

Roe v. Elyea, 631 F.3d 843, 859, 861 (7th Cir. 2011) ("Dr. Elyea inaugurated a protocol for hepatitis C treatment that categorically required that all candidates for antiviral therapy–despite their particular genotype–have at least two years left on their sentence. This categorical rule, the plaintiffs submit, deprived them of necessary treatment that would have been effective. This rule was grounded, they further contend, in consideration of administrative convenience rather than medical effectiveness. . . . The evidence permitted, although it did not compel, the jury to conclude that Dr. Elyea's policy prevented treating physicians from exercising any professional judgment as to whether to commence interferon treatment for inmates who could complete the prescribed course of treatment during the remaining period of their incarceration. Mr. Roe's records reflect that on several occasions his physicians identified him as not a candidate for treatment because of the policy. . . Under these circumstances, we believe that the district court properly denied, each time it was presented, Dr. Elyea's invocation of qualified immunity.")

Purvis v. Oest, 614 F.3d 713, 721 (7th Cir. 2010) ("There is no case law of the U.S. Courts of Appeals or Supreme Court of which we are aware that demonstrates that Purvis's constitutional rights would have been violated by reporting her to a body that would perform an independent investigation before effecting a deprivation. . . . It was clearly established that due process was denied by the introduction of a fundamental conflict of interest into the investigative process. But it was not clearly established that such a procedural defect violated the Constitution if whatever conclusion eventuated was subject to confirmation and validation by a subsequent independent investigation.")

T.E. v. Grindle, 599 F.3d 583, 590 (7th Cir. 2010) ("Grindle argues that because none of our decisions have explicitly adopted Stoneking, it cannot be considered clearly established for the purpose of qualified immunity. Grindle's argument misses the mark. . . . While district court decisions alone do not clearly establish a right for the purpose of qualified immunity, the number and unanimity of these decisions, combined with our circuit-level precedent, show that a reasonable school principal would have concluded that she could be held liable for turning a blind eye to and affirmatively covering up evidence of child sexual abuse by one of her teachers.").

Catlin v. City of Wheaton, 574 F.3d 361, 369 (7th Cir. 2009) ("If there is a legitimate question as to the existence of the right at issue, then qualified immunity attaches. . . In the present case, even if the defendants had consulted a casebook prior to formulating their plan, they still would not have had fair notice that they had a constitutional obligation to announce their identity prior to completing [an] arrest [in a public place].")

Narducci v. Moore, 572 F.3d 313, 322, 323 (7th Cir. 2009) ("Although there was Ano square holding addressing whether recording an employee's phone calls violates his Fourth Amendment rights," court holds Ait was sufficiently clear that government employees enjoyed a reasonable expectation of privacy in the workplace to preclude qualified immunity.").

Matrisciano v. Randle, 569 F.3d 723, 730, 731, 735, 736 (7th Cir. 2009) ("Although we ultimately decide this case on account of the failure to meet the 'clearly established' requirement, some examination of the alleged constitutional right that was violated is helpful in understanding whether such a right was clearly established at the relevant time. Matrisciano argues that the defendants retaliated against him, in a manner contrary to the protections guaranteed by the First Amendment, by reassigning him after he testified before the Prisoner Review Board in support of Aleman's release. . . . Matrisciano voluntarily testified before the Board on a day that he took off from work. His job description does not hint at voluntary testimony before the Board. In short, we find no evidence that Matrisciano spoke to the Board pursuant to his official duties, and the defendants do not argue otherwise. . . .In these particular circumstances, the law at the time was not such that reasonable officials would know that transferring Matrisciano after his testimony before the Board was unlawful. . . . This is also not an obvious case. Aleman was an infamous prisoner known to have bribed a government official, and an Assistant Deputy Director in the Department of Corrections voluntarily made his first Prisoner Review Board comments on behalf of that inmate, without any special knowledge of the inmate's daily behavior in custody. None of the cases to which Matrisciano points put the defendants on notice that reassigning him as a result of this testimony violated the Constitution.").

Carvajal v. Dominguez, 542 F.3d 561, 569, 570 (7th Cir. 2008) ("The district court reached the second step of qualified immunity analysis in concluding that the obligation to disclose impeaching or exculpatory information would have been clear to a reasonable law enforcement officer. Given our conclusion that no Brady violation occurred here, we do not need to evaluate that aspect of the ruling. Nonetheless, a more careful examination of this question should have produced a different result. The question at this step, if reached, would not be whether a law enforcement officer would clearly know that he had to disclose impeaching or exculpatory information. That assumed the result. Rather, the question should have been whether it was clear that a law enforcement officer would have been expected to disclose whether he had seen a photo of a suspect before he went to a potentially dangerous undercover meeting with that individual. As noted, good police practices and common sense would suggest that an officer ought to prepare in that way. We are aware of no case which clearly indicates, or even hints, for that matter, that a law enforcement officer would be expected to disclose that he had undertaken such preparation. It is about the equivalent of strapping on a concealed weapon or reviewing a suspect's prior criminal history before attending such an undercover encounter. Unless clear guidance is given that such a practice must be disclosed as potentially impeaching or exculpatory, the broad protection of qualified immunity should protect a law enforcement officer from liability for failure to mention viewing a suspect's photo before meeting with him.").

Lee v. Young, 533 F.3d 505, 512 (7th Cir. 2008) ("While we agree with the district court's overall disposition of the case, we pause to note that we explicitly do not affirm its rulings regarding qualified immunity . . . . The district court concluded, in error, that no factually similar cases were on point, and so the contours of the right at issue were not clearly defined. In Alvarado v. Litscher, 267 F.3d 648, 653 (7th Cir.1999), we explicitly held that '[g]iven the decision in Helling, the right of a prisoner to not be subjected to a serious risk of his future health resulting from ETS was clearly established in 1998-99.' Since this right was clearly established in 1998-1999, it was also clearly established during the relevant period of time here, 2001-2002. Nevertheless, the district court did not have to rule on the issue of qualified immunity, and neither do we, since the first prong of the test (i.e., defendants violated plaintiff's constitutional rights) has not been met, as detailed above.").

Michael C. v. Gresbach, 526 F.3d 1008, 1017, 1018 (7th Cir. 2008) ("Considering the facts above in the light most favorable to the Plaintiffs, we find that a reasonable child welfare worker would have known that conducting a search of a child's body under his clothes, on private property, without consent or the presence of any other exception to the warrant requirement of the Fourth Amendment, is in direct violation of the child's constitutional right to be free from unreasonable searches. Gresbach argues that Heck is distinguishable from this case, because Heck did not address the issue of scope of consent in the context of child abuse investigations. However, a general constitutional rule already identified may apply with obvious clarity to the specific conduct in question, even though the very action in question has not previously been held unlawful. . . . At the time Gresbach conducted the searches at Good Hope in 2004, there was a clearly established doctrine as to what actions a Bureau caseworker must take when conducting a child abuse investigation at a private school. Today we reiterate Heck's definitive holding, along the lines of the Fourth Amendment principles outlined above, that it is a violation of a child's constitutional rights to conduct a search of a child at a private school without a warrant or probable cause, consent, or exigent circumstances.").

Koger v. Bryan, 523 F.3d 789, 802, 803 (7th Cir. 2008) ("RLUIPA was enacted on September 22, 2000. . . Koger filed his requests for a non-meat diet in May 2001, December 2001, and April 2002. His internal grievance was filed in January 2002. Because of the dearth of cases dealing with RLUIPA during this period, Koger must show that RLUIPA itself, or principles established in other contexts and applicable to RLUIPA, established the contours of his rights so that a reasonable official could have easily discerned them. There are numerous reasons leading us to conclude that the rights protected by RLUIPA, and violated by the prison officials as set forth above, were clearly established during the period the prison officials denied Koger's dietary requests. First, RLUIPA did not announce a right having broad application across many segments of society. Rather, it prohibited substantially burdening religious exercise in only two contexts: by land use regulation, 42 U.S.C. § 2000cc, or while a person is imprisoned. 42 U.S.C. § 2000cc-1. Moreover, RLUIPA did not announce a new standard, but shored up protections Congress had been attempting to provide since 1993 by means of the RFRA, and which had seen frequent litigation in the prison context. . . Aside from the fact that RLUIPA employs a standard already contained in the RFRA, it is noteworthy that the components of its analysis have been used in constitutional litigation for some time. For example, the difficult burden laid on a defendant who must show that its conduct was the 'least restrictive means of achieving some compelling state interest' has been established for decades. . . Similarly, the prohibition against substantially burdening sincerely held religious beliefs is well-established in Free Exercise Clause cases. . . RLUIPA has a broader scope of protection than 'central religious beliefs or practices,' but Congress cleared up any resulting ambiguity by expressly setting forth what is included within that broader protective scope–'any exercise of religion, whether or not compelled by, or central to, a system of religious belief.'. . While the case will undoubtedly arise where a plaintiff asserts a right only questionably covered by RLUIPA, Koger asserted the right to religious accommodation for a religious practice demonstrably associated with, though not compelled by, his religion. The prison officials violated this clearly established right because they required exactly what RLUIPA provides they cannot–a religious practice compelled by OTO. Likewise, in requiring clergy verification, the prison officials employed a clergy-as-arbiter-of-orthodoxy standard that had long been rejected. . . Finally, we note that the only other circuit court to have considered this issue held that '[a]lthough the outer boundaries of RLUIPA may have been uncharted at the time [of the defendant's conduct], its core protections were not.' [citing Lovelace v. Lee, 472 F.3d 174 (4th Cir. 2006)]Accordingly, Koger's right not to be subjected to a religiously required test or a clergy verification requirement was clearly established when the prison officials employed both. Those rights being clearly established at the relevant time, we conclude that the prison officials are not entitled to qualified immunity.").

Steidl v. Fermon, 494 F.3d 623, 632, 633 (7th Cir. 2007) ("We have found no case that is directly analogous to the alleged misconduct of the police here. (This is essentially good news: we sincerely hope that this type of behavior is rare.) We therefore must decide whether the alleged actions were 'so egregious' that no reasonable person could have believed that they were permissible. This is the approach that the Supreme Court took in its decisions in United States v. Lanier, 520 U.S. 259, 265 (1997), and Hope v. Pelzer, 536 U.S. 730, 740 (2002), both of which focused on whether a reasonable person would know that the challenged behavior violated a constitutional right and held that there need not be case law on point so long as the official had 'fair warning' that her conduct was impermissible. . . In urging this court not to dispense with the need to find a closely analogous case, the ISP Officials rely on Denius v. Dunlap, 209 F.3d 944, 951 (7th Cir.2000), which held that '[i]n some rare cases, where the constitutional violation is patently obvious, the plaintiff may not be required to present the court with any analogous cases.' Id. at 951. But Denius's use of the word 'rare' did not mean that the second route should normally be closed. To the contrary, Denius noted that 'widespread compliance with a clearly apparent law may have prevented the issue from previously being litigated.'. . We are persuaded that the ISP Officials, and indeed all of the police officers involved in this case, had ample notice that the knowing suppression of exculpatory material that was in the files at the time of the trial violated the defendant's constitutional rights. If, as we held in Newsome, the duty to disclose was clearly established as of 1979 and 1980, then it remained clearly established at Steidl's initial trial in 1987 and throughout his post-trial proceedings. Supervisors in the Illinois State Police cannot have thought that they were permitted deliberately to obstruct the access to this evidence of the post-conviction court and the Governor's Office, which has its own role to play in the state's criminal justice system. By the time these officials acted, Kyles v. Whitley was also on the books, eliminating any doubt about the joint responsibility of the police and prosecutors to assure the fair administration of the criminal justice system. Much of our discussion of the scope of the right Steidl is asserting applies with equal force to the question whether that right was clearly established, as we have taken care to rely on cases and doctrines that were in place before these officials acted. We therefore conclude that the district court correctly denied the ISP Officials' motion for dismissal based on qualified immunity.").

Boyd v. Owen, 481 F.3d 520, 523, 524 (7th Cir. 2007) ("The district court appears to have conflated the two prongs of the qualified immunity test. The court held that Boyd possessed a protected liberty interest in his employment as a police officer. The court then recognized that our decision in Dupuy could not clearly establish any due process violation because it was issued after the events at issue in the case. The court nevertheless held that Foott and Owen violated Boyd's clearly established constitutional right to due process because 'DCFS' own rules and regulations imposed a duty to identify other possible explanations for the abuse,' and Owen and Foott failed to do so. . . The district court properly held that our Dupuy decision could not demonstrate a clearly established right because it did not exist when these events occurred, but its alternative reasoning is erroneous. The Supreme Court has made clear the requirement of due process is not defined by state rules and regulations, but is an independent determination. . . Accordingly, the district court erred in determining that the failure to comply with DCFS regulations demonstrated a violation of a clearly established constitutional right.").

Borello v. Allison, 446 F.3d 742, 749, 750 (7th Cir. 2006) ("Because Defendant has not shown that his constitutional rights were violated, we need not move to the second step of the qualified immunity analysis: whether those rights were clearly established at the time of the attack. We note, however, that the district court improperly simplified this second step, finding that '[i]t is untenable to say that prison officials don't know what actions in this area are illegal.' This analysis relieved Plaintiff of his burden of proof. . . . The inquiry into whether a right is clearly established 'must be undertaken in light of the specific context of the case, not as a broad general proposition.'. . It is insufficient for a plaintiff simply to point to a recognized constitutional right and claim that the right has been violated. A plaintiff is required to show that a violation of that right has been found in factually similar cases, or that the violation was so clear that an official would realize he or she was violating an inmate's constitutional rights even in the absence of an on-point case. . . Although it is well established that a plaintiff can bring an Eighth Amendment claim based on a prison official's deliberate indifference to a substantial risk of serious harm, there is still a question whether the facts of this case are sufficient to establish deliberate indifference. The purpose of the second step of the qualified immunity analysis is to ensure that prison officials will not be held personally liable for their official conduct when they were not aware that their conduct violated any of an inmate's constitutional rights. Plaintiff has not attempted to compare this case to any factually similar ones, or argue that the violation was so obvious that Defendants should have been on notice that their actions constituted deliberate indifference.").

Miller v. Jones, 444 F.3d 929, 939 (7th Cir. 2006) ("To leap from the simple observation that the boundaries of what constitutes public concern require some searching, to the argument that after San Diego 'no reasonable law enforcement official' may be expected to determine what is appropriate behavior in this realm, is a step too far. Nothing in San Diego reformed the core of our jurisprudence on the matter. Nor did San Diego strike down Delgado, where we held that employee speech on a matter of public concern was protected under the First Amendment, and therefore protected against retaliatory transfers, when it grew out of some discretionary act. . . For examples of similar factual scenarios, Chief Jones may have turned to our holding in Campbell v. Touse, where we held that a police officer's speech criticizing the management of a community-oriented policing program was a matter of public concern. . . Additionally, Jones may have turned to Knapp v. Whitaker, wherein we held a public school teacher had spoken on a matter of public concern when protesting an inequitable reimbursement scheme for expenses incurred in coaching students. . . The core of the public concern in Knapp was the misuse of funds intended for the school's athletic program; a secondary mission of the school system, to be sure. . . Finally, should former Chief of Police Jones have needed personal notice that the retaliatory transfer of public employees for speech protected by the First Amendment is subject to suit under § 1983, he need only look to our holding in Octavio Delgado v. Police Chief Arthur Jones and Deputy Chief Monica Ray, 282 F.3d 511, Mar. 8, 2002, decided against the appellant himself in the same month during which the merger was first proposed.").

Wernsing v. Thompson, 423 F.3d 732, 747, 748 (7th Cir. 2005) ("We are satisfied that Thompson is entitled to qualified immunity, though not for the precise reasons he advances. Simply put, Thompson must prevail in the present suit since it was not clearly established, at the time the pre-clearance directive was first issued (December 5, 2000), that such a directive constituted an unlawful prior restraint on speech. Of course the case law on prior restraints is replete with decisions invalidating zoning ordinances, licensing schemes, permit regulations and other official acts that limit expressive activity. Additionally, our recent decision in Crue v. Aiken, where we held a similar pre-clearance directive to constitute an unlawful prior restraint on speech, casts serious doubt upon the legality of Thompson's directive. . . However, while the constitutional limits of restraints applicable to the general public are well-settled, and while the Supreme Court has struck down formal statutory bans of certain speech activity by government employees, . . .

the prerogatives of a government supervisor in managing the communications of his own staff are far less clear. We emphasize that our analysis of qualified immunity here is focused specifically and exclusively on this kind of relatively informal supervisory directive aimed at close subordinates. . . In December 2000 case law touching on this kind of internal pre-clearance directive was decidedly scant and, to the extent that it existed at all, actually suggested that such directives are permissible.").

Nanda v. Moss, 412 F.3d 836, 844, 845 (7th Cir. 2005) ("We find that a reasonable dean or university administrator was on notice as of 1998 that it would be a violation of federal law to ratify a recommendation to terminate a female professor without investigation into several allegations of gender and ethnic discrimination surrounding the recommendation, and then to falsely report that the recommendation was made with the approval of faculty and an advisory committee.").

Kiddy-Brown v. Blagojevich, 408 F.3d 346, 356 (7th Cir. 2005) ("The State defendants contend that it was not clearly established at the time Ms. Kiddy-Brown's employment was terminated that dismissing the warden at a state prison would violate the Constitution. They submit that 'there are no closely analogous cases ... involving the position at issue–Warden of a state correctional institution.' . . However, the law of qualified immunity does not require a plaintiff to produce a case that is 'directly on point' in order to show that a right is clearly established. . . . As we noted earlier, because this case is before us on a motion for judgment on the pleadings, we are obliged–as was the district court–to view the facts alleged in Ms. Kiddy-Brown's complaint in the light most favorable to her. . . According to Ms. Kiddy-Brown, she had no 'discretionary policymaking powers' and 'no meaningful input into government decision making on issues where there was room for principled disagreement on goals.'. . Accepting these allegations as true, Ms. Kiddy-Brown was among the employees who have a right not to be subjected to patronage dismissal. We think the law was sufficiently clear at the time Ms. Kiddy-Brown was dismissed that a reasonable official would have understood that political affiliation was not an appropriate requirement for a position such as the one described in Ms. Kiddy-Brown's complaint.").

Lunini v. Grayeb, 395 F.3d 761, 769 (7th Cir. 2005) ("We acknowledge that 'liability is not predicated upon the existence of a prior case that is directly on point,' . . . yet nonetheless '[t]he contours of the right [at issue] must be sufficiently clear that a reasonable official would understand that what he is doing violates that right.' . . However suggestive our dicta in Hilton, we are instructed to conduct the 'clearly established' inquiry from the defendant-official's perspective, and in this light, a claim in a factually dissimilar case which ultimately fails to survive a qualified immunity defense cannot be said to sufficiently define 'the contours of the [purported] right' to any significant degree. Indeed the precise contours of class of one equal protection rights continue to elude some of this circuit's most capable judges. . . . Certainly Lunini is unhappy with defendant police officers' response to the incident at the High Street residence. However, on this record it appears highly doubtful that any alleged police misjudgments (if misjudgments there were) took on constitutional proportions. While we take pains to affirm the baseline principle that police support and protection must be afforded to all citizens on a non-discriminatory basis, we decline to take the unprecedented step of implying a general constitutional police duty to arrest certain individuals during a response to an isolated domestic incident. Such a ruling would threaten to turn every police house call into a potential federal constitutional lawsuit.").

Board v. Farnham, 394 F.3d 469, 484 (7th Cir. 2005) ("Because dental care is a basic human need and the constitutional test requires us to look at 'the evolving standards of decency that mark the progress of a maturing society,'. . .Farnham was or should have been 'on notice' and had 'fair warning' that it would be unconstitutional for him to deny oral hygiene products to pretrial detainees under his watch for long periods of time. [citing Hope] We hold that the district court did not err in denying qualified immunity to Farnham based on the alleged denial of toothpaste to Duke and Jerry Board for three-and-a-half weeks and approximately 113 days respectively.").

Baird v. Bd. of Educ. for Warren Community Unit School Dist. No. 205, 389 F.3d 685, 696, 697 (7th Cir. 2004) ("The Board contends that its individual members are absolutely immune from liability since various discrete actions in firing Baird–namely the determination of rules and procedures, participation in the pre-termination hearing and individual decisions to terminate Baird–were legislative acts. The issues raised by this appeal are, however, a totality involving the termination of an employee, which is an administrative act. The evidence does not establish that the Board members are entitled to legislative immunity. Nor do Board members appear to be entitled to qualified immunity, which protects public officials who exercise discretionary or policymaking functions from liability in damages. . . We have already found that the Board violated Baird's due process rights by according him a hearing whose procedures were severely deficient. Thus, we proceed directly to the question whether Baird's rights were clearly established. We conclude that they are. . . . Determining the reasonableness of a 'mistake' does not necessitate comparison to a precedent that squares in every detail with the present case. . .As earlier discussed, numerous cases from Perry v. Sindermann to Loudermill to Lujan–a case the defendants rely on to justify their conduct–have defined the contours of what process is due to a public employee who is to be terminated. Given the quality and volume of this precedent, we cannot determine on this record that the Board's conduct was a reasonable mistake, thereby establishing the defense of qualified immunity.").

Manning v. Miller, 355 F.3d 1028, 1034 (7th Cir. 2004) ("Buchan and Miller also argue that Brady should not be extended to cover the actions of police or investigators, but rather, only prosecutors. This assertion, while eloquently argued, is flatly contradicted by existing case law. In Kyles v. Whitley, the Supreme Court found that the Brady duty of turning over exculpatory evidence includes not only the prosecutor, but the investigating officers as well. 514 U.S. 419, 438 (1995). . . . Manning is able to meet the second prong of the qualified immunity test: his constitutional due process right was 'clearly established' at the time he asserts it was violated. Buchan and Miller assert that this behavior was not clearly prohibited at the time of its occurrence because no decision had dealt with a Brady claim that matched the facts in Manning's Brady claim. Following this logic, all Brady violations would receive qualified immunity because the facts of every case are unique. Instead, we hold that it is enough that, prior to the actions that gave rise to this case, it was well established that investigators who withhold exculpatory evidence from defendants violate the defendant's constitutional due process right. See, e.g ., United States ex rel. Smith v. Fairman, 769 F.2d 386, 391 (7th Cir.1985). It is immaterial whether Manning complains that Agents Buchan and Miller withheld exculpatory information regarding fabricated testimony or fingerprint analysis.")

Dunn v. City of Elgin, 347 F.3d 641, 650, 651 (7th Cir. 2003) ("Although it was objectively unreasonable for the police officers to believe they had authority to seize a child pursuant to an out-of-state order, we cannot say that the unconstitutionality of this action was clearly established when Katia was seized. It may have been clearly established that such conduct violated Illinois law and the standard operating procedures for the City of Elgin Police Department, but Plaintiffs must also show that the conduct was so severe that 'a reasonable person would have known of the unconstitutionality of the conduct at issue.' . . This requires either that the plaintiff point to closely analogous cases, . . . or prove that the right is 'so clear... that no one thought it worthwhile to litigate the issue.'. . In both cases the plaintiff must do more than merely prove that a general right, such as the right to be free from unreasonable seizures, was clearly established. . . Plaintiffs have not met this burden. Plaintiffs have pointed to no cases where the enforcement of an out-of-state custody order in violation of a state statute was found to be a constitutional violation. . . . Considering the circuit split that existed regarding whether an officer may act reasonably when acting beyond his or her jurisdiction, . . . we also cannot say that the absence of cases on point is due to the obviousness of the constitutional violation.").

McCann v. Mangialardi, 337 F.3d 782, 787, 788 (7th Cir. 2003) ("In Brady v. Maryland . . . the Supreme Court held that during trial the government is constitutionally obligated to disclose evidence favorable to the defense when the evidence is material to either the guilt or punishment of the defendant. . . The Court has yet to address, however, whether the Due Process Clause requires such disclosures outside the context of a trial. . . . [W]e have a question not directly addressed by [United States v. Ruiz, 536 U.S. 622 (2002)]: whether a criminal defendant's guilty plea can ever be 'voluntary' when the government possesses evidence that would exonerate the defendant of any criminal wrongdoing but fails to disclose such evidence during plea negotiations or before the entry of the plea. . . . Ruiz indicates a significant distinction between impeachment information and exculpatory evidence of actual innocence. Given this distinction, it is highly likely that the Supreme Court would find a violation of the Due Process Clause if prosecutors or other relevant government actors have knowledge of a criminal defendant's factual innocence but fail to disclose such information to a defendant before he enters into a guilty plea. We need not resolve this question, however, because even if such disclosures of factual innocence are constitutionally required, McCann has not presented any evidence that Mangialardi knew about the drugs being planted in McCann's car prior to the entry of his guilty plea.").

Molina ex rel Molina v. Cooper , 325 F.3d 963, 972 (7th Cir. 2003) ("As for the Molinas' alternative argument that the police failed to wait a reasonable amount of time after announcing their presence to forcibly enter the house, we are similarly unconvinced. Police officers' compliance with the 'knock and announce' requirement is determined on a case- by-case basis. . . . Although the duration is disputed, the officers claim that five seconds passed after their third and final knock, and that a total of twelve to fifteen seconds passed between their first knock and forcible entry. . . Under the circumstances, we find that this was a reasonable interval. Even if it was not, the officers would be entitled to qualified immunity. The plaintiffs have not cited any cases which clearly establish that an interval of this length was unconstitutional at the time that they conducted the search.").

Cavalieri v. Shepard, 321 F.3d 616, 623, 624 (7th Cir. 2003) ("Of course, the law did not require Shepard to sit by the telephone all day, communicating with the CCCF about transferred prisoners. The question is what he was supposed to do in the face of the knowledge of a life-threatening situation that he actually had. He made several telephone calls to the CCCF, but he passed by the opportunity to mention that he had been informed that Steven was a suicide risk, and that the jail itself had recognized this only a month earlier. If Shepard had known that a detainee had an illness that required life-saving medication, he would also have had a duty to inform the CCCF, or any other entity that next held custody over the detainee. . . . We conclude that the law as it existed at the time of Steven's suicide attempt provided Shepard with fair notice that his conduct was unconstitutional. The rule that officials, including police officers, will be 'liable under section 1983 for a pre- trial detainee's suicide if they were deliberately indifferent to a substantial suicide risk,' . . . was clearly established prior to 1998. The fact that several state agencies were working together on his case, and that Steven happened to attempt suicide in the county's facility rather than at the police station, does not change this analysis.")

Sonnleitner v. York, 304 F.3d 704, 716 (7th Cir. 2002) ("Under the first prong of this inquiry, we agree with Sonnleitner that the Institute may have violated his procedural due process rights by failing to accord him a predisciplinary hearing on the unenumerated (i.e., the more serious) charges contained in the Bellaire report. However, under the second prong of the qualified immunity analysis, Sonnleitner has failed to establish that this right was clearly established at the time of the alleged violation. Although Sonnleitner need not offer up a federal decision which precisely mirrors the facts of this case, at a minimum he must point to a closely analogous case decided prior to the challenged conduct. . . Sonnleitner contends that the Supreme Court's decision in Loudermill clearly established his right to more exhaustive pre-disciplinary proceedings. However, as discussed earlier, Loudermill involved the termination of two public employees without any pre-termination proceedings, and is therefore factually distinguishable from this case.").

Driebel v. City of Milwaukee, 298 F.3d 622, 637, 652 (7th Cir. 2002) ("[I]in light of the Saucier decision, we must determine whether, and at what point, actions initiated by the Department against its on-duty police officers during a criminal investigation should be classified as unreasonable seizures in violation of the officers' Fourth Amendment rights. . . . [W]e have been unable to discover any case law that would justify a reasonable belief that an officer suspected of criminal misconduct may be seized during a criminal investigation and detained for questioning based on the reasonable suspicion standard.").

Morrell v. Mock, 270 F.3d 1090, 1100 (7th Cir. 2001) ("Morrell contends that it was clearly established that due process requires notice and an opportunity to be heard before state actors may interfere with a mother's liberty interest in her child. The statement of the right at this level of generality, however, is of little help in determining the reasonableness of the defendants' conduct. . . The appropriate question is whether it would be clear to reasonable officials in the defendants' position that enforcing the New Mexico court's order without prior notice or an opportunity to be heard in Illinois was unconstitutional. . . . Morrell has not identified, and we have been unable to find, any authoritative cases considering analogous circumstances that hold that pre-deprivation notice and an opportunity to be heard is required as a matter of constitutional due process before a state may enforce another state's custody order.").

Siebert v. Severino, 256 F.3d 648, 654, 655 (7th Cir. 2001) ("A violation may be clearly established if the violation is so obvious that a reasonable state actor would know that what they are doing violates the Constitution, or if a closely analogous case establishes that the conduct is unconstitutional. . . This case seems to fit within the 'obvious' scenario–a reasonable state actor would know that he cannot enter a fenced-in, closed structure located within 60 feet of a person's house without a warrant or some exception to the warrant requirement. But even if not reasonably obvious to Severino, a closely analogous case indicates that his conduct was unconstitutional: his search took place in 1996, and less than three years earlier the Fourth Circuit held that citizens enjoy an expectation of privacy in their barn.[citing Fourth Circuit case] Therefore, Severino is not protected by qualified immunity.").

Campbell v. Peters, 256 F.3d 695, 700, 701 (7th Cir. 2001) ("Campbell contends that he has shown that it was clearly established that incarcerating a prisoner beyond the termination of his sentence without penological justification violates the Eighth Amendment as cruel and unusual punishment. At a general level, this proposition may be true. . . . But we do not deal with generalities. Instead, we must determine whether it was clearly established that the defendants, in revoking the good conduct credits and computing a new release date after the recommitment, were violating Campbell's constitutional rights by requiring him to serve more time than state law and his sentence required. As Campbell points out, it is not necessary for him to point to a case saying that the revocation, under the identical circumstances, was unlawful. Instead, as the Supreme Court put it in Katz, the law is 'clearly established' if 'various courts have agreed that certain conduct is a constitutional violation under facts not distinguishable in a fair way from the facts presented in the case at hand....'. . . At the time of the revocation of Campbell's credits, it was not apparent that this kind of state law mistake rose to the level of an Eighth Amendment violation.").

Pearson v. Ramos, 237 F.3d 881, 884 (7th Cir. 2001) ("Since no one could believe that a single 90-day denial of yard privileges would be a cruel and unusual punishment for a serious violation of prison disciplinary rules, the dispositive issue in this case is whether the stacking of such sanctions to the point of depriving a prisoner of an entire year of yard access is cruel and unusual punishment; and as there was no case law when the defendant acted indicating that it is and no tenable argument then or now that stacking so clearly violated the Eighth Amendment that an official in the defendant's position would have had to know that it did, even without any guidance from case law, it is obvious that the immunity defense should have been sustained.")

Brokaw v. Mercer County, 235 F.3d 1000, 1022, 1023 (7th Cir. 2000) ("The defendants argue that it was not clearly established in June 1983 that their actions violated C.A.'s constitutional rights, noting that C.A. failed to cite to closely analogous cases clearly establishing his constitutional rights. However, a plaintiff need not always identify a closely analogous case; rather, he can establish a clearly established constitutional right by showing that the violation was so obvious that a reasonable person would have known of the unconstitutionality of the conduct at issue.Thus, binding precedent is not necessary to clearly establish a right. . . . As alleged, this case fits that principle to a T. The defendants' alleged conduct in this case is so severe that a reasonable person would have understood that he was violating C.A.'s constitutional rights. Specifically, a reasonable person would have known that it was unconstitutional to use the government's power to cause, or conspire to cause, the unjustified removal of a six-year-old child from his parents in order to destroy the family, based simply on the family's religious beliefs. . . . In closing our discussion of qualified immunity, we note that several circuit courts have concluded that because the balance between a child's liberty interest in familial relations and a state's interest in protecting the child is nebulous at best, social workers and other state actors who cause a child's removal are entitled to qualified immunity because the alleged constitutional violation will rarely–if ever–be clearly established.[citing cases]. While we agree that that is generally the case, . . .as noted above, some governmental actions are so clearly beyond the pale that a reasonable person should have known of their unconstitutionality even without a closely analogous case.").

Elwell v. Dobucki, 224 F.3d 638, 641 (7th Cir. 2000) ("A snapshot of the law in 1992 . . . shows that there was no clearly established prohibition against taking race into account in a hiring decision within a prison or police department context.").

Perry v. Sheahan, 222 F.3d 309, 317 (7th Cir. 2000) ("In summary, it was clearly established law at the time of the seizure that even seizures pursuant to an eviction are not immune to the strictures of the Fourth Amendment. Here, the defendants seized the weapons even though they knew that the eviction had been stayed by order of the court and thus that the seizure was not pursuant to any court order. It was also clearly established that warrantless seizures of personal effects from a home are presumably unreasonable. No exception to that rule or other circumstances apparent in this motion to dismiss would render objectively reasonable their belief that this seizure was constitutional. Therefore, there is no basis for qualified immunity, and the decision of the district court in Perry I must be reversed on this issue.").

Coady v. Steil, 187 F.3d 727, 734 (7th Cir. 1999) ("[W]e reject the defendant's argument that because this court has not previously had a case with identical facts to this one, the violation of the plaintiff's right to be free from harassment in his exercise of protected political speech could not have been clearly established. . . . Indeed, because Connick-Pickering balancing always involves factspecific balancing, if plaintiffs had to point to a case on all fours with their own, defendants would nearly always be entitled to qualified immunity. However, we have rejected that argument. . . . We believe it was clear on March 18, 1995, that in this circuit, a government official could not harass a subordinate employee because of that individual's activities in support of political candidates, when the subordinate employee's actions were protected by the First Amendment and not in contravention of any state law, municipal ordinance or departmental policy.").

Markham v. White, 172 F.3d 486, 492 (7th Cir. 1999) ("[I]t was well established by 1993 that the U.S. Constitution does not tolerate sex discrimination in an educational setting. Contrary to the defendants' argument, the fact that neither this court nor any other has ever dealt with a situation involving a short training seminar conducted for narcotics officers is of no moment. Under the doctrine of qualified immunity, 'liability is not predicated upon the existence of a prior case that is directly on point.'. . In light of the law at the time, a reasonable government official in the defendants' shoes would have understood that the prohibition against sexual harassment extended to their training seminars.").

Kerr v. Puckett, 138 F.3d 321, 323-24 (7th Cir. 1998) ("We must determine whether the generalities of the Constitution have been made concrete, so that officeholders can understand the limits on their conduct. No court has ever held that 'brainwashing' of prisoners as part of substance-abuse-control programs violates the eighth amendment.... Prison officials needn't predict the outcome of cases yet to be brought. And the lack of precedent is not because these programs are so plainly unconstitutional that no one has ever needed to litigate the point before.").

Khuans v. School District 110, 123 F.3d 1010, 1018-19 (7th Cir. 1997) ("Khuans alleges termination of an independent contractor relationship. And back in mid-1994, whether the analysis regarding First Amendment rights of public employees to free speech extended to independent contractors was an unsettled matter. Not until June 28, 1996, did the Supreme Court address whether and to what extent the First Amendment restricts the freedom of federal, state, or local governments to terminate a relationship with an independent contractor because of the contractor's speech.... [A]t the time Khuans lost her job, whether independent contractors could be terminated for their exercise of free speech in the workplace was unaddressed, undecided and unsettled in this circuit.").

Flenner v. Sheahan, 107 F.3d 459, 465 (7th Cir. 1997) ("We do not take exception with the district court's observation that considerable uncertainty exists in the area of patronage law. This is an observation that. . . we have made often ourselves. . . . The district court's error lies in its conclusion that the uncertainty in applying the Branti standard precludes liability for the dismissal of those employees who do in fact occupy an extremely 'low rung on the bureaucratic ladder.'

[cite omitted] . . . In making the determination whether the law was sufficiently clear in 1993 that correctional officers were not subject to patronage dismissal, the district court should look to analogous case law. . . . To prevail, appellants need not point to a case holding unconstitutional the dismissal of Cook County correctional officers for patronage reasons. . . . Appellants must, however, establish that, given the inherent powers of their positions and in the light of pre-existing law, the unlawfulness of Sheriff Sheahan's actions was apparent.").

Vickery v. Jones, 100 F.3d 1334, 1340 (7th Cir. 1996) ("We simply do not agree with the plaintiff's assertion that the constitutional status of patronage hiring of temporary positions was clearly established at the time of the activities challenged in this case. For the reasons stated above, the plaintiff has not provided a 'closely analogous' case that covers both the Rutan holding and its application to temporary employment positions like the temporary highway maintainer positions, nor has he shown that using information regarding an applicant's political affiliation was so obviously unconstitutional that the State Defendants should have known that they were violating the law. Therefore, the district court correctly concluded that the State Defendants were entitled to qualified immunity.").

Hernandez v. O'Malley, 98 F.3d 293, 297 (7th Cir. 1996) ("A regimen of case-by-case balancing makes it hard to dismiss complaints and simultaneously makes it hard to show that the right in question was 'clearly established.' . . . . Drawing a stable line in Elrod cases has been difficult; even slight differences in the nature and context of the job can lead to opposite outcomes . . . . Contextual balancing tests should be worked out prospectively, rather than at the expense of public officials who guess wrong about future legal developments.").

Erwin v. Daley, 92 F.3d 521, 528 (7th Cir. 1996) ("Whatever else one might say about the state of the law in 1990 on affirmative action programs, the standard of review to which they are subject, and the nature of the justifications that will support them, it is clear that as of the time the City officials implemented their promotion program it was not 'clearly established' . . . that the use of standardization techniques and out of rank order promotions in police departments was illegal. . . it may not be illegal at all.").

Anderson v. Romero, 72 F.3d 518, 525-27 (7th Cir. 1995) ("Neither in 1992 nor today was (is) the law clearly established that a prison cannot without violating the constitutional rights of its HIV-positive inmates reveal their condition to other inmates and to guards in order to enable those other inmates and those guards to protect themselves from infection. . . . [D]istrict court decisions cannot clearly establish a constitutional right. . . . They are evidence of the state of the law. Taken together with other evidence, they might show that the law had been clearly established. . . .And, although we cannot find any cases on the point, we are confident that an unpublished decision cannot elevate the decision that it affirms to the status of circuit precedent. . . . If the only reason that the defendants denied haircuts and yard privileges to Anderson was that he was HIV- positive, and there is no conceivable justification for these as AIDS-fighting measures, then the absence of a case involving this specific form of arbitrary treatment would not confer immunity on the defendants. A constitutional violation that is so patent that no violator has even attempted to obtain an appellate ruling on it can be regarded as clearly established even in the absence of precedent.").

Camp v. Gregory, 67 F.3d 1286, 1298 (7th Cir. 1995) ("Certainly it was clear by 1991 that a child had a right not to be placed with an abusive caretaker. K.H., a 1990 decision, settled that issue in this circuit. However, Camp has cited no decision to us recognizing a constitutional right to adequate supervision and guidance. There are hints in the cases that caseworkers must not place children with caretakers who will abuse or neglect them. E.g., K.H. . . . Neglect certainly could be construed to include not only the failure to provide a child with the necessities, but the degree of supervision, instruction, and involvement necessary to steer the child clear of dangerous activities. Yet, no case cited to us does so. Thus, at best a public official would have had to predict that cases such as K.H. would be construed expansively in order to anticipate our holding today. Certainly an official could be charged with knowledge that it was impermissible to misrepresent facts to a court. . . but he could not have predicted civil liability under the due process clause for the placement decision itself.").

Burns v. Reed, 44 F.3d 524, 528 (7th Cir. 1995) ("Plaintiff. . . would need to cite more specific precedent than the basic line of coercion cases to persuade this Court that the United States Constitution clearly proscribed hypnosis of a suspect at the time of her interrogation.").

Dahm v. Flynn, 60 F.3d 253, 258 (7th Cir. 1994) ("Because it was not clearly established at the relevant time that qualitative reductions in job responsibilities, without discharge, transfer, demotion, or salary loss, could constitute an adverse employment action, [Defendant] is immune from civil damages . . .").

Eberhardt v. O'Malley, 17 F.3d 1023, 1028 (7th Cir. 1994) ("If the complaint is taken at face value, ... the defendants punished the plaintiff for writing a novel, without having any legitimate reason for such punishment. This is such an elementary violation of the First Amendment that the absence of a reported case with similar facts demonstrates nothing more than widespread compliance with well-recognized constitutional principles.").

Donovan v. City of Milwaukee, 17 F.3d 944, 952 (7th Cir. 1994) ("Garner is not the most apt analogy to this case because the facts of Garner are not sufficiently particularized to put potential defendants on notice that striking a fleeing vehicle with their police cruisers constitutes an unreasonable seizure.").

Henderson v. DeRobertis, 940 F.2d 1055, 1058-59 (7th Cir. 1991) ("...until a particular constitutional right has been stated so that reasonably competent officers would agree on its application to a given set of facts, it has not been clearly established"; court should look to whatever decisional law is available to decide whether right clearly established), cert. denied, 112 S. Ct. 1578 (1992).

K.H. ex rel Murphy v. Morgan, 914 F.2d 846, 851 (7th Cir. 1990) ("There has never been a section 1983 case accusing welfare officials of selling foster children into slavery; it does not follow that if such a case arose, the officials would be immune...because no previous case had found liability in those circumstances.")

Rivera v. Guevara, 319 F.Supp.3d 1004, 1053-54 (N.D. Ill. 2018) ("The facts of Jones are very similar to those here, and the Jones decision more than suffices to show that by 1988 it was clearly established that due process would not tolerate a police officer fabricating evidence. . . .As for the Brady claims, the Seventh Circuit held in Newsome v. McCabe that it was 'clearly established in 1979 and 1980 that police could not withhold from prosecutors exculpatory information about fingerprints and the conduct of a lineup.'. . Jones again furnishes the salient example. . . The officer defendants again cite Gauger v. Hendle, 349 F.3d 354, 360 (7th Cir. 2003), for the proposition that it was not established, much less clearly, that they had to turn over anything if the person who ultimately stood trial was present at the lineup. . . But Newsome involved a lineup in which the wrongfully convicted person stood (so he knew about it), and the officers nevertheless had no qualified immunity for Brady claims that they did not tell the prosecutors or the defense that they encouraged witnesses to pick the § 1983 plaintiff from the lineup. . . Newsome, therefore, clearly established that the Brady disclosure requirement expounded in Jones has full force when the person who later stands trial is in the lineup (which is usually the case since introducing evidence identifying someone else as the perpetrator of a crime is a poor strategy for winning a conviction). . . Given the genuine fact issues, the court cannot say that Rivera is complaining of the nondisclosure of 'little...tidbit[s]' of evidence whose value to the defense would not have been apparent to the officer defendants. . . As discussed extensively earlier, the jury could find that whole swaths of evidence that would have corroborated the existence of the first lineup were suppressed and that cumulatively the withheld evidence was an impeachment goldmine. Based on the foregoing analysis, the court concludes that a jury viewing the summary judgment record most favorably to Rivera could find that his clearly established rights were violated.")

Chatman v. City of Chicago, No. 14 C 2945, 2018 WL 1519160, at *15 (N.D. Ill. Mar. 28, 2018) ("Mokstad and Cartrette assert that they are shielded, in their individual capacities, from Chatman's due process claim by qualified immunity. As noted, in the context of a Brady claim, the qualified immunity issue is not whether the officer knew he had to disclose exculpatory information; rather, the question is whether it was clearly established that the information the plaintiff claims the police failed to disclose was exculpatory or impeaching. . . For the reasons discussed above, Chatman has satisfied his burden of showing, at least at this stage of the litigation, that Mokstad and Cartrette should not be afforded qualified immunity. As explained above, it was clearly established that the sleeping deputy evidence was exculpatory or impeaching, and a reasonable jury could view the record and conclude that the evidence was otherwise unavailable. In addition, whether Mokstad and Cartrette knowingly suppressed the evidence depends on disputed issues of fact.")

Myvett v. Chicago Police Detective Edward Heerdt, 232 F.Supp.3d 1005, 1024 (N.D. Ill. 2017) ("Whitlock and its progeny stand for the proposition that if a police officer fabricates information that is used 'in some way' to deprive a plaintiff of his liberty, then that officer has violated the very laws he has sworn to protect. . . The Seventh Circuit made no suggestion in Whitlock, or any other case, that fabrication claims should somehow turn on the admissibility of the concocted information. Instead, what Whitlock illustrates is that so long as the fabricated statements are used to deprive a plaintiff of his liberty in some way, then the defendant officers have violated his clearly established constitutional rights. Here, as discussed supra, that is exactly what happened (or so the jury could reasonably conclude).

Smith v. Burge, 222 F.Supp.3d 669, 680-83 (N.D. Ill. 2016) ("Reviewing Plaintiff's well-pleaded allegations and all reasonable inferences in his favor—as the Court is required to do at this procedural posture—Plaintiff bases his Brady violation on more than just Defendant Officers' failure to disclose their unlawful interrogation tactics in relation to his coerced confession. Specifically, Plaintiff alleges that Defendant Officers suppressed the implements of their torture, including the plastic bag, the rubber nightstick, and Plaintiff's bloody clothes. . . More importantly, Plaintiff alleges that Defendants suppressed and destroyed evidence of systemic torture and abuse in Area 2, obstructed investigations into the CPD's systemic torture, and discredited findings of systemic torture. . . With the Seventh Circuit's Gauger and/or Sornberger decisions in mind, courts in this district have concluded that similar allegations state a Brady claim based on events that transpired outside of the interrogation room. [collecting cases] The decision in Saunders-El does not change this reasoning as it relates to Plaintiff's allegations of Defendants suppressing the implements of their torture, destroying evidence of systemic torture and abuse in Area 2, obstructing investigations into the CPD's systemic torture, and discrediting findings of systemic torture. In sum, at this stage of the proceedings, Plaintiff's allegations are distinguishable from the facts in Saunders-El because Plaintiff is not merely basing his Brady claim on Defendants 'keeping quiet about their wrongdoing.'. . .[T]he individual Defendants argue that qualified immunity protects them from liability as to Plaintiff's Brady claim. . . . Defendants argue that their 'failure to disclose the alleged torture evidence did not in 1984 and does not today violate any clearly established constitutional right.'. . In making this argument, Defendants characterize Plaintiff's Brady claim as follows: 'Plaintiff has essentially alleged that Brady requires police officers to disclose their misconduct, including criminal misconduct, to criminal defendants.'. .First, Defendants mischaracterize Plaintiff's Brady claim, which includes allegations that Defendants suppressed and destroyed evidence of systemic torture and abuse in Area 2, obstructed investigations into the CPD's systemic torture, and discredited findings of systemic torture. Second, Defendants fail to explain how it was not clearly established in 1983-84 that destroying and suppressing exculpatory evidence was unconstitutional. In fact, since Brady and Killian v. United States, 368 U.S. 231, 82 S.Ct. 302, 7 L.Ed.2d 256 (1961), 'bad-faith destruction or loss of exculpatory evidence violate[s] a suspect's due process rights.' Armstrong v. Daily, 786 F.3d 529, 532 (7th Cir. 2015); see also Tillman, 813 F. Supp. 2d at 966 n.12. Moreover, viewing Plaintiff's allegations and all reasonable inferences in his favor, his allegations show that Defendants' conduct was 'so egregious that no reasonable person could have believed that it would not violate established rights.'. .The Court therefore denies Defendants' motion to dismiss Plaintiff's Brady claim.")

Alton v. City of Naperville, No. 16 CV 6640, 2016 WL 6877678, at *2 (N.D. Ill. Nov. 22, 2016) ("Naperville argues that this Court should find that qualified immunity shields the officers from liability. Qualified immunity shields officers from civil liability stemming from discretionary functions so long as their conduct did not violate a clearly established statutory or constitutional right that a reasonable person would have known. . . Naperville asserts that: The correct inquiry is whether it was clearly established that police engagement of a canine constitutes excessive force when the engagement of the canine arises when a suspect in a serious crime has recklessly utilized every available means to evade capture, including fleeing in a vehicle until the vehicle becomes inoperable, followed by fleeing on foot across a major interstate highway, and secreting himself underneath garbage within a small, confined and enclosed dumpster space, all during the dark of night, and before police were able to determine whether the suspect was armed. . . . If constitutional rights needed to be so narrowly defined to be 'clearly established,' then police officers would enjoy qualified immunity in nearly every instance. . . .This Court must take the allegations in the Complaint as true for purposes of ruling on the motion to dismiss, including that Alton was not resisting and was complying with Officer Lippencott's order to get out of the dumpster. Further, there are no allegations in the Complaint suggesting Officer Lippencott had reason to suspect that Alton was armed. Under Alton's version of the facts, he was at most passively resisting. Accordingly, at this stage, the Court finds the allegations in the Complaint do not establish the affirmative defense of qualified immunity.")

Chatman v. City of Chicago, No. 14 C 2945, 2016 WL 4734361, at *2-4 (N.D. Ill. Sept. 12, 2016) ("The OPS Defendants argue, that even if they had a duty to disclose exculpatory material, such an extension of Brady was not clearly established at the time of Chatman's criminal proceedings. . . . Initially, only the members of the prosecution bore the obligation to disclose material, exculpatory evidence to defense counsel. . . Subsequently, Brady was extended so that the prosecutor's duty to disclose reached evidence in the hands of police officers, even if the information was not known to the prosecutor. . . Although the rule was articulated in terms of a duty by the prosecutor to learn of information held by the police, it has also been understood to establish an independent duty on the part of police officers to disclose such information. See Steidl v. Fermon, 494 F.3d 623, 630–33 (7th Cir. 2007) (holding that the duty of police officers to disclose exculpatory information—which is enforceable under § 1983—has been clearly established since Kyles). That said, neither the Seventh Circuit nor the Supreme Court has addressed whether governmental agencies that are in charge of investigating the police officers themselves—as opposed to the criminal defendant—are also subject to the duty to disclose under Brady. . . . 'Exactly who constitutes a member of the prosecution team is determined using a "case-by-case analysis of the extent of interaction and cooperation between" a potential member of the team and the prosecutor.'. . . In this case, the second amended complaint is bereft of any allegations that the OPS Defendants actively investigated the case against Chatman, acted under the Assistant State's Attorney's supervision, or were involved in crafting trial strategy. In short, there is no indication in the second amended complaint that the OPS Defendants were part of the prosecution team against Chatman. The inquiry that was sparked by the anonymous memo focused on uncovering misconduct by Officer Kato rather than investigating the allegations of rape against Chatman. . . .Because the OPS Defendants were not part of the prosecution team behind Chatman's arrest and conviction (at least, as they are portrayed in the second amended complaint), there was no clearly established law in this circuit tasking them with a duty to disclose the anonymous memo to the defense. . . Chatman relies heavily on the fact that OPS was formally part of the Chicago Police Department. As a result, argues Chatman, the OPS Defendants' duty to disclose under Brady is coextensive with that of the police—which has been clearly established since Kyles. . . But Chatman's reliance upon the organizational relationship between the OPS and the Chicago Police Department ignores the functional inquiry utilized in cases like Morris that asks whether the individual in question participated in the investigation and prosecution of the underlying crime. . . In fact, OPS has since been replaced by the Independent Police Review Authority, which is an entity separate from the Chicago Police Department. . . To rely entirely on CPD's internal organizational structure to determine the bounds of Brady, as Chatman urges here, would invite the type of formalistic departmental compartmentalization denounced in Morris. . . With no Supreme Court or Seventh Circuit cases on point, Chatman turns to out-of-circuit cases to argue that the OPS Defendants clearly had a duty to disclose. The cases he relies on, however, all turn on the prosecutor's duty to search for information held by other government agencies as opposed to the agencies' independent duty to disclose. . . . For these reasons, the Court holds that the duty at issue in this case (assuming that one exists) was not clearly established at the relevant time period. The Court takes no position as to the appropriateness of imposing a duty to disclose on the OPS Defendants under these circumstances, particularly given that they plainly were aware of the ongoing criminal proceedings against Chatman. What is clear, however, is that such a duty was not clearly established at the time the proceedings were taking place.") Sanders v. City of Chicago Heights, No. 13 C 0221, 2016 WL 2866097, at *10 (N.D. Ill. May 17, 2016) ("Because the Court has determined that Sanders has set forth sufficient evidence raising a genuine issue of material fact for trial that Defendant Officers violated his due process rights by employing unnecessarily suggestive identification procedures, the Court addresses whether this due process right was clearly established at the time of the alleged violations in December 1993 and January 1994. . . In support of their argument, Defendant Officers maintain that because there is no set of universally adopted police identification procedures, they are shielded by qualified immunity. In other words, Defendant Officers argue that at the time of the identification procedures at issue, there were no established guidelines for them to follow. Defendant Officers, however, admit that it is 'well established that an officer should not do anything overtly or intentionally to cause the witness to identify a suspect in a photo array or line-up.'. . Defendants' argument about established police procedures misses the mark because whether there were generally accepted police practices for conducting identification procedures does not speak to whether it was clearly established in December 1993 and January 1994 that police officers violated a criminal defendant's due process rights by conducting impermissibly suggestive identification procedures. Indeed, it has been clearly established since at least 1977 that a criminal defendant has a due process right not to be subjected to unduly suggestive identifications that taint his criminal trial. . . As such, Defendant Officers' qualified immunity argument fails.")

Spaulding v. City of Chicago, No. 12 C 8777, 2016 WL 2733232, at *10-13 (N.D. Ill. May 11, 2016) ("The parties agree that Plaintiffs' work for IAD is not protected by the First Amendment. . . They disagree, however, over whether Plaintiffs' reports to the FBI about Watts's illegal activity, and their pre-IAD work for the FBI, are constitutionally protected. . . .Under these precedents [discussed in case], all of which were issued before the retaliatory conduct alleged in this case, Plaintiffs' speech to the FBI—from their initial report to Smith in late 2007 until the August 17, 2008 meeting where the CPD formally assigned them to Operation Brass Tax—is protected by the First Amendment. Prompted by Watson's dismissal of Echeverria's debriefing of the suspect who reported Watts's activity, Plaintiffs reported Watts's misconduct to an outside law enforcement agency, on their own initiative, while off-duty and on their own time. These were not 'the tasks [Plaintiffs were] paid to perform,'. . . and police corruption is, as Defendants concede, . . . a matter of public concern. It follows that Plaintiffs' speech to the FBI before August 17, 2008—when, with their assignment to Detached Services, their reports to the FBI became part of their official CPD duties—is constitutionally protected. . . .As discussed above, the record would allow a reasonable jury to find a First Amendment violation, so Plaintiffs have met their 'burden of establishing that [their] rights were violated' under the first prong of the qualified immunity inquiry. . . For the second element, Plaintiffs submit that ever since the Supreme Court issued Garcetti in 2006, it 'has been clearly established law … that the First Amendment protects a public employee who complains about public corruption in a forum outside of his or her official job duties.'. . As noted above, the Seventh Circuit has applied the Garcetti standard in a variety of contexts. [collecting cases] All of these cases were issued before August 17, 2010, the first alleged act of retaliation in this case. And because the Seventh Circuit—in Chaklos, Chrzanowski, and Houskins—has consistently interpreted Garcetti to hold that the speech of an employee who reports misconduct outside official or established channels is constitutionally protected, reasonable police officers in the defendant officers' position would have known that Plaintiffs' speech to FBI was protected and that any retaliation against them for that speech would violate the First Amendment.")

Herrera v. Pohl, No. 15 C 2983, 2015 WL 7731867, at *7 (N.D. Ill. Dec. 1, 2015)("It was ultimately discovered that Herrera could be charged with an unrelated crime, but that is of no effect when the question is whether he was unlawfully held for the month preceding the issuance of a warrant in that other case. The wheels that ultimately resulted in the indictment's dismissal were set in motion too late because Houpt and Knudsen failed in their duty to consider evidence at their ready disposal that at a glance would have resolved whether they had the wrong man. . . .Houpt and Knudsen raise the defense of qualified immunity, a defense that should be decided at as early a stage as is consistent with the liberal notice pleading requirements of Rule 8 . . . .Houpt and Knudsen cannot . . . take refuge by simply pointing to the absence of clearly analogous caselaw. Law enforcement personnel do not get a free pass for shocking and egregious abuses of power simply because those abuses mark an innovation in the catalogue of shocking and egregious abuses of power. And their conduct as alleged by Herrera (and as necessarily credited at this threshold stage) does fit under the well-established rubric of Hankins, BeVier and Armstrong, which possess the appropriate specificity to have put a reasonable officer on notice that he had a duty to act.")

Vaughn v. City of Chicago, 14 C 47, 2014 WL 3865838, *3, *4 (N.D. Ill. Aug. 5, 2014) ("At the motion to dismiss stage, Defendants are not entitled to the inference that their actions left Vaughn no worse off than when he returned to the scene with a stick in hand. . . It is plausible that Vaughn was safer with a stick in his hand than he was after Defendants ordered him to drop it. In simple terms, Defendants made Vaughn an easier target for would-be assailants in the rival group than he otherwise would have been. This marginal increase in risk is sufficient to state a plausible state-created danger claim. . . . [A]n individual has clearly established rights not be stranded (Paine) or trapped (Monfils) in dangerous situations that state actors either created or made more perilous. . . Plaintiff's claim falls within this clearly established line of cases. Defendants stranded Vaughn in a dangerous situation by ordering him to drop the object he intended to use for self-protection and simply watching while he was bludgeoned to death. The same police actions placed Vaughn in a trap of sorts by making him an easy target for the man who killed him. In short, Defendants are not entitled to dismissal on qualified immunity grounds because Plaintiff's claim is based on clearly established due process rights.")

T.V. ex rel. B.V. v. Smith-Green Community School Corp., 2011 WL 3501698, at *17 (N.D. Ind. 2011) ("Principal Couch has qualified immunity from damages because, on the current state of the developing law in this context, particularly involving student speech originating off-campus and by use of the internet, Couch's actions could reasonably have been thought to be consistent with the rights they are alleged to have violated.")

Husband v. Turner , No. 07-CV-391-bbc, 2008 WL 2002737, at *4, *5 (W.D. Wis. May 6, 2008) ("Defendants contend that plaintiff's right to a Miranda warning under the circumstances of the in-school interrogation was not so clear that reasonable officers would have known that failure to give a Miranda warning would violate plaintiff's Fifth Amendment rights. Defendants are correct. No precedent addresses the custodial nature of school interrogations by police officers. Moreover, although no case on point is necessary where the constitutional violation is obvious, . . . this is not such an obvious case. In the circumstances of plaintiff's interrogation, it was not so evident that a Miranda warning was required that defendants should have reasonably known that a lack of such a warning would violate plaintiff's constitutional rights. Accordingly, when defendants interrogated plaintiff on April 12, 2002, his right to a Miranda warning was not clearly established. Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity for their failure to give such a warning. Moreover, although defendants do not raise this argument, it was not even clear in 2002 that a failure to give a Miranda warning was a violation of a constitutional right and not simply a ground for excluding evidence obtained from a suspect before the warning was given. At the time, no opinion from the Supreme Court or the Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit held that a failure to give a Miranda warning violated a person's constitutional rights. . . Indeed, courts in other circuits had explained that a failure to give a Miranda warning was not a constitutional violation.[citing cases] Some courts have suggested that the Supreme Court repudiated this rationale in 2000 in Dickerson v. United States, 530 U.S. 428 (2000), in which the Court stated that Miranda announced a 'constitutional rule.' . . However, Dickerson did not hold that a violation of Miranda is a violation of the Fifth Amendment. . . The Court declined the invitation to 'go farther than Miranda' and refused to say that 'Miranda warnings are required by the Constitution.'. . . In the absence of clear Supreme Court authority, a failure to give a Miranda warning was not clearly established as a constitutional violation until *Sornberge*r, 434 F.3d 1006, was decided in 2006. Sornberger held that if a suspect's statement were used against him in a 'criminal case,' a Miranda violation was actionable under § 1983 (and therefore a constitutional violation). . . Because it was not clearly established until 2006 that a failure to give a Miranda warning was a constitutional violation, defendants are entitled to qualified immunity for their failure to give plaintiff a Miranda warning on April 12, 2002.").

West v. Frank, No. 04-C-173-C, 2005 WL 701703, at 5-7 (W.D. Wis. Mar. 25, 2005)(not reported) ("Defendants do not try to defend the constitutionality of the decisions to deny plaintiff the downloaded internet materials sent to him under the old version of DOC 309 IMP 1. They do not argue that any penological interest was furthered by denying plaintiff the materials sent to him by his family and they do not try to show any reasonable relation between their actions and any penological interest. Instead, they argue that plaintiff's right to receive internet materials was not clearly established at the time the original version of DOC 309 IMP I was in effect. Because the policy burdens plaintiff's First Amendment right to receive mail and because there is no record evidence of any legitimate penological interest served by the restriction, I must conclude that the policy violated plaintiff's First Amendment rights. . . Plaintiff frames the right at issue in this case as an inmate's 'right to information,' which was recognized in Turner. Although that case did not establish or recognize this right explicitly, it did acknowledge implicitly that prison inmates have protected interests in sending and receiving mail. . . It is reasonable to infer that these interests grow out of an underlying interest inmates have in receiving and sending information. Thus, plaintiff's contention is not an incorrect statement of the law. For the purpose of the 'clearly established' inquiry, however, the right identified by plaintiff is too broad because it fails to incorporate the specific factual context of this case. . . The fact that an inmate's right to information was clearly established at the time defendants' denied plaintiff's mail would not put defendants on notice that the reason why plaintiff's mail was denied in this case was constitutionally suspect. The proper formulation of the right at issue in this case is an inmate's right to receive and possess materials downloaded from the internet. To date, neither the United States Supreme Court nor the Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit has held that a prison policy prohibiting inmates from receiving internet materials violates the First Amendment. . . The lack of controlling authority in plaintiff's favor does not foreclose the possibility of finding a right clearly established if there is 'such a clear trend in the case law that we can say with fair assurance that the recognition of the right by controlling precedent was merely a matter of time.' . . . . From August 2003 to February 2004, the time during which defendants denied delivery of plaintiff's mail, Clement [v. California Dept. of Corrections, 364 F.3d 1148 (9th Cir.2004)] was the only case fairly on point. One case does not constitute a clear trend in the law. Given the sometimes extensive curtailment of constitutional rights in the prison setting, the limitation imposed by the earlier version of DOC 309 IMP 1 was not so obviously unconstitutional that reasonable persons in defendants' shoes would have known they were violating plaintiff's First Amendment rights by refusing delivery of his mail.").

EIGHTH CIRCUIT

Karels v. Storz, No. 17-2527, 2018 WL 4957704, at *5 (8th Cir. Oct. 15, 2018) ("Blazek and Wertish do not establish that the slightest resistance justifies any subsequent use of force by an officer, as Storz seems to argue. They instead establish that an officer may use 'somewhat more force' on a 'passively resistant' suspect. The evidence here would support a finding that Karels was not 'passively resistant.' A jury could find that she did not have time to comply with Storz's command to put her hands behind her back before he used significant force against her. A jury could also consider Norlin's use-of-force review form, on which he did not check the box marked 'passive resistance' in describing Karels's actions. Whether a reasonable officer would have interpreted Karels as being resistant—either passively or actively—is a disputed question of fact that a jury must decide. As set forth above, a jury could find that Karels did not resist at all and that a reasonable officer would have known that she was not resisting. . .Viewing the facts in the appropriate light, several cases establish that every reasonable officer would have understood that he could not forcefully take down Karels—a nonviolent, nonthreatening misdemeanant who was not actively resisting arrest or attempting to flee—in the allegedly violent and uncontrolled manner that Storz did . . .To the extent Storz argues that these cases present different facts and circumstances, 'there is no requirement that [the plaintiff] must find a case where "the very action in question has previously been held unlawful,". . . so long as "existing precedent [has] placed the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate[.]"'")

Kelsay v. Ernst, 905 F.3d 1081, 1085 (8th Cir. 2018) ("It was not clearly established in May 2014 that a deputy was forbidden to use a takedown maneuver to arrest a suspect who ignored the deputy's instruction to 'get back here' and continued to walk away from the officer. We held in Ehlers v. City of Rapid City, 846 F.3d 1002 (8th Cir. 2017), that an officer did not violate the Fourth Amendment by executing a takedown of a nonviolent misdemeanant when the officer twice ordered the suspect to place his hands behind his back, but the suspect continued walking away. . . The court concluded that a reasonable officer would interpret the subject's behavior as 'noncompliant,' and reasoned that he 'at least appeared to be resisting' when he continued to walk away, so the officer was 'entitled to use the force necessary to effect the arrest.'. . Under Kelsay's version of the facts, Ernst told Kelsay only once to 'get back here' before she continued to walk away, but even if there might be a constitutionally significant distinction between one command and two, no such rule was clearly established when Ernst made his arrest. None of the decisions cited by the district court or Kelsay involved a suspect who ignored an officer's command and walked away, so they could not clearly establish the unreasonableness of using force under the particular circumstances here. The constitutionality of Ernst's takedown was not beyond debate, and he is thus entitled to qualified immunity. . . . A reasonable officer thus could interpret Ehlers to mean that it is reasonable to execute a takedown when a nonviolent misdemeanant ignores two commands. If that was the law in 2017, then it was not obvious or beyond debate in 2014 that an officer was forbidden to execute a takedown when a nonviolent misdemeanant ignored one command. For these reasons, the order of the district court denying qualified immunity is reversed.")

Kelsay v. Ernst, 905 F.3d 1081, 1085-86 (8th Cir. 2018) (Beam, J., concurring) ("I concur in the court's reversal of this matter. But, I do so somewhat advisedly because of the extant but confusing precedent available to the district court at that time. And, speaking parenthetically, the slamming of this lady to the ground by the deputy with force sufficient to fracture her shoulder was uncalled for given the nature of the encounter underway.")

Kelsay v. Ernst, 905 F.3d 1081, 1086-87 (8th Cir. 2018) (Smith, C.J., dissenting) ("I respectfully dissent. The court rightfully concludes that in May 2014, case law did not clearly establish 'that a deputy was forbidden to use a takedown maneuver to arrest a suspect who ignored the deputy's instruction to "get back here" and continued to walk away from the officer.'. . But, 'in an obvious case,' the clearly-established prong can be met 'even without a body of relevant case law.'. . Prior case law is unnecessary where 'a general constitutional rule already identified in the decisional law [applies] with obvious clarity to the specific conduct in question.'. . This is such a case. . . . Given the facts, a reasonable officer on the scene would have known that a full-body takedown of a small and nonviolent misdemeanant was excessive under the circumstances. Deputy Ernst was entitled to use the force necessary to effect an arrest. However, a jury might decide that Deputy Ernst used substantially more force than necessary.")

Wilson v. Lamp, 901 F.3d 981, 990-91 (8th Cir. 2018) ("The officers' drawing and pointing of weapons as they approached the truck, which they reasonably believed was being driven by David, was not excessive. But Levi and M.W. say that the officers kept their weapons drawn and pointed at them throughout the incident even after they realized the driver was Levi, not David, the passenger was M.W., a child, and the officers had patted Levi down. . . On the facts here, the continuous drawing and pointing of weapons constitutes excessive-force. . . .Finally, the officers argue that the law is not clearly established, claiming that this court has not recognized excessive force under similar facts. To the contrary, an officer's 'use of force against a suspect who was not threatening and not resisting' is unreasonable. [collecting cases] The district court correctly concluded that the officers were not entitled to qualified immunity on the excessive force claim.")

Ross v. City of Jackson, Missouri, 897 F.3d 916, 922-23 (8th Cir. 2018) ("Viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to Ross, the officers saw the comment, discovered where Ross worked, and then went to his job site with the sole intent of placing him under arrest. Ross tried to explain what was meant by his comment and provide the officers with more context about the post, but the officers did not give him that opportunity until after he was booked at the police station. . . And, after interviewing Ross, officers indicated that they did not think the charges would stick, i.e., they did not believe he had truly made a 'terrorist threat.' Ross was nonetheless charged and held in custody for several days until he was able to post bail. In sum, it is beyond debate that—had the officers engaged in minimal further investigation—the only reasonable conclusion was that Ross had not violated § 574.115.1(3). . . We reverse the district court's grant of summary judgment to the officers based on qualified immunity and remand the case for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.")

Neal v. Ficcadenti, 895 F.3d 576, 582 (8th Cir. 2018) ("Neal has provided adequate evidence that he neither posed a threat to anyone's safety nor resisted arrest at the time that Officer Ficcadenti executed the arm-bar takedown. We are satisfied that these facts, construed in a light most favorable to Neal, establish a violation of a constitutional right to be free from unreasonable and excessive force. . . We turn now to the question of whether or not the constitutional right that Officer Ficcadenti allegedly violated was clearly established as of June 6, 2012. We have said many times that '[t]he right to be free from excessive force in the context of an arrest is clearly established under the Fourth Amendment's prohibition against unreasonable searches and seizures.'. . The 'salient question' is whether the state of the law at the time the force was exerted gave Officer Ficcadenti 'fair warning' that his alleged treatment of Neal was unconstitutional. . . In June 2012, the state of the law would have given a reasonable officer fair warning that using physical force against a suspect who was not resisting or threatening anyone was unlawful. . . .After construing the facts in a light most favorable to Neal, i.e. that he was fully compliant at the time that Officer Ficcadenti applied the arm-bar takedown maneuver on him, that conduct violated a clearly established constitutional right on June 6, 2012. The district court correctly concluded that this is one of those relatively rare cases in which a question of fact is presented for the ultimate finder of fact and qualified immunity does not apply.")

Dean v. Searcey, 893 F.3d 504, 518-19 (8th Cir. 2018) ("In both White and Winslow, we examined the deputies' actions and found that a jury could believe that they 'conducted a conscience-shocking reckless investigation ... that was used to box' Appellees in. . . And we held—relying on Supreme Court precedent and this Court's holding in Wilson v. Lawrence County, 260 F.3d 946 (8th Cir. 2001)—that the prohibitions against their actions were clearly established in 1989. The deputies argue that it was improper to rely on 'general statements of the law' in reaching the latter conclusion. But, Pauly explicitly reaffirmed that 'general statements of the law are not inherently incapable of giving fair and clear warning' so long as 'the unlawfulness ... [is] apparent.'. . There is no doubt that the conduct we described above and in prior opinions is (and was) unlawful. . . Indeed, 'if any concept is fundamental to our American system of justice, it is that those charged with upholding the law are prohibited from ... framing individuals for crimes they did not commit.'. . The jury was warranted in concluding that this is exactly what happened through the reckless investigation here. The prohibition on using official power to frame individuals is deeply embedded in the historical roots of due process. . . . The Supreme Court—long before 1989—recognized this as well. . .To put it simply, this is not a case like many Fourth Amendment cases, where the 'specificity of the rule is especially important' because 'officers will often find it difficult to know how' the Constitution applies in 'the precise situation encountered.'. . Instead, this is an ' "obvious case,"' where the 'unlawfulness of the [deputies'] conduct is sufficiently clear.'. . The evidence supports the conclusion that the deputies 'knowingly violate[d],'. . . the due process rights of the Appellees by applying 'systematic pressure' to implicate the Appellees and by 'purposefully ignor[ing]' exonerating evidence. . . The illegality of this was well-established long before 1989. Thus, our prior determination holds: qualified immunity does not shield the deputies.")

Cravener v. Shuster, 885 F.3d 1135, 1140-41 (8th Cir. 2018) ("Cravener argues his case is unique because he was not engaged in criminal activity, and thus the force greatly exceeded the need. True, Cravener's lack of criminal activity is an important consideration in the qualified immunity analysis. However, officers may seize a person 'in order to ensure the safety of the public and/or the individual, regardless of any suspected criminal activity.'. . Here, the deputies were called to the house to ensure Cravener's safety. This court has found no excessive force where the subject was not currently engaged in criminal activity or resisting arrest. . .Cravener also argues the deputies faced no imminent harm because Cravener was unarmed and was passively, not actively, resisting. Even if Cravener were passively resisting, this argument fails. Unarmed, passively resisting subjects can pose a threat necessitating the use of taser force. . . .Deputy Calvin also is entitled to qualified immunity based on the second inquiry because 'even if the reasonableness of [his] actions was questionable,' Cravener cannot 'show that a reasonable officer would have been on notice that the officers' conduct violated a clearly established right.'. . Because of the significant similarities between this case and De Boise—with no intervening Eighth Circuit case between 2008 and 2013—De Boise controls here. '[N]o reasonable officer, observing [Cravener's] behavior, would have understood the actions taken to be so disproportionate and unnecessary as to amount to a violation of [Cravener's] rights.'. .The district court erred in denying qualified immunity.")

Estate of Walker v. Wallace, 881 F.3d 1056, 1060-62 (8th Cir. 2018) ("The district court denied Wallace qualified immunity because, if the jury believed the plaintiffs' version of the facts, then the evidence 'could show that the consent was not voluntary.' True, but that is not the correct inquiry. The correct inquiry is whether, even if we construe the facts in a light most favorable to the plaintiffs, a reasonable official in Wallace's position would have known that he was violating the constitution when he searched the plaintiffs' house after receiving signed consent to do so in the particular circumstances. We believe that Wallace, at worst, made a bad guess in a gray area of the law—but the law gave him the breathing room to make such a guess. First, determining whether consent is voluntary requires a highly particular look at all the relevant circumstances. . . .Since questions of consent necessarily turn on the particular facts of a case, it may be hard to show that prior decisions should have put Wallace on notice that his search under the circumstances was unconstitutional or that every reasonable official in his position would have understood that he was violating a constitutional right. . . We do not mean that officials are always entitled to qualified immunity when dealing with questions of consent; it is easy to imagine facts that would alert a reasonable person that consent was not voluntarily given. We mean only to emphasize that officials should be given some leeway when acting in legally murky environments. We believe that both the plaintiffs and the district court defined the right in question here too generally. The plaintiffs focus on the presumptive unreasonableness of searching a house (whether for evidence of a crime or for building code violations) without a warrant. The district court began its analysis with the observation that a government official's warrantless entry into a house does not violate the Fourth Amendment when one voluntarily consents to the entry, only to note then that consent may not have been voluntarily given here. But 'clearly established law should not be defined at a high level of generality' and must be particularized to the facts of the case so that the unlawfulness of an official's actions are apparent. . . Context is critical in determining qualified immunity in Fourth Amendment cases. . . The first principles that the district court and the plaintiffs emphasized can only go so far. Nowhere do they identify any case applying these first principles in a context sufficiently similar to the situation in which Wallace found himself when he searched the plaintiffs' house. Though the plaintiffs need not provide a case directly on point, some existing precedent must place the question beyond debate, or the conduct must be so obviously unconstitutional that no precedent is needed. . . The plaintiffs have failed to carry their burden on this point. . . . A single case, which is not even a binding precedent in the district in which it was decided, seems hardly enough to count as one that establishes a clear legal principle. One swallow does not a summer make. For these reasons, the plaintiffs have not carried their burden to show that the unconstitutional nature of Wallace's conduct was clearly established. We therefore reverse and remand for further proceedings.")

Morgan v. Robinson, 881 F.3d 646, 656-57 (8th Cir. 2018) ("Since we have determined that Morgan's speech was protected, his termination was an adverse employment action sufficient to violate his First Amendment rights. . . We therefore turn to the second inquiry, under which '[t]he relevant question ... is this: Could [Robinson] reasonably have believed, at the time he fired [Morgan], that a government employer could fire an employee on account of' the employee exercising his First Amendment right to free speech during a run for political office, where that speech had no disruptive impact on office functioning? . . .The answer to this question is an unequivocal "no.". . .[P]ublic officials have been on notice since the Court decided Pickering in 1968 that they may not sanction an employee for uttering protected speech when that speech neither impacts the employee's official duties nor detracts from office efficiency. This is all the more true given the context in which Morgan spoke here: a political campaign, where 'the First Amendment has its fullest and most urgent application.'. . To the extent that there remains any ambiguity, we hold that a public employee cannot be terminated for making protected statements during a campaign for public office where that speech has no demonstrated impact on the efficiency of office operations.")

Lyons v. Vaught, 875 F.3d 1168, 1173-76 & n.4 (8th Cir. 2017) ("Throughout this litigation, Lyons has conceded and the district court has acknowledged, correctly in our view, that his speech during the student appeal process was unprotected employee grievance. . . However, in denying defendants qualified immunity, the district court concluded that the meeting with Chancellor Morton was not 'part of [Lyons's] job duties,' that 'academic improprieties involving interscholastic athletes is an issue of public concern,' that Eighth Circuit cases prior to Garcetti 'clearly established that a public employee had a First Amendment right to speak on maters of a public concern so long as that speech was not part of the employee's job duties,' and that Garcetti did not change that law. We disagree. . . .Determining whether an employee's speech was pursuant to his official duties is a practical inquiry. . . . Here the central focus is whether it was clearly established that Lyons's speech at the meeting with Chancellor Morton was as a citizen, not a part-time lecturer. . . .Under Garcetti, 'a public employee speaks without First Amendment protection when he reports conduct that interferes with his job responsibilities, even if the report is made outside his chain of command.'. . Did Lyons transform what began as unprotected speech pursuant to his duties as a lecturer into protected speech by virtue of speaking more broadly about the issue to both the UMKC Chancellor and 'community leaders'? Perhaps. But Vaught and Bassa could reasonably conclude that Lyons spoke solely as an aggrieved lecturer in asking Chancellor Morton to investigate grading policies for student athletes. In these circumstances, Lyons has failed to show, using the particularized inquiry required, that his right to make this speech in these circumstances was clearly established. . . . Garcetti left open the question whether its holding would apply to 'speech related to scholarship or teaching.'. . In our view, this case does not involve speech related to scholarship or teaching. . . But in any event, the law is no more clearly established even if Garcetti is persuasive but not controlling precedent.")

Hansen v. Black, 872 F.3d 554, 559-60 (8th Cir. 2017) ("Even assuming a constitutional violation, Trooper Black is entitled to qualified immunity because his conduct did not violate a clearly established Fourth Amendment right. To avoid qualified immunity, Hansen must show that existing precedent placed Trooper Black's conduct 'beyond debate.'. . Hansen has not cited, and we have not found, any case concluding that an officer violated the Fourth Amendment when he shot and killed an unrestrained, unsupervised dog creating a serious risk to public safety and avoiding numerous attempts to control him without force.")

Hoyland v. McMenomy, 869 F.3d 644, 653-55 & n.4 (8th Cir. 2017) ("We hold that, under Minnesota law, it was not objectively reasonable for these officers to believe they had probable cause to arrest Hoyland for obstruction. This case is far removed from the examples of 'obstruction' described above. Here, Hoyland stood in his own lighted doorway, on his own property, some 30-40 feet from the officers and his wife. The officers almost immediately saw that he held a camera and not any kind of weapon in his hands. No more than twenty seconds elapsed from Hoyland's first words spoken from his doorway to McMenomy's shout of 'you are under arrest.'. . . However reasonable the command for Hoyland to go back inside may have been, his refusal to do so did not constitute obstruction. As Minnesota law makes abundantly clear, obstruction must be either physical obstruction or verbal conduct, such as fighting words, that has the effect of physically obstructing officers in the performance of their duties. Nowhere in Minnesota law does mere physical presence at a distance constitute obstruction. So arresting Hoyland for obstruction due to his continued presence in his doorway was unreasonable under state law. Even when we consider his verbal conduct, no reasonable officer could construe his shouting as 'physically obstructing or interfering' in the officers' performance of their duties. . . . The officers are therefore denied qualified immunity for Hoyland's Fourth Amendment claim. . . . As to whether it was objectively reasonable for the officers to believe that probable cause existed to seize Hoyland as he stood in his doorway, the dissent contends that the fact that the state prosecutor resisted dismissal of the charge of obstructing legal process against Hoyland 'is as significant as the decision of the state judge to dismiss the charge.' No authority is provided for this proposition and, indeed, it is the lack of neutrality and detachment that disqualifies prosecutors, who have a 'responsibility to law enforcement,' from a role in the ultimate probable cause determination.")

Hoyland v. McMenomy, 869 F.3d 644, 658-61 (8th Cir. 2017) (Colloton, J., dissenting) ("Notably absent from the majority opinion is any mention of the Supreme Court's several recent decisions reversing denials of qualified immunity by the courts of appeals. The Court explained that these opinions were necessary 'both because qualified immunity is important to society as a whole, and because as an immunity from suit, qualified immunity is effectively lost if a case is erroneously permitted to go to trial.'. . .The officers are entitled to qualified immunity on both claims if they had 'arguable probable cause' to make an arrest. The Fourth Amendment requires probable cause to arrest, but if police make an objectively reasonable mistake about the existence of probable cause, then they have 'arguable probable cause' and are immune from suit. . .A First Amendment retaliation claim fails if the police had arguable probable cause to arrest. . . .Viewing the situation more broadly, Hoyland's repeated argumentative refusals to comply with police commands at an active arrest scene also gave police at least arguable probable cause to believe that he violated § 609.50. Although the Minnesota Supreme Court wrote in response to a vagueness challenge that the statute is directed at 'physically obstructing or interfering' with an officer, . . . the few decisions applying the statute show that it encompasses violations that do not involve physical contact between an offender and a police officer. . . .We must address qualified immunity 'in light of the specific context of the case,'. . . yet there is no Minnesota court decision applying the statute to alleged obstruction by a third party at an active arrest scene. What constitutes obstruction of an officer may well be different at an active arrest scene than in the reception area at police headquarters. Hoyland refused seven times to comply with commands of police officers. It was reasonable to believe that his conduct substantially hindered the officers who were attempting to control the scene, by creating a new security concern and by preventing the officers from focusing their attention on the two suspects who were apprehended at Hoyland's residence after fleeing. Hoyland's persistence in refusing to comply supported an objectively reasonable belief in probable cause that he intentionally resisted or interfered. It was not beyond debate that the statute encompassed the interruptions and refusals directed at the desk officer in Occhino, and the loud and repetitive interruptions of the officers issuing citations in Hanson, but did not proscribe Hoyland's interruptions and distraction of police officers at an active arrest scene.")

Div. of Employment Sec. v. Bd. of Police Commissioners, 864 F.3d 974, 979 (8th Cir. 2017) ("Although Supreme Court precedent 'do[es] not require a case directly on point for a right to be clearly established, existing precedent must have placed the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate.'. . 'Our prior cases have clearly established that use of [a] taser on a nonfleeing, nonviolent suspected misdemeanant [is] unreasonable.'. . Where a suspect is neither fleeing nor resisting arrest and does not pose a threat to the safety of the officers, it is 'unreasonable for [an officer] to use more than de minimis force against' the suspect. . . In light of Gurley's compliance with the officers' demands, it was therefore beyond debate at the time of the events in question that the officers could not reasonably use more than de minimis force against Gurley.")

Gerlich v. Leath, 861 F.3d 697, 708-09 (8th Cir. 2017) ("We conclude that it was clearly established at the time that ISU's [Iowa State University's] trademark licensing program was a limited public forum. Defendants argue that they did not violate clearly established law because at the time of this dispute the contours of the government speech doctrine were not clearly established. It was clearly established, however, that the government speech doctrine does not insulate a state actor from First Amendment scrutiny when the state has created a limited public forum for speech. . . . Like the university in Rosenberger, ISU was not engaging in government speech in this case because it had created a limited public forum to facilitate speech by private persons. . . Moreover, ISU's trademark licensing program was capable of accommodating a large number of student groups without defeating its essential function. . . Because ISU's trademark licensing program facilitated the speech of private persons and was capable of accommodating a large number of speakers, ISU's administration of that program was not government speech under clearly established law. The next question is whether at that time it was clearly established that a university may not discriminate on the basis of viewpoint in a limited public forum. It has long been recognized that if a university creates a limited public forum, it may not engage in viewpoint discrimination within that forum. . . . Given this history, plaintiffs' right not to be subjected to viewpoint discrimination while speaking in a university's limited public forum was thus clearly established at the times in question. Because defendants violated plaintiffs' clearly established First Amendment rights, the district court did not err by denying qualified immunity to defendants and granting plaintiffs summary judgment on their First Amendment claims.")

Gerlich v. Leath, 861 F.3d 697, 717 (8th Cir. 2017) (Loken, J., dissenting) ("Repeatedly, the Supreme Court has cautioned that 'clearly established law should not be defined at a high level of generality.' White v. Pauly, 137 S. Ct. 548, 552 (2017) (quotations omitted). Rather, 'clearly established law must be particularized to the facts of the case.'. . In a public school or university setting, 'educators are rarely denied immunity from liability arising out of First-Amendment disputes. The rare exceptions involve scenarios in which a factually analogous precedent clearly established the disputed conduct as unconstitutional.'. . The court cites no case in which school officials administering a trademark licensing program violated, or were even accused of violating, the First Amendment by denying proposed uses of the school's registered trademark. This case presents two uncertain First Amendment issues that warrant qualified immunity: (1) whether a trademark licensing program that allows student groups to associate their messages with the university's symbol or logo is a form of government speech or a limited public forum; and (2) if the program is a limited public forum, whether administrators' decisions to restrict the licensing of designs associating the university with unsafe or illegal activities such as drug use constitute unlawful viewpoint discrimination or permissible content regulation.")

Perry v. Woodruff County Sheriff Dep't, 858 F.3d 1141, 1146 (8th Cir. 2017) ("Wolfe raises a two-fold challenge to our conclusion about the clearly established nature of the Fourth Amendment violation. She first claims that under White v. Pauly, 137 S. Ct. 548 (2017), it was not clearly established that she was prohibited from relying on Clark's judgments about the need to use force against Perry. Next, she asserts that Perry's claim founders on Chambers v. Pennycook, 641 F.3d 898 (8th Cir. 2011), because Perry only alleged de minimis injuries and under Pennycook, such injuries could not serve as the basis for excessive-force claims until 2011. Both her arguments are unavailing. In White, the Supreme Court held that '[c]learly established federal law does not prohibit a reasonable officer who arrives late to an ongoing police action ... from assuming that proper procedures ... have already been followed. No settled Fourth Amendment principle requires that officer to second-guess the earlier steps already taken by his or her fellow officers.'. . White is inapplicable to our case because it addresses a wholly different set of facts. As noted above, Wolfe was on the scene at the time of the incident and testified that she viewed the entire interaction between Perry and Clark. As a result, Smith governs this case, and Perry's Fourth Amendment right to be free from excessive force was clearly established. Wolfe responds that even if she used excessive force against Perry, he suffered only de minimis injuries as a result of her conduct. In Pennycook, decided in 2011, we held for the first time 'that a citizen may prove an unreasonable seizure based on an excessive use of force without necessarily showing more than de minimis injury.'. . While it is true that a de minimis injury could not serve as the basis for an excessive-force claim in August 2009, the record indicates that Perry suffered more than de minimis injuries such that Pennycook does not apply.")

Williams v. Tucker, 857 F.3d 765, 770-71 (8th Cir. 2017) ("Tucker argues that even if he violated Jenkins' First Amendment right to support an electoral candidate, the contours of that right were not clearly established at the time of any such violation. Tucker frames the right at issue as the right to remain a full time court employee, but the issue is properly characterized as whether Tucker impermissibly retaliated against Jenkins by causing her to become a part time employee. It is clearly established 'that a government employer cannot take adverse employment actions against its employees for exercising their First Amendment rights' by participating in electoral activities. . . This right was clearly established at the time of the alleged violation.")

De La Rosa v. White, 852 F.3d 740, 745-47 (8th Cir. 2017) ("[I]n this case, the Fourth Amendment issue is whether an officer had reasonable suspicion justifying a warrantless investigative detention, rather than probable cause to arrest or search. Thus, Trooper White is entitled to qualified immunity if a reasonable officer could have believed that he had a reasonable suspicion; in other words, if he had arguable reasonable suspicion. . . In this case, we find no controlling Eighth Circuit authority placing the question beyond debate, nor a 'robust consensus of cases of persuasive authority.' More recent Eighth Circuit decisions have distinguished Jones and Beck, the cases on which the district court primarily relied, in finding no Fourth Amendment violations, let alone violations of clearly established Fourth Amendment law. . . Rather than 'a robust consensus of cases of persuasive authority' favoring the district court's resolution of this difficult issue, our prior cases have found reasonable suspicion upholding the extension of traffic stops by officers relying on similar facts[.] [discussing cases] To be sure, on the merits, the existence of reasonable suspicion was a close question, because the facts on which Trooper White relied, taken together, did not raise as strong a suspicion of interstate drug trafficking as in prior cases such as Riley and Lebrun. But White relied on facts presenting substantial similarities with prior cases in which reasonable suspicion of drug trafficking was found and extension of a traffic stop was upheld. In recent years, the Supreme Court has repeatedly reversed decisions denying qualified immunity where lower courts 'misunderstood the "clearly established" analysis.' White v. Pauly, 137 S. Ct. 548, 552 (2017). To avoid qualified immunity, De La Rosa must show a 'a robust consensus of cases of persuasive authority.' Here, there is no consensus to be found in the prior decisions that have resolved a fact-intensive Fourth Amendment issue under a governing standard that requires judges to 'allow[ ] officers to draw on their own experience and specialized training to make inferences from and deductions about the cumulative information available to them that might well elude an untrained person.' . . Trooper White is therefore entitled to qualified immunity from De La Rosa's damage claims.")

Ehlers v. City of Rapid City, 846 F.3d 1002, 1012 (8th Cir. 2017) ("The law did not clearly establish in December 2010 that the use of an arm bar in this context constitutes excessive force. Indeed, the only instance in which we have considered the merits of the use of an arm bar occurred after 2010 and concerned an arm bar as a takedown maneuver, not as a method of handcuffing a suspect. See Hicks v. Norwood, 640 F.3d 839, 842 (8th Cir. 2011). More broadly, we have held that officers may use force to handcuff a suspect who is resisting, even if that force causes pain. See, e.g., Blazek v. City of Iowa City, 761 F.3d 920, 924 (8th Cir. 2014) (analyzing the state of the law in 2009). The only cases Ehlers provides to support a finding of clearly established law concern the use of force against an individual who is not resisting. . . As discussed above, the officers reasonably interpreted Ehlers's behavior as resistance. The officers also reasonably considered Ehlers's free hand a potential threat. . . As a result, Ehlers's cases are inapposite. A reasonable officer would not have understood the action in question to constitute excessive force. . . Thus, the law was not clearly established, and Rybak is entitled to qualified immunity.")

Jenkins v. Univ. of Minnesota, 838 F.3d 938, 947 (8th Cir. 2016) ("Swem does not dispute that the right to be free of sexual harassment in the workplace is clearly established, but asks us to take a very narrow view of the contours of that right here. He insists that a reasonable public official would not have known that his comments, 'void of any physical conduct,' could amount to sexual harassment. We find this argument unavailing. Our case law clearly establishes that physical contact is not required to make out a hostile-work-environment claim. . . We find that the right Swem violated was clearly established. Swem then argues that a reasonable official in his position would not have known the conduct was unlawful because he did not receive any sexual harassment training from UM and lacked specific knowledge of UM's sexual harassment policy. 'A reasonably competent public official should know the law governing his conduct.'. . A person such as Swem, who has had prior experience working with and supervising students, should be aware that sexual harassment violates a student's clearly established rights, even in the absence of specific training. . . Because we find that Jenkins has satisfied both prongs of the qualified immunity analysis, we agree with the district court that Swem was not entitled to qualified immunity or summary judgment on that basis.")

Gilmore v. City of Minneapolis, 837 F.3d 827, 834 (8th Cir. 2016) ("Because the law regarding warrantless misdemeanor arrests for offenses committed outside the presence of the arresting officer is not clearly established under the Fourth Amendment, the arresting officers are entitled to qualified immunity on Gilmore's constitutional claim.")

Stewart v. Wagner, 836 F.3d 978, 982-86 (8th Cir. 2016) ("[W]e note that, while a prosecutor's duty to disclose is absolute, to recover damages from other law enforcement officials for a Brady violation, a § 1983 plaintiff must prove the requisite mens rea. In denying investigators Wagner and Choate summary judgment on this claim, the district court adopted the amorphous 'bad faith' mens rea standard set forth in White v. McKinley, 519 F.3d 806, 814 (8th Cir. 2008), rather than the more precise standard adopted in our earlier, and therefore controlling, opinion in Villasana v. Wilhoit, 368 F.3d 976, 980 (8th Cir. 2004) – 'Brady ensures that the defendant will obtain relief from a conviction tainted by the State's nondisclosure of materially favorable evidence, regardless of fault, but the recovery of § 1983 damages requires proof that a law enforcement officer other than the prosecutor intended to deprive the defendant of a fair trial.' (Emphasis added.) The district court must apply this controlling standard when the issue again arises on remand, whether before, during, or after trial. . . .[A] § 1983 plaintiff's claim that he was arrested or prosecuted without probable cause, even if labeled a claim of malicious prosecution, 'must be judged' under the Fourth Amendment, not substantive due process. . . We recognized in Moran that additional considerations in a particular case may trigger substantive due process protection, like the impact of 'falsely-created evidence and other defamatory actions' on a public employee plaintiff's career, and the equal protection interest in not being investigated or punished on account of race, that were present in that case. . . But here, Stewart was not a public employee, race was not an issue, and the alleged fabricated evidence was only used in a probable cause statement. Thus, the general rule in Oliver applies, and the district court committed an error of law in not judging the actions of Selby and Wagner under the Fourth Amendment. . . .We note that the preliminary hearing at which Kimberling testified was nearly two months after charges were filed based on Wagner's probable cause statement. Stewart did not gain pretrial release or dismissal of the charges at that hearing, which strongly suggests that the presence of arguable probable cause was overwhelming. On this record, we conclude it was error to deny Prosecutor Selby qualified immunity on this claim because Stewart failed to present sufficient evidence that Wagner and Selby violated 'clearly established [Fourth Amendment] rights of which a reasonable person would have known.'. . .If this were an appeal from the denial of a motion to suppress or exclude the testimony of Parker and Pollard, or from the denial of a properly preserved federal habeas claim, we might well agree there is sufficient evidence of a Sixth Amendment violation under Kuhlmann to warrant a full trial of this claim. But this is the appeal from the denial of qualified immunity from a § 1983 claim. Neither the district court nor Stewart cited, and we have not found, a reported federal decision discussing the elements of a § 1983 Sixth Amendment claim based on use of a jailhouse informant's testimony at trial, and the proper application of qualified immunity principles to such a claim. The absence of such precedent is not dispositive but is clearly relevant. . . . The judgment of Wagner and Selby on this issue may have been wrong, but Kuhlmann and the earlier cases it applied create a very indistinct line between aggressive use of jailhouse informants that does and does not violate the Sixth Amendment rights of a defendant who has just been charged and invokes his right to counsel. And there were no § 1983 precedents giving these defendants 'fair and clear warning of what the Constitution requires,' . . . and therefore no 'existing precedent [that] placed the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate[.]'. . In such circumstances, suppression, not § 1983 damage liability, is the appropriate remedy.")

Carter v. Huterson, 831 F.3d 1104, 1107-09 (8th Cir. 2016) ("In appealing the dismissal of his Fourth Amendment claim, Carter first contends that because he was a civilly committed individual rather than a pre-trial detainee or a prisoner, the defendants could not collect a blood sample to produce his DNA profile without first demonstrating individualized suspicion of criminal wrongdoing and acquiring a search warrant. However, we do not reach the question of whether the alleged warrantless collection of Carter's blood sample violated the Fourth Amendment because the defendants are entitled to qualified immunity with respect to this claim. Here, the defendants are entitled to qualified immunity with respect to their alleged taking of Carter's blood sample because Carter has failed to demonstrate that, at the time of the events in question, civilly committed sexually violent predators maintained a clearly established right to be free from the warrantless drawing of a blood sample to produce a DNA profile. . . . First, we previously have held that civilly committed individuals 'retain the Fourth Amendment right to be free from unreasonable searches that is analogous to the right retained by pretrial detainees.' Beaulieu v. Ludeman, 690 F.3d 1017, 1028 (8th Cir. 2012). Shortly after our decision in Beaulieu, the Supreme Court held in Maryland v. King that the Fourth Amendment does not require authorities to obtain a warrant before conducting a mouth swab to obtain the DNA profile of a pretrial detainee. 569 U.S. ——, 133 S. Ct. 1958 (2013). Relying on these two cases, therefore, the defendants reasonably could have concluded that the Fourth Amendment does not prohibit the warrantless collection of a civilly committed person's DNA profile. Indeed, the defendants have shown that several of the same government interests identified in King reasonably could justify the DNA identification of a civilly committed sexually violent predator, including determining 'the [individual]'s future dangerousness' and the extent he might be 'inclined to flee' from confinement. . . Second, courts generally have recognized the collection of a blood sample as a minimally intrusive mechanism for obtaining information from individuals in state custody. . . .Given the state of the law at the time of the alleged events and his status as a civilly committed sexually violent predator, Carter did not have a 'clearly established' right to be free from the warrantless collection of his blood sample for the purpose of obtaining his DNA profile. . . As a result, the district court did not err when it found that the defendants are entitled to qualified immunity with respect to this claim.")

Ingrassia v. Schafer, 825 F.3d 891, 899 (8th Cir. 2016) ("Defendants contend that, even if questions of material fact remain whether Ingrassia was denied adequate nutrition, the right to adequate nutrition was not clearly established, warranting qualified immunity. Defendants argue that appellate courts have not clearly defined adequate nutrition in the civil commitment context. At the time of the alleged violations, however, it was clearly established that a prisoner may properly allege a constitutional violation by demonstrating significant weight loss or other adverse physical effects from lack of nutrition. . . While there are contested issues of fact about Ingrassia's weight loss and caloric intake, his evidence established a significant weight loss tied to nutrition. Because the law was settled, the district court properly denied summary judgment to Englehart, Blake and Weinkein.")

Dadd v. Anoka Cty., 827 F.3d 749, 757 (8th Cir. 2016) ("Dadd arrived at the jail with instructions from his doctor in the form of a Vicodin prescription, and the deputies and the jail nurse ignored his complaints of pain and requests for treatment. When Dadd was prescribed additional medication by a jail doctor, he did not receive it. Moreover, the defendants had fair warning about the unconstitutionality of a failure to provide pain medication for serious dental conditions in particular. . . . Dadd's right to adequate treatment was clearly established, and the district court properly denied the defendants qualified immunity.")

Barton v. Taber, 820 F.3d 958, 968-70 (8th Cir. 2016) (Colloton, J. dissenting) ("It was clearly established in September 2011, at least under the law of the Eighth Circuit, that a law enforcement officer must not act with deliberate indifference to the serious medical needs of an arrestee. . . But this is a broad general proposition. The issue here is whether the facts alleged, in the specific context of this case, show that only a plainly incompetent state trooper, or a trooper who knowingly violates the law, would have turned Barton over to the custody of the detention center without seeking medical attention. In other words, it must be clearly established that the complaint's allegations are sufficient to show that Barton suffered from an objectively serious medical need, and that Owens exhibited deliberate indifference (i.e., criminal recklessness) to that need by failing to seek medical attention. The complaint and relevant precedents do not support a denial of qualified immunity. . . .Owens knew that Barton was a drunk driver, and a reasonable state trooper with no medical training could have believed that his slurred speech, difficulty walking, inability to answer questions, and even temporary non-responsiveness were the results of intoxication that did not require immediate medical attention. On the facts alleged, it would not have been obvious to a layperson that Barton's symptoms exceeded those of acute intoxication. There is no allegation that Owens had any knowledge that Barton suffered from the heart condition that eventually caused his death. And there is no assertion that Owens knew how to distinguish symptoms of intoxication from those of an impending coronary. The district court thought Thompson v. King, 730 F.3d 742, 748 (8th Cir.2013), clearly established that Owens's conduct violated Barton's constitutional rights, but this conclusion was error. Assuming that controlling circuit precedent is a dispositive source of clearly established law, cf. Carroll v. Carman, ––– U.S. ––––, ––––, 135 S.Ct. 348, 350, 190 L.Ed.2d 311 (2014) (per curiam), Thompson was decided in 2013, two years after Barton's death in 2011, so it could not provide clearly established law for this incident. . . The court relies instead on McRaven v. Sanders, 577 F.3d 974 (8th Cir.2009), but the decision there on dissimilar facts did not put Owens on notice of a clearly established constitutional right in this case. The officers in McRaven knew that an arrestee had consumed a 'cocktail of potent drugs' under circumstances that "strongly suggested" they were not taken in prescribed dosages, yet they failed to seek medical attention when the arrestee exhibited extreme symptoms of drug intoxication. Unlike Owens, who was unaware of Barton's heart condition, the officers in McRaven had specific reason to believe that the offender suffered from a serious medical need—a drug overdose—that distinguished him from an arrestee who had consumed excessive amounts of alcohol. . . . More instructive is a decision that unfortunately was not cited by either party. In Martinez v. Beggs, 563 F.3d 1082 (10th Cir.2009), officers arrested a man named Ginn for public intoxication. The arresting officer reported that Ginn 'was unable to stand.' A witness testified that officers 'picked up' Ginn and 'dragged' him to a patrol car. The officer transporting Ginn to the detention center thought Ginn had 'passed out, like most of your drunks do' during a ride to the facility. At the detention center, Ginn could not walk in a straight line, and officers helped to support his weight. Ginn was placed in a cell. Three hours later, he died from a heart attack due to coronary artery disease. Ginn's estate sued the arresting officers, alleging that they knew that Ginn had consumed a large quantity of alcohol, could not walk without help, may have been unconscious for a short time, and was talking as if he were hallucinating. The plaintiff also sued two custodial officers, asserting that they knew Ginn was drunk, was too incoherent to be booked into jail, and had difficulty walking. The court affirmed a grant of summary judgment for the officers because there was insufficient evidence to show deliberate indifference to the detainee's serious medical needs:

[T]he sufficiently serious objective harm that Ginn faced was heart attack and death, and not acute intoxication.... The officers subjectively knew that Ginn was intoxicated, but there is no evidence to show that anyone would have known that Ginn would face an imminent heart attack or death, much less that the individual county defendants subjectively knew that Ginn was at risk of heart attack or death.

Id. at 1090.

So too here. Owens knew that Barton was a drunk driver, and Barton exhibited symptoms that a reasonable trooper could associate with acute intoxication. Owens had no reason to know that Barton suffered from an undiagnosed heart condition that would cause his death. Barton may have had an objectively serious medical need for treatment of his heart, but it was not a need to which Owens was deliberately indifferent under clearly established law on the facts alleged. I would therefore reverse the district court's order denying the motion to dismiss.") Mountain Pure, LLC v. Roberts, 814 F.3d 928, 935 (8th Cir. 2016) ("The employees finally assert that Roberts and Spradlin acted unreasonably in detaining them incommunicado by denying them access to telephones. Again they rely on Ganwich, in which the Ninth Circuit also concluded that qualified immunity did not apply because the officers there had denied employees telephone access during their detentions. . . The Ganwich court reasoned that based on the Supreme Court's decisions in Florida v. Royer, 460 U.S. 491, 103 S.Ct. 1319, 75 L.Ed.2d 229 (1983) and Terry v. Ohio, 392 U.S. 1, 88 S.Ct. 1868, 20 L.Ed.2d 889 (1968), a reasonable official would have known that incommunicado detention 'was significantly more intrusive than was necessary for them to complete the search' of the employees' offices. . . We disagree. To conclude that official conduct violates clearly established rights, we must find some 'factual correspondence with precedent,' which requires a 'fact-intensive inquiry [that] must be undertaken in light of the specific context of the case, not as a broad general proposition.'. . Neither Royer nor Terry involved factually similar circumstances to those in question here, and those cases do not support the conclusion that the agents violated the employees' clearly established rights. . . We thus conclude that the district court did not err in concluding that qualified immunity barred their unlawful detention claims.")

Bailey v. Feltmann, 810 F.3d 589, 593 (8th Cir. 2016) ("Bailey first argues that we should analyze his § 1983 claim against Feltmann for denial of medical care under the objective reasonableness standard of the Fourth Amendment. The Fourth Amendment governs an arrestee's claim alleging excessive use of force, Graham v. Connor, 490 U.S. 386, 395 (1989), but this court has not resolved whether an arrestee's claim alleging denial of medical care is analyzed under the Due Process Clause or the Fourth Amendment. One recent decision, Carpenter v. Gage, 686 F .3d 644, 650 (8th Cir.2012), applied due process analysis to the claim of an arrestee, but the plaintiff there did not invoke the Fourth Amendment, and the issue was not joined. Earlier cases seem to imply—also without discussion of the Fourth Amendment—that the Due Process Clause may govern, e.g., Spencer v. Knapheide Truck Equip. Co., 183 F.3d 902, 905 & n. 3 (8th Cir.1999), and there is a conflict in authority elsewhere about how to evaluate this type of claim. Compare Ortiz v. City of Chicago, 656 F.3d 523, 530 (7th Cir.2011) (applying Fourth Amendment), with Barrie v. Grand Cty., 119 F.3d 862, 865–69 (10th Cir.1997) (applying Due Process Clause). For present purposes, it is enough to acknowledge that a right under the Fourth Amendment against unreasonable delay in medical care for an arrestee was not clearly established in March 2012. Neither the Supreme Court nor this circuit had announced such a right, and there is no uniform body of authority that might allow us to conclude that the right was clearly established. Nor was it clearly established that a standard of objective reasonableness applies under the Due Process Clause. Cf. Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 135 S.Ct. 2466, 2473 (2015). Feltmann is therefore entitled to qualified immunity on Bailey's claim that Feltmann acted unreasonably, and the district court properly dismissed that portion of the complaint. We think it prudent to avoid addressing the proper constitutional standard unnecessarily. See Camreta v. Greene, 131 S.Ct. 2020, 2031 (2011). Bailey argues in the alternative that Feltmann's decision to proceed to the jail rather than to a hospital exhibited deliberate indifference to his need for medical attention in violation of his clearly established constitutional rights under the Due Process Clause. Regardless of whether an 'unreasonable' decision to forego treatment would violate the Constitution, this court deemed it clearly established by 2008 that a pretrial detainee (or an arrestee, see Spencer, 183 F.3d at 905 n. 3) has a right to be free from deliberately indifferent denials of emergency medical care. See Thompson v. King, 730 F.3d 742, 750 (8th Cir.2013). Bailey's claim fails, however, because he has not produced sufficient evidence to support a finding that Feltmann violated that right.")

Wright v. United States, 813 F.3d 689, 696-99 (8th Cir. 2015) ("Recently, in Hollingsworth v. City of St. Ann, we determined that it was not clearly established in July 2009 that the use of a Taser resulting in only de minimis injury violated the Fourth Amendment. . . Despite a Taser's 'unique capability to cause high levels of pain without long-term injury, "we have not categorized the Taser as an implement of force whose use establishes, as a matter of law, more than de minimis injury."'.

. In April 2009, when the events at issue in this case transpired, the state of the law was no different. . . . Therefore, the Marshals are entitled to qualified immunity on Wright's excessive force claim. The district court, despite the Marshals' failure to argue the clearly established issue, cited to our decision in Shekleton v. Eichenberger in support of the court's conclusion that the tasering of Wright was excessive force in violation of clearly established law at the time. . . .The facts in Shekleton are distinguishable from those in this case in that a Grand Jury had indicted Vinol Wilson for several felonies. . . He was considered armed and dangerous. In contrast, the suspect in Shekleton was arrested for public intoxication, a misdemeanor. . .. Thus, our holding in Shekleton does not change our finding that the state of the law in April 2009 was such that a reasonable officer would not have had fair warning that using a single Tazer shock against a suspected felon would have violated clearly established Constitutional rights. Accordingly, we hold that the Marshals are entitled to qualified immunity on Wright's excessive force claim because it was not clearly established in April 2009 that the use of a Tazer against a suspected armed and dangerous felon violated the Fourth Amendment. . . . Wright was held for up to twenty minutes after the Marshals realized that he was not Vinol Wilson. Under the totality of circumstances, we conclude the delay in releasing Wright was reasonable. . . . The Fourth Amendment does not demand perfection from law enforcement officers; it only requires that their conduct be reasonable under the totality of the circumstances. The twenty-minute detention was not an unreasonable seizure under the Fourth Amendment, and therefore the Marshals are entitled to summary judgment on Wright's claim for unreasonable seizure.")

Hollingsworth v. City of St. Ann, 800 F.3d 985, 990-91 (8th Cir. 2015) ("The issue in this case is whether McCallum, having justification to use some force to cause Hollingsworth to change into an orange jumpsuit, violated her clearly established rights by deploying the Taser rather than employing other means such as physical restraint and forcible removal of clothing. . . As we have explained in other decisions, it was an open question at the time of this incident in July 2009 whether a plaintiff must demonstrate greater than de minimis injury to establish an excessive force claim under the Fourth Amendment. . . The district court, citing a concession by Hollingsworth, concluded that her injuries were de minimis, and she does not dispute that point on appeal. Therefore, Hollingsworth can prevail only if it was clearly established in July 2009 that use of a Taser that caused de minimis injury violated the Fourth Amendment. Hollingsworth's claim founders on our decision in LaCross v. City of Duluth, 713 F.3d 1155 (8th Cir.2013). LaCross held that it was not clearly established in 2006 that an officer's use of a Taser that resulted in no lasting physical injuries or injuries requiring medical care nonetheless could be unreasonable because Tasers caused 'excruciating pain without lasting physical effects.'. . This court held that despite the Taser's unique capability to cause high levels of pain without long-term injury, 'we have not categorized the Taser as an implement of force whose use establishes, as a matter of law, more than de minimis injury.'. . We thus concluded it was not clearly established that an officer's use of a Taser, resulting in only de minimis injury, was an unconstitutional use of force. . . The law was not materially different in July 2009, so McCallum is entitled to qualified immunity.")

Hollingsworth v. City of St. Ann, 800 F.3d 985, 992-96 (8th Cir. 2015) (Kelly, J., concurring) ("I concur in the decision to affirm the judgment of the district court. I write separately for three reasons. First, to state clearly that, in my belief, Officer McCallum acted unreasonably in tasing Hollingsworth. Second, to highlight my concern that Hollingsworth did not, in fact, concede to the district court that she sustained merely de minimis injuries. And third, to explain that while I believe that at the time this event occurred in July 2009, it was clearly established that it was unlawful to use a Taser on an unarmed, secured, and nonthreatening misdemeanant, I recognize that I am constrained by this court's decision in LaCross, and thus I concur. . . .The majority allows that 'the actions of one or more officers might have been unreasonable' and does not elaborate further—instead reaching its decision on the second prong of the qualified immunity test. In my view Officer McCallum's actions were unreasonable. . . .As the court notes, the district court summarily concluded that Hollingsworth's injuries were de minimis by citing to a 'concession' made by Hollingsworth on this point. . . .Acknowledging that Eighth Circuit precedent may construe her injuries as de minimis does not constitute a concession that Hollingsworth agreed her injuries were de minimis, particularly when she goes on to argue for a change in the law. . . .It appears from her briefing, however, that Hollingsworth has abandoned any argument that her injuries were above and beyond the injuries alleged in LaCross, and thus I agree with the court that she is limited by our ruling in that case. . . .Finally, I write to express my belief that at the time of Hollingworth's tasing in July 2009, it was clearly established that it was unlawful to use a Taser on an unarmed, secured, and nonthreatening misdemeanant. Were I not constrained by precedent, I would decline to extend qualified immunity to Officer McCallum . . . . Each of these cases stands for the proposition that a reasonable officer would have known that the use of a Taser in circumstances similar to the one at present was clearly established as unlawful: Brown concerned events that took place in 2005, and Shekleton and DeBoise concerned separate events that took place in 2008. . . .These holdings, then, must be reconciled with Chambers, which holds that prior to 2012, arrestees did not have a clearly established right to be free from unreasonable force that resulted in merely de minimis injuries. Rather than ignoring these cases, I read Brown and Shekleton as support for the view that a Taser, when effectively used, typically results in more than de minimis injuries. . ..While I find this court's decision in LaCross to be at odds with much of our precedent outlined here, I recognize that its factual similarity to the case at hand, combined with the plaintiff's failure to plead specialized injury, forecloses the conclusion that Hollingsworth suffered greater than de minimis injuries. Thus, I concur in the decision of the court.")

Robinson v. Payton, 791 F.3d 824, 829-30 (8th Cir. 2015) ("We find that a reasonable official, standing in Trooper Condley's shoes, would not understand that what he is doing—restraining a hysterical individual on the scene and deciding not to leave the hysterical individual and intervene—violates clearly established law. Trooper Condley neither was plainly incompetent nor did he knowingly violate the law. His decision to stay with Eva and not to intervene did not transgress a bright line. If he left Eva, she could have and likely would have joined the altercation, possibly harming herself or others. . . . Because we do not find it would be clear to a reasonable officer, standing in the shoes of Trooper Condley, that his conduct was unlawful in the present case, Trooper Condley is entitled to qualified immunity. The district court's denial of qualified immunity is reversed.")

Robinson v. Payton, 791 F.3d 824, 831 (8th Cir. 2015) (Murphy, J., dissenting) ("Trooper Condley was present when Stevens first threatened to tase Matthew, then aimed the taser, and pulled its trigger. Condley did not say or do anything to deescalate the situation. He simply stood by and watched the deputies repeatedly tase the young man. . . Nor did he intervene after Matthew's mother was returned to the patrol car. There is no question that the law is 'clearly established that an officer who fails to intervene to prevent the unconstitutional use of excessive force by another officer may be held liable for violating the Fourth Amendment.'. . Also well established is that 'one who is given the badge of authority of a police officer may not ignore the duty imposed by his office and fail to stop other officers who summarily punish a third person in his presence or otherwise within his knowledge.'. . Important issues of disputed fact remain on this record as to whether Corporal Condley failed a clearly established duty by not intervening while officers Stevens and Payton fired multiple taser shocks into Matthew's body. The experienced trial judge's denial of qualified immunity should be affirmed.")

Story v. Foote, 782 F.3d 968, 970-73 (8th Cir. 2015) ("The Supreme Court never has resolved whether convicted inmates retain a Fourth Amendment right against unreasonable searches while in custody. The Court in Bell v. Wolfish, 441 U.S. 520, 99 S.Ct. 1861, 60 L.Ed.2d 447 (1979), assumed the point for the sake of analysis. . . In Hudson v. Palmer . . . the Court held that the Fourth Amendment did not apply to a search of a prison cell, reasoning that '[a] right of privacy in traditional Fourth Amendment terms is fundamentally incompatible with the close and continual surveillance of inmates and their cells required to ensure institutional security and internal order.'. . The Seventh Circuit, in the wake of Hudson, ruled that inmates retain no right under the Fourth Amendment against visual inspections by prison guards. Johnson v. Phelan, 69 F.3d 144, 146–47 (7th Cir.1995). This court, however, has said that 'prison inmates are entitled to Fourth Amendment protection against unreasonable searches of their bodies,' Levine v. Roebuck, 550 F.3d 684, 687 (8th Cir.2008), and allowed a Fourth Amendment claim challenging strip searches to proceed in Seltzer–Bey v. Delo, 66 F.3d 961, 963 (8th Cir.1995). The Arkansas Supreme Court, as best we can tell, has never addressed the question. The Supreme Court recently has reserved judgment twice on the question whether decisions of a federal court of appeals are a source of clearly established law for purposes of qualified immunity analysis. See Carroll v. Carman, —— U.S. ——, 135 S.Ct. 348, 350, 190 L.Ed.2d 311 (2014) (per curiam); Reichle v. Howards, —— U.S. ——, 132 S.Ct. 2088, 2094, 182 L.Ed.2d 985 (2012). Following the approach of the Court in those cases, we assume for the sake of analysis that our decisions clearly establish that a convicted inmate has rights under the Fourth Amendment against unreasonable searches of his body. . . .Here, Story alleges that officers conducted a visual body-cavity inspection when Story returned to the Williams facility from outside the institution. Given what the Supreme Court and this court have said about the strong institutional interests in maintaining security, and about the reasonableness of visual body-cavity inspections when detainees enter a facility, Story's allegation of a body-cavity search by itself does not state a claim for the violation of a clearly established right. Story argues, however, that the manner in which this particular search was conducted violated the Fourth Amendment. He highlights an allegation that a female correctional officer was working in the master control room at the time of the search, and that she viewed the search on a video screen. He cites this court's statement—in a case about a strip search of an arrestee in a motel room—that 'strip searches should be conducted by officials of the same sex as the individual to be searched.' Richmond v. City of Brooklyn Center, 490 F.3d 1002, 1008 (8th Cir.2007). The search in this case, consistent with Richmond's general admonition, was conducted by male correctional officers. Story does not allege that the male officers knew that female officers would observe the video feed from the master control unit. In any event, the male officers did not violate Story's clearly established rights by conducting the inspection in a location where a female officer also may have viewed the search from the master control room through a video feed from a security camera. This court in Timm v. Gunter, 917 F.2d 1093 (8th Cir.1990), held that prison administrators did not violate the Fourth Amendment rights of inmates by allowing intermittent visual surveillance of male inmates by female guards while the inmates used showers and bathrooms or slept without clothing in their cells. Our opinion cited the 'rational connection between sex-neutral visual surveillance of inmates and the goal of prison security,' and observed that staffing adjustments (akin to removing female officers from the master control room during searches in this case) would interfere with equal employment opportunities for women and require significant expenditures by the prison. . . We also have held that the use of cameras to monitor activities from a control booth is reasonable, even when body-cavity searches are involved. . . In light of these precedents, it was not beyond debate that a reasonable correctional officer was forbidden to proceed with a visual body-cavity search in an area monitored by security cameras while a female officer was assigned to the master control unit. . . .We cannot say, however, that Foote's single alleged use of the term 'monkey,' even with its potential racial overtones, is sufficient to allege the violation of a clearly established right under the Fourth Amendment. Story cites no supporting case with analogous facts, and recent decisions rejecting Fourth Amendment claims based on verbal abuse alone militate against a conclusion that the alleged.") Story v. Foote, 782 F.3d 968, 974-76 (8th Cir. 2015) (Bye, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("The majority sua sponte raises qualified immunity, 'an affirmative defense that must be pleaded by a defendant official.'. . In the instant matter, the district court did not discuss qualified immunity and the correctional officers do not raise qualified immunity on appeal. The majority does not cite, and I have been unable to find, any cases where the Eighth Circuit sua sponte raised the affirmative defense of qualified immunity after the district court dismissed without mention of qualified immunity and the defendants failed to brief a qualified immunity defense on appeal. . . .It appears the majority's sua sponte qualified immunity ruling in this case is unique. Unlike before the district court, where the correctional officers had not been served or had an opportunity to respond, on appeal the correctional officers had the opportunity to brief any affirmative defenses they wished to raise. The correctional officers chose not to raise a qualified immunity defense. . . .Even if a qualified immunity defense were properly before this court, I would not find defendants entitled to qualified immunity at this time. . . .A correctional officer's power to strip search an inmate may be broad, but it is not unfettered. . . Second, a reasonable correctional officer would have known an overly-intrusive and unnecessary strip search was unconstitutional at the time Story was strip searched. It was clearly established law that unreasonable strip searches violate the Fourth Amendment. . . Perhaps after the completion of discovery and briefing by the parties, it will be appropriate to find the correctional officers entitled to qualified immunity against Story's claims; however, the time for such a finding is not now.")

Rodgers v. Knight, 781 F.3d 932, 939-42 (8th Cir. 2015) ("It was not clearly established that the officers, having developed probable cause for a concealed firearms offense, were required to investigate Greg's claim about a Florida permit; our precedent suggests the opposite. . . Although Greg reportedly informed different police officers about the Florida permit during a previous encounter in January 2011, there was no evidence that the arresting officers in August 2011 knew that information. Nor was it clearly established that probable cause was defeated by the 'dwelling unit' exception for carrying concealed weapons in Missouri. No court had construed the meaning of 'dwelling unit or ... premises over which the actor has possession, authority or control,'. . . and there was Missouri authority suggesting that 'a tenant does not have control of the common areas and thus does not possess them.'. . Officers reasonably could have believed that Greg was forbidden to carry a concealed weapon without a permit in common outdoor areas of the apartment complex. Therefore, officers are entitled to qualified immunity for recommending the firearms charge to county prosecutors. . . . As of 2011, an officer was entitled to qualified immunity against this type of retaliation claim if an arrest or prosecution was supported by probable cause. . . The qualified immunity extends further to an action based on at least 'arguable' probable cause. . . For reasons discussed in connection with Greg's Fourth Amendment claims, a reasonable officer in 2011 could have believed that there was probable cause to charge Greg with unlawful use of a firearm based on carrying a concealed weapon or unlawful possession of a firearm as a fugitive from justice. Therefore, the district court was correct to dismiss the First Amendment claims against the officers.")

Parker v. Chard, 777 F.3d 977, 981-82 (8th Cir. 2015) ("Based on White and J.L., it was not clearly established that Chard and Illetschko—having corroborated the running asserted in the eyewitness tip, and knowing shoplifting recently occurred—could not reasonably suspect Parker of shoplifting. '[W]hether or not the constitutional rule applied by the court below was correct, it was not beyond debate.'. . The officers are entitled to qualified immunity.")

Reeves v. King, 774 F.3d 430, 433 (8th Cir. 2014) ("We conclude a reasonable correctional officer in Lieutenant King's position would have known, based on Irving and Norman, labeling Reeves a snitch for reporting on a prison nurse who was bringing contraband into the prison would violate his constitutional right to protection from harm. Accordingly, the district court properly denied qualified immunity to Lieutenant King.")

Williams v. City of Alexander, Ark., 772 F.3d 1307, 1313 (8th Cir. 2014) ("Because a reasonable official would understand that including false information in and omitting relevant information from an affidavit in an effort to punish someone for supporting one's political opponent would constitute a violation of clearly established constitutional rights, Walters is not entitled to qualified immunity.")

Bates v. Hadden, 576 F. App'x 636, 639 (8th Cir. 2014) ("In a pair of 2001 decisions, we observed that malicious prosecution is not a constitutional injury. . . Kurtz and Technical Ordnance raise a high hurdle for Bates's § 1983 malicious prosecution claim. . . . Our precedents dictate that Officer Hadden is entitled to qualified immunity as to Bates's malicious prosecution claim. No 'reasonable officials acting in [Officer Hadden's] position would ... have understood they were violating"' Bates's constitutional right against malicious prosecution because no such constitutional right had been clearly established.")

Meehan v. Thompson, 763 F.3d 936, 941, 946, 947 (8th Cir. 2014) ("We conclude that, at the time of Meehan's arrest, the law was not clearly established that a police officer could not constitutionally arrest an individual whom he reasonably believed to be moderately intoxicated and who would otherwise be left alone on a public roadway at night. Thompson asserts that his arrest of Meehan was a valid exercise of his role as a 'community caretaker.'. . We have recognized that it may be reasonable under the Fourth Amendment for a police officer, acting in his capacity as community caretaker, to seize an apparently intoxicated individual 'to ensure the safety of the public and/or the individual, regardless of any suspected criminal activity.'. . Such an arrest is reasonable 'if the "governmental interest in the police officer's exercise of [his] community caretaking function," ... outweighs "the individual's interest in being free from arbitrary government interference."'. . As we made clear in Winters, the primary governmental interest underlying the arrest of an intoxicated individual who is not suspected of criminal activity is a concern for safety. . . Meehan asserts that this interest does not justify her arrest because, under clearly established law, her apparent intoxication was too mild to support a reasonable inference that she was a danger to herself or others. We disagree. As we explain below, Thompson reasonably believed that Meehan was at least moderately intoxicated, and the law at the time of Meehan's arrest was not so clear that a reasonable officer would have known that he lacked probable cause to arrest a moderately intoxicated individual in lieu of leaving her alone on a public roadway at night. . . . Meehan also argued to the district court, and the district court concluded, that Thompson used excessive force in frisking Meehan. Meehan does not dispute that Thompson's frisk caused only de minimis injury. This fact is fatal to Meehan's excessive force claim because, at the time of her arrest, it was not clearly established that conduct by a police officer that caused only de minimis injury could constitute excessive force. We recognized for the first time in Chambers v. Pennycook, 641 F.3d 898 (8th Cir.2011), that police conduct that causes only de minimis injury could constitute excessive force. We noted, however, that it had previously 'remain [ed] an open question in this circuit whether an excessive force claim requires some minimum level of injury.'. . Chambers was handed down on June 6, 2011, more than a month after Meehan was arrested. Meehan thus cannot avail herself of the legal principle articulated in Chambers. Meehan argues, however, that the law was clearly established even before Chambers that de minimis injury could give rise to an excessive force claim. Meehan notes that Chambers was the result of an en banc rehearing granted in part because of the petitioner's assertion that the original panel's holding—that de minimis injury could not support an excessive force claim—conflicted with a 2010 Supreme Court case, Wilkins v. Gaddy, 559 U.S. 34 (2010). Wilkins, however, dealt with a prisoner's right to be free from excessive force under the Eighth Amendment and did not clearly establish that de minimis injury could support an excessive force claim under the Fourth Amendment. Chambers's holding was not based on Wilkins but on an exhaustive study of case law, a study that no reasonable police officer should have been expected to conduct. . . Meehan does not point to any other specific case enunciating the principle that de minimis injury can give rise to an excessive force claim, nor can we find one. . . Because the law was not clear before Chambers that police conduct could constitute excessive force even if it caused only de minimis injury, Meehan's excessive force claim must fail.")

Jacobson v. McCormick, 763 F.3d 914, 917, 918 (8th Cir. 2014) ("In September 2009, a reasonable officer had a solid basis to believe that strip searching an arrestee was constitutional if there was reasonable suspicion that the detainee possessed contraband. . . The county's policy provided for strip searches based on reasonable suspicion. Jacobson was arrested for driving while impaired. He admitted that he recently smoked a bowl of marijuana, so there was also probable cause to believe that he recently had committed a controlled substance offense. Officers found no drugs in a traditional pat-down search of Jacobson's person while he was clothed. The question confronting the officers under county policy, therefore, was whether they had reasonable suspicion that Jacobson may have concealed contraband in a private area that could be viewed only through a strip search. Two circuits had held by 2009 that an arrest based on evidence that a person was under the influence of drugs did not provide reasonable suspicion for a strip search. . . . In 2009, this court had never addressed the constitutionality of a strip search premised on an arrestee's recent use of drugs, and a close reading of our precedent left open the possibility that drug-related offenses or conduct might give rise to reasonable suspicion.")

Blazek v. City of Iowa City, 761 F.3d 920, 924-26 (8th Cir. 2014) ("In our view, the narrower scope of qualified immunity urged by the partial dissenting opinion would impose an unreasonable burden on the police officers and cannot be squared with the more robust version of the doctrine espoused recently by the Supreme Court. Blazek must show that 'every reasonable official would have understood that what he is doing violates' a constitutional right, . . . and that the constitutional question was 'beyond debate.'. . We must not 'define clearly established law at a high level of generality, since doing so avoids the crucial question whether the official acted reasonably in the particular circumstances that he or she faced.' Plumhoff v. Rickard, 134 S.Ct. 2012, 2023 (2014) . . . It is clear in light of Wertish that if the officers had lifted the belligerent Blazek off his feet, thrown him to the ground, and jumped on his back to handcuff him, without causing the alleged injury to his ankle or shoulder, then the officers would have acted reasonably or at least be entitled to qualified immunity. But the partial dissent would hold that if Blazek instead had one foot planted on the floor, and the torque of the throw to the ground caused his ankle to twist and fracture, then the officers are subject to suit and liability for damages. Similarly, an awkward landing that caused a separated shoulder would trigger liability, but a smoother alighting that resulted in ordinary bruising would not. And if the throw had caused merely a sprained ankle with no fracture, then who knows? Immunity from suit and liability for damages would depend on whether a reviewing judge later decides that use of the forceful throw allowed in Wertish caused an unacceptable degree of injury. Qualified immunity is designed to free police officers from the risk of suit and liability based on such fine distinctions. One can debate the Fourth Amendment ruling in Wertish,. . . but taking the decision as a given, it is unrealistic to expect a police officer, in the heat of the moment, to discern whether a particular ankle injury would result from a takedown or to plan a careful landing for the detainee's shoulder. The same goes for the force applied to Blazek's arms during the handcuffing. A reasonable officer reading the annals of the federal courts in 2009 would know that the technique like that applied here—where an officer 'grabbed plaintiff's arm, twisted it around plaintiff's back, jerking it up high to the shoulder'—was 'a relatively common and ordinarily accepted non-excessive way to detain an arrestee.'. . . Yet the partial dissent would hold that if the detainee complains of no pain during the incident, but discovers later that otherwise permissible 'twisting' of his arm upward and behind his back caused a tear in his rotator cuff, then the officers have violated a clearly established right and are subject to suit and liability for damages. It was not 'beyond debate' in 2009 that the constitutionality of the officers' actions here depended on whether their use of a 'common and ordinarily accepted' handcuffing method caused injury to the detainee's shoulder area. The officers' jerking of Blazek from the floor to his bed, however, presents a discrete use of force for consideration under the Fourth Amendment. At that point in the encounter, Blazek was handcuffed and under control. In his telling, Blazek was not resisting and posed no threat to the officers. He was not suspected of any serious offense; he was detained only because he was present at Feldhacker's residence and would not stay seated and identify himself when questioned. Nonetheless, the officers allegedly 'jerked' him up by the arms with sufficient force to cause serious injury to his shoulder area. It was clearly established in 2009 that when a person is subdued and restrained with handcuffs, a 'gratuitous and completely unnecessary act of violence' is unreasonable and violates the Fourth Amendment. . . Pepper spray administered in the face of a subdued arrestee . . . and handcuffs applied so tightly—despite repeated complaints of pain—that they broke the wrist of a compliant arrestee, . . . were known to violate the Fourth Amendment. There is no prior case involving Blazek's precise factual scenario, but he need not show that the 'very action in question has previously been held unlawful' to overcome qualified immunity, as long as the unlawfulness was apparent in light of preexisting law. . . Reasonable officers surely could bring Blazek up from the floor in some manner after he was handcuffed, and officers are not required to treat detainees as gently as possible. . . But Blazek's allegation is that the officers did more than lift him up roughly. If Blazek can prove at trial that he was subdued and compliant, but that the officers grabbed him by the arms and gratuitously 'jerked' him from the floor onto the bed, using enough violent force to cause significant injury, then we agree with the district court that a reasonable jury could find a violation of the Fourth Amendment. And the law was sufficiently developed to show that such a violation—allegedly involving unnecessary violence against a handcuffed and compliant detainee—would contravene clearly established law as of 2009.") Blazek v. City of Iowa City, 761 F.3d 920, 926-31 (8th Cir. 2014) (Gruender, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("I concur in the court's opinion insofar as it affirms the denial of qualified immunity to Officers Santiago and Roth for their act of jerking Blazek from the floor and dismisses the appeal of Blazek's state-law claims. However, I respectfully dissent from the court's decision to grant qualified immunity to the officers for their use of force to handcuff Blazek, which a reasonable jury could conclude caused a separated shoulder, a torn rotator cuff, and a fractured ankle. . . .Considering the totality of the circumstances—including Officer Santiago's lack of suspicion that Blazek had committed a crime, the fact that Blazek was wearing a bath towel, the degree of Blazek's passive resistance, and the extent of his injuries—a reasonable jury could conclude that the officers' applications of force during the entire sequence of events—grabbing, twisting, throwing, jumping on, holding, and jerking—violated the Fourth Amendment. . . . This brings me to the legal issue on which the court and I disagree: whether the constitutional right implicated by Blazek's handcuffing was clearly established at the time of the incident. This determination requires discerning whether '[t]he contours of the right [are] sufficiently clear that a reasonable official would understand that what he is doing violates that right.'. . A plaintiff need not show that 'the very action in question has previously been held unlawful,'. . . but he must establish that the unlawfulness was apparent in light of preexisting law. . . . This circuit applies a 'flexible standard' in conducting this inquiry, 'requiring some, but not precise factual correspondence with precedent, and demanding that officials apply general, well-developed legal principles.'. . Judged by this standard, Officers Santiago and Roth violated a clearly established constitutional right. Kukla, a then-existing precedent in this circuit, and the analogous decisions of our sister circuits demonstrate as much. By distinguishing Kukla on its facts, . . . the court mandates too much factual correspondence between past cases and the present scenario. Kukla is far more analogous to this case than the court allows. . . .That the constitutional right at issue was clearly established is further supported by the then-existing views of our sister circuits. The First, Second, and Sixth Circuits have reached similar conclusions to that in Kukla, and the First Circuit even cited Kukla in doing so. . . . Notwithstanding Kukla and other analogous decisions, the court artificially separates an unbroken sequence of events that involved multiple applications of force—grabbing, twisting, throwing, jumping on, holding, and jerking—to grant qualified immunity for all but one of these uses of force. The court takes this step even though we cannot determine which use (or uses) of force caused Blazek to suffer a separated shoulder, a torn rotator cuff, and a fractured ankle. The court justifies its unusual bifurcation of this incident by concluding that of the applications of force at issue here, a reasonable officer would have understood that only one of them—the jerking—violates the Constitution. Because precedent clearly establishes that a reasonable officer would not draw this distinction, I respectfully dissent.")

Hemminghaus v. Missouri, 756 F.3d 1100, 1114 & n.12 (8th Cir. 2014) ("'At least five circuits have concluded that, because Pickering's constitutional rule turns upon a fact-intensive balancing test, it can rarely be considered "clearly established" for purposes of ... qualified immunity.' Bartlett v. Fisher, 972 F.2d 911, 916 (8th Cir.1992). . . . This is not to say Pickering balancing never allows for clearly established law in the qualified immunity analysis.")

Nord v. Walsh County, 757 F.3d 734, 739, 743 (8th Cir. 2014) ("We begin with the first step of the qualified immunity inquiry. In this limited context, Wild concedes that Nord was terminated in violation of his First Amendment rights under the first prong of the investigation. Assuming, without holding, that this is true, we conclude that step one of the qualified immunity analysis has been sufficiently established for purposes of further inquiry. Despite this concession, Wild contends that given the circumstances of this dispute, qualified immunity nonetheless protects him because his act of terminating Nord did not violate a 'clearly established statutory or constitutional right[ ] of which a reasonable person would have known.'. . .Based upon the foregoing analysis, we conclude that use of the Pickering/Connick balancing test is clearly called for in this dispute. And, based upon the use of such test, we conclude (1) that at least some of Nord's campaign speech does not merit First Amendment protection; (2) that even if Nord's speech was fully protected by the Constitution, Wild could have reasonably believed that the speech would be at least potentially damaging to and disruptive of the discipline and harmony of and among co-workers in the sheriff's office and detrimental to the close working relationships and personal loyalties necessary for an effective and trusted local policing operation . . . and, the above-mentioned adverse employer-employee circumstance did not need to become manifest in order to be acted upon promptly by Wild. . . (3) that applying the second step of the qualified immunity inquiry, and considering North Dakota law and well-established state and federal jurisprudence, and especially the advice given by the Walsh County attorney and its human resources consultant, Sheriff Wild could have logically and rationally believed that his decision to terminate Nord was well within the breathing room accorded him as a public official in making a reasonable, even if mistaken, judgment under the circumstances. . . and thus (4) that Wild, as a matter of law, is entitled to qualified immunity to shield him from any liability claimed to have arisen through violation of the First Amendment as asserted by Nord.")

Nord v. Walsh County, 757 F.3d 734, 747-50 (8th Cir. 2014) (Shepherd, J., dissenting) ("Because the Pickering/Connick test informs the first step of the qualified immunity analysis and the majority has already acknowledged that the first step has been met, in my opinion, the majority erred in stating that 'we must determine whether or not Nord's particular speech was protected by the First Amendment,' ante at 5, and, thus, was mistaken in its conclusion that, under the Pickering/Connick balancing test, Nord's rights were not clearly established. Consistent with a proper qualified immunity framework, I would hold that Nord's First Amendment rights were clearly established and the qualified immunity defense fails. . . .Even if we were to consider Nord's positional status and apply the Elrod/Branti test instead, I find unpersuasive the majority's reliance on a Fourth Circuit case in determining that Nord holds a position of confidence. This court has acknowledged that although 'other circuits have determined that deputy sheriffs held policymaking positions and could be transferred for political reasons, ... these cases are not controlling here because they turned on state law provisions in different jurisdictions.'. . We have to look to the applicable state laws and the actual duties assigned to deputy sheriffs in Walsh County, North Dakota to determine whether political affiliation is essential to Nord's effective performance of his position as deputy sheriff. . .Here, Nord's duties included the routine tasks of general police work, prevention and detection of crime, protection of life and property, and the performance of duties as assigned. Nothing in the Walsh County Deputy Sheriff's job description empowers the deputy with any discretionary function nor can it be said, based on this job description, that the deputy sheriff ‘ “performs virtually all the duties attendant to the actual duties of the sheriff himself.”’. . Viewing the deputy sheriff and sheriff’s relationship in the abstract is insufficient to establish the type of relationship necessary under Elrod/Branti. . . .Nord was fired in violation of his First Amendment rights which were clearly established under the law. He did not hold a confidential or policymaking position, nor is political affiliation essential to the performance of his duties. Accordingly, the Appellants have failed to satisfy the elements of the qualified immunity defense.”)

Edwards v. Byrd, 750 F.3d 728, 731 (8th Cir. 2014) (“The facts that the district court found to be supported by the record for the purpose of summary judgment would support a claim of excessive force in violation of the Eighth Amendment. . . . The district court found for the purpose of summary judgment that, immediately before the guards entered Pod B, the plaintiffs were lying submissively, face-down, in the pod. The guards could see this through the window in the pod door. . . The plaintiffs did not resist or otherwise act aggressively. Nevertheless, the guards employed a flash-bang grenade in close quarters, kicked the compliant detainees, and shot them with bean-bag guns. These facts, if proved, could show that the guards did not apply this force in order to restore order or discipline but rather for the sole—and impermissible—purpose of inflicting unjustified harm on the detainees. At the time of the incident, it was clearly established that such conduct would violate the Eighth Amendment's proscription of cruel and unusual punishment.”)

Ellis v. Houston, 742 F.3d 307, 325, 326 (8th Cir. 2014) (“Long before the actions of supervisors in this case, the Supreme Court had recognized employee rights to be free from racial harassment and retaliation in Jones, 541 U.S. at 383, and CBOCS, 553 U.S. at 451. In light of this preexisting law it was readily apparent that a ‘continuous racially invidious climate’ in a penitentiary, Snell, 782 F.2d at 1099, and undertaking ‘systematic[ ]’ retaliation following complaints, Kim, 123 F.3d at 1052, would violate clearly established rights. . . .The black officers presented evidence here that the Nebraska penitentiary’s own administrative regulation 112.07 recognized that inflammatory racial comments and jokes violate employee rights. Any reasonable supervisor would have recognized that racial slurs and remarks like those used here would illegally affect the working environment. . . As in the prison in Snell, there is also evidence that conduct by the supervisors at the Nebraska penitentiary caused black guards to question whether white officers would come to their aid if they were in danger. . . The evidence in this case is nearly identical to that shown to violate the law in Allen, including black officers being monitored more closely than white employees and told not to congregate in the yard, receiving baseless citations, and being denied career advancement opportunities. . . .We conclude that existing precedent put the supervisors on notice that such actions would violate constitutional rights. A reasonable prison supervisor would have understood that permitting and participating in racially derisive remarks and assigning inferior work assignments would violate the black officers’ rights under §§ 1981 and 1983. Based on the record evidence, Sergeant Miles has not shown that he is entitled to qualified immunity on the black officers’ harassment claims, nor have Lieutenants Stoner and Haney shown they are entitled to qualified immunity on the retaliation claims of Officer Ellis.”)

Spencer v. Jackson County Mo., 738 F.3d 907, 913 (8th Cir. 2013) ("The right of an inmate to file a lawsuit is well established, . . . as is an inmate's First Amendment right to access the prison grievance process . . . . Since Spencer has raised genuine issues of material fact as to whether defendants violated his First Amendment rights, the district court's grant of qualified immunity to the defendants was premature and must be reversed.")

Burton v. Arkansas Secretary of State, 737 F.3d 1219, 1236, 1237 (8th Cir. 2013) ("We have not yet addressed whether a plaintiff may bring a retaliation claim for complaining of discrimination 'under the guise of equal protection' pursuant to § 1983. . . . We conclude that the district court 'erred in denying [Chief Hedden] qualified immunity on [Burton's] equal protection claim for retaliation [under § 1983].'. . 'The right to be free from retaliation is clearly established as a first amendment right and as a statutory right under Title VII; but no clearly established right exists under the equal protection clause to be free from retaliation.'. . We have only recognized that '§ 1983 provides a vehicle for redressing claims of retaliation on the basis of the First Amendment.'. . 'Because no established right exists under the equal protection clause to be free from retaliation, we reverse the district court's denial of qualified immunity on [Burton's] equal-protection retaliation claim.'")

Scott v. Baldwin, 720 F.3d 1034, 1037 (8th Cir. 2013) ("The plaintiffs cite no authority that clearly required Baldwin to recalculate their release dates within a certain time. Under the circumstances, the law did not fairly warn him that the amount of time spent recalculating thousands of release dates, including the plaintiffs', recklessly disregarded their constitutional right to release. . . Because Baldwin's conduct was not clearly 'unlawful in the situation he confronted,' he is entitled to qualified immunity.")

Roberts v. City of Omaha, 723 F.3d 966, 972-74 (8th Cir. 2013) ("The qualified immunity defense is available for ADA and Rehabilitation Act claims. See Gorman v. Bartch, 152 F.3d 907, 914 (8th Cir.1998); Lue v. Moore, 43 F.3d 1203, 1205 (8th Cir.1994). Therefore, the officers were entitled to summary judgment unless Roberts produced evidence showing the officers violated a clearly established right under these statutes. . . . Taking all disputed facts in Roberts's favor, nothing in the law clearly established the ADA and Rehabilitation Act applied to the undisputed circumstances of this case. No reasonable officer could have known the ADA and Rehabilitation Act imposed a duty on the officers to accommodate Roberts's disability while the officers were attempting to secure Roberts and take him into custody for his own safety and the safety of the officers and Roberts's family. . .The officers are entitled to qualified immunity on Roberts's ADA and Rehabilitation Act claims. . . . [On Fourth Amendment claim] The district court found a genuine dispute of material fact regarding whether Roberts posed an objectively reasonable threat of violence during the entire encounter. Some evidence intimates Officer Martinec fired his weapon at Roberts several times, paused, and fired several more times, possibly shooting Roberts in the back. We are bound by the district court's evidence-supported factual findings for purposes of Officer Martinec's appeal.")

S.L. ex rel. Lenderman v. St. Louis Metropolitan Police Dept. Bd. of Police Com'rs, 725 F.3d 843, 853, 854 (8th Cir. 2013) ("We conclude that conspiring to prevent a plaintiff from bringing a viable § 1983 action by covering up a false arrest . . . may amount to a violation of a clearly established right. . . .A reasonable officer would be aware that it is impermissible to assist in falsifying an arrest report or hinder an investigation into the underlying misconduct. Nor is this a circumstance in which officers unwittingly accepted a falsified arrest report or disclosed details of an investigation. Rather, Isshawn–O'Quinn instructed Lorthridge to fabricate portions of the report, resulting in her inserting a false witness, false place of arrest, and false incident summary. He then approved the modified report without question or comment. Drawing 'reasonable inferences in [S.L.'s] favor,'. . . the record similarly supports that Harris disclosed confidential information to Arnold in order to assist her in concealing facts sought by investigators. We conclude that the material facts identified by the district court and the record viewed in the light most favorable to S.L. would support a conclusion that Harris and Isshawn–O'Quinn conspired with Arnold and Lorthridge to prevent S.L. from filing a § 1983 action following her false arrest, which amounted to participation in a § 1983 conspiracy. The record at this stage is sufficient for a reasonable jury to find that Harris and Isshawn–O'Quinn violated S.L.'s clearly established constitutional rights, and the district court accordingly did not err in denying qualified immunity to them.")

Hess v. Ables, 714 F.3d 1048, 1052, 1053 (8th Cir. 2013) ("There are two primary obstacles to Lesher's capacity to serve as clearly established law for the purposes of this qualified immunity analysis. First, Lesher's holding establishes that a municipal employer cannot attempt to compel one of its employees to relinquish his Fourth Amendment rights. But as Hess concedes, it was a state trooper, not her employer the City, who requested the ostensibly unreasonable search. Second, there was no coercion under threat of termination; neither Lawson nor Ables ever threatened Hess in an attempt to convince her to voluntarily undergo an unconstitutional search. Although Lawson directed Hess to leave work and go to Trooper Chastain's office, Hess does not allege that Lawson told her to go to the police station and submit to a drug test or that Lawson warned her she would be fired if she refused such a test. Instead, it was only after Hess had refused the test that Lawson conferred with Ables and terminated Hess's employment. Hess argues that these differences are too minute to matter, but 'the right allegedly violated must be defined at the appropriate level of specificity.'. . While 'officials can still be on notice that their conduct violates established law even in novel factual circumstances,' prior cases must give officers 'fair warning that their alleged [conduct] was unconstitutional.'. . Lesher simply does not provide fair warning. In light of existing law on February 23, 2010, it would not have been clear to a reasonable official in the position of Lawson or Ables that it was unconstitutional to fire someone after she refused a state trooper's request to take a drug test for law enforcement purposes. Accordingly, we agree with the district court's conclusion. Even assuming the termination violated Hess's Fourth Amendment rights, it was not clearly established at the time of the incident that such an action was unconstitutional, and therefore the defendants were entitled to qualified immunity.")

Atkinson v. City of Mountain View, Mo., 709 F.3d 1201, 1212-14 (8th Cir. 2013) ("Viewing the record in the light most favorable to Atkinson, we decide the unlawfulness of Sanders' charging Atkinson 'would be clear to a reasonable officer' in Sanders' situation. . . . On August 31, 2007, Sanders had 'fair warning' that charging at a non-resisting individual without first identifying himself as a police officer was unconstitutional in the context of an arrest. . . .We doubt a reasonable officer in Sanders' position would have needed to 'consult[ ] a casebook,'. . . to recognize the unreasonableness of using enough force to cause three broken ribs, a punctured lung, and repeated pneumothorax against a man who was objectively using peaceful means to prevent a fight. . . Even if the conduct which cast Sanders in the role of 'irate' stranger was itself reasonable, a reasonable officer finding himself in that role would have sought to pacify—not escalate—the tense situation. A reasonable officer would recognize that his own conduct—shoving a father who was trying to extract his son from a fight and announcing 'I'm the motherf[——] er who says who does what around here'—directly contributed to the tense situation. But had Sanders perused the United States Reports on August 31, 2007, he would have discovered the Supreme Court's 1989 decision in Graham, showing his extreme use of force against Atkinson was unconstitutional. . . .The 'linchpin' of our decision is not that Sanders should have known the Fourth Amendment required him 'to identify himself as an officer before using force to carry out an arrest in public.'. . We deny Sanders qualified immunity because as in Gainor, Lambert, Kukla, and Samuelson, there is a genuine dispute of material fact whether any of the three Graham factors reasonably justified slamming Atkinson into the side of a truck with enough force to break three ribs and puncture a lung. Our emphasis on Sanders' failure to identify himself flows directly from Graham's third factor: it is convincing evidence that Atkinson was neither 'actively resisting arrest [n]or attempting to evade arrest by flight.'. . Had Sanders clearly identified himself and Atkinson still intervened or refused to return the cell phone, Sanders might reasonably expect Atkinson would 'actively resist[ ] arrest,'. . . But if Atkinson's account is accepted, then Sanders could not reasonably expect active resistance to an unidentified officer. It is not for us, at the summary judgment stage, to construe the evidence in Sanders' favor.")

Atkinson v. City of Mountain View, Mo., 709 F.3d 1201, 1219, 1220 (8th Cir. 2013) (Colloton, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("The doctrine of qualified immunity requires an exercise of judicial restraint that sometimes can be discomfiting. Even when a court believes that a defendant violated the constitutional rights of a plaintiff, the court is required to dismiss the plaintiff's claim if the unconstitutionality of the defendant's conduct was not clearly established. Perhaps this is an appropriate case in which to announce a rule that a police officer must identify himself before using more than de minimis force to complete an arrest, if it is reasonable to believe that self-identification would obviate the need to use force. . . . But the rule announced by the court today was not clearly established in 2007, and the putative unlawfulness of Sanders's action was not apparent under pre-existing law. . . I would affirm the judgment.")

Stickley v. Byrd, 703 F.3d 421, 423, 424 (8th Cir. 2013) ("Stickley broadly asserts that the denial of adequate toilet paper violated his constitutional rights. We must, however, review the totality of the circumstances at issue. . . Although Stickley exhausted his supply before receiving an additional roll the following week, he was not always without toilet paper. When he did run out of toilet paper, he was able to clean himself by taking a shower. The Seventh Circuit has concluded that a prisoner's deprivation of toilet paper for five days, though 'merit[ing] some management criticism,' did not rise to the level of a constitutional violation. . . This holding is consistent with our precedent. . . We conclude that, given the amount of toilet paper afforded him, the limited time in which he went without toilet paper, and his ability to attend to his hygiene needs at those times, Stickley's constitutional rights were not violated by the denial of additional toilet paper. . . Whether the denial of a request for additional toilet paper or similar hygiene items might in some circumstances constitute a constitutional violation is a question we need not resolve today. We hold only that, in the circumstances presented in this case, the Defendants' refusal to grant Stickley's request for additional toilet paper did not violate any clearly established right. Accordingly, the Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity.")

Sutton v. Bailey, 702 F.3d 444, 449 (8th Cir. 2012) ("[T]he issue here is qualified immunity from Sutton's claims of inadequate pre-termination process. Appellants were aware of the University's grievance procedures, but they were not responsible for their adequacy. Appellants provided Sutton the essential elements of the pre-termination hearing Loudermill and our cases applying Loudermill required. It was reasonable for them to assume that Sutton, if he wished to contest the termination, would file a grievance and that the grievance procedures would comport with the minimum post-termination procedures that the Due Process Clause mandates. . . . Whether the University's post-termination process was so inadequate that due process required more than an informal pre-termination hearing is an uncertain issue that turns on 'a balancing of the competing interests at stake' in a particular case. . . Because the constitutional adequacy of post-termination procedures therefore cannot be assessed in a vacuum, the possible inadequacy of the post-termination procedures Sutton failed to invoke cannot, as a matter of law, be a proper basis for denying qualified immunity from individual-capacity damage claims based entirely on the alleged inadequacy of the pre-termination process the decision-makers provided.")

Winslow v. Smith, 696 F.3d 716, 738, 739 (8th Cir. 2012) ("Defendants do not dispute that the right to be free from the use of false evidence to secure a conviction was clearly established in 1989, nor could they. . . Instead, the parties dispute whether reasonable officers in 1989 should have known that recklessly investigating a crime violated clearly established law. We have previously addressed this issue in Wilson v. Lawrence County, 260 F.3d 946 (8th Cir.2001). In Wilson, the plaintiff brought a section 1983 civil rights action against law enforcement officials for their conduct in a murder investigation which led to his wrongful conviction. We affirmed the district court's denial of qualified immunity to the defendants, recognizing that 'the liberty interest involved ... is the interest in obtaining fair criminal proceedings.' Wilson, 260 F.3d at 956 n. 8. In Wilson, we noted such a right had previously been recognized in Brady v. Maryland, 373 U.S. 83, 87, 83 S.Ct. 1194, 10 L.Ed.2d 215 (1963), where suppression of exculpatory evidence violated due process, and Napue v. Illinois, 360 U.S. at 269, 79 S.Ct. 1173, where use of false evidence at trial violated due process. Wilson, 260 F.3d at 956 n. 8. As a result, '[l]aw enforcement officers, like prosecutors, have a responsibility to criminal defendants to conduct their investigations and prosecutions fairly.' Id. at 957. Here, the district court held that the right to be free from a reckless investigation was not clearly established in 1989. In reaching this result, the district court interpreted Wilson as not deciding whether a right to be free from reckless investigatory police work was clearly established in 1986 because the appellants '[did] not challenge the district court conclusion that the right was clearly established at the time of the alleged violation.' The district court is correct that in Wilson the appellants conceded that 'intentional acts of failing to investigate other leads would violate due process.' Wilson, 260 F.3d at 955. However, the appellants still argued that 'allegations or evidence of recklessness [were] insufficient to state a claim.' Id. We rejected their argument and held that the plaintiff's claim based on a reckless investigation in 1986 was actionable. Id. at 957. Pursuant to Wilson, then, a due process right against a reckless investigation was clearly established in 1986. As a result, Plaintiffs' right to be free from a reckless investigation was clearly established three years later in 1989.")

Williams v. Herron, 687 F.3d 971, 978 (8th Cir. 2012) ("Herron attempts to distinguish his case on appeal by arguing that we must limit our clearly established right analysis to cases involving section 1983 and qualified immunity; he further asserts that the type of claim brought by Williams has never given rise to section 1983 liability. We have previously held that section 1983 sexual-harassment claims are treated the same as sexual-harassment claims under Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, 42 U.S.C. § 2000e et seq. See Moore v. Forrest City Sch. Dist., 524 F.3d 879, 883 (8th Cir.2008); Weger v. City of Ladue, 500 F.3d 710, 717 n. 4 (8th Cir.2007); Tuggle v. Mangan, 348 F.3d 714, 720 (8th Cir.2003); see also Wright, 417 F.3d at 884–85 (listing cases). It should be no surprise that we apply the same treatment here, making Title VII sexual-harassment cases relevant to our determination. As explained above, a qualified-immunity analysis does not augment a plaintiff's burden to show her hostile-work-environment claim. Thus, because our claim analysis is the same regardless of whether qualified immunity is implicated, we may rely on cases not involving qualified immunity when determining whether a violation is clearly established.")

Burke v. Sullivan, 677 F.3d 367, 372 (8th Cir. 2012) ("Because the instant matter concerns a claim of qualified immunity, not a motion to suppress evidence, we need not reach the issue of whether the officers violated the dictates of the Fourth Amendment. . . .Based on the several facts known to the officers, it was reasonable for them to conclude their warrantless entry into Burke's home was lawful under either the emergency aid exception or the community caretaker exception. Jay had become highly intoxicated. Jay refused to leave the neighbor's party. Jay would not cooperate with Burke when she tried to take him home and was verbally abusive to Burke. Jay forcefully pushed Burke against a wall. Jay was involved in a physical altercation with one of the party guests, seriously biting him. Jay kicked and broke a table. Jay was known to use illegal drugs and may have been under the influence of illegal drugs. Jay went into Burke's house across the street immediately before the officers' arrival. There was no response when the officers attempted to contact Burke by knocking on her door, shouting, shining a flashlight inside, and telephoning the residence. Burke, who had been thrown against a wall by Jay, was now in the home alone with a violent suspect. When viewed collectively, these facts could lead a reasonable police officer to conclude there was either a threat of violence or an emergency requiring attention. . . . Contrary to Burke's assertion, Smith v. Kansas City, Mo. Police Department, 586 F.3d 576 (8th Cir.2009) does not dictate a different result. In Smith, we determined a police officer was not entitled to qualified immunity when the officer entered the home of an unarmed domestic violence suspect without a warrant. . . In reaching our decision, we gave significant weight to the fact the officer had no information any victim or potential victim was inside the home. . . In Burke's case, the officers had specific information a potential victim, Burke, was inside the home with Jay, the violent suspect, whose erratic behavior generated the domestic disturbance call. Jay had already been involved in violent encounters with Burke and LaRose. Given these facts, it was reasonable for the officers to conclude their warrantless entry into Burke's home was lawful. . . In addition, our court did not decide Smith until November 2009, over four months after the officers entered Burke's home. As such, Smith was not part of the established law when the officers entered Burke's home.")

Wagner v. Jones, 664 F.3d 259, 273-75 (8th Cir. 2011) ("The Supreme Court decided Rutan in 1990. Dean Jones does not contend that either the full-time or adjunct LAWR positions were policymaking or confidential positions and acknowledges that Wagner had a First Amendment right not to have her hiring decision based on her political beliefs and associations. Thus, Wagner has met her burden to prove that, at the time the hiring decisions were made, the law was clearly established that an employee seeking employment with the state cannot be denied a job based on her political associations or beliefs unless the position is a policymaking or confidential position. Because Wagner has shown that the First Amendment generally prohibits a state from basing its hiring decision on political beliefs or associations, the question now is 'whether a reasonable [dean] could have believed [not hiring Wagner] to be lawful, in light of clearly established law and the information [that the dean] possessed.'. . Dean Jones had several indications that Wagner's political beliefs and associations may have played a role in the faculty's hiring decisions. Only one law school faculty member out of 50 is a registered Republican. As dean, Dean Jones generally should have been aware of her faculty's point of view and its political tendencies. Associate Dean Andersen contacted Dean Jones before Wagner interviewed for the full-time position and relayed Wagner's concerns about whether her politics would make it difficult for her to be hired. Dean Jones apparently did nothing to ensure that the faculty did not impermissibly consider Wagner's politics in making its recommendation as to whom she should hire even though Dean Jones was present for the faculty discussion on January 25, 2007. After the faculty voted not to recommend Wagner for the full-time position, Associate Dean Carlson sent an e-mail to Dean Jones questioning whether Wagner's politics played a role in the faculty's vote and if Wagner's politics would play a role in voting on whether she could teach the summer LAWR program or serve as an adjunct. Dean Jones apparently completed no further investigation other than speaking to Associate Dean Carlson. More importantly, Dean Jones took no steps to ensure that the faculty did not take Wagner's political associations and beliefs into consideration when the faculty voted on whether to recommend her for an adjunct LAWR position. Dean Jones supported Wagner's serving as an adjunct instructor because she asked Janis to follow up with Wagner to determine whether she was interested in the adjunct position. But Dean Jones refused to hire Wagner and instead relied on the faculty's recommendations. Dean Jones did not provide Wagner with any explanation as to why she chose not to hire her for any of the adjunct positions. Dean Jones argues that the University has a standard policy for hiring law school faculty. The Committee receives the applications, screens the candidates, conducts the initial interviews, and then chooses candidates for a full-day interview. The faculty attends the job talk portion of the candidate's full-day interview and votes on whether to recommend hiring candidates to the dean. Dean Jones argues that as the dean, she has to hire the person whom the faculty recommends and that this has been the practice for the last 50 years. The district court found 'that Jones acted in strict conformity with longstanding hiring policy' and 'deans routinely and consistently exercised no independent personal judgment in making hiring decisions but acted entirely on the advice and recommendations of a Faculty Appointments Committee.' Wagner, however, presented evidence that at least one other dean in the past 50 years chose not to hire the person whom the faculty recommended. In her deposition, Dean Jones also conceded that she was free to refuse to hire the person recommended by the faculty and would do so in unusual circumstances . . . . Whether Dean Jones had the ability to hire Wagner absent the faculty's vote is a genuine issue of material fact that the jury, not the court, should decide. Furthermore, Dean Jones was notified that the 'process' may not have been working properly and the faculty may have violated the First Amendment, but she still made her hiring decision based solely on the faculty's suggestions. By her own admission, Dean Jones had the ability to hire someone whom the faculty had not recommended but chose not to do so. Dean Jones's conduct confirmed the faculty's recommendations, which a jury ultimately could conclude violated the First Amendment. Consequently, Dean Jones has not shown that a reasonable university dean in her position would have believed that failing to hire Wagner was lawful in light of clearly established law.")

Mathers v. Wright, 636 F.3d 396, 402 (8th Cir. 2011) ("[W]e conclude that it was clearly established that a school official may not treat a student differently from her similarly situated peers when such conduct exceeds the scope of professionally acceptable choices and stems from an improper personal motivation. This holding is consistent with decisions from other courts that have denied qualified immunity to a school official accused of discriminating against a student in the absence of a rational basis to do so. . . Our holding is narrow. Looking no further than the face of the complaint and accepting as true all allegations therein, we conclude that the allegations regarding Wright's treatment of J.S.J. state an equal protection violation, and we are satisfied that a reasonable teacher in Wright's position would recognize as much. Accordingly, Wright is not entitled to qualified immunity at this stage of the proceeding.")

Doe v. Flaherty, 623 F.3d 577, 585 (8th Cir. 2010) ("It was clearly established at the time of the incident in this case that a supervisory school official with actual notice of ongoing sexual abuse against a student was required to take action to investigate and stop the abuse. The plaintiffs do not appear to argue that the notice standard under § 1983 is less stringent than actual knowledge, but to the extent that the issue is raised, no less stringent notice standard was clearly established for purposes of qualified immunity in this circuit as of October 2006.")

Langford v. Norris, 614 F.3d 445, 461, 462 (8th Cir. 2010) ("In this case, it is plain that if Byus knew all the relevant facts about Langford's and Hardin's medical needs, the unlawfulness of failing to ensure that they received adequate treatment would have been apparent. The more difficult question centers on how much Byus actually knew about Langford's and Hardin's medical needs and the allegedly inadequate treatment they received. As we have said, we may take as given the facts that the district court assumed. . . But the only relevant fact identified in the magistrate judge's proposed findings and recommendations is that Byus sent letters to Langford and Hardin in which he acknowledged receiving letters from them. . . .The district court likely inferred that the letters from Langford and Hardin contained at least some description of their medical needs–Langford's stomach and back pain and Hardin's Charcot foot–and the perceived inadequacy of the treatment they had received to that point. . . . Considering these facts together, and drawing all reasonable inferences from them in favor of the plaintiffs, we are convinced that the constitutional right at issue was clearly established as of the time of the relevant conduct, such that a reasonable supervisory official would have known that his actions were unlawful. That is to say, a reasonable official standing in Byus's shoes would have understood that ignoring Langford's and Hardin's complaints about receiving deficient medical care contravened clearly established principles of Eighth Amendment jurisprudence.")

Morris v. Zefferi, 601 F.3d 805, 812 (8th Cir. 2010) ("We believe our decision in this case is controlled by the reasoning of *Nelson.*The district court did not err in finding the unconstitutionality of Zefferi's alleged conduct should have been obvious to Zefferi based both on common sense and prior general case law. . . Transporting a pretrial detainee in a small, unsanitary dog cage for ninety minutes, with no compelling urgency and other alternatives available, under the above precedent, sufficiently shows the possible infringement of a clearly established constitutional right to be free from improper punishment.")

Williams v. Jackson, 600 F.3d 1007, 1014 (8th Cir. 2010) ("Here, for purposes of our review, the allegations in the case involve the malicious and retaliatory exposure of inmates to an apparently intended harm without a penological purpose. . . . We do not believe that qualified immunity in this context hinges on the question of whether prior cases referenced the particular, technological manner in which force was applied. Similarly, we do not believe qualified immunity applies simply because the precise degree of harm likely to result was uncertain. As already discussed, the material inquiry is not the degree of harm, but rather, the degree of force applied and the reason for applying that force. . . .[R]easonable officers are on sufficient notice that they may not purposefully expose prisoners to potentially harmful radiation in the complete absence of a penological purpose. Importantly, the record here taken in a light most favorable to Williams shows just such a complete absence of a penological purpose in removing the shield and in failing to deactivate the light immediately upon removal of the shield. Given the reasonable inference that the officers acted maliciously in an effort to cause harm, and the allegations that an injury did result, the correction-officer defendants are not entitled to qualified immunityat this time. Similarly, in this case, the same rationale supports the denial of qualified immunity as to the related claim of deliberate indifference.").

Heartland Academy Community Church v. Waddle, 595 F.3d 798, 807-09 (8th Cir. 2010) ("In response to Heartland's jurisdictional challenge, the Officials try to couch their fact-intensive 'I didn't do it!' defenses in the language of a purely legal argument. The Officials characterize the issue before us as whether the evidence Heartland adduced is sufficient to survive scrutiny under Fed.R.Civ.P. 56. The Officials stress they do not dispute Heartland's evidence, but only challenge its sufficiency to establish violations of clearly established constitutional rights. We decline to elevate the form of the Officials' argument over its substance. . . .The evidence Heartland presented to the district court–if believed–is so outrageous we are presented with a case in which the civil rights defendants acted in a 'plainly incompetent' manner or in 'a knowing violation of a clearly established precedent.'. . We express no view as to the ultimate truth. But under the version of the facts we must accept as true for purposes of this interlocutory appeal, the Officials knowingly worked with one another to effect the mass removal of HCA students without court orders, with court orders based upon lies, or court orders devoid of probable cause. The Officials deprived Heartland of notice and an opportunity to be heard, and then tried to cover up the Officials' wrongdoing– with false, misleading, and incomplete statements. All of Heartland's relevant constitutional rights were clearly established on October 30, 2001. The state of the law on October 30, 2001, gave the Officials fair warning that effecting or at least conspiring to effect the mass removal of HCA students with bogus ex parte orders potentially would violate Heartland's Fourteenth Amendment rights to family integrity, Fourth and Fourteenth Amendment rights to be free from unreasonable seizures, First and Fourteenth Amendment rights to free association, and Fourteenth Amendment rights to procedural due process. The Supreme Court has long recognized the constitutional rights the Officials allegedly infringed.").

Rush v. Perryman, 579 F.3d 908, 914 (8th Cir. 2009) ("Rush's right to a post-termination name-clearing hearing was clearly established. The district court did not err in denying the Board members' summary judgment motion on qualified immunity grounds.").

Bonner v. Outlaw, 552 F.3d 673, 679, 680 (8th Cir. 2009) ("Outlaw's conduct violated Bonner's clearly established rights because the law gave Outlaw 'fair warning' his conduct was unconstitutional. Over thirty years ago, the Supreme Court in Procunier declared that inmates have a due process right to notice whenever correspondence addressed to them is rejected. . . Outlaw argues he did not have fair notice Procunier applies to packages because Procunier only discussed letters, and he reasonably relied on 28 C.F.R. ' 540.13 to support his interpretation of Procunier. We believe, however, such an interpretation of Procunier strains credulity. The reasoning of Procunier clearly applies to all forms of correspondence, even if the decision only discussed letters. There is no valid reason for distinguishing between letters and packages: the inmate's liberty interest is the same and there is no additional administrative burden involved.").

Cross v. Mokwa, 547 F.3d 890, 896, 897 (8th Cir. 2008) ("These six plaintiffs allege that the police officers' actions at 3309 Illinois violated their First Amendment right to protest because the Building Code Violation Enforcement Plan was devised and executed as a prior restraint on protester activities. The district court denied the police officers qualified immunity on these claims, concluding that reasonable police officers should have known that 'selective and disproportionate use of police power to prevent the occurrence of a protest' would violate clearly established First Amendment rights, and that plaintiffs presented sufficient evidence that 'a person of ordinary firmness would be deterred by this State action.' We disagree. . . . Neither the court nor plaintiffs on appeal cite any authority for the proposition that a policeman's decision to enforce a traffic law or a provision of the housing code, for example, is unconstitutional if it can be shown that he has enforced that law in a 'selective' manner, not to retaliate for the violator's prior First Amendment protected activity, but to 'chill' future First Amendment activity that the violator may be contemplating. We have found no federal appellate case granting or upholding First Amendment relief on this ground. . . . At a minimum, it was not clearly established in 2003 that a police officer could be liable on a 'prior restraint' theory for making arrests that were supported by probable cause and then conducting a reasonable search and seizure of a condemned building. For these reasons, the district court's denial of qualified immunity from these First Amendment claims is reversed.").

Stufflebeam v. Harris, 521 F.3d 884, 887-89 (8th Cir. 2008) ("[T]he primary question, one not addressed by the district court or carefully analyzed by the parties on appeal, is whether Arkansas law permits a police officer to arrest a person for refusing to identify himself when he is not suspected of other criminal activity and his identification is not needed to protect officer safety or to resolve whatever reasonable suspicions prompted the officer to initiate an on-going traffic stop or Terry . . .stop. . . We conclude it does not. . . . Here, Harris acted contrary to the plain meaning of Rule 2.2(b) and the law of Arkansas as clearly established in Meadows by prolonging the detention and then arresting Stufflebeam, a passenger not suspected of criminal activity, because he adamantly refused to comply with an unlawful demand that he identify himself. . . . On this record, Officer Harris is not entitled to dismissal of Stufflebeam's claim, either on the merits or based on qualified immunity.").

Irving v. Dormire, 519 F.3d 441, 450 (8th Cir. 2008) ("An officer who acts so far beyond the bounds of his official duties that 'the rationale underlying qualified immunity is inapplicable' can have fair warning even if there is no factually similar case. . . It was clearly established by Burton that a guard is not permitted to threaten an inmate with death by means readily at hand. It should have likewise been clear that a guard may not threaten an inmate with death by means of arming, bribing, and inciting other inmates to accomplish that which the guard may not do directly. No reasonable prison guard would have believed that no constitutional right would be violated by such conduct, and thus the district court correctly denied qualified immunity to Brigance.").

Brown v. Fortner, 518 F.3d 552, 561 (8th Cir. 2008) ("We conclude that Fortner had 'fair warning' that driving recklessly while transporting a shackled inmate who had been denied the use of a seatbelt and ignoring requests to slow down violated the constitutional prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment. There is no question that it was clearly established that subjecting inmates to unreasonable and substantial risk of harm constituted a constitutional violation. . . While there are not any published cases from our circuit directly addressing deliberate indifference in the context of prisoner transportation, Morgan is on point. . . . The facts in Morgan that were sufficient to support a conclusion that an officer transporting an individual was deliberately indifferent are sufficiently similar to the conduct alleged of Fortner to make it clear to a reasonable officer that the conduct was unconstitutional. Moreover, even discounting Morgan's significance because it was unpublished, '"officials can still be on notice that their conduct violates established law even in novel factual circumstances."' . . Other cases addressing deliberate indifference to the safety of prisoners provided notice that the conduct engaged in by Fortner was unconstitutional, making the right clearly established.").

Duckworth v. St. Louis Metropolitan Police Dept., 2007 WL 2050857, at *5 (8th Cir. July 19, 2007) ("In the specific context of this case, the superiors were confronted with the situation where no female officers were working the night watch in District One. Captain Filla thought that Special Order 90-S-7 granted her authority to reassign Plaintiffs, as long as she had a 'sufficient justification.' . . . . Reasonable police administrators could believe that assigning female officers to the night watch was lawful.").

Lindsey v. City of Orrick, Missouri, 491 F.3d 892, 902 (8th Cir. 2007) ("Although neither the Supreme Court nor this court has considered a completely analogous case–one involving an employee's dismissal after speech alleging violations of open meetings law that is not our inquiry. In Hope v. Pelzer, 536 U.S. 730 (2002), the Supreme Court changed the clearly established law inquiry from a hunt for prior cases with precisely the same facts to asking whether the official had fair notice her conduct was unconstitutional.").

Richmond v. City of Brooklyn Center, 490 F.3d 1002, 1007, 1009 (8th Cir. 2007) ("The defendants do not dispute on appeal the jury's finding that Officer Bruce conducted the strip search in an unreasonable manner in violation of Richmond's Fourth Amendment rights. Therefore, we proceed directly to the second prong of the qualified immunity analysis, which asks whether the asserted constitutional right was clearly established. . . . In this case, the officers had reasonable suspicion that Richmond was concealing evidence on his person and were in a position to conduct a private, hygienic and non-abusive strip search on the spot, rather than risk Richmond disposing of the evidence during the course of his transportation to the police station. . . . No clearly established legal standards would have put a reasonable officer on notice that, in these particular circumstances, it was objectively unreasonable to lower the handcuffed arrestee's pants and boxer shorts to accomplish the strip search, rather than to risk loss of evidence by waiting until the arrestee was in an environment where handcuffs were not required.").

Clemmons v. Armontrout, 477 F.3d 962, 966 (8th Cir. 2007) ("We hold that, under the first prong of Saucier, Investigator Brooks did not violate Clemmons's constitutional rights, as Clemmons adduced no evidence that Brooks acted intentionally, recklessly, or in bad faith when he failed to disclose the IOC to the prosecutor and failed to investigate Clark's statement that Bagby murdered Johnson. While Clemmons argues that he demonstrated recklessness by providing evidence that Investigator Brooks received the IOC, failed to interview Clark, failed to interview other eyewitnesses, and failed to include the IOC to the prosecutor, he has offered no explanation for why these actions constitute recklessness as opposed to mere negligence. . . . As a matter of law, we conclude that the undisputed facts establish that Investigator Brooks's actions were not intentional or reckless. Mere negligence on Brooks's part by failing to disclose the IOC or investigating another lead is insufficient to deny him qualified immunity.").

Kahle v. Leonard, 477 F.3d 544, 554 (8th Cir. 2007) ("Without question, then, Kahle's constitutional right to be protected from being sexually assaulted by a guard was clearly established on December 14, 2002, as was the fact that a supervisor who was deliberately indifferent to a substantial risk of such an assault could be held liable under § 1983. . . . Because a reasonable juror who accepted Kahle's version of the events could conclude that Malone violated Kahle's clearly-established constitutional rights by demonstrating deliberate indifference to a substantial risk that she would be seriously harmed by Leonard, the district court's denial of Malone's summary-judgment motion is AFFIRMED.").

Ambrose v. Young, 474 F.3d 1070, 1078 (8th Cir. 2007) ("Major Young was in charge of all inmate crews involved in the Sinai clean-up. As previously discussed, Major Young knew the dangling, live power line created a substantial risk of harm. Despite this known risk, Major Young told the inmates to stomp out a non-threatening fire within arms reach of an obviously unstable and live power line. . . .. It is well-established in this circuit that 'knowingly compelling an inmate to perform labor that is ... dangerous to his or her life or health' is a violation of the Eighth Amendment. . . Viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Ambrose, we therefore conclude Major Young's conduct was not 'objectively legally reasonable,'. . . and the district court properly denied Major Young qualified immunity.") Szabla v. City of Brooklyn Park, Minnesota, 429 F.3d 1168, 1174 (8th Cir. 2005) ("In this case, as in Kuha, the officer accompanied the dog, rather than allowing the dog to run loose. Keeping the dog on the lead gave the officer more control over the dog, but it also exposed the officer to greater risk. In both cases, the officer was running with the dog, at night, searching for a person who had fled and whose whereabouts were unknown. Szabla argues that this case is distinguishable from Kuha because Baker used a dog to track a person who may have fled because he was injured or ill, not because he wanted to evade the police. This distinction is indeed relevant to the Fourth Amendment reasonableness of Baker's use of the track command, but it does not demonstrate that any reasonable officer would have known on August 17, 2000, that a prior warning was constitutionally required in these circumstances. Baker is therefore entitled to summary judgment on the ground of qualified immunity.").

Wright v. Rolette County, 417 F.3d 879, 887-89 (8th Cir. 2005) (Bye, J., concurring) ("I concur with the majority as to the facts as alleged by Ms. Wright, if proven true, could support a claim for sexual harassment, but not a claim for constructive discharge. I write separately in regards to section III.D.2 of the opinion, which discusses the clearly established prong of the qualified immunity inquiry. The majority declares '[t]he right to be free of gender discrimination is clearly established.' This hasty resolution of the clearly established prong ignores the Supreme Court's pronouncements in Anderson v. Creighton. . .and Saucier v. Katz. . . . Although we do not require a precise factual analog to precedent, in light of pre-existing law the unlawfulness of specific conduct must be apparent to a reasonably competent official. . . The importance of this particularized inquiry cannot be discounted because it is the teeth of the qualified immunity defense. Without these teeth, the defense lacks the bite essential in promoting the compelling public policy objectives underlying it. . . . Our case law clearly establishes sexual innuendo or discriminatory conduct is pervasive or abusive when it is both frequent and severe. . . . That is not to say our case law is a model of clarity in the absence of frequent and severe discriminatory conduct. In fact, the line between merely offensive conduct and actionable sexual harassment is blurred where the harassment, though severe, occurs relatively infrequently, or where the complained of conduct, though frequent, is relatively innocuous. But the conduct at issue here is neither infrequent nor innocuous. Thus, if Ms. Wright's allegations turn out to be true, Sheriff Sims's conduct falls within the realm of frequent and severe sexual innuendo and outside the protection of the qualified immunity defense." [footnotes omitted]).

Davis v. Hall, 375 F.3d 703, 719 (8th Cir. 2004) ("Based on Slone and the law of other circuits . . . we have no difficulty concluding that Davis alleged the deprivation of a clearly established right and that a reasonable government actor would know that failing to respond to Davis's requests to be released in keeping with the court order that he possessed was unlawful.").

Burton v. Richmond, 370 F.3d 723, 730 (8th Cir. 2004) ("Assuming arguendo that plaintiffs have shown a constitutional violation, defendants are still entitled to qualified immunity if the alleged right at issue was not clearly established at the time of the complained-of conduct in 1985. . . We believe the constitutional right of children under DFS supervision, yet not within DFS custody, to be free from abuse in a court-ordered placement was not clearly established in 1985. Courts have split on whether children in the mid-1980s had a clearly established right to reasonable safety while placed in foster care after having been taken into state custody. [citing cases] Given the wide divergence of views on whether the right to protection from abuse was clearly established for children in state custody placed in foster care, we refuse to find that a right to protection while under state supervision, yet not in state custody, was clearly established in 1985. The District Court erred when it ruled that in 1985 plaintiffs had a clearly established constitutional right to be protected from abuse at the hands of a private individual while under state supervision yet not in state custody.").

Villasana v. Wilhoit, 368 F.3d 976, 978 (8th Cir. 2004) ("After substantial discovery, the district court granted defendants' motion for summary judgment, concluding they are entitled to qualified immunity from these claims. The court reasoned that no case has extended liability under Brady to crime laboratory technicians and therefore Villasana failed to show 'that defendants had a clearly established obligation under Brady to disclose exculpatory or potentially exculpatory

Kuha v. City of Minnetonka, 365 F.3d 590, 601, 602 (8th Cir. 2004) (amending and superceding original panel opinion on reh'g)("Kuha has alleged facts sufficient to survive summary judgment on his Fourth Amendment claim, which is based on the officers' failure to give a verbal warning prior to using a police dog to seize him. The second step of the qualified immunity inquiry will still shield the officers from suit, however, if their conduct was objectively legally reasonable in light of the information they possessed at the time of the alleged violation. . . . Kuha's right to a verbal warning in this case was not clearly established at the time of the seizure. Officers Anderson and Warosh were not on notice that it arguably was constitutionally impermissible to use a police dog against Kuha without a verbal warning under the circumstances of this case. . . . There are no cases from this circuit that mandate such a warning and a review of other circuits offers little guidance on the issue. In most of the published K-9 bite cases, the fighting issue is whether the initial decision to release the dog was objectively reasonable under the circumstances. . . . In those few cases turning on a failure to warn, significant factual differences weigh against charging Officers Anderson and Warosh with notice sufficient to warrant denial of qualified immunity. . . . An officer could conclude, as Officer Anderson testified in this case, that in situations where the location of the suspect is less evident, a warning would place the officers at undue risk from a hiding suspect. We cannot say that 'no reasonably competent officer' would have concluded otherwise. . . . Accordingly, Officers Anderson and Warosh are entitled to qualified immunity for their actions in this case.").

Lawyer v. City of Council Bluffs, 361 F.3d 1099, 1108 (8th Cir. 2004) ("Even if an Iowa court were to conclude later that conduct such as Timothy's does not violate the statute, the officers are entitled to qualified immunity. Police officers are not expected to parse code language as though they were participating in a law school seminar, and a reasonable officer certainly could believe that Timothy's earnest efforts to induce Michael's defiance of a lawful command 'obstructed' the officer's duties. Given the lack of detailed judicial guidance on the interplay among the statutory terms 'obstruct,' 'resist,' and 'verbal harassment,' we conclude that the arrest of Timothy did not violate clearly established law.").

Moran v. Clarke, 359 F.3d 1058, 1061 (8th Cir. 2004) ("Appellants, especially as law enforcement officials, knew or should reasonably have known that the specific conduct outlined by Moran was unlawful. No reasonable official would believe it was permissible to hatch a plan to scapegoat an innocent officer for acts of police brutality against a developmentally disabled citizen. On April 14, 1997, and every day thereafter, such actions were clearly beyond the scope of Appellants' discretionary authority. . . . Appellants arguments based on Albright are unavailing. They argue that because the Supreme Court held in Albright that a substantive due process claim would not lie in a malicious prosecution claim, . . . they could not have been on notice that their conduct violated the Constitution. We disagree. As we explained in Moran I, Appellants' purported actions went well beyond the realm of malicious prosecution. . . 'Instead of simply allowing a weakly supported prosecution to proceed,' Moran asserts that Appellants engaged in a 'purposeful police conspiracy to manufacture ... false evidence.'").

Hawkins v. Holloway, 316 F.3d 777, 788 (8th Cir. 2003) ("Although the sheriff faults the district court for failing to cite to any case that is factually similar, it was not necessary for the court to do so because Sheriff Holloway's alleged conduct was so far beyond the bounds of the performance of his official duties that the rationale underlying qualified immunity is inapplicable. . . . . No reasonable official in the sheriff's shoes could have thought it within his duties to threaten his employees with deadly force.").

Hill v. McKinley, 311 F.3d 899, 904, 905 (8th Cir. 2002) ("Although we conclude that the facts establish a constitutional violation, we believe the defendants were entitled to qualified immunity on the ground that their actions did not violate clearly established law. . . .[T]the relevant authority indicates that prisoners are entitled to very narrow zones of privacy, and circumstances may warrant the most invasive of intrusions into bodily privacy. In light of this authority, we cannot say as a matter of law that it was clearly established in 1996 that a highly intoxicated, loud and violent prisoner could not constitutionally be restrained naked outside the view of all but a small number of guards. Thus, the district court should have ruled that the defendants were entitled to qualified immunity on Hill's Fourth Amendment claim.").

Treats v. Morgan, 308 F.3d 868, 875 (8th Cir. 2002) ("At the time Treats was sprayed, the law was clearly established that correctional officers do not have a blank check to use force whenever a prisoner is being difficult. . . Prison regulations governing the conduct of correctional officers are also relevant in determining whether an inmate's right was clearly established. Hope, __ U.S. at __, 122 S.Ct. at 2517. The ADC regulations authorize use of pepper spray only when an inmate is threatening physical harm, refuses to produce an item, or refuses to relocate, . . and the regulations prohibit its use without warning, . . or as punishment. . . The ADC promulgated these rules to regulate the conduct of correctional officers, and Treats has presented evidence that appellants violated each of them.").

Meloy v. Bachmeier, 302 F.3d 845, 849 (8th Cir. 2002) ("We conclude Bachmeier's adherence to Dr. O'Neill's order that the prison need not provide Meloy a CPAP was objectively reasonable in light of the legal rules in place at the time of her adherence. Bachmeier had some medical training as a nurse, but she was functioning in an administrative role. Bachmeier was not responsible for examining Meloy or treating him herself. Although Meloy personally told Bachmeier about his condition and his need for a CPAP, Bachmeier relied on the opinion of prison doctors, who had more medical training, about the necessary treatment for Meloy's OSA. Bachmeier followed Dr. O'Neill's order that a CPAP was unnecessary, and followed the cardiologist's order that the prison should provide one. . . . . As for Bachmeier's liability in her role as a supervisor, we cannot say the law was clearly established that Bachmeier's failure to override Dr. O'Neill's treatment order constituted deliberate indifference to any Eighth Amendment violation by him. The law does not clearly require an administrator with less medical training to second-guess or disregard a treating physician's treatment decision. Because the law was not clearly established that Bachmeier was deliberately indifferent to Meloy's serious medical needs, Bachmeier is entitled to qualified immunity.").

Omni Behavioral Health v. Miller, 285 F.3d 646, 653, 654 (8th Cir. 2002) ("While there appears to be no reported case dealing with the precise situation before us, to find a right clearly established, 'it is not necessary that the Supreme Court has directly addressed the issue, nor does the precise action or omission in question need to have been held unlawful.' . . . However, there must be the 'requisite degree of factual correspondence' between the case at issue and previous cases. . . . The only cases that appear to be factually similar to this case involve lawsuits by parents claiming that their liberty interest in the care and custody of their children was violated by child abuse investigations. [citing cases] In each of these cases, the court held the state actor that was investigating child abuse was entitled to qualified immunity. . . . The need to continually subject the assertion of this abstract substantive due process right to a balancing test which weighs the interest of the parent against the interests of the child and the state makes the qualified immunity defense difficult to overcome. Moreover, the requirement that the right be clearly established at the time of the alleged violation is particularly formidable. . . Applying the above analysis here, it is clear that the right to occupational liberty, to the extent that it exists at all in this context, does not include a right to be free from child abuse investigations.").

Foulk v. Charrier, 262 F.3d 687, 702 (8th Cir. 2001) ("By June of 1994, the law was well established that a malicious and sadistic use of force by a prison official against a prisoner, done with the intent to injure and causing actual injury, is enough to establish a violation of the Eighth Amendment's cruel and unusual punishment clause.").

Gorman v. Bartch, 152 F.3d 907, 915-16 (8th Cir. 1998) ("At the time of Gorman's arrest in May of 1992, Title II of the ADA had only been in effect for some four months. Despite the clear language of the statute, there was uncertainty about the extent of its coverage. There were no cases addressing its possible application to government agencies like police departments or to the transportation of arrestees. Although there were some cases applying the Rehabilitation Act to prisons, there were none dealing with facts similar to those alleged by Gorman. . . In the intervening years until the Supreme Court decided Yeskey, courts divided on the applicability of the ADA and Rehabilitation Act to state prisons. . . . Under the circumstances, it cannot be said that reasonable police officials in May of 1992 would have known that the actions alleged against the individual defendants in respect to the transportation of a disabled arrestee were subject to, and in violation of, Title II of the ADA or ' 504 of the Rehabilitation Act.").

Greer v. Shoop, 141 F.3d 824, 828 (8th Cir. 1998) ("We are of the view that the state-created danger theory was an emerging rule of law in this circuit in 1991. Therefore, we assume without deciding, based on the facts accepted for purposes of summary judgment, that Greer has sufficiently alleged a violation of Mora Greer's constitutional rights pursuant to the state-created danger theory. However, we are not convinced that the law was so clearly established in 1991 that a reasonable official under these factual circumstances would have known that his or her actions were violative of Mora Greer's constitutional rights. Although a precise factual correspondence with precedents has never been required for a constitutional right to be clearly established, Boswell v. Sherburne County, 849 F.2d 1117, 1121 (8th Cir.1988), when the distinguishing facts are such that they change the nature of the claim presented, they are relevant to that determination. In this case, the privacy issues that surround a person's medical condition, specifically when that person is HIV-positive or has AIDS, complicate the application of the state-created danger theory. See Iowa Code Ann. ' 141.23 (West, WESTLAW through 1991) (prohibiting non-consensual disclosure of a person's HIV-positive status). Because of those privacy concerns, we cannot say that in 1991, a reasonable official would have known that failing to inform Mora Greer of Stevens' HIV-positive status violated her due process rights. It is just as likely that a reasonable official would have thought that disclosing Stevens' HIV-positive status violated Stevens' right of privacy. Therefore, we hold that the contours of the state-created danger theory, as applied to the unique facts of this case, were not defined clearly enough in 1991 to remove the defendants' qualified immunity protection.").

Burnham v. Ianni, 119 F.3d 668, 675, 677 (8th Cir. 1997) (en banc) ("Because this case involves Ianni's suppression of plaintiffs' protected speech, plaintiffs have (at least for purposes of summary adjudication) sufficiently established a violation of a constitutional right . . . . Here, of course, we have long established, binding precedent totally supportive of plaintiffs' claims. The Supreme Court and this court have both clearly and directly spoken on the subject on numerous occasions and in years long prior to the 1992 censorship by Ianni. Accordingly, Chancellor Ianni's "not clearly established" claim must be rejected.").

Veneklase v. City of Fargo, 78 F.3d 1264, 1269 (8th Cir. 1996) (Veneklase I) ("[U]pon a careful reading of Frisby[v. Schultz, 487 U.S. 474 (1988)], we do not find that its holding defined the outer parameters of 'focused' residential picketing. We hold that plaintiffs did not have a clearly established right on October 10, 1991, to picket in a route encompassing the Bovard residence and the two to three homes on either side of it. We further hold that the arrest of plaintiffs by the defendant officers was objectively reasonable in light of the legal rules in existence at the time the action occurred.").

Bills v. Dahm, 32 F.3d 333, 335 (8th Cir. 1994) ("To determine whether [plaintiff's] constitutional right to equal protection was violated ... we cannot begin with the generalized inquiry into whether the right to equal protection is clearly established. Instead, we must ask 'a more particularized' question ... namely, whether under the circumstances of this case he had a clearly established right. In other words, we must determine whether he had a clearly established right to be offered the same opportunities [privilege of overnight child visitation] afforded prisoners confined within the Nebraska Center for Women.").

Sellers v. Baer, 28 F.3d 895, 900 (8th Cir. 1994) ("As was the case in Anderson, the plaintiffs here have stated the constitutional right allegedly violated at too high a level of generality. It is particularly important for a complaint alleging a violation of substantive due process to state with particularity the precise nature of the alleged violation. [cite omitted] The issue in this case for purposes of qualified immunity is whether reasonable officers in the position of [defendant officers] would have understood they were violating [decedent's] constitutional rights when they removed him from the fairgrounds, where he had been making a great nuisance of himself, and set him free in a parking lot, near a police station and behind a federal building, away from his companions, without funds, and in an intoxicated state, rather than retain custody and charge him with disorderly conduct.").

Grantham v. Trickey, 21 F.3d 289, 293 (8th Cir. 1994) ("Our cases recently have reached different conclusions on the question of when an individual's right to free speech in public employment is 'clearly established' for the purposes of qualified immunity. We have held that 'when Pickering's fact-intensive balancing test is at issue, the asserted First Amendment right "can rarely be considered 'clearly established' for purposes of the Harlow qualified immunity standard." '" cites omitted).

Bartlett v. Fisher, 972 F.2d 911, 918 n.3 (8th Cir. 1992) ("Factually analogous cases are highly relevant to the qualified immunity inquiry when the constitutional right in question is subject to a balancing test.").

Parada v. Anoka County, No. CV 18-795 (JRT/TNL), 2018 WL 3621210, at *5-6, *8 (D. Minn. July 30, 2018) ("Neither the Supreme Court nor the Eighth Circuit has expressly decided whether the Fourth Amendment 'permits a warrantless arrest for a misdemeanor when the alleged offense did not occur in the presence of the arresting officer.'. . Although the Eighth Circuit has not decided the issue, it has held that, '[b]ecause the law regarding warrantless misdemeanor arrests for offenses committed outside the presence of the arresting officer is not clearly established under the Fourth Amendment,' arresting officers are entitled to qualified immunity. . . Because the law was not clear at the time of the arrest, the Court concludes that Oman is entitled to qualified immunity for any argument based on his lack of presence during Parada's commission of the crime. . . . The Court must decide whether it was clearly established at the time of the arrest that unreasonably prolonging a traffic stop and subsequently arresting someone under these circumstances violates the Fourth Amendment. Caballes and Rodriguez clearly establish that a seizure cannot extend beyond the time necessary to issue a traffic ticket. . . And while Parada cannot use Rule 6.01 to establish a Fourth Amendment violation, the Rule is evidence that Oman should know that a full custodial arrest is not necessary – and indeed not even allowed in Minnesota – to issue a citation for driving without a license. The Court concludes that Oman has not shown that he is entitled to qualified immunity with respect to Parada's Fourth Amendment claim stemming from the initial arrest. The Court notes that this is the only Fourth Amendment theory that Parada can assert against Oman in his individual capacity. . . . Having established that Parada states a sufficient claim that her Fourth Amendment rights were violated, the Court must decide whether it was clearly established at the time of the arrest that law enforcement cannot detain an alien on suspicion of removability without probable cause to believe that a crime has been committed. It is clearly established that a warrantless arrest must be supported by probable cause of criminal activity, that unlawful presence is not a crime, and that an immigrant's possible removability is insufficient to give rise to probable cause. . . It is also clearly established that an ICE Detainer alone cannot support local law enforcement's continued detention of an alien. . . Oman cannot establish at this stage that he is entitled to qualified immunity.")

Ferguson v. Short, No. 2:14-CV-04062-NKL, 2017 WL 194282, at *4 (W.D. Mo. Jan. 17, 2017) ("Clearly, Defendants were on notice that it would be a constitutional violation to knowingly use fabricated evidence or unreliable evidence to convict a criminal defendant. But Defendants contend that they also had to know that falsifying evidence through one defendant to use against another defendant was unconstitutional. Qualified immunity, however, is intended to protect officers who do not know that they are doing something wrong. It is not intended to protect them if they knowingly do something wrong. Furthermore, to prove his fabrication claim, Ferguson must show that Defendants could foresee that their actions would injure Ferguson. It would be illogical to place that burden on Ferguson and then excuse the Defendants' actions because they didn't know the Court would find them responsible for their unconstitutional conduct under recognized common law standards.")

Ellington v. Piercy, No. 2:14-CV-04316-NKL, 2016 WL 2745868, at *6-7 (W.D. Mo. May 11, 2016) ("Having considered the precedent behind Plaintiffs' Fourth Amendment allegations, the Court finds it 'beyond debate' that the erratic operation of a police vehicle—whether a car or a boat—can constitute an objectively unreasonable seizure. Eighth Circuit precedent has established that the manner in which an offer operates his vehicle may cause a Fourth Amendment violation. . . While the Eighth Circuit has not discussed Fourth Amendment seizures in the context of a water transport, Plaintiffs allege that Piercy drove at speeds exceeding 40 miles per hour across a crowded lake in a non-emergency situation. Such driving would bring Piercy's actions in line with those found unreasonable in Chambers: in both cases, a restrained suspect was subject to erratic driving, causing him physical injury. . . . The novel factual elements of Brandon's case—that he was being transported in a patrol boat across water and died by drowning—do not affect these underlying legal principles. The United States Supreme Court has 'expressly rejected a requirement that previous cases be "fundamentally similar."'. . Instead, because the central question of this inquiry is 'whether the state of the law at the time gave the officials fair warning their conduct was unlawful,' the 'contours of a right' may be sufficiently clear even if the factual situations are different. . . Although Piercy argues there is no clearly-established constitutional right where someone is 'improperly and incorrectly secured during transport over water after his arrest,'. . . Piercy does not show how the legal principles differ when a suspect is transported in a boat, as compared to cases where the suspect is transported in a car. The Court cannot say as a matter of law that 'a reasonable officer could have believed that his conduct was justified.'. .Consequently, Piercy had fair warning that his conduct was unlawful and cannot shield himself from Plaintiffs' Section 1983 claim alleging Fourth Amendment violations.")

Thomas v. Barze, 57 F. Supp. 3d 1040, 1068, 1071-75 (D. Minn. 2014) ("The Court concludes that here, where the idea and execution of the interview was entirely directed by the law enforcement officer rather than the school official, traditional Fourth Amendment principles, rather than the relaxed standards of TLO, apply. The Court will proceed to analyze the evidence in support of Thomas' unreasonable seizure and false arrest claims under traditional Fourth Amendment standards. However, to the extent that, for qualified immunity purposes, it was not clearly established in January 2012 that TLO would not apply in such circumstances in the Eighth Circuit, the Court also concludes that, even under TLO's relaxed standard, summary judgment for Barze and Mills would not be appropriate. . . .Having determined that a reasonable jury could conclude that Barze and Mills violated Thomas' rights under the Fourth Amendment, the Court must also consider whether those rights were clearly established in order to assess Barze's and Mills' claims that they are entitled to qualified immunity. . . .The officers should have known that a private meeting in an inner office which involved a pat-down at some point was excessively intrusive if the purpose of the meeting was to mentor Thomas or merely encourage him to not incite any potential fights. Even Matlock acknowledges that the 'mentoring' meeting turned wrong quickly, and a reasonable jury could conclude that the escalation was due to the officers', rather than Thomas', conduct. If that were the case, a reasonable officer should have known that such a seizure, which involved Thomas being placed into a choke hold, would not have been appropriate in scope given the initial fight-prevention rationale for the meeting. The Court therefore concludes that summary judgment for Barze and Mills on Thomas' claims for excessive force and false arrest is not appropriate and that the officers are not entitled to qualified immunity. . . .With regard to whether it was clearly established that not intervening would violate Thomas' constitutional rights, the Court concludes that any determination on whether intervention was warranted or necessary is contingent upon the jury's determination as to what was happening between Thomas and Barze, which is not yet determined. Given that Defendants have not moved for summary judgment on the excessive force claim against Barze, the Court takes the facts surrounding the physical altercation in a light most favorable to Thomas and concludes that a reasonable officer should have known to intervene and stop another officer from putting a student in a neck restraint or choke hold where such restraint was unprovoked. The Court therefore concludes that summary judgment on Thomas' excessive force claim against Mills is not warranted at this time and that Mills is not entitled to qualified immunity on this claim.")

Robinson v. City of Minneapolis, 957 F.Supp.2d 1094, 1099 & n.3 (D. Minn. 2013) ("If Defendants caused Robinson only de minimis injuries, they are entitled to qualified immunity regardless of whether their use of force was justified ab initio.. . . Robinson argues that endorsing such a result will give police officers 'free license to rough up any suspect, regardless of the need to use force. That is hardly "reasonable" and thus contrary to the Fourth Amendment's prohibition against "unreasonable" seizures.'. . But 'roughing up' a suspect suggests causing far more than de minimis injury. And in any event, Robinson's concern is illusory. Chambers made clear, for conduct occurring after that case was decided, that the focus is on the force used and not its end result. . . Hence, officers cannot 'rough up' suspects with impunity going forward. A de minimis injury defense will shield officers from liability only for arrests occurring before June 6, 2011, the date Chambers was decided.")

R.S. ex rel. S.S. v. Minnewaska Area School Dist. No. 2149, 894 F.Supp.2d 1128, 1139, 1140 (D. Minn. 2012) ("The movement of student speech to the internet poses some new challenges, but that transition has not abrogated the clearly established general principles which have governed schools for decades. . . . The law on out-of-school statements by students can thus be summarized as follows: Such statements are protected under the First Amendment and not punishable by school authorities unless they are true threats or are reasonably calculated to reach the school environment and are so egregious as to pose a serious safety risk or other substantial disruption in that environment. R.S.'s Facebook wall postings were not true threats or threats of any kind. While her statements may have been reasonably calculated to reach a school audience, that possible fact is not sufficient to justify her punishment. The school defendants must also show that the statements posed a substantial disruptive effect. . . . [T]he general rule that schools may not regulate merely inappropriate out-of-school speech (as opposed to truly threatening or substantially disruptive speech) has been well-established for decades.")

Shepard v. Wapello County, 303 F.Supp.2d 1004, 1016 (S.D. Iowa 2003) ("At the time Sheriff Kirkendall discharged Shepard the applicable law was very well developed and gave one in Kirkendall's position 'fair warning' that discharging Shepard because he reported Craven's alleged misconduct and complained to a County Supervisor that the Sheriff's budget was inadequate would violate Shepard's rights under the First Amendment.").

NINTH CIRCUIT

Scott v. County of San Bernardino, 903 F.3d 943, 950-51 (9th Cir. 2018) ("We do not diminish the seriousness of potential violence between students, or the need for conflict resolution in the educational setting. But '[s]ociety expects that children will make mistakes in school—and yes, even occasionally fight.' E.W. by and through T.W. v. Dolgos, 884 F.3d 172, 183 (4th Cir. 2018). Deputy Ortiz faced a room of seven seated, mostly quiet middle school girls, and only generalized allegations of fighting and conflict amongst them. Even accounting for what Deputy Ortiz perceived to be non-responsiveness to his questioning, the full-scale arrests of all seven students, without further inquiry, was both excessively intrusive in light of the girls' young ages and not reasonably related to the school's expressed need. Ironically, the primary instigator of the conflicts, L.V., was the only one released to a parent at the school campus. The foundation of T.L.O.'s special needs standard is reasonableness. . . An arrest meant only to 'teach a lesson' and arbitrarily punish perceived disrespect is clearly unreasonable under T.L.O. Under the circumstances of this case, we hold that the arrests of the students were unreasonable and in violation of the Fourth Amendment. . . . At the time of the students' arrest, it was clearly established that a police seizure at the behest of school officials must, at a minimum, be 'reasonably related to its purpose, and must not be "excessively intrusive in light of the age and sex of the student and the nature of the infraction."'. . . Defendants do not—and indeed, cannot—meaningfully contest Deputy Ortiz's motivation for the arrests, which he stated multiple times. No reasonable officer could have reasonably believed that the law authorizes the arrest of a group of middle schoolers in order to prove a point. . . . [N]othing in C.B. suggests that an officer may arrest an entire group of students to teach them a lesson or to 'prove a point.' While the officers in C.B. took the troubled student into custody in order to safely transport him into the care of a relative, here, in contrast, Deputy Ortiz admitted that he 'did not care' who was at fault in the alleged fighting and arrested all of the students in order to teach them a lesson. Under any standard, the arrests here were unreasonable, and the district court properly denied Deputies Ortiz and Thomas qualified immunity.")

Mellen v. Winn, 900 F.3d 1085, 1103-04 (9th Cir. 2018) ("We next must decide whether it was clearly established, in 1997, that police officers had a duty to disclose material impeachment evidence to prosecutors. This is not an open question in our Circuit. In Carrillo v. County of Los Angeles, we concluded that '[t]he law in 1984 clearly established that police officers were bound to disclose material, exculpatory evidence.'. . Carrillo cited approvingly United States v. Butler, 567 F.2d 885 (9th Cir. 1978) (per curiam), an even earlier case that concluded that police investigators violate Brady when they fail to disclose material impeachment evidence to prosecutors. . . . Carrillo also relied on Kyles, the case where the Supreme Court expressly extended Brady obligations to police officers. . . .Detective Winn offers no meaningful way to distinguish Carrillo, Butler, and Kyles, and we agree that these cases are controlling. We therefore reverse the district court's grant of summary judgment for Detective Winn on Mellen's § 1983 claim premised on a violation of her due process rights, and we remand for further proceedings.")

Rodriguez v. Swartz, 899 F.3d 719, 728-34 (9th Cir. 2018), petition for cert. filed, No. 18-309 (U.S. Sept. 7, 2018) ("Swartz filed this interlocutory appeal to challenge the district court's denial of qualified immunity. The United States filed an amicus brief that presented an argument that had not been made in district court: that Rodriguez lacks a Bivens cause of action for a Fourth Amendment violation. Though Swartz had not raised that argument in his opening brief on appeal, he adopted it in his reply brief. We affirm the district court's decision to let Rodriguez's Fourth Amendment claim proceed. . . . Based on the facts alleged in the complaint, Swartz violated the Fourth Amendment. It is inconceivable that any reasonable officer could have thought that he or she could kill J.A. for no reason. Thus, Swartz lacks qualified immunity. . . .[U]nlike the American agents in Verdugo-Urquidez, who acted on Mexican soil, Swartz acted on American soil. Just as Mexican law controls what people do there, American law controls what people do here. Verdugo-Urquidez simply did not address the conduct of American agents on American soil. Also, the agents in Verdugo-Urquidez knew that they were searching a Mexican citizen's property in Mexico, but Swartz could not have known whether J.A. was an American citizen or not. The practical concerns in Verdugo-Urquidez about regulating conduct on Mexican soil also do not apply here. There are many reasons not to extend the Fourth Amendment willy-nilly to actions abroad, as Verdugo-Urquidez explains. But those reasons do not apply to Swartz. He acted on American soil subject to American law. We recognize that on similar facts, the Fifth Circuit reached a contrary conclusion. But its reasoning was about the Fourth Amendment generally, including warrantless searches of those crossing the border and electronic surveillance of the border itself. The concerns in Verdugo-Urquidez were also specific to warrants and overseas operations. But this case is not about searches and seizures broadly speaking. Neither is it about warrants or overseas operations. It is about the unreasonable use of deadly force by a federal agent on American soil. Under those limited circumstances, there are no practical obstacles to extending the Fourth Amendment. Applying the Constitution in this case would simply say that American officers must not shoot innocent, non-threatening people for no reason. Enforcing that rule would not unduly restrict what the United States could do either here or abroad. So under the particular circumstances of this case, J.A. had a Fourth Amendment right to be free from the objectively unreasonable use of deadly force by an American agent acting on American soil, even though Swartz's bullets hit him in Mexico. Verdugo-Urquidez does not require a different conclusion. . . .Swartz argues that when he shot J.A., it was not clearly established that he could not shoot someone on the other side of the border. We cannot agree. 'The qualified immunity analysis ... is limited to the facts that were knowable to the defendant officers at the time they engaged in the conduct in question. Facts an officer learns after the incident ends—whether those facts would support granting immunity or denying it—are not relevant.'. . . When he shot J.A., Swartz could not have known whether the boy was an American citizen. Thus, Swartz is not entitled to qualified immunity on the bizarre ground that J.A. was not an American. For all Swartz knew, J.A. was an American citizen with family and activities on both sides of the border. Therefore, the question is not whether it was clearly established that aliens abroad have Fourth Amendment rights. Rather, it is whether it was clearly established that it was unconstitutional for an officer on American soil to use deadly force without justification against a person of unknown nationality on the other side of the border. Had there been a serious question about whether the Constitution banned federal officers from gratuitous cross-border killings, Tennessee v. Garner and Harris v. Roderick would have answered it. 'It does not take a court ruling for an official to know that no concept of reasonableness could justify the unprovoked shooting of another person.' Any reasonable officer would have known, even without a judicial decision to tell him so, that it was unlawful to kill someone—anyone—for no reason. . . .Rodriguez's complaint makes a persuasive case for murder charges. Indeed, the United States has indicted and tried Swartz for murder. We are unable to imagine a serious argument that a federal agent might not have known that it was unlawful to shoot people in Mexico for no reason. To be sure, Brosseau v. Haugen holds that the Fourth Amendment prohibition on excessive force is 'cast at a high level of generality.' That general prohibition clearly establishes a constitutional violation only 'in an obvious case.' But this is an obvious case. Unlike officers in other situations, Swartz did not have to determine how much force to use; he was not permitted to use any force whatsoever against someone who was innocently walking down a street in Mexico." [footnotes omitted])

Pike v. Hester, 891 F.3d 1131, 1141-42 (9th Cir. 2018) ("Hester first contends that no single case has held that 'a consensual K-9 sniff-sweep of a public employee's shared office' is unlawful. However, the justice court concluded the search was not consensual. The relevant question is whether a no-consent dog search of a public employee's office was clearly unlawful in 2011, when the search occurred. Supreme Court and Ninth Circuit precedent easily resolve that question in the affirmative. . . .The fact that Hester's search involved a dog does not affect that conclusion. In 2011, it was clearly established that dog sniff searches are exempt from Fourth Amendment protection only when the dog and accompanying officer are lawfully present. . . .Accordingly, it was clearly established in 2011 that a dog search of a public employee's private office violates the Fourth Amendment, absent consent. . . Hester's conduct violated Pike's clearly established right; therefore, he is not entitled to qualified immunity.") Easley v. City of Riverside, 890 F.3d 851, 865-67 (9th Cir. 2018) (Pratt, J. (S.D. Iowa), dissenting) ("The second inquiry asks whether the constitutional 'right at issue was clearly established at the time of the incident.'. . The first step in determining whether Macias's alleged conduct violated a clearly established right is to determine whether case law existed at the time of the incident in which 'an officer acting under similar circumstances ... was held to have violated the Fourth Amendment.'. . Even if this is not the 'obvious' case, I conclude other clearly established case law in this circuit would have given officers fair notice that the conduct alleged here was unconstitutional at the time of the incident. . . In non-obvious cases, courts must explicitly identify particular court rulings demonstrating the unlawfulness of the alleged conduct. . . This specific-case requirement ensures that officers are not exposed to liability without a 'fair and clear warning of what the Constitution requires.'. .This Court has held that its 1991 decision, Curnow ex rel. Curnow v. Ridgecrest Police, 952 F.2d 321, 324 (9th Cir. 1991), fairly informs officers of the constitutionality of the use of deadly force in circumstances sufficiently analogous to the present case. . . . In the present case, as in Curnow, the record for summary-judgment purposes reveals that Easley was not holding a gun at the time of the shooting, nor was he raising his arm toward or turning to face Macias. Further, in Curnow, the suspect had a firearm within immediate reach, while in this case, Plaintiff had thrown his firearm away from his person and continued to run in the opposite direction of the gun. Therefore, Curnow, a twenty-year-old decision at the time of the shooting in this case, gave Macias a fair and clear warning that his use of deadly force—at least on the facts as construed for summary judgment—was not constitutional. . . .There is some tension in the case law concerning how distinguishable a case may be on its facts before it cannot be construed as clearly established law for qualified-immunity purposes. On the one hand, the Supreme Court has repeatedly admonished this Court 'not to define clearly established law at a high level of generality.'. . To constitute clearly established law, the 'existing precedent must have placed the ... constitutional question beyond debate' and must ' "squarely govern[ ]' the specific facts at issue.'. . At the same time, the Supreme Court has consistently maintained that its 'caselaw does not require a case directly on point for a right to be clearly established,'. . . and that 'officials can still be on notice that their conduct violates established law even in novel factual circumstances.' Hope v. Pelzer, 536 U.S. 730, 741 (2002). This of course must be true because every individual case will present at least nominal factual distinctions. If precisely identical facts were required, qualified immunity would in fact be absolute immunity for government officials. With these principles in mind, I conclude that clearly established law for qualified-immunity purposes will necessarily contain both operative circumstances—i.e., the circumstances from which the constitutional violation flowed—and ancillary circumstances—i.e., the surrounding factual details of the case that bear no constitutional significance. The operative circumstances described in Curnow include: (1) the suspect was not holding a gun when shot even though a gun was within his reach, (2) the suspect did not point a gun at the officers, and (3) the suspect did not turn to face the officers. These same circumstances are the foundational points of fact in the present case for summary-judgment purposes. . . .In broader terms, Macias contends the only court ruling that would satisfy the established-law inquiry would be a case holding that it is 'unconstitutional for an officer to shoot at an armed suspect who grabbed and raised an object immediately before being shot, simply because the suspect let go of the object seconds before being hit.' This curious characterization of the present circumstances is strained and self-contradictory; it claims Easley was simultaneously armed and unarmed. But more to the point, the law does not require this level of precise factual identity for the unconstitutionality of certain conduct to be 'clearly established.' In this case, there exists a construction of the disputed facts that is controlled by the clearly established expectations for government officials both as generally set forth in Garner and Graham and as specifically set forth in Curnow. . . .The third inquiry asks whether 'a reasonable officer would have understood her conduct to be unlawful' in the circumstances alleged. . . Again, this is a separate question from whether Macias's conduct was reasonable. Macias enjoys an extra layer of deference on this third inquiry insofar as he may have reasonably believed his conduct was permissible even if it was not. In recognition of this extra deference, 'if officers of reasonable competence could disagree on this issue, immunity should be recognized.'. .However, the proper answer to this inquiry, like that of the first inquiry, is presently lost within the contested facts. If the objective circumstances would have unequivocally informed a reasonable officer that Easley was disarmed and if four full seconds to deliberate passed between that officer's perception thereof and his decision to shoot Easley, I conclude there is no room for a reasonable officer with an understanding of Garner, Graham, and Curnow to assert that the use of deadly force was reasonable. Therefore, there remain genuine issues of material fact bearing upon resolution of this inquiry. Based on the summary-judgment record taken in the light most favorable to Easley, Macias's entitlement to qualified immunity is not presently established as a matter of law.")

Daniels Sharpsmart, Inc. v. Smith, 889 F.3d 608, 617-18 (9th Cir. 2018) ("The district court was satisfied that, as it said, '[t]he extraterritorialty doctrine has been clearly established for decades.' No doubt that is so, but that is far from deciding that it was clearly established that application of the MWMA [Medical Waste Management Act] violated the doctrine. . . Certainly, the Department officials could not look at a decision dealing with the MWMA itself, and that statute at least injected some ambiguity into the equation when it declared that '[m]edical waste transported out of [California] shall be consigned to a permitted medical waste treatment facility in the receiving state.' Cal. Health & Safety Code § 118000(c). Of course, that does not say who must issue the permit to the facility, and a reasonable official, who is not knowledgeable about the arcane considerations lurking within dormant Commerce Clause doctrine, could reasonably, if erroneously, believe that the Department could control what was done with California waste in another state. . . As we see it, this area is complex and murky enough that it was improper to decide that Pilorin, Dabney, and Hilton could be mulcted with damages for their error. The district court erred in holding that they could be.")

Reese v. County of Sacramento, 888 F.3d 1030, 1037-40 (9th Cir. 2018) ("Here, the jury found Deputy Rose violated Reese's right to be free from excessive force under the Fourth Amendment. . . . Rose's entitlement to qualified immunity therefore turns on whether Reese's right was clearly established at the time of the incident in 2011. Joining other circuit courts from around the country, this Court recently determined that the 'clearly established' prong of the qualified immunity analysis is a matter of law to be decided by a judge. Morales v. Fry, 873 F.3d 817, 824–25 (9th Cir. 2017). . . . We recognized, however, that '[a] bifurcation of duties is unavoidable: only the jury can decide the disputed factual issues, while only the judge can decide whether the right was clearly established once the factual issues are resolved.'. . In arguing that his right to be free of excessive force under these circumstances was clearly established, Reese relies on the jury's answer to Question 14, their finding that it did not appear that Reese posed an immediate threat of death or serious physical injury to Rose at the time Rose fired his shot. Reese contends that by making this finding, the jury determined Rose violated Reese's clearly established right not to be subjected to deadly force when he posed no immediate threat to Rose or others. As Morales confirmed, however, the question of whether the right was clearly established is solely for the judge to decide, not the jury. . . Thus, although the jury's finding that Reese posed no immediate threat of death or serious physical injury to Rose addresses the first prong of the qualified immunity analysis, it does not answer the purely legal question of whether the right was clearly established in this context. Therefore, the district court was within its authority to determine, as a matter of law, whether Deputy Rose was entitled to qualified immunity, even where a jury determined that he violated Reese's Fourth Amendment right to be free from excessive force. . . .We agree with the district court that Reese has not identified any sufficiently analogous cases showing that under similar circumstances, a clearly established Fourth Amendment right against the use of deadly force existed at the time of the shooting. The jury determined that when Reese answered the door to his apartment, he had a knife in his hand in an elevated position. Upon seeing Reese in the doorway with the knife, which was very close to where Rose was standing, Brown immediately fired a shot from his rifle at Reese, but missed. After Brown fired the shot, he saw Reese back into the apartment and drop the knife. Rose, who saw Reese when he first opened the door, lost sight of Reese when he backed up into his apartment and after Brown fired at him. Rose then advanced toward the doorway and was surprised to see Reese standing in the apartment. Rose stated that he could not see Reese's hands but upon seeing him, shot Reese in the chest from three to five feet away. Notably, while the jury found that Reese did not brandish the knife at Rose, they also found that at the time Rose fired his shot, he did not see Reese's hands. Although Reese goes to great lengths to remind this Court that we do not demand a case with 'materially similar' factual circumstances or even facts closely analogous to his case, Hope v. Pelzer, 536 U.S. 730, 741, 122 S.Ct. 2508, 153 L.Ed.2d 666 (2002), none of Reese's cited cases demonstrate that the contours of his Fourth Amendment right were sufficiently clear such that 'any reasonable official in [his] shoes would have understood that he was violating it.'. . Critically, Reese points to no case that considered the relevant question whether Deputy Rose, having come within striking distance of a suspect who had held a knife a fraction of a second before, was objectively unreasonable in using deadly force before determining whether the suspect still possessed the knife. . . .Reese's reliance on our decision in Hughes v. Kisela, 862 F.3d 775

(9th Cir. 2016), only confirms that the law was not clearly established here. In Hughes, we reasoned that an officer's shooting of a plaintiff who was approaching a third party while holding a kitchen knife at her side violated the plaintiff's clearly established rights, where the facts viewed in the plaintiff's favor showed that she was not 'angry or menacing,' officers knew only that she has been using the knife to carve a tree, and the plaintiff did not understand orders to drop the weapon. . . After Reese's appeal was argued, the Supreme Court summarily reversed our decision in Hughes, concluding that it was 'far from an obvious case,' and that none of our precedents squarely governed the facts involved. Kisela v. Hughes, —– U.S. ——–, 138 S.Ct. 1148, 1153, —– L.Ed.2d —— (2018). Given that Rose had greater reason to perceive a threat here, and no luxury of time or distance to discern whether Reese still posed such a threat, the Supreme Court's decision in Kisela v. Hughes further illustrates that Rose is entitled to qualified immunity. None of Reese's cases 'squarely govern' the situation that Rose confronted such that they would have given Rose clear warning that his use of deadly force was objectively unreasonable. . . Absent a showing by Reese that the right was clearly established at the time, Rose is entitled to qualified immunity on the Fourth Amendment excessive force claim. We therefore affirm the district court's ruling that Deputy Rose is entitled to qualified immunity on that claim.")

Thompson v. Rahr, 885 F.3d 582, 584, 586-90 (9th Cir. 2018) ("This appeal presents a question at the intersection of the Fourth Amendment and qualified immunity law. In the course of a felony arrest, may a police officer point a loaded gun at an unarmed suspect's head, where that suspect had already been searched, was calm and compliant, was watched over by a second armed deputy, and was seated on the bumper of a police cruiser 10–15 feet away from a gun found in the suspect's car? Because the facts are at this stage disputed, we take the facts in the light most favorable to the suspect. We hold that pointing a loaded gun at the suspect's head in these circumstances constitutes excessive force under the Fourth Amendment, but that the officers here are entitled to qualified immunity because the law was not clearly established at the time of the traffic stop. . . . [W]e conclude that Copeland's use of force in arresting Thompson was not objectively reasonable. Accepting Thompson at his word, as we are required to do at the summary judgment stage, Copeland pointed the gun at Thompson's head and threatened to kill him if he did not surrender. This type and amount of force can hardly be characterized as 'minor,' as the government contends. We have previously held, in the context of a residential confrontation, that 'pointing a loaded gun at a suspect, employing the threat of deadly force, is use of a high level of force.'. . With respect to the government's interests, Thompson was suspected of driving with a suspended license and violating the Uniform Firearms Act—potential crimes of low and moderate severity, respectively. The safety threat either to the officers or the public was relatively low. The government's claim that Thompson 'could have charged past Deputy Copeland and grabbed the revolver [in the back of the car] in a matter of seconds' is weak. Thompson would have had to travel 10–15 feet to his car to grab the gun or make any use of it. Thompson had no weapon and had already been searched. He was sitting on the bumper of a squad car, watched over by an armed deputy. He was not 'actively resisting arrest or attempting to evade arrest by flight.'. . He was 'compliant with the directions of law enforcement at all times.'. . Nor did the officers have 'reason to believe that he would resist or flee.'. . Reviewing the totality of the circumstances, the force used against Thompson was excessive when balanced against the government's need for such force. In the end, 'pointing guns at persons who are compliant and present no danger is a constitutional violation.'. . A jury could find that 'brandishing a cocked gun in front of [Thompson's] face' and threatening to kill him was unreasonable under these particular circumstances. . . We do not discount the concern for officer safety when facing a potentially volatile situation. But where the officers have an unarmed felony suspect under control, where they easily could have handcuffed the suspect while he was sitting on the squad car, and where the suspect is not in close proximity to an accessible weapon, a gun to the head constitutes excessive force. . . .Although the use of excessive force violated Thompson's constitutional rights, Copeland is entitled to qualified immunity because Thompson's right not to have a gun pointed at him under the circumstances here was not clearly established at the time the events took place. In arriving at this conclusion, we take careful note of recent Supreme Court precedent illuminating the reach and parameters of qualified immunity in the excessive force context. . . . Just last year, in a case addressing excessive force, the Supreme Court underscored that qualified immunity, when properly applied, protects 'all but the plainly incompetent or those who knowingly violate the law.'. . .Looking to the particular setup here, we cannot say that every reasonable officer in Copeland's position would have known that he was violating the constitution by pointing a gun at Thompson. Thompson's nighttime, felony arrest arising from an automobile stop, in which a gun was found, coupled with a fluid, dangerous situation, distinguishes this case from our earlier precedent. More specifically, Copeland was conducting a felony arrest at night of a suspect who was not handcuffed, stood six feet tall and weighed two hundred and sixty-five pounds, was taller and heavier than Copeland, and had a prior felony conviction for unlawfully possessing a firearm. Although Thompson was cooperative, the situation was still critical in terms of potential danger to the officers, especially given that a loaded gun was only 10–15 feet away. Copeland did not violate a 'clearly established' right as that concept has been elucidated by the Supreme Court in the excessive force context. . . In arguing that Copeland violated his clearly established rights, Thompson points to our earlier decisions in Robinson v. Solano Cty., 278 F.3d 1007 (9th Cir. 2002) (en banc), and Hopkins v. Bonvicino, 573 F.3d 752 (9th Cir. 2009). But neither of those cases involved a felony traffic stop with a firearm in proximity, nor did they feature facts sufficiently similar to the pattern we address here to put the constitutional question beyond debate as required to defeat qualified immunity. . . . After careful scrutiny of the record, we are not persuaded that Copeland was 'plainly incompetent' or that he 'knowingly violate[d] the law' when he acted as he did. . . .While Thompson fails to carry his burden that, in view of the safety concerns faced in this traffic stop, every reasonable police officer would have known that Copeland's conduct was unconstitutional under these circumstances, we acknowledge that the facts of this case are at the outer limit of qualified immunity's protection in the excessive force context. There can be little question that holding the gun in the low-ready alternative would have been a superior option for Copeland to use in the circumstances here, rather than pointing it at Thompson's head. In the face of the then-current law, there was not a clearly established constitutional violation. Going forward, however, the law is clearly established in this scenario.")

Thompson v. Rahr, 885 F.3d 582, 590-97 (9th Cir. 2018) (Christen, J., dissenting) ("The majority decides Deputy Copeland is entitled to qualified immunity on Lawrence Thompson's excessive force claim because Thompson's right not to have a gun pointed at his head was not clearly established in 2011, when the events of this case took place. This decision squarely conflicts with the clear directive our court issued in Robinson v. Solano County, a case involving facts that, if distinguishable at all, posed a greater threat to officer safety. We specifically took Robinson en banc 'to clarify the law of the circuit on the scope of qualified immunity for excessive force claims,' 278 F.3d 1007, 1009 (9th Cir. 2002) (en banc), and Robinson's holding was plain: an officer who points his gun at the head of an arrestee who is cooperative and unthreatening, outnumbered by police, and apparently unarmed, violates the Fourth Amendment. . . If the contours of this right were not clearly established before we decided Robinson, they most certainly were thereafter. . . Today's decision regrettably muddies Robinson's clear dictates, but it cannot overturn sixteen years of precedent. Because our three-judge panel is bound to abide by Robinson, I respectfully dissent. . . . Robinson was decided in 2002. It cannot be questioned that the rule from Robinson was clearly established when Thompson was arrested in 2011. Today, the court agrees that Deputy Copeland used unconstitutionally excessive force. It also agrees that, going forward, qualified immunity should not be available to officers who point guns at suspects under similar circumstances. Yet the court grants Deputy Copeland qualified immunity. It does so by concluding that, until now, the law had not made it clear to an officer in Deputy Copeland's position that pointing a gun at the suspect's head would constitute excessive force. The court offers two reasons for reaching this conclusion. Neither withstands scrutiny. First, the court likens Thompson's case to a traffic stop. That comparison would be apt if Thompson had been sitting in a car, because then a reasonable deputy might have feared that Thompson could reach a hidden weapon. But Thompson was outside of his car and well away from it, he had already been frisked, and he was under the guard of a second officer. The possibility of a secreted weapon did not justify pointing a gun at Thompson's head. The only other justification the court offers for granting qualified immunity is its suggestion that Robinson's case did not put Deputy Copeland on notice that threatening Thompson with lethal force would be excessive because, unlike Thompson, Robinson was 'approach[ing] from the area immediately surrounding ... his home' when officers pointed their guns at him. . . . Inevitably, there are minor factual differences between Robinson's case and Thompson's, but the Supreme Court has repeatedly instructed that a plaintiff need not identify 'a case directly on point' for a right to be clearly established. . . . The question is whether existing precedent 'placed the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate,'. . such that a reasonable officer in the defendant's position would have known his behavior was unlawful[.] . .Here, factual differences between Thompson's case and Robinson's only underscore the strength of Thompson's excessive force claim: Deputy Copeland himself patted down Thompson before he directed Thompson to sit on the bumper of the patrol car. Thompson's affect was calm, he was under the supervision of another officer, he was seated at least 10 to 15 feet away from the vehicle he had been driving—and at least that far from the gun on its rear floorboard. Like Robinson, Thompson was outnumbered by officers. He was apologetic and uncombative. There were 'no dangerous or exigent circumstances apparent at the time of the detention,'. . . nor any allegation that Thompson was behaving erratically. Robinson provided fair notice that pointing a gun at a suspect's head under these circumstances—where a fully compliant suspect is unarmed, outnumbered, and unthreatening—violates the Fourth Amendment. The court's effort to distinguish Robinson by suggesting that Robinson was anywhere near the curtilage of his home erodes our en banc effort to provide a clear standard for police officers. . . . Here, the court acknowledges that Thompson was 'under control' and 'not in close proximity to an accessible weapon.' . . . This court has seen an alarming number of officer shooting cases in recent years, many involving circumstances similar to those present here but with fatal results. Police departments are to be commended for acknowledging the problem and making efforts to address it, . . . as are Blue Ribbon commissions convened to determine how and why situations like this one too often escalate to involve the use or threatened use of deadly force, and to identify training tactics that reduce risks. . . Hopefully, this important work will continue. There will always be tension between protecting individual rights and allowing officers the flexibility they need to protect the public and themselves, but the court's job is to balance officers' use of force against intrusions on individuals' Fourth Amendment rights. . . The facts of this case cannot be meaningfully distinguished from those in Robinson, and we have already made the judgment that on these facts the balance tips in the suspect's favor. . . .Robinson recognized the critical distinction between pointing a gun at someone's head and holding it in the low-ready position. Deputy Copeland was justified in displaying some degree of force, but accepting the allegations in the complaint as true, he unquestionably used excessive force when he aimed his gun at Thompson's head and threatened that if Thompson moved, he'd be dead. Because that rule was clearly established long before Thompson was arrested, I respectfully dissent.")

Bonivert v. City of Clarkston, 883 F.3d 865, 872-74, 879 (9th Cir. 2018) ("[T]he reasonableness standard governing violations of a Fourth Amendment right is distinct from the reasonableness standard governing whether the right was 'clearly established.'. . The former protects an officer who reasonably, but mistakenly, perceives facts that would have made his actions lawful had they been true. . . The latter, by contrast, goes further by acknowledging 'that reasonable mistakes can be made as to the legal constraints on particular police conduct.'. . Thus, even an officer who correctly perceives the facts establishing that his conduct was 'unreasonable' under the Fourth Amendment is entitled to immunity if he was mistaken 'as to what the law require[d]' under the circumstances, so long as the mistake was 'reasonable.'. . . Among constitutional rules, few are as well established, frequently applied, and familiar to police officers as the warrant requirement and its exceptions. Because there is no dispute that the officers failed to obtain a warrant before entering Bonivert's home, the entry was presumptively unreasonable. The officers argue that their entry was nevertheless justified by the three exceptions to the warrant requirement: consent, emergency aid, and exigent circumstances. Alternatively, the officers claim they are entitled to qualified immunity because it was not clearly established law that these exceptions did not justify a warrantless entry under the circumstances. . . .This is not a case involving 'such an undeveloped state of the law' that qualified immunity is necessary to protect the officers from the special unfairness that results when they are 'expected to predict the future course of constitutional law.'. . Rather, it is one demanding 'knowledge of ... basic, unquestioned constitutional rights.'. . To the extent the officers were mistaken 'as to what the law require[d]' to justify a warrantless entry that evening, we conclude their mistake was not 'reasonable.'. . Taken in the light most favorable to Bonivert, the facts demonstrate that the officers violated Bonivert's constitutional right because no exception to the Fourth Amendment's warrant requirement justified the officers' entry into Bonivert's home. Additionally, the unlawfulness of the officers' entry under each exception was clearly established because it 'was apparent in light of pre-existing law. . . We explain our holding with respect to each exception below. . . .We recognize that police officers responding to reports of domestic violence are 'not conducting a trial, but' rather are 'required to make ... on-the-spot decision[s].'. . In this case, however, the facts of the situation did not entitle officers to 'disregard the overriding respect for the sanctity of the home that has been embedded in our traditions since the origins of the Republic.'. . The officers are not entitled to qualified immunity on Bonivert's warrantless entry claim because it was clearly established law, as of 2012, that neither consent, the emergency aid exception, nor the exigency exception justified the officers' warrantless entry.")

Kramer v. Cullinan, 878 F.3d 1156, 1164 (9th Cir. 2018) ("By the time of Kramer's termination, it was clearly established law that an employer charging an employee with fraud, dishonesty, or immorality is required under the Fourteenth Amendment to afford that employee a name-clearing hearing. . . However, that generalized statement of the law was not sufficient to put Dr. Cullinan on notice that her particular actions violated Kramer's constitutional rights. . . Accordingly, Kramer's reliance on Tibbets and Cox as 'clearly establishing' precedent is not persuasive. Those cases did not definitively place the question of whether the conditional language in the Miller Nash letter was stigmatizing 'beyond debate.'. . Indeed, as discussed, the language in the Letter is not similar to phrasing that we have found to be stigmatizing. The district court failed to identify, the parties have not cited, and we have not found a case where conditional language was determined to be stigmatizing. Neither has a case been referenced that found stigmatization in the absence of a charge of fraud, dishonesty, or immoral conduct. In this circumstance, Kramer has failed to place the stigmatizing nature of the Letter 'beyond debate.'. . Reliance on the broad principles espoused in Tibbets and similar cases clearly establishing the stigmatizing nature of charges of fraud, dishonesty, or immorality does not place the question in this case 'beyond debate' because the Letter did not charge Kramer with fraud, dishonesty or immorality. At worst, the Letter could plausibly be read to imply a breach of fiduciary duty. But no precedent has been brought to our attention clearly establishing a charge of breach of fiduciary duty as stigmatizing. The Supreme Court has cautioned us against defining clearly established law 'at a high level of generality.'. . In White, the Supreme Court overruled a decision of the Tenth Circuit denying qualified immunity where 'it failed to identify a case where an officer acting under similar circumstances ... was held to have violated the Fourth Amendment.'. . The Supreme Court reiterated that 'the clearly established law must be particularized to the facts of the case.'. . There is simply no clearly established law 'particularized to the [unique] facts of [this] case.'. . This is not a case where the stigmatizing nature of the charge is obvious as in Guzman . . . or Tibbetts. . .or Campanelli. . . or Vanelli. . . . Dr. Cullinan's conduct did not constitute such a run-of-the-mill Fourteenth Amendment violation. Instead, this case lacks an explicit charge of fraud, dishonesty, or immorality, militating against a conclusion that Dr. Cullinan's actions violated a 'clearly established' right.")

Frudden v. Pilling, 877 F.3d 821, 832 (9th Cir. 2017) ("While Barnette and the present case both involve public schools, 'Tomorrow's Leaders' is not analogous to the Pledge of Allegiance. The former is an anodyne phrase printed on a shirt or sweatshirt, while the latter is a compelled oral recitation pledging fidelity to national unity (in its current form, to national unity 'under God'). Further, while Wooley and the present case both involve printed words, the cases are not analogous. The motto 'Tomorrow's Leaders' has little if any substantive content and was displayed on a uniform only in a school setting. In contrast, 'Live Free or Die' has obvious political content and is publicly displayed everywhere a vehicle is driven. Thus, it can hardly be maintained that these two cases clearly establish that the motto 'Tomorrow's Leaders' violates the First Amendment. Stated otherwise, existing precedent had not 'placed the ... constitutional question beyond debate.'")

Dunlap v. Anchorage Police Dep't., 712 F. App'x 646, ___ (9th Cir. 2017) ("The legal framework governing the probable cause determination was contradictory and confusing, and the singular case on which Dunlap relies, De Nardo v. State, 819 P.2d 903 (Alaska Ct. App. 1991), does not resolve that confusion. For a right to be 'clearly established,' 'a case directly on point' is not required, 'but existing precedent must have placed the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate.'. . De Nardo did not place beyond debate the question of whether 'on the person' applies to concealed weapons located within easy reach, as De Nardo explicitly declined to define the 'outer boundaries' of 'on the person' and did not address the concealed weapons laws in a factual context similar to that of the instant appeal. . . Moreover, no case law or statutory definitions clarify how the combination of Alaska Statute 11.61.220 and Anchorage Municipal Ordinance 8.25.020 operate under the circumstances at issue here. . . Accordingly, Dunlap fails to carry his burden of demonstrating that the right allegedly violated was clearly established. . . The district court correctly held that Henry is entitled to qualified immunity.")

Entler v. Gregoire, 872 F.3d 1031, 1042-45 & n. 27 (9th Cir. 2017) ("It was . . . beyond cavil that Entler's grievances were the first requisite steps in the pursuit of civil litigation. . . The threat of civil litigation if a prisoner's complaints are not redressed is implicit in every grievance; explicitly articulating that threat as a precursor to initiating civil litigation does not suddenly make that threat more intimidating or coercive. Thus, in the analogous Title VII retaliation context, we noted—twenty years before Entler was punished—that '[w]e see no legal distinction to be made between the filing of a charge which is clearly protected, and threatening to file a charge.'. .We find the Gifford footnote persuasive since we see no material distinction between retaliation in the Title VII context and prisoner retaliation. . . The sanctity of a constitutional right is at least of equal moment as a statutory right. And even though, in the face of Ninth Circuit precedent, we need not resort to out-of-circuit caselaw, we note with approval two out-of-circuit district court cases involving prisoner litigation. . . .In essence, it is illogical to conclude that prison officials may punish a prisoner for threatening to sue when it would be unconstitutional to punish a prisoner for actually suing. Thus, once again, as we held in Hargis, ten years before Entler was sanctioned, a threat to sue—even if verbal—may not ipso facto rise to the level of coercion to support prison retaliation. . . Taking the complaint as true in the face of a 12(c) motion to dismiss on the pleadings, . . . we cannot conclude that a reasonable official would not have understood that disciplining Entler for threatening to file a civil suit was constitutionally impermissible. Therefore, on the papers before us, Appellees are not entitled to qualified immunity for Entler's threats to initiate civil litigation. . . .Included in the mix of infractions that caused Hearing Officer Jackson to sentence Entler to fifteen days of lost 'big yard' and gym time was Entler's threat to 'file criminal charges/arrest by sheriff.' We hold, as a matter of first impression in our circuit, that both the filing of a criminal complaint by a prisoner, as well as the threat to do so, are protected by the First Amendment, provided they are not baseless. . . Although we have not had occasion to opine on the foundational constitutional principle, we join our two sister circuits that have held that the filing of criminal complaints falls within the embrace of the First Amendment. [citing cases from 10th and 5th Circuits] It logically follows, therefore, just as with threats to file civil litigation, that the right to petition for the redress of grievances applies with equal force to threats to file criminal complaints. Therefore, the threat by a prisoner to file a criminal complaint, as well as the filing of the complaint, are both constitutionally protected conduct. . . . Although we hold that Entler's threat to file his criminal complaint was a constitutionally protected right, we are not convinced that at the time of the threat 'any reasonable official in [Appellees'] shoes would have understood that [they were] violating it, meaning that existing precedent ... placed the ... constitutional question beyond debate.'. . While it is true that where, as here, there is no binding Ninth Circuit precedent, we may 'look to whatever decisional law is available, including relevant decisions of other circuits, state courts, and district courts,'. . . , neither Meyer, Hylton, nor the three out-of-circuit prisoner cases hold that the threat to file a criminal complaint is constitutionally protected conduct. . . Unlike the threat to sue, therefore, there is neither Ninth Circuit precedent nor out-of-circuit authority addressing that issue, let alone a 'robust consensus of cases of persuasive authority.'. . .Since the record does not support Entler's claim that he was retaliated against for filing a criminal complaint, we need not address whether qualified immunity would there attach.") Sharp v. Cty. of Orange, 871 F.3d 901, 910-13, 915-20 (9th Cir. 2017) ("Although unconstitutional, the arrest was not clearly proscribed by established federal law. The Supreme Court has repeatedly instructed that we examine 'whether the violative nature of particular conduct is clearly established' by controlling precedent, not whether the conduct violates a general principle of law. . . Therefore, while Hill v. California, 401 U.S. 797, 802 (1971), and Rivera v. County of Los Angeles, 745 F.3d 384, 389 (9th Cir. 2014), establish a general rule that an unreasonable mistake of identity renders an arrest unconstitutional, we cannot simply apply that general rule to the facts of this case. Except in the rare case of an 'obvious' instance of constitutional misconduct (which is not presented here), Plaintiffs must 'identify a case where an officer acting under similar circumstances as [defendants] was held to have violated the Fourth Amendment.'. . In other words, Plaintiffs must point to prior case law that articulates a constitutional rule specific enough to alert these deputies in this case that their particular conduct was unlawful. To achieve that kind of notice, the prior precedent must be 'controlling'— from the Ninth Circuit or Supreme Court—or otherwise be embraced by a 'consensus' of courts outside the relevant jurisdiction. . . . It is true that in a sufficiently 'obvious' case of constitutional misconduct, we do not require a precise factual analogue in our judicial precedents. . . . But this obviousness principle, an exception to the specific-case requirement, is especially problematic in the Fourth-Amendment context. When a violation is obvious enough to override the necessity of a specific factual analogue, we mean to say that it is almost always wrong for an officer in those circumstances to act as he did. But that kind of categorical statement is particularly hard to make when officers encounter suspects every day in never-before-seen ways. There are countless confrontations involving officers that yield endless permutations of outcomes and responses. So the obviousness principle has real limits when it comes to the Fourth Amendment. . . With these observations in mind, we find this is not 'one of those rare cases' in which a violation was so 'obvious' that qualified immunity does not apply 'even without a case directly on point.'. . . The deputies subsequently detained Sharp III's in the patrol car after they discovered that he was not the warrant subject. . . .We hold that the categorical detention rule announced in Summers does not apply to arrest warrants, and because there were no particular circumstances justifying Sharp III's detention after learning he was not the arrest-warrant subject, we conclude that detention was unconstitutional as well. However, once again, it did not violate clearly established law because of the legal ambiguity existing at the time of the arrest as to whether the categorical Summers exception applied to arrest warrants. Thus, qualified immunity should have been granted. . . . We hold that the Summers exception, which hinged critically on the distinct nature of a search warrant, does not extend to arrest warrants. . . .Although there was no constitutional authority to detain Sharp III in the patrol car after discovering he was not the subject of the warrant, that particular detention was not clearly proscribed by established law. Except when there is an 'obvious' instance of constitutional misconduct, Plaintiffs must 'identify a case where an officer acting under similar circumstances as [defendants] was held to have violated the Fourth Amendment.'. . Simply put, there is no such controlling case here that would alert these officers to the proper scope of Summers. . . .Plaintiffs have also failed to identify a case that pronounces a constitutional rule at a level of specificity sufficient to alert these deputies here that their conduct was unconstitutional in the specific circumstances they confronted. Nor is this a sufficiently 'obvious' case justifying departure from our requirement that there be some factually analogous judicial precedent. Thus, qualified immunity should have been granted. . . .Turning to the degree of force used, Plaintiffs point only to cases that establish the general framework for evaluating how much force is constitutionally excessive. See, e.g., Graham v. Connor, 490 U.S. 386, 395 (1989). But that is not enough to defeat a qualified-immunity defense. We are aware of no controlling constitutional principle or judicial precedent that is specific enough to alert Deputy Anderson that the degree of force he used in these circumstances was unreasonable. Thus, qualified immunity was warranted. . . .Sharp III asserts a First Amendment claim based on the deputies' alleged retaliation against him for being argumentative. . . .While in the patrol car, Sharp III was visibly angry at the deputies, swore at them, and threatened to sue them. In response, Deputy Anderson told him, 'If you weren't being so argumentative, I'd probably just put you on the curb.'. . We conclude that Sharp III suffered unconstitutional retaliation that was clearly proscribed by established law. . . .This violation was clearly established by Ford v. City of Yakima, 706 F.3d 1188 (9th Cir. 2013). In that case, a police officer pulled over a driver who was blasting loud music, and because the driver would not stop 'running [his] mouth' and exhibited an uncooperative 'attitude,' the officer arrested him and booked him in jail—rather than merely issuing a citation. . .The officer repeated that he was arresting the man because the man would not 'shut up' and had 'diarrhea of the mouth.'. . On these facts, we found an unconstitutional retaliation. These facts are sufficiently analogous to the case before us to conclude that Deputy Anderson was on notice that his particular conduct was unconstitutional. Thus, qualified immunity was properly denied.")

Sharp v. Cty. of Orange, 871 F.3d 901, 923-27 (9th Cir. 2017) (N.R. Smith, J., dissenting in part) ("Viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to Sharp III, it is obvious that the deputies arrested Sharp III without probable cause. The facts in this case do not come close to meeting the probable cause standard. In an effort to avoid that uncomfortable truth, the Majority ignores the statements made by Deputies Anderson and Flores and analyzes this case as one of mistaken identity. . . But that theory crumbles when we view the facts in the light most favorable to Sharp III. Since the deputies had fair warning that their conduct violated Sharp III's Fourth Amendment rights when they arrested him without probable cause, they are not entitled to qualified immunity. The District Court was right; this claim should go to trial. . . . Based on Deputy Anderson's statement, the Majority concedes that the deputies failed to release Sharp III in retaliation for exercising his First Amendment rights. In contrast, when analyzing whether the continued detention violated Sharp III's Fourth Amendment rights, the Majority inexplicably ignores Deputy Anderson's statement. Instead, the Majority improperly concludes that the deputies may have reasonably but mistakenly believed that the exception in Summers applied to arrest warrants. However, the Majority's conclusion is possible only if we view the evidence in the light most favorable to the deputies. Thus, viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Sharp III, the deputies continued Sharp III's arrest because he exercised his First Amendment rights. . . . Holding a suspect in custody for exercising his First Amendment rights is an obvious violation of the Fourth Amendment. . . .[In Duran v. City of Douglas, Ariz., 904 F.2d 1372 (9th Cir. 1990)], the court held that detaining an individual without probable cause for exercising First Amendment rights was an obvious violation of the Fourth Amendment. . . The import of Duran is clear: the deputies committed a clearly established violation of the Fourth Amendment when they kept Sharp III in custody for exercising his First Amendment rights. . . As a result, the second prong of the qualified immunity analysis does not provide immunity to the deputies. . . . In this case, the Majority agrees Sharp III was arrested, so the exception in Summers could never apply. While a mere detention can turn into a de facto arrest, . . . the Majority does not go there. Further, I am aware of no case in which an arrest turned into a mere detention. . . Consequently, Sharp III continued to be under arrest during his subsequent seizure in the patrol vehicle. Thus, Summers, even if it applied to arrest warrants, could never justify Sharp III's continued seizure. Since the language in Summers is categorical and clear, any reasonable officer would know this. . . .Viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to Sharp III, the deputies used considerable force against Sharp III. The deputies arrested Sharp III at gun point and used enough force to tear his rotator cuff. On the other hand, he had committed no crime. Deputy Flores conceded that the deputies arrested Sharp III because 'we were trying to just detain everybody[.]' Sharp III posed no immediate threat to the safety of the officers or others. Sharp III walked calmly toward the deputies and was fully compliant. He never resisted or attempted to evade arrest by flight. No reasonable officer would believe using force, let alone significant force, was lawful under these circumstances. None of the Graham factors were present. Since Deputy Anderson had fair warning that his use of force violated Sharp III's Fourth Amendment rights, he is not entitled to qualified immunity. The District Court was right; this claim should go to trial. . . . Contrary to precedent regarding qualified immunity, the Majority fails to view the facts in the light most favorable to Sharp III when analyzing these Fourth Amendment claims. Consequently, the Majority improperly grants the deputies qualified immunity for their initial arrest of Sharp III, their use of excessive force against Sharp III, their subsequent search of Sharp III, and their continued arrest of Sharp III. Instead, viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Sharp III, the deputies are not entitled to qualified immunity for any of these constitutional violations. Thus, Sharp III's Fourth Amendment claims stemming from these violations should go to trial right along with Sharp III's claim of First Amendment retaliation. I dissent.")

Shafer v. Cty. of Santa Barbara, 868 F.3d 1110, 1113, 1117-18 (9th Cir. 2017) ("The jury found that Deputy Padilla violated Shafer's Fourth Amendment constitutional right to be free from excessive force. The evidence adduced at trial was sufficient to sustain the jury's verdict. However, Deputy Padilla is entitled to qualified immunity, because, at the time this incident occurred, the law was not clearly established that an officer cannot progressively increase his use of force from verbal commands, to an arm grab, and then a leg sweep maneuver when a misdemeanant refuses to comply with the officer's orders and resists, obstructs, or delays the officer in his lawful performance of duties such that the officer has probable cause to arrest him in a challenging environment. . . . Defined at an appropriate level of specificity, the question at hand is whether an officer violates clearly established law when he progressively increases his use of force from verbal commands, to an arm grab, and then a leg sweep maneuver, when a misdemeanant refuses to comply with the officer's orders and resists, obstructs, or delays the officer in his lawful performance of duties such that the officer has probable cause to arrest him in a challenging environment. The answer is no. We are mindful of the Supreme Court's pronouncement in White v. Pauly that, to satisfy this step in the qualified immunity analysis, we generally must 'identify a case where an officer acting under similar circumstances as [Deputy Padilla] was held to have violated the Fourth Amendment.'. . We are aware of no such case. Shafer cites four cases with comparable degrees of force used by officers, but none of which involved a challenging environment or an act of physical resistance or obstruction by the arrestee. . . .Although we do not require a case to be 'on all fours,'. . . '[w]e cannot conclude ... in light of these existing precedents, that "every reasonable official would have understood ... beyond debate,"'. . . that Deputy Padilla's conduct in these circumstances constituted excessive force based on the cases cited by Shafer. In these cases, where there is a 'hazy border between excessive and acceptable force,'. . . such that the officer 'reasonably misapprehends the law governing the circumstances [ ]he confronted,' qualified immunity protects officers. . .Shafer's primary argument on appeal is that Deputy Padilla violated clearly established law, because he had no basis for using any force whatsoever. We disagree. The jury found that Deputy Padilla had probable cause to arrest Shafer for violations of California Penal Code section 148 for resisting, delaying, or obstructing an officer. This entitled Deputy Padilla to use some degree of force. . . Finally, Shafer argues that it is Deputy Padilla's burden to demonstrate that he did not violate Shafer's clearly established constitutional right. Again, we disagree. It is the plaintiff who 'bears the burden of showing that the rights allegedly violated were "clearly established."'. . Because Shafer fails to identify sufficiently specific constitutional precedents to alert Deputy Padilla that his particular conduct was unlawful, Deputy Padilla is entitled to qualified immunity.")

S.B. v. County of San Diego, 864 F.3d 1010, 1014-16 (9th Cir. 2017) ("Here, a reasonable jury could conclude that: (1) the three officers, responding to a call about a mentally ill and intoxicated individual 'acting aggressively,' entered Brown's house and saw that he had knives in his pockets; (2) after Brown complied with the officers' orders to kneel, Brown grabbed a knife with a six-to-eight-inch blade from his back pocket; (3) Moses shot Brown as soon as his hand touched the knife; (4) Brown was on his knees when he was shot; (5) when he grabbed the knife, Brown was approximately six to eight feet away from Vories; (6) Moses could not see the other officers at the time Brown grabbed the knife; (7) after Brown went for the knife, the officers did not order him to drop the knife or warn that he was about to be shot; and (8) Vories had a non-lethal option – a Taser gun. Viewing the facts in this light, Moses's use of deadly force was not objectively reasonable, and therefore violated Brown's Fourth Amendment right against excessive force. Our holding mirrors those in similar cases. . . .But that is not all. Under the second prong of the qualified immunity test, we decide if the alleged violation of Brown's Fourth Amendment right against excessive force 'was clearly established at the time of the officer's alleged misconduct.'. . . In analyzing this question, we acknowledge the Supreme Court's recent frustration with failures to heed its holdings. The Supreme Court has 'repeatedly told courts – and the Ninth Circuit in particular – not to define clearly established law at a high level of generality.'. . Our court lacks a monopoly over such immunity missteps. When recently reversing the Tenth Circuit, the Supreme Court wrote: 'In the last five years, [the Supreme Court] has issued a number of opinions reversing federal courts in qualified immunity cases.' White v. Pauly, 137 S. Ct. 548, 551 (2017) (per curiam) (citing Sheehan, 135 S. Ct. at 1774 n.3 (collecting cases)). 'The Court has found this necessary both because qualified immunity is important to "society as a whole," and because as "an immunity from suit," qualified immunity "is effectively lost if a case is erroneously permitted to go to trial."'. . . We hear the Supreme Court loud and clear. Before a court can impose liability on Moses, we must identify precedent as of August 24, 2013 – the night of the shooting – that put Moses on clear notice that using deadly force in these particular circumstances would be excessive. General excessive force principles, as set forth in Graham and Garner, are 'not inherently incapable of giving fair and clear warning to officers,' but they 'do not by themselves create clearly established law outside an obvious case.'. . Instead, we must 'identify a case where an officer acting under similar circumstances as [Moses] was held to have violated the Fourth Amendment.'. . We cannot locate any such precedent. Our most similar case which pre-dates Moses's use of deadly force is Glenn, where officers fatally shot a suicidal and intoxicated individual in his driveway who did not comply with orders to put down a pocketknife. . . But in Glenn, the individual 'did not brandish

[the pocketknife] at anyone, but rather held [it] to his own neck.'. . Brown's grabbing the knife from his pocket despite orders to place his hands on his head was more threatening. . . As such, the facts of Glenn are not sufficiently analogous to give Moses fair notice that it was objectively unreasonable to use lethal force against Brown. . . Plaintiffs argue that two district court decisions (within the Ninth Circuit but outside of California) provided clear warning to Moses. However, 'district court decisions – unlike those from the courts of appeals – do not necessarily settle constitutional standards or prevent repeated claims of qualified immunity.'. . Moreover, even if district court decisions could clearly establish the law for purposes of qualified immunity, the cases on which plaintiffs rely are insufficient. . . . We disagree with the district court that it was clearly established on August 24, 2013, that using deadly force in this situation, even viewed in the light most favorable to plaintiffs, would constitute excessive force under the Fourth Amendment. . . The district court did not have the benefit of White, and the cases that plaintiffs cite do not satisfy White's exacting standard. Nor does this case involve an 'obvious' or 'run-of-the-mill' violation of the Fourth Amendment under Graham and Garner. . . Moses is therefore immune from liability under section 1983 for his use of deadly force, so we reverse the denial of summary judgment on the Fourth Amendment claim.")

Estate of Peterson v. Krueger, No. 14-35682, 2017 WL 1174402, at *1 (9th Cir. Mar. 30, 2017) (not reported) ("The United States Supreme Court recently reiterated 'the longstanding principle that "clearly established law" should not be defined "at a high level of generality."'. . '[T]he clearly established law must be "particularized" to the facts of the case.'. . The district court erred in failing to identify a case where an officer acting under similar circumstances as Krueger was held to have violated the Fourteenth Amendment. Instead, the district court relied on Munger v. City of Glasgow Police Department, 227 F.3d 1082 (9th Cir. 2000), Kennedy v. City of Ridgefield, 439 F.3d 1055 (9th Cir. 2006), and Patel v. Kent School District, 648 F.3d 965 (9th Cir. 2011), which lay out the state-created danger exception in markedly different circumstances and are applicable to this case only at a high level of generality. Accordingly, we conclude that summary judgment based on qualified immunity was warranted because the law was not clearly established at the time of the alleged conduct.")

Hardwick v. County of Orange, 844 F.3d 1112, 1117-20 (9th Cir. 2017) ("[T]he 'salient question' we must answer is 'whether the state of the law [as of February, 2000, when the conduct at issue allegedly occurred] gave [these social workers] fair warning' that their alleged use of perjured testimony and fabricated evidence in court in order to sever Preslie's familial bond with her mother was unconstitutional. . . .No official with an IQ greater than room temperature in Alaska could claim that he or she did not know that the conduct at the center of this case violated both state and federal law. The social workers in this case are alleged to have knowingly and maliciously violated the law in their attempt to sever Preslie's protected relationship with her mother. Perjury is a crime under both federal and California state law, as is the knowing submission of false evidence to a court. 18 U.S.C. § 1621; Cal. Penal Code § 118. Both crimes make no distinction between criminal and civil proceedings. This malicious criminal behavior is hardly conduct for which qualified immunity is either justified or appropriate. The doctrine exists to protect mistaken but reasonable decisions, not purposeful criminal conduct. As the Supreme Court repeated in Sheehan, officials who knowingly violate the law are not entitled to immunity. . . . Just as the Court in Hope used an ADOC regulation and a DOJ report to support its conclusion that the officials were on fair notice of the wrongfulness of their conduct, here, a pertinent state statute warns defendants in unmistakable language of the personal consequences of lies, perjury, and deception: the loss of immunity for such conduct. Furthermore, the statute focuses on behavior designed wrongfully to affect dependency proceedings in court, the citadel of Due Process. We believe this is the kind of case the Supreme Court had in mind in Hope when it talked about conduct so clearly and obviously wrong that the conduct itself unmistakably 'should have provided [defendants] with some notice' that their alleged conduct violated their targets' constitutional rights.")

Kirkpatrick v. County of Washoe, 843 F.3d 784, 792-93 (9th Cir. 2016) (en banc) ("In July 2008 it was well-settled that a child could not be removed without prior judicial authorization absent evidence that the child was in imminent danger of serious bodily injury. . . But the Supreme Court has 'repeatedly told courts—and the Ninth Circuit in particular—not to define clearly established law at a high level of generality.'. . . In 2008, it was not beyond debate that the confluence of factors set forth above would not support a finding of exigency. No Supreme Court precedent defines when a warrant is required to seize a child under exigent circumstances. And although the Supreme Court has assumed that circuit precedent can be a dispositive source of clearly established law, see id.; Carroll v. Carman, 135 S. Ct. 348, 350 (2014); Reichle v. Howards, 132 S. Ct. 2088, 2094 (2012), none of the cases from this court explain when removing an infant from a parent's custody at a hospital to prevent neglect, without a warrant, crosses the line of reasonableness and violates the Fourth Amendment. . . . In fact, very few cases from any circuit have addressed what constitutes exigent circumstances in a case that remotely resembles this one. . . No matter how carefully a reasonable social worker had read our case law, she could not have known that seizing B.W. would violate federal constitutional law. Without that fair notice, the social workers in this case are entitled to qualified immunity.")

Kirkpatrick v. County of Washoe, 843 F.3d 784, 798-800 (9th Cir. 2016) (en banc) (Friedland, J., joined by Thomas, C.J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("I join the majority's opinion as to municipal liability but dissent from its affirmance of summary judgment on the claim against the individual defendants. An official is liable, and not entitled to qualified immunity, if her 'conduct violated a clearly established constitutional right.'. . The constitutional rule that B.W. could not be seized without a warrant absent imminent danger was clearly established, and it was equally clear that there was no imminent danger to B.W. On the Fourth Amendment claim against the social workers, I would therefore hold that summary judgment to Defendants should be reversed and Plaintiff's cross-motion for summary judgment should be granted. . . The majority correctly recognizes that the rule of law at issue here was clearly established at the time: '[A] child could not be removed without prior judicial authorization absent evidence that the child was in imminent danger of serious bodily injury.'. . . Although it is true that no binding authority has addressed this exact factual scenario, such specificity is not required for a constitutional obligation to be 'clearly established.'. . It was clearly established that a child could not be seized without a warrant absent imminent danger, and the inescapable conclusion to be drawn from this record is that no objective social worker could have believed—and indeed, these social workers did not believe—that B.W. was in imminent danger. It follows, therefore, that the social workers violated B.W.'s clearly established constitutional rights.")

Kirkpatrick v. County of Washoe, 843 F.3d 784, 800 (9th Cir. 2016) (en banc) (Kozinski, J., joined by O'Scannlain, Rawlinson, and Bea, JJ., and Watford, J., joining with respect to Part 2, dissenting in part) ("For the reasons explained in my panel dissent, I agree that the social workers here are entitled to qualified immunity and join that part of the opinion. But I cannot agree that the social workers committed a constitutional violation, nor that the County can be liable for a policy of unconstitutional conduct under Monell. I therefore dissent from those portions of the opinion.")

Shepard v. Quillen, 840 F.3d 686, 693-94 (9th Cir. 2016) ("A prisoner's general right against retaliatory punishment was clearly established well before Wise transferred Shepard to administrative segregation in 2008. . . Nor was there any question that Shepard was engaged in protected conduct and that he was subject to the type of adverse action that would chill speech. . . But to overcome qualified immunity, Shepard must show that, as to the precise conduct at issue, 'existing precedent ... placed the ... constitutional question beyond debate.'. . Because the analysis of a retaliation claim is largely subjective, it's difficult to determine at the summary judgment stage whether a reasonable officer in Wise's position would have known he was violating the law. As we have explained, a jury could determine that Wise was motivated by retaliatory animus. But a jury could also conclude that Wise was relying on what he reasonably thought was a prison policy. In the latter circumstance he wouldn't have violated any right, let alone a clearly established one. But in the former, Wise would have been 'knowingly violat[ing] the law.'. . Nor, assuming Shepard's version of events is true, can Wise claim that he could have reasonably believed his conduct was lawful because he was advancing a legitimate penological goal by complying with section 3335. . . As we have explained, there's virtually no evidence that Shepard needed to be transferred out of the general population for his own safety or to preserve the integrity of an investigation. . .Wise argues that because section 3335 mandates placing a prisoner in administrative segregation following a complaint, he could not have been on notice that his conduct was unlawful; the dissent echoes Wise's reading of the regulation, dissent at 25. But the regulation does no such thing, . . . let alone authorize prison officials to retaliate against prisoners for complaining about officers. No reasonable prison official could read the regulation in that way, and Wise has offered no evidence that any other official did so[.]. . . Considering the substantial chilling effect that such a reading would have on the long established right of prisoners to seek redress of grievances, . . . this interpretation doesn't even 'pass[ ] the laugh test'; its illegality would be 'so obvious that any prison official involved in enforcing it should have known he was breaking the law.'. . In 2003, five years before the events at issue, we followed 'other circuits [in] holding that prison officials may not defeat a retaliation claim ... simply by articulating a general justification for a neutral process, when there is a genuine issue of material fact as to whether the action was taken in retaliation for the exercise of a constitutional right.'. . Those circuits have stated their rule even more bluntly, holding that the 'policy [against retaliation] applies even where the action taken ... would otherwise be permissible.'. . Accordingly, the contours of Shepard's right against retaliation were 'sufficiently clear that a reasonable official' in Wise's position would have understood 'that what he [was] doing violate[d] that right.'. . Wise may have done just what Bruce prohibits. Resolution of the disputed factual issues is thus 'critical to a proper determination of [Wise's] entitlement to qualified immunity.'. .Shepard has established a genuine issue of material fact as to whether Wise retaliated against him. He has also shown that Wise isn't entitled to qualified immunity at this stage. Accordingly, we reverse the district court's grant of summary judgment in Wise's favor.")

Shepard v. Quillen, 840 F.3d 686, 696-98 (9th Cir. 2016) (Tallman, J., dissenting) ("In short, Lieutenant Wise received a complaint that one of his correctional officers had engaged in abusive misconduct. Knowing this, Lieutenant Wise made a judgment call: Shepard's continued presence in his housing unit 'present[ed] an immediate threat to [Shepard's] safety' and 'jeopardize[d] the integrity of an investigation' into Officer Quillen's alleged misconduct. . . Lieutenant Wise properly followed prison policy and transferred Shepard into administrative segregation in furtherance of those legitimate penological goals. A reasonable correctional supervisor would have done the same. . . .Even assuming Shepard has alleged facts that show a constitutional violation, Lieutenant Wise is still entitled to qualified immunity if the right at issue was not 'clearly established' at the time of the challenged conduct. . . A clearly established right is one that is 'sufficiently clear that every reasonable official would have understood that what he is doing violates that right.'. . Shepard can't meet that high burden here. The question we must answer is: would a reasonable prison official in Lieutenant Wise's position have known that placing Shepard in administrative segregation after a complaint of serious staff assault, as directed by a clearly legitimate prison regulation, was a violation of Shepard's constitutional rights? I am at a loss as to how the answer to this question can be anything but a resounding 'no.'The relevant prison regulation, § 3335, required Lieutenant Wise to transfer Shepard into administrative segregation following his complaint of serious staff misconduct if Lieutenant Wise determined that Shepard's personal safety was at risk or that Shepard's continued presence in the housing unit threatened the integrity of the resulting internal investigation. The record amply demonstrates why it was reasonable for Lieutenant Wise to transfer Shepard into administrative segregation for these legitimate reasons. Under these circumstances, a reasonable officer in Lieutenant Wise's position could not have known that complying with a mandatory prison regulation would be a violation of Shepard's constitutional rights. In concluding otherwise and second-guessing his decision, the majority subjects Lieutenant Wise to unnecessary 'harassment, distraction, and liability.'. . The Supreme Court has told us that qualified immunity protects 'all but the plainly incompetent or those who knowingly violate the law.'. . Lieutenant Wise's decision to transfer Shepard into administrative segregation falls squarely within the range of conduct that is protected by qualified immunity. The district court properly granted him the law's protection. My colleagues err in refusing to apply it.")

A.K.H. v. City of Tustin, 837 F.3d 1005, 1013-14 (9th Cir. 2016) ("It has long been clear that '[a] police officer may not seize an unarmed, nondangerous suspect by shooting him dead.' Garner, 471 U.S. at 11. Viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to the plaintiffs, that is precisely what Officer Villarreal did here. We affirm the district court's denial of qualified immunity and remand for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.")

Pauluk v. Savage, 836 F.3d 1117, 1118-19, 1123-26 (9th Cir. 2016) ("This case lies at the intersection of two lines of authority—on the one hand, the state-created danger doctrine under which constitutional due process claims may be brought; on the other, the Supreme Court's decision in Collins v. City of Harker Heights, 503 U.S. 115 (1992), declining to find a general due process right to a safe workplace. We hold that Collins does not bar Plaintiffs' due process claim. Plaintiffs have stated a claim under the state-created danger doctrine, notwithstanding the fact that the danger at issue is a physical condition in the workplace. However, we reverse the district court's denial of summary judgment as to Wojcik and Savage, on the ground that the due process right asserted by Plaintiffs was not clearly established at the time of the violation. . . . The threshold question before us is whether Plaintiffs' claim under the state-created danger doctrine is foreclosed by Collins. We conclude that it is not. . . .Other courts agree that Collins does not foreclose application of the state-created danger exception in workplace safety cases. . . . To prevail on a state-created danger due process claim, a plaintiff must show more than merely a failure to create or maintain a safe work environment. First, a plaintiff must show that the state engaged in 'affirmative conduct' that placed him or her in danger. . . .Second, the state actor must have acted with 'deliberate indifference' to a 'known or obvious danger.'. . .Plaintiffs' evidence, if true, satisfies both elements of a state-created danger claim. First, Pauluk's 2003 transfer back to Shadow Lane was 'affirmative' conduct. Pauluk clearly did not want to return to Shadow Lane and was transferred 'involuntarily.' There is sufficient evidence in the record that either or both Wojcik and Savage were sufficiently involved in the decision to transfer that a reasonable jury could conclude they should bear some responsibility for that transfer. . . .Second, construing the facts in the light most favorable to Plaintiffs, Wojcik and Savage acted with deliberate indifference in exposing Pauluk to a known and obvious danger. Plaintiffs presented evidence that Wojcik and Savage were both aware of the CCHD's long and tortured history of pervasive mold problems in multiple buildings, including the Shadow Lane facility. . . .The core question in this appeal is whether Collins bars the application of the state-created danger doctrine in cases where the danger is a physical condition in the workplace. Because Wood did not involve a dangerous workplace, it does not speak to this question. Grubbs I presents a closer analogy to this case. However, as recounted above, the danger in Grubbs I was a human actor who posed a known threat. In contrast, Pauluk was not harmed by a human agent, but rather by a physical condition in the building where he worked. This case is factually very similar to Collins, where, as here, the danger was a physical danger in the workplace. For the reasons given above, we conclude that Plaintiffs have stated a claim despite the fact that Pauluk's injury was caused by physical conditions in the workplace. But, because the Supreme Court in Collins declined to find a due process violation in a case with very similar facts, we cannot say that Wojcik and Savage were 'on notice' that their conduct was unlawful under clearly established law.")

Pauluk v. Savage, 836 F.3d 1117, 1126 (9th Cir. 2016) (Murgia, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("I fully agree with the opinion's analysis as to the scope of this court's jurisdiction to review the district court's denial of summary judgment on qualified immunity grounds, and with its conclusion that the district court erred in denying qualified immunity to Wojcik and Savage. However, even accepting as true the plaintiffs' version of events, see Behrens v. Pelletier, 516 U.S. 299, 313 (1996), I respectfully disagree that the plaintiffs have presented a cognizable claim that Wojcik and Savage affirmatively acted with deliberate indifference to Pauluk's substantive due process rights under the state-created danger doctrine.")

Pauluk v. Savage, 836 F.3d 1117, 1132-34 (9th Cir. 2016) (Noonan, J., dissenting) ("Today, the majority holds that the state-created danger doctrine—a theory of constitutional harm whose contours have been 'clearly established' by at least nine published opinions of this court over the course of two decades—is no longer sufficiently 'clear' in light of a single case which addresses an unrelated legal theory. I respectfully dissent. . . .No basis exists to distinguish this case from Wood, Kennedy, or any other published opinion of this court upholding the applicability of the state-created danger doctrine. I would affirm the district court's denial of summary judgment. I therefore concur with the majority's conclusion that, viewing the facts in the light most favorable to plaintiffs, they have shown a violation of the Fourteenth Amendment under the state created danger doctrine. . . .Pauluk's case therefore presents the precise facts that the Collins Court deemed were inapplicable to its analysis and holding. Accordingly, Collins does not counsel against affirming the district court here. Indeed, the majority appears to concede that Collins is distinguishable, but concludes that even assuming Pauluk has stated a constitutional violation, the factual circumstances of this case are simply too similar to the facts of Collins for the defendants to have been ' "on notice" that their conduct was unlawful under clearly established law.'. . The law governing the state-created danger doctrine is 'clearly established' by the controlling precedent discussed above such that 'any reasonable official in [defendants'] shoes would have understood that [they were] violating it.' City & Cty. of S.F. v. Sheehan, 135 S. Ct. 1765 (2015) (citations omitted). Indeed, in light of these cases, the constitutional question has been 'placed...beyond debate.'. . A case which presents some factual similarities but lacks any legal nexus to the state-created danger doctrine cannot revive that debate, nor can it serve to convolute what this court has defined with pellucid clarity. Collins does not control here. Accordingly, I dissent.")

Managed Protective Services, Inc. v. City of Mesa, 654 F. App'x 276, __ (9th Cir. 2016) ("[T]he district court erred in examining solely 'hot pavement' cases to determine whether the law was clearly established. That courts have resolved prior 'hot pavement' cases differently is not dispositive; law can be 'clearly established' even if 'there was no case on all fours prohibiting that particular manifestation of unconstitutional conduct.'. .Among other relevant principles, it was clearly established that the Fourth Amendment prohibits the continued use of force against an arrestee who is restrained and no longer resisting, see, e.g., LaLonde v. County of Riverside, 204 F.3d 947, 960–61 (9th Cir. 2000), and that ignoring an arrestee's complaints of pain violates the Fourth Amendment, see, e.g., Palmer v. Sanderson, 9 F.3d 1433, 1436 (9th Cir. 1993)")

Managed Protective Services, Inc. v. City of Mesa, 654 F. App'x 276, ___ (9th Cir. 2016) (Bea, J., concurring in part, dissenting in part) ("I respectfully dissent from the majority's decision to reverse the district court's grant of qualified immunity as to the excessive force claim. The district court did not err when it canvassed other hot surface cases to determine whether the officers' conduct here amounted to a clearly established violation of Simpson's constitutional right to be free from unreasonable seizure. In assessing qualified immunity, '[i]t is important to emphasize that this inquiry "must be undertaken in light of the specific context of the case, not as a broad general proposition."'. . Broad general propositions can establish a 'clear' violation 'in an obvious case.'. . However, as the district court noted, this is not such a case. Federal courts have reached different results in cases involving detainees and hot surfaces. . . This body of case law 'undoubtedly show[s] that this area is one in which the result depends very much on the facts of each case.'. . 'None of them squarely governs the case here; they do suggest that [the officers'] actions fell in the "hazy border between excessive and acceptable force."'. . Accordingly, I would affirm the district court's holding that hobbling Simpson on hot pavement to overcome his physical resistance to entering the squad car did not amount to a clearly established violation of his constitutional rights.")

Sialoi v. City of San Diego, 823 F.3d 1223, 1233-36 (9th Cir. 2016) ("In sum, once the officers determined that the item in G.S.'s hand was a toy, no officer of 'reasonable caution' would have had any reason to believe that G.S., T.O.S., and B.F. were the suspects the apartment manager described, or were otherwise engaged in unlawful activity. Accordingly, taking the facts in the light most favorable to the plaintiffs, the officers violated the constitutional rights of G.S., T.O.S., and B.F. when they arrested them. . . .It is true, as the defendants argue, that the officers found themselves in a potentially dangerous situation: they were in a high-crime area responding to a report of suspects with weapons. While these background circumstances are no doubt relevant to the question whether the officers' conduct was reasonable, they do not render it even 'reasonably arguable' that probable cause existed for the arrests of the young boys. Where no facts specific to the arrestees establish probable cause, officers may not rely on general background facts to immunize themselves from suit. . . . To repeat, the officers encountered not two black individuals but instead three Samoans wearing clothing that did not resemble the apartment manager's description. Before handcuffing the three boys and placing them in a police car, the officers knew that the item in G.S.'s hand was a mere toy, knew that none of the boys possessed a gun, and were aware of no other even remotely suspicious activity in which any of the boys had engaged or were engaging. For these reasons, no reasonable officer would have concluded that probable caused existed to arrest the teenagers, and we affirm the district court's denial of qualified immunity for their arrest. . . . We hold that, taking the facts in the light most favorable to the remaining plaintiffs, no reasonable officer would have thought it lawful to detain and search them. The defendants do not dispute that it has long been clearly established that it is unlawful to conduct an investigatory stop and search unsupported by reasonable suspicion. . . Once the officers discovered that the item in G.S.'s hand was a mere toy, the only fact that in any way suggested that the Sialoi family was involved in criminal activity was the sole circumstance of their presence outside an apartment building near which two armed suspects had earlier been spotted. Were this sufficient to establish reasonable suspicion, the police would be authorized to indiscriminately detain individuals in areas of expected criminal activity without any 'basis for suspecting that the particular person detained is engaged in criminal activity.'. . Accordingly, no reasonable officer would think that the location of the encounter alone could serve as the basis for reasonable suspicion. Furthermore, because the officers do not 'allege[ ] any specific facts' suggesting that any of the remaining plaintiffs possessed a weapon, 'we conclude that it would have been clear to a reasonable officer that [the] pat-down[s] ... [were] unlawful in this situation.'. . Accordingly, we affirm the district court's denial of qualified immunity for the officers' seizure and search of the remaining plaintiffs.")

Hamby v. Hammond, 821 F.3d 1085, 1091-95 & n.3 (9th Cir. 2016) ("In a nutshell, according to the Supreme Court, state officials are entitled to qualified immunity so long as 'none of our precedents "squarely governs" the facts here,' meaning that 'we cannot say that only someone "plainly incompetent' or who "knowingly violate[s] the law" would have ... acted as [the officials] did.'. .Before applying the above principles to Hamby's case, we must emphasize that the fact-specific, highly contextualized nature of the inquiry does not depend on which particular constitutional right a given plaintiff claims the officials have violated. In particular, Hamby—drawing on some recent statements from our court—suggests that the qualified-immunity inquiry in Eighth Amendment cases differs from the inquiry in other types of cases, such as those involving excessive force, where analogies to prior cases supposedly play a stronger role. That proposition is demonstrably untrue. Not only has the Supreme Court never suggested any such distinction, but several cases affirmatively repudiate it. Indeed, Taylor v. Barkes was an Eighth Amendment case—just like the present one—in which an inmate's estate alleged that prison officials were deliberately indifferent to the inmate's serious medical needs. . . . Likewise, Wood v. Moss and Reichle v. Howards were First Amendment cases rather than Fourth Amendment ones. . . And yet the Supreme Court's analysis proceeded along the same lines. These cases make clear that the particular right at issue in no way changes the fact-specific, highly contextualized nature of the 'clearly established' analysis. . .Given the foregoing doctrine, the question in this case must be: viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to Hamby, was it 'beyond debate,' at the time the prison officials acted, that their conduct violated the Constitution? If the answer is no—if the officials' actions did not clearly violate Hamby's rights under the Eighth Amendment—then the officials are entitled to qualified immunity, and summary judgment must be entered in their favor. . . . For purposes of determining qualified immunity, therefore, we must ask the narrower question: viewing the evidence most favorably to Hamby, and given existing case law at that time, was it 'beyond debate' that the prison officials pursued a medically unreasonable course of treatment by declining to refer Hamby for a surgical evaluation? . . . Here, the answer is no, even if we assume that each of the officials Hamby sued was aware of his chronic pain. . . That is, in light of existing precedent and the specific facts of Hamby's case, it is at least debatable that the officials complied with the Eighth Amendment, because—to the extent they played any role in the decision to deny Hamby surgery for his umbilical hernia—the record makes clear that they did so based on legitimate medical opinions that have often been held reasonable under the Eighth Amendment. . . . At worst, the evidence in the record shows a difference of medical opinion amounting to possible negligence on the part of Drs. Hammond and Smith. . . . Hamby's argument misunderstands the sort of clarity a plaintiff must demonstrate in order to overcome a defense of qualified immunity. For starters, defining the relevant right as simply the right to be free from deliberate indifference 'is far too general a proposition to control this case.'. . To proceed in that manner is to neglect the dispositive question: whether these officials, on these facts, should have known that what they did violated the Eighth Amendment. In short, Hamby would have us repeat the same error the Supreme Court has time and again felt compelled to correct. Of course, it is true (as far as it goes) that a plaintiff need not find a case with identical facts in order to survive a defense of qualified immunity; obviously, one can imagine a situation where the officials' conduct is so egregious that no one would defend it, even if there were no prior holding directly on point. . . But it should be equally obvious that the farther afield existing precedent lies from the case under review, the more likely it will be that the officials' acts will fall within that vast zone of conduct that is perhaps regrettable but is at least arguably constitutional. So long as even that much can be said for the officials, they are entitled to qualified immunity. Such is the case here. Even when the facts are viewed most favorably to Hamby, they demonstrate that the prison officials acted on a bona fide medical opinion, and opted for a course of treatment held to be constitutional on numerous prior occasions. . . That is enough to shield them from damages liability.")

Hamby v. Hammond, 821 F.3d 1085, 1096-97 (9th Cir. 2016) (Gould, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("I concur only in the result reached by the majority in Part IV. I respectfully dissent from the rest of the majority's opinion. We have long recognized: 'It is settled law that deliberate indifference to serious medical needs of prisoners violates the Eighth Amendment.'. .I do not say that Hamby showed deliberate indifference as a matter of law and could receive summary relief himself. But his evidence was sufficient to raise a genuine issue of material fact on whether 'the course of treatment the doctors chose was medically unacceptable under the circumstances,' and whether they 'chose this course in conscious disregard of an excessive risk' to Hamby's health. . . This case should have gone to a jury as the trier of fact, with the guidance of correct jury instructions on deliberate indifference. It should not have been resolved by summary judgment of the district court. . . Nor should that summary judgment be affirmed by us. And so I dissent in the hope that a future court may correct the majority's error.")

Injeyan v. City of Laguna Beach, 645 F.3d 577, 580 (9th Cir. 2016) (Pregerson, J., dissenting) ("I dissent. Injeyan's claim of excessive force is not a carbon copy of Meredith, Hansen, Franklin, or Tekle. But these cases, when taken together, provide clear notice that the officer's conduct would run afoul of the law. . . Here, the officer was faced with seventy-two-year-old Marilyn Injeyan—a slight woman whom the officer had met the day before, who was not a suspect in the crime, and who readily submitted to the officer's authority to detain her. Yet, in the face of ready submission, the officer handcuffed Injeyan and wrenched her arms to such a degree that he tore her rotator cuffs. Any reasonable officer would have understood that such force in these circumstances was excessive. I understand that the Supreme Court has cautioned that we not define clearly established law at a high level of generality. But I am troubled that in a number of cases this caution has become an insurmountable barrier to many righteous claims.")

Garcia v. Cty. of Riverside, 817 F.3d 635, 642-44 (9th Cir. 2016) ("[A]n obvious physical discrepancy between a warrant subject and a booked individual, such as a nine-inch difference in height, accompanied by a detainee's complaints of misidentification, should prompt officers to engage in readily available and resource-efficient identity checks, such as a fingerprint comparison, to ensure that they are not detaining the wrong person. Here Plaintiff's claim of mistaken identity was not uncorroborated, because of the height and weight differences, and he also alleges that officers already had all the information they needed to differentiate him from the warrant subject. . . . Because we hold that Garcia has sufficiently pleaded a Fourteenth Amendment violation, whether Baca is entitled to qualified immunity depends on whether the right that Garcia asserts was 'clearly established' at the time of the alleged misconduct. . . Defendants contend that until Rivera, our cases have applied Baker unevenly and inconsistently. However, the holdings of Lee, Fairley, Rivera, and Gant are explained by differences in the facts, not by inconsistent statements of law. Rivera, decided after the district court's second order, summarizes existing law: officers violate the Fourteenth Amendment if they wrongly detain a person where 'the circumstances indicated to [them] that further investigation was warranted.'. . .In sum, at the time of Plaintiff's November 2012 incarceration, the standards for determining whether alleged police conduct violates the Fourteenth Amendment were clearly established. Baca is not entitled to qualified immunity.")

O'Brien v. Welty, 818 F.3d 920, 936 (9th Cir. 2016) ("In this case, the district court held that qualified immunity shielded defendants from suit because the FAC 'fail[ed] to set forth facts to show that any constitutionally protected right was infringed by any Defendant at any time.' As explained above, we disagree with the district court and hold that the FAC pleads a plausible First Amendment retaliation claim. The constitutional right to be free from retaliation was 'clearly established at the time of defendants' actions.'. . Retaliation for engaging in protected speech has long been prohibited by the First Amendment. . . We have previously made it clear that there is a right to be free from retaliation even if a non-retaliatory justification exists for the defendants' action. . . A reasonable official in defendants' shoes would thus have known that taking disciplinary action against O'Brien in retaliation for the expression of his views violated his First Amendment rights. Our denial of qualified immunity at this stage of the proceedings does not mean that this case must go to trial. Once an evidentiary record has been developed through discovery, defendants will be free to move for summary judgment based on qualified immunity.")

Reza v. Pearce, 806 F.3d 497, 506 (9th Cir. 2015) (order denying reh'g and reh'g en banc and amending opinion) ("On February 22, 2011, the date of the S.B. 1070 hearing, clearly established law held that an individual could protest in a limited public forum, but that the government could restrict the individual's speech to safeguard the purpose of the forum, as long as the restrictions were reasonable and viewpoint neutral. . . Our circuit's case law also unambiguously held that a government official could remove an individual from a limited public forum if the individual had actually disrupted proceedings. . . . Norse reaffirmed the fundamental principle that the government can remove an individual from a limited public forum only if the individual actually disrupts the proceedings. No cases, in the Ninth Circuit or otherwise, even remotely suggest that Norse's principle can be inverted to indefinitely ban an individual from a government building based on a single disruption of a hearing. . . . Thus, nothing in our caselaw suggests that Pearce could have reasonably believed that he could violate Norse and instead bar Reza from the building at a time when it is undisputed that he was not being disruptive. . . . We thus conclude that, when genuine disputes of fact are resolved in Reza's favor, Senator Pearce violated Reza's clearly established First Amendment rights and that the district court erred by granting summary judgment to Senator Pearce.")

Reza v. Pearce, 806 F.3d 497, 509-11 (9th Cir. 2015) (order denying reh'g and reh'g en banc and amending opinion) (Wallace, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) (" I dissent from Part I of the majority opinion, which incorrectly holds that Senator Pearce 'violated Reza's clearly established First Amendment rights.' The Supreme Court has repeatedly cautioned courts-and our circuit in particular—'not [to] define clearly established law at a high level of generality.'. . Rather than correct the course, as directed by the Supreme Court, in this case, the majority continues in the wrong direction and I therefore dissent. . . .[W]e need not even reach the question of whether Senator Pearce actually violated First Amendment law in this case by relying, as he could, on reports given to him by officers assigned to keep order, because there is no doubt that the senator did not violate 'clearly established' law at the time of the challenged conduct. At that time, not a single Supreme Court decision clearly established the right Reza now asserts. Implicitly acknowledging this fact, the majority focuses solely on Ninth Circuit law. After reviewing our law at the time, the majority concludes that '[n]o cases, in the Ninth Circuit or otherwise, even remotely suggest that Norse's principle can be inverted to indefinitely ban an individual from a government building based on a single disruption of a hearing.'. . But this answers the wrong question and is ultimately a red herring. The fact that no cases affirmatively permitted an official to ban an individual from a government building based on a single disruption (the majority's conclusion) is irrelevant for purposes of qualified immunity. Instead, the relevant question is whether any case expressly prohibited an official from banning an individual from a government building for a single disruption. None of our cases at the time of the hearing in question answered that question. . . . Maybe Senator Pearce made a mistake in banning Reza from the senate building. Perhaps the First Amendment should prohibit such a ban. But neither view should make any difference in this case because at the time of the challenged conduct Senator Pearce did not violate any 'clearly established' right. On this basis, I would hold that Senator Pearce is entitled to qualified immunity and would affirm the district court's summary judgment in his favor. The majority's holding to the contrary continues our unfortunate ignoring of the Supreme Court's repeated caution to 'avoid defining clearly established law at a high level of generality.' . . I therefore dissent from the holding reversing the district court's summary judgment in favor of Senator Pearce but concur in the remainder of the majority opinion.")

Jones v. Cnty. of Los Angeles, 802 F.3d 990, 1004-08 (9th Cir. 2015) ("Were we faced with a social worker who detained a child without exigent circumstances, this case would fall neatly within our existing case law. . . .What makes this case more difficult is that Dr. Wang was a physician investigating child abuse, not a social worker, and the seizure occurred in a hospital. Therefore, the question presented by this case is whether these two facts—that Dr. Wang was a physician investigating abuse, not a social worker, and that G.J. was detained in a hospital following his parents' consent to hospitalization—sufficiently differentiate this case from our precedent in child abuse investigations such that our precedent does not clearly apply. We conclude that our case law provided fair warning to Dr. Wang that detaining G.J. would violate the Constitution. . . .Our recent decision in Kirkpatrick supports our conclusion that Dr. Wang's efforts to keep G.J. in the hospital—as described by the Joneses—violated clearly established law. . . .[O]ur case law prohibits an official from detaining a child before the official develops a reasonable belief that a risk of serious harm is imminent. It follows from this clearly established principle that an official may not detain a child merely in the hope that further investigation will turn up facts suggesting that exigent circumstances exist. We next turn to whether this case is distinguishable from the general rule because Dr. Wang is a physician investigating child abuse rather than a social worker. Dr. Wang insists that because she is a physician investigating the cause of serious injuries sustained by an infant, the constitutional standard that we have applied to social workers is not clearly established with respect to her. Again, we disagree. 'It is well-settled that the immunity to which a public official is entitled depends not on the official's title or agency, but on the nature of the function that the person was performing when taking the actions that provoked the lawsuit.'. . The appropriate frame for our analysis therefore focuses on what Dr. Wang did, not her title or person. . . . This case presents complex legal and factual issues. However, once the legal landscape is properly understood, the simplicity of the Joneses' claim underscores why the district court did not err when it denied Dr. Wang summary judgment. . . . It is clearly established law that a state actor may not remove a child from their parents' custody absent a court order or exigent circumstances. According to the Joneses, that is exactly what Dr. Wang did: she orchestrated G.J.'s hospitalization without sufficient evidence that G.J. was in imminent danger, implicitly coerced the Joneses to consent to that hospitalization, and ensured they could not remain alone with their child while Dr. Wang made the final decision whether to request a hospital hold. If the Joneses' version of events were believed, a rational juror could conclude that Dr. Wang knew she was violating the law. Dr. Wang knew she did not have sufficient evidence to detain G.J., yet a rational juror could find that she seized him anyway to further her investigation. The clear guidance our precedent provides to state officials investigating child abuse would put any reasonable state official in Dr. Wang's position on notice that such conduct violated G.J.'s and the Joneses' rights. Accordingly, because both prongs of the qualified immunity test were satisfied, the Joneses are entitled to attempt to prove their version of the facts to a jury and summary judgment was not appropriate.")

Jones v. Cnty. of Los Angeles, 802 F.3d 990, 1009, 1011-12 (9th Cir. 2015) (McNamee, District Judge, dissenting) ("I find that Dr. Wang is entitled to qualified immunity because she did not violate either the Fourth Amendment or clearly established law. . . .In sum, 'there is a world of difference[]'. . . between a social worker removing young children without physical manifestations of abuse from their homes and Dr. Wang recommending hospital care to a nonverbal infant with textbook head and rib injuries suggesting serious child abuse. Given the unique situation presented in this case, a finding that 'every reasonable official [in Dr. Wang's situation] would have understood that what he is doing violated' a constitutional right is simply unsupported. . . .The lack of affirmative facts implicating Dr. Wang, the distinct circumstances of this case, and the cornucopia of child abuse investigation standards lead me to find that Dr. Wang is entitled to qualified immunity. . . . I share Judge Kozinski's concern that 'future babies will pay with their lives' due to the current trajectory of our qualified immunity case law. . . I also fear that today's decision will encourage state officials, particularly investigating doctors, to forgo medically reasonable tests and procedures before making life-altering accusations. I therefore respectfully dissent from the majority's opinion.")

Carrillo v. Cnty. of Los Angeles, 798 F.3d 1210, 1218-28 & n.15 (9th Cir. 2015) ("The defendants do not dispute that the evidence allegedly withheld falls within Brady's scope, and we therefore do not address the first prong of the qualified immunity analysis. . . Instead, we consider only the second prong: whether the officers would have understood they were violating the Supreme Court's 1963 decision in Brady by failing to disclose this evidence. We first address whether it was clearly established in 1984 that police officers as well as prosecutors were bound by Brady at all . . . and next whether the evidence allegedly withheld in these cases was clearly established to be Brady evidence. . . .The officers argue the law did not clearly establish that they were bound by Brady at all in 1984 and 1991. This contention lacks merit because it was clearly established well before the events in these cases that police officers were bound to disclose material and exculpatory evidence. . . .Just one year after Brady, the Fourth Circuit held police officers as well as prosecutors were bound to disclose material, exculpatory evidence . . . . [citing Barbee v. Warden, 331 F.2d 842, 846 (4th Cir.1964)]Requiring police officers as well as prosecutors to disclose material and exculpatory evidence follows logically from Brady's rationale. . . .This circuit adopted Barbee's logic well before the investigations here. In United States v. Butler, 567 F.2d 885, 891 (9th Cir.1978), we rejected the government's argument that no Brady violation occurred because investigative agents, and not the prosecutor, were responsible for the nondisclosure of promises made to certain prosecution witnesses. . . . Butler undisputably put police officers on notice that their failure to disclose Brady information would constitute a violation the defendant's constitutional rights. . . . Because 'clearly established law' includes 'controlling authority in [the defendants'] jurisdiction,' Butler clearly established in 1978 that police officers have a duty to disclose Brady material. . . The officers' attempts to circumvent Butler are unpersuasive. . . . [T]he officers argue the law did not clearly establish they were bound by Brady until the Supreme Court itself 'extended' Brady to police officers in Kyles v. Whitley, 514 U.S. 419, 438 (1995). . . . But Kyles did not announce a new principle of law. In fact, Kyles itself rejected the state's argument that 'it should not be held accountable under Bagley and Brady for evidence known only to police investigators and not to the prosecutor,' explaining that '[t]o accommodate the State in this matter would ... amount to a serious change of course from the Brady line of cases.'. . .Furthermore, the vast majority of circuits to have considered the question have adopted the view that police officers were bound by Brady well before the Court decided Kyles. . . The Third Circuit alone has disagreed, concluding such an obligation was not clearly established until 'the Supreme Court ... settle[d] this matter' in Kyles, notwithstanding precedent in that circuit that a police officer's failure to disclose Brady evidence could be imputed to the prosecutor. . . . The First Circuit has also held police officers were not bound to affirmatively disclose Brady evidence until Kyles. See Drumgold v. Callahan, 707 F.3d 28, 43 (1st Cir.2013). But it distinguished the affirmative duty to disclose evidence from the duty not to deliberately suppress exculpatory evidence. Where the defendant police officer was alleged to have deliberately suppressed evidence, in violation of either Brady or Mooney v. Holohan, 294 U.S. 103 (1934), the court concluded such conduct was clearly established as unlawful in 1989. . . . The defendants argue that the Third Circuit's decision created a circuit split on the issue and that, 'if judges thus disagree on a constitutional question, it is unfair to subject police to money damages for picking the losing side of the controversy.'. . . Although disagreement among circuit courts may imply a legal principle is not 'beyond debate,' and thus not clearly established, qualified immunity is not the 'guaranteed product of disuniform views of the law in the other federal, or state, courts, and the fact that a single judge, or even a group of judges, disagrees about the contours of a right does not automatically render the law unclear.' Safford Unified Sch. Dist. No. 1 v. Redding, 557 U.S. 364, 378 (2009). More importantly, however, '[i]f the right is clearly established by decisional authority of the Supreme Court or of this Circuit, our inquiry should come to an end.'. . Only in the absence of binding precedent do we consider other sources of decisional law such as out-of-circuit cases. See Boyd v. Benton Cnty., 374 F.3d 773, 781 (9th Cir.2004). Because Butler unambiguously held due process is violated where a police officer fails to disclose material, exculpatory evidence, our inquiry is over. We hold that, at the time of the relevant events in these cases, circuit precedent clearly established that police officers were bound by *Brady'*s disclosure requirements. . . .Even though it was clearly established at the time of the investigations that police officers were bound to disclose Brady evidence, we must next consider whether every reasonable police officer would have understood the specific evidence allegedly withheld was clearly subject to Brady's disclosure requirements. . . . Here, the right being violated is, by its terms, significantly more specific than the 'extremely abstract' right of freedom from unreasonable searches and seizures. . . Brady defines the type of material the government is obligated to disclose concretely and specifically as 'favorable to the accused, either because it is exculpatory, or because it is impeaching.'. . Unlike the broad touchstone of 'unreasonableness,' the contours of a defendant's right to Brady material are focused and clear. . . .As in Tennison, law predating the investigations in both of these cases clearly established that the type of evidence allegedly withheld—including impeachment and alternative suspect evidence—fell within Brady's scope. The officers' assertions of qualified immunity, therefore, fail. . . .The law clearly established, well before the events in these cases, that police officers were bound by Brady and that the evidence allegedly withheld in these cases fell within Brady's scope. We therefore affirm the denial of qualified immunity in both cases and remand to the district court for further proceedings.")

Jones v. Williams, 791 F.3d 1023, 1034 (9th Cir. 2015) ("Here, there is at least an issue of material fact as to what a reasonable officer at the Penitentiary should have known on July 8, 2007. Several months before McBride ordered Jones to cook pork loins, the Penitentiary implemented a new policy providing that an inmate could opt out of handling pork on religious grounds. And Jones alleges that he told the officers in charge that he had the right to not handle pork. That some officers claim they were not personally aware of the policy change or Belleque's memo to Jones is not sufficient to show that Jones's right to avoid handling pork was not clearly established. In sum, viewing the record in the light most favorable to Jones, Appellees' conduct violated Jones's clearly established right to avoid handling pork on the basis of his religious beliefs. On this record, Appellees are not entitled to qualified immunity.")

Walker v. Beard, 789 F.3d 1125, 1131 n.3, 1139 (9th Cir. 2015) ("Walker asserts claims for both damages and injunctive relief, but we consider only the mootness of the injunctive claims because Defendants are immune from liability for damages. Defendants are immune from Walker's official capacity damages claims under the Eleventh Amendment. See Will v. Mich. Dep't of State Police, 491 U.S. 58, 64–65 (1989); Holley v. Cal. Dep't of Corr., 599 F.3d 1108, 1111–12 (9th Cir.2010). Walker's personal capacity claims fail because Defendants plainly did not violate clearly established rights of which a reasonable person would (or should) have known, thus entitling Defendants to qualified immunity. See Pearson v. Callahan, 555 U.S. 223, 232–33 (2009). . . .Walker successfully alleged a burden on his religious exercise under RLUIPA and the First Amendment, but the State has a compelling interest in avoiding unconstitutional racial discrimination, and subjecting Walker to integrated celling is the only possible means of furthering that interest. Accordingly, we conclude that Walker has failed to state claims under RLUIPA and the First Amendment; we further conclude that the district court did not abuse its discretion in denying leave to amend.")

Mikich v. City & Cnty. of San Francisco, 612 F. App'x 443, 445 (9th Cir. 2015) ("At the time of this event, it was clearly established law that, in order for a warrantless removal based on exigent circumstances to be lawful, a social worker 'must have reasonable cause to believe that the child is likely to experience serious bodily harm in the time that would be required to obtain a warrant.' Rogers v. Cnty. of San Joaquin, 487 F.3d 1288, 1294 (9th Cir.2007). No reasonable social worker could have concluded that AM was in imminent danger of serious bodily injury while she was in the hospital; the danger already identified as potentially warranting seizure would only materialize at the time of AM's discharge. Accordingly, because the danger would not have arisen in the time it would have taken Defendants to obtain a warrant, no reasonable social worker in Defendants' position would have believed it was lawful to remove AM without obtaining a warrant.")

Tatum v. Moody, 768 F.3d 806, 821 n.10 (9th Cir. 2014) ("Moody and Pulido do not independently appeal the denial of qualified immunity on the ground that even if the jury was properly instructed, 'the right at issue was [not] "clearly established" at the time of [their] alleged misconduct.'. . They have thus forfeited any such objection for failure to assert it 'specifically and distinctly' in their opening brief. . .Nor could Moody and Pulido have asserted that the right they violated was not clearly established. They concede 'that withholding exculpatory evidence may cause constitutional injury not only at the criminal trial, but during the pretrial stages of the criminal proceedings as well,' but they argue that this rule applies only if their conduct violates the standards set by the Fourth Amendment. Immunity, however, turns 'on an officer's duties, not on other aspects of the constitutional violation.' Stoot v. City of Everett, 582 F.3d 910, 927 (9th Cir.2009). Uncertainty regarding the procedural niceties of privately enforcing the relevant constitutional prohibition—including knowledge of the particular constitutional provision implicated by the violation—does not immunize state officials from liability. . . Where, as here, officers recognize that their conduct 'could ripen into' an actionable violation on the basis of subsequent contingencies beyond their control, they are not immune from suit. Stoot, 582 F.3d at 927. Commonsense confirms Moody and Pulido's concession that the withholding of exculpatory evidence can cause constitutional injury; that concession recognizes 'the almost tautological conclusion that an individual in custody has a constitutional right to be released from confinement after it was or should have been known that the detainee was entitled to release.'")

George v. Edholm, 752 F.3d 1206, 1220, 1221 (9th Cir. 2014) ("George has provided evidence that would support a jury conclusion that Freeman and Johnson gave false information to Dr. Edholm, and that this false information induced Edholm to perform unconstitutionally intrusive procedures that he would not otherwise have performed. '[E]very reasonable official would have understood' that conduct to violate the Fourth Amendment. . . We reach this decision based on Supreme Court precedent, 'cases of controlling authority in [the officers'] jurisdiction,' and 'a consensus of cases of persuasive authority.'. . First, it was clearly established that a private citizen's search may be attributed to the police when the 'the private party act[s] as an instrument or agent of the Government' in conducting the search. . . That principle had been repeatedly and clearly applied to doctors' searches of suspects' bodies. . . No reasonable officer could have believed that he could avoid responsibility for an unconstitutional search by using deception to induce a private party to perform the search. The Supreme Court has deemed that principle so obvious as to be 'axiomatic.'. . Second, it was clearly established that a search of a patient's body must be reasonable. . . As we explained above, forced sedation, anoscopy, intubation, insertion of a nasogastric tube, and bowel evacuation are more intrusive than the stomach-pumping rejected in Rochin, and at least as intrusive as other searches characterized as highly invasive by courts across the country. . . Case law clearly established that the possibility that a baggie of drugs could rupture, standing alone, cannot justify a warrantless search as intrusive as that conducted here. . . Indeed, the California Supreme Court so held nearly thirty years before the search in this case.")

Grenning v. Miller-Stout, 739 F.3d 1235, 1241, 1242 (9th Cir. 2014) ("We conclude, based on the foregoing, that there are material issues of fact remaining as to the brightness of the continuous lighting in Grenning's SMU cell, as to the effect on Grenning of the continuous lighting, and as to whether the defendant officials were deliberately indifferent. . . .The district court did not consider the question of qualified immunity because it granted summary judgment to Defendants on the merits. We leave the issue of qualified immunity for the district court to determine in the first instance on remand. . . If the district court finds for Grenning on the merits of his Eighth Amendment claim, and if it finds that Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity, Grenning may still be entitled to injunctive relief. . . It is obvious from the record before us that prisoners at Airway Heights may be placed in the SMU for many reasons, and, so far as the record shows, Grenning is likely to remain a prisoner at Airway Heights for a sustained period. It thus appears that there is sufficient likelihood of Grenning being again confined in the SMU to preserve his claim for injunctive relief.")

Grenning v. Miller-Stout, 739 F.3d 1235, 1242, 1243 (9th Cir. 2014) (Rawlinson, J., dissenting) ("I respectfully dissent from the majority's failure to rule on the issue of qualified immunity in this case. We may affirm the district court's decision 'on any ground supported by the record.'. . And the record in this case supports affirming the grant of summary judgment in favor of the prison officials on the basis of qualified immunity. . . I agree that constant illumination of an inmate's sleeping quarters may constitute a serious deprivation of the right to shelter guaranteed by the Eighth Amendment in some circumstances. . . However, before denying qualified immunity to prison officials, we must determine whether the party asserting the injury has sufficiently alleged a constitutional violation, and whether the right violated was clearly established. . . We recently held that constant illumination of an inmate's cell is unconstitutional only if no penological justification is provided for such illumination. . . .By contrast, in this case, prison officials offered the following legitimate penological purposes for constant illumination:

• Offenders in the Segregation Management Unit (SMU) pose a greater security risk within the institution.
• Because of the greater security risk, inmates housed in the SITU are subjected to security checks every thirty minutes.
• Constant illumination allows staff to conduct security checks without disrupting offenders by turning on the lights every thirty minutes or by shining a flashlight into the inmate's cell.
• Constant illumination prevents inmates from observing the use of lights by correctional staff to assess their proximity.

As federal judges, we are in no position to second-guess the legitimacy of these proffered justifications. . . In my view, the presence of legitimate justifications for the constant illumination in the SMU sufficiently distinguishes this case from Keenan such that it would not be clear to a reasonable prison official that reliance on the proffered justifications for the use of constant illumination in the SMU would violate the Eighth Amendment. I would affirm the district court's grant of summary judgment in favor of the prison officials on the alternative basis that they were entitled to qualified immunity.") Gravelet-Blondin v. Shelton, 728 F.3d 1086, 1092-96 (9th Cir. 2013) ("Having concluded that Sgt. Shelton may indeed have used excessive force in violation of the Fourth Amendment, we now consider whether the right to be free from such force was clearly established at the time of the incident. . . .The right to be free from the application of non-trivial force for engaging in mere passive resistance was clearly established prior to 2008. [Discussing Deorle, Nelson, and Headwaters] Though these cases do not concern tasers, they need not. As we explained in Deorle, '[i]t does not matter that no case of this court directly addresses the use of [a particular weapon]; we have held that "[a]n officer is not entitled to qualified immunity on the grounds that the law is not clearly established every time a novel method is used to inflict injury."'. . Indeed, even absent taser-specific case law, three of our sister circuits have held that the law was clearly established, prior to 2008, that the use of a taser can in some instances constitute excessive force. . . .Still, relying on our grants of qualified immunity in Bryan and Mattos, Defendants argue that the law was insufficiently clear before 2010—when we first identified tasers in dart mode as an intermediate level of force, . . . to put Sgt. Shelton on notice that his use of a taser against Blondin was excessive. But this case is factually distinguishable from Bryan and Mattos in one critical respect: Blondin engaged in no behavior that could have been perceived by Sgt. Shelton as threatening or resisting. As a result, the use of non-trivial force of any kind was unreasonable. . . .Here, evaluating the situation from Sgt. Shelton's perspective, Blondin—who, unlike Bryan, Brooks, and Mattos, had no connection to the underlying crime—committed no act of resistance. He took no affirmative step to violate an officer order (Bryan), did not physically resist officers (Brooks), and neither made physical contact with an officer nor tried to interfere with efforts to arrest a suspect (Mattos). His momentary failure to move farther than thirty-seven feet away from officers arresting his neighbor, . . . after merely inquiring into what those officers were doing, can hardly be considered resistance. This is especially so given evidence that Blondin was visibly frozen with fear. . . .Having determined that the right to be free from the application of non-trivial force for engaging in passive resistance was clearly established prior to 2008, we proceed to the second part of our constitutional inquiry, . . . considering a question that was not before us in Bryan or Mattos : whether it was clear in 2008 that using a taser in dart mode was non-trivial. . . . By 2008, the Tenth Circuit and a number of district courts had found taser use unconstitutionally excessive in some circumstances. Because '[a]bsent binding precedent, we look to all available decisional law, including the law of other circuits and district courts, to determine whether [a] right was clearly established,'. . . those decisions are relevant here. . . . We do not look to these cases to establish Blondin's right to be free from non-trivial force in response to his total lack of resistance—as discussed above, that right was established within our own circuit as early as 2001, such that, by 2008, it was 'beyond debate' that using non-trivial force in response to such passive bystander behavior would be unconstitutionally excessive. . . Instead, they support our determination that, though the specific level of force involved in using a taser was not clear until 2010, it was well known as of 2008 that a taser in dart mode constitutes more than trivial force. Sgt. Shelton is therefore not entitled to qualified immunity.") Gravelet-Blondin v. Shelton, 728 F.3d 1086, 1101-05 (9th Cir. 2013) (Nguyen, J., dissenting) ("The majority goes badly astray because it loses sight of the specific context of this case and employs hindsight rather than viewing the scene through the eyes of a reasonable officer. Blondin interjected himself into a rapidly-evolving, highly volatile scene: officers struggling to restrain a combative, armed man in the process of trying to take his own life. At the time Blondin was tased, two loaded firearms were unsecured. Yet, at every turn, the majority attempts to minimize the precariousness of the situation, thinly splicing the facts to assess Blondin's conduct—and the reasonableness of the officers' response—in a vacuum. It is one thing to resolve disputed facts and inferences in Blondin's favor. But the majority goes well beyond this by choosing to ignore undisputed facts which do not favor Blondin's case. By discounting the danger and abstracting the qualified immunity inquiry, the majority's approach fails to accord appropriate deference to an officer's reasonable judgment exercised under exigent circumstances. Because the majority fails to follow the Supreme Court's dictate to assess the use of force 'from the perspective of a reasonable officer on the scene, rather than with the 20/20 vision of hindsight [,]' Graham v. Connor, 490 U.S. 386, 396 (1989), I respectfully dissent. . . .Even if we assume that Sgt. Shelton's use of force was excessive, why wasn't his mistake reasonable? What precedent existed in May 2008 such that every reasonable officer would have understood that it was unlawful to tase Blondin for two seconds under these circumstances? Which case placed this constitutional question 'beyond debate' in 2008? . . . I don't know. Nor is it evident from the majority's opinion, which, rather than squarely addressing these questions, re-frames the inquiry instead. The issue here, the majority says, is whether 'the right to be free from non-trivial force for engaging in mere passive resistance was clearly established prior to 2008.'. . This formulation is wrong in two respects. First, it contravenes the Supreme Court's instruction that the qualified immunity inquiry 'must be undertaken in light of the specific context of the case, not as a broad general proposition.'. . Indeed, the Court has expressly taken us to task for failing in this regard. . . I recognize that the inquiry need not be so narrowly defined as to allow the officers to 'define away all potential claims.' . . However, by analyzing whether Blondin's right was clearly established without reference to the specific factual context, the majority not only brushes off the Supreme Court's instructions, it departs from the same cases upon which it goes on to rely. . . .Lastly, even if the majority is correct that we may look to cases which do not involve tasers, . . . framing our inquiry in terms of 'non-trivial force' still paints with too broad a brush. All 'non-trivial force' is not created alike. Here, specifically, the majority employs 'non-trivial force' to mean tasing someone for two seconds in dart mode. But 'non-trivial force' also covers, among other things, firing a lead-filled beanbag round into someone's face with enough force to gouge out their eye, fracture their cranium, and leave a lead shot embedded in their skull. See Deorle v. Rutherford, 272 F.3d 1272, 1286 (9th Cir.2001). Any reasonable officer might know that the constitution would prohibit firing a lead-filled beanbag round into Blondin's face from short range. But tasing him for two seconds? That's a much closer call. Thus, in my view, asking whether law regarding the use of 'non-trivial force' was clearly established is not a fair benchmark by which to gauge an reasonable officer's understanding of the legality of his actions. Moreover, I fail to see how the cases relied upon by the majority made the 'contours [of Blondin's right] sufficiently clear that every reasonable official would have understood that what [Sgt. Shelton did] violated that right.'. . While precedent need not be squarely on all fours, . . . we nevertheless require 'closely analogous pre-existing case law' to show that the law is clearly established. . . . Here, the cases which the majority concludes set forth clearly established law are far from closely analogous. . . .One final point. In three recent cases involving the use of tasers in dart mode, we granted officers qualified immunity upon concluding that the law was not sufficiently clear as of 2005 and 2006 to render the alleged constitutional violations clearly established. . . And, as the district court correctly recognized, '[b]y May 2008, the state of the law in this circuit was no clearer; no Supreme Court or Ninth Circuit opinion was issued in the interim.' The majority nevertheless asserts that Mattos, Brooks, and Bryan are distinguishable in 'one critical respect: Blondin engaged in no behavior that could have been perceived by Sgt. Shelton as threatening or resisting.'. . This assertion, however, is not only shaded with the benefit of hindsight, it is inconsistent with undisputed facts in the record. Blondin did engage in behavior that could have objectively been perceived as resisting, if not threatening: for fifteen seconds he refused to comply with officers' repeated orders to back away from a dangerous, volatile scene. Accordingly, Blondin's purported lack of resistance cannot justify departing from the holdings in Mattos, Brooks, and Bryan. . .In sum, I believe that the law did not clearly establish that Sgt. Shelton's conduct violated Blondin's constitutional rights. I therefore would affirm the district court's holding that the officers are entitled to qualified immunity on Blondin's excessive force claim.")

But see Gravelet-Blondin v. Shelton, 665 F. App'x 603, 605 (9th Cir. 2016) ('[T]he outcome of our earlier panel opinion does not control the outcome here. In our prior opinion reviewing the district court's grant of summary judgment for the defendants, we examined the discovery record and construed all factual disputes in Blondin's favor. . . Based on that record and the construction of facts in the light most favorable to the nonmoving party, we held that a reasonable jury could conclude that Blondin's tasing and arrest violated the Fourth Amendment. . . But now, on appeal from a jury verdict in the defendants' favor, we review a different record—the facts revealed at trial—and this time we construe them in favor of the defendants—the opponents to the present motion. . . We also ask a different question: whether a reasonable jury could find that Blondin's tasing and arrest were not in violation of the Fourth Amendment. See Johnson v. Paradise Valley Unified Sch. Dist., 251 F.3d 1222, 1227 (9th Cir. 2001). We cannot reverse the jury's determination if it is supported by substantial evidence. . .Reviewing the record at trial in the light most favorable to the defendants, we conclude that there was substantial evidence to support a conclusion that Sergeant Shelton's use of the taser against Blondin was not excessive.")

A.D. v. California Highway Patrol, 712 F.3d 446, 454, 455 (9th Cir. 2013) ("By March 23, 2006—the day that Markgraf shot Eklund—it was clearly established that a police officer, who acts with the purpose to harm unrelated to a legitimate law enforcement objective, violates the rights protected by the Fourteenth Amendment due process clause. . . .Further, because we are confined to the jury's factual finding that Markgraf acted with a purpose to cause Eklund's death unrelated to any legitimate law enforcement objective, we are essentially compelled to deny Markgraf qualified immunity—it would be 'clear to a reasonable officer' that killing a person with no legitimate law enforcement purpose violates the Constitution. . . This is one of those rare cases in which the constitutional right at issue is defined by a standard that is so 'obvious' that we must conclude—based on the jury's finding—that qualified immunity is inapplicable, even without a case directly on point. . . .Applying the principles of al-Kidd and Anderson to this case, we could not say that it is clearly established law (for purposes of qualified immunity) that whatever 'shocks the conscience' violates due process. However, the Supreme Court has defined the law of due process that governed Markgraf's conduct with more particularity. A reasonable police officer in Markgraf's position would have known that acting with a purpose to harm unrelated to a legitimate law enforcement objective (such as arrest, self-defense, or the defense of others) violates due process. Where, as here, a jury has determined that the officer acted with such a purpose, we must conclude that he violated clearly established law and deny him qualified immunity.")

Ellins v. City of Sierra Madre, 710 F.3d 1049, 1064, 1066 (9th Cir. 2013) ("The district court held that even assuming a First Amendment violation, Defendants had 'no indication' that Diaz's conduct was unlawful. The district court reasoned that there was no case law that specifically held 'that a police officer suffers a First Amendment violation when a certifying officer delays approval of an application that requires a certification of the applicant's good moral character.' However, the district court framed the inquiry much too narrowly. The question is not whether an earlier case mirrors the specific facts here. Rather, the relevant question is whether 'the state of the law at the time gives officials fair warning that their conduct is unconstitutional.'. . Viewing Diaz's actions in the light most favorable to Ellins, we conclude that she acted unreasonably in light of clearly established law. . . . [I]n light of the Supreme Court's longstanding and unequivocal precedents protecting employee speech, we conclude that a reasonable official in Diaz's position would have known that delaying Ellins's application to the P.O.S.T. program because of his union activity, which resulted in a lower salary than that to which he otherwise would have been entitled, violated Ellins's First Amendment rights; that in leading a union vote Ellins acted as a private citizen addressing a matter of public concern; and that depriving Ellins of salary in retaliation for his protected speech was unconstitutional.")

Ellins v. City of Sierra Madre, 710 F.3d 1049, 1068 (9th Cir. 2013) (Rawlinson, J., concurring in the judgment) ("The majority relies primarily upon the Seventh Circuit's decision in Fuerst v. Clarke, 454 F.3d 770, 774 (7th Cir.2006), where the court held, without any analysis, that the employee's speech as a union representative was not made as a public employee. . .The two district court cases from district courts in D.C., Baumann v. District of Columbia, 744 F.Supp.2d 216, 224 (D.D.C.2010), and Hawkins v. Boone 786 F.Supp.2d 328, 335 (D.D.C.2011) simply parroted the Seventh Circuit's ruling in Fuerst, again without any analysis. I am not confident that reliance on these cases supports concluding that Ellins was speaking as a private citizen when he criticized Chief Diaz. There is no doubt in this Circuit that whether an employee speaks as a private citizen is a question of fact rather than an issue of law. . . The record in this case is devoid of any description of Ellins's job duties. . . For all we know, Ellins's job duties could encompass his union responsibilities. . . In sum, I agree with the majority that this case should be remanded. However, upon remand all questions of fact, including whether Ellins spoke as a public employee or as a private citizen, should be resolved by the factfinder. For that reason, I concur only in the judgment affirming in part, reversing in part and remanding for further proceedings.")

Maxwell v. County of San Diego, 708 F.3d 1075, 1082, 1083 (9th Cir. 2013) ("The Sheriff's officers found Kristin facing a preexisting danger from her gunshot wound. There is evidence they affirmatively increased that danger by preventing her ambulance from leaving. This arguably left Kristin worse off than if the ambulance had been allowed to bring her to an air ambulance that had advanced medical capabilities and was ready to fly her to a trauma center. The Sheriff's officers argue that our danger creation cases are distinguishable because they did not involve first responders securing a crime scene. But 'officials can still be on notice that their conduct violates established law even in novel factual circumstances.'. . The existence of a crime scene does not change our analysis. It was irrelevant to the delay of the ambulance. The ambulance contained no witnesses or evidence apart from the victim herself and her wounds. Lowell had confessed and was in custody. The Sheriff's officers had found the gun used in the crime. The crime scene was sealed. The Sheriff's officers also argue they lacked the mens rea to be held liable under § 1983, claiming the record does not show 'deliberate indifference ... to known or obvious dangers.'. . We reject the argument. It was obvious that delaying a bleeding gun shot victim's ambulance increased the risk of death. Finally, the Sheriff's officers appear to argue that the Maxwells must show that they acted with a 'purpose to harm' Kristin since this case involved a medical emergency calling for split-second decisions. . . This contradicts their earlier recognition that the appropriate standard is one of deliberate indifference. It also nonsensically suggests that a medical emergency faced by third parties justified the decision to prevent those parties from responding to that emergency.")

Maxwell v. County of San Diego, 708 F.3d 1075, 1083, 1084 (9th Cir. 2013) ("We note there are few cases discussing the reasonability of detaining witnesses solely for investigative purposes. In most cases, the lack of on-point precedent would compel us to grant qualified immunity. . . Nevertheless, 'in an obvious case, [general] standards can "clearly establish" the answer, even without a body of relevant case law.' Brosseau v. Haugen, 543 U.S. 194, 199 (2004). This is an obvious case. Although detention of witnesses for investigative purposes can be reasonable in certain circumstances, such detentions must be minimally intrusive. . . .We conclude that the Sheriff's officers were on notice that they could not detain, separate, and interrogate the Maxwells for hours.")

Maxwell v. County of San Diego, 708 F.3d 1075, 1090, 1093 (9th Cir. 2013) (Ikuta, J., dissenting) ("The facts of this case are undeniably tragic. But despite the ill-fated sequence of events, the Sheriff's deputies who secured the crime scene did not 'violate clearly established statutory or constitutional rights of which a reasonable person would have known,'. . . by delaying the ambulance's departure for a few minutes, if at all, or detaining the Maxwells while they obtained and executed a search warrant for the Maxwells' home. Accordingly, qualified immunity protects all the deputies from suit for civil damages. . . .Instead of citing relevant case law, the majority makes the unsupported and conclusory statement that 'it was obvious' that the deputies violated Kristin's due process right to bodily security. . . But only in retrospect is it 'obvious' that the brief delay may have raised the risk that Kristin would die from her injuries. This very term, the Supreme Court reprimanded the Ninth Circuit for judging the reasonableness of officers' conduct 'with the 20/20 vision of hindsight' rather than 'from the perspective of a reasonable officer on the scene.' Ryburn, 132 S.Ct. at 992(quoting Graham v. Connor, 490 U.S. 386, 396–97 (1989)). . . . Contrary to the Court's direction, the majority's eyes here are focused on the rearview mirror. Given that Kristin's medical condition initially appeared stable and that paramedics were actively tending to her at the time of the alleged delay, the danger was not so obvious that a decision to briefly delay the ambulance shows deliberate indifference.")

Ford v. City of Yakima, 706 F.3d 1188, 1193-96 (9th Cir. 2013) ("In this Circuit, an individual has a right 'to be free from police action motivated by retaliatory animus but for which there was probable cause.' Skoog, 469 F.3d at 1235. That right was violated when the officers booked and jailed Ford in retaliation for his protected speech, even though probable cause existed for his initial arrest. Ford's criticism of the police for what he perceived to be an unlawful and racially motivated traffic stop falls 'squarely within the protective umbrella of the First Amendment and any action to punish or deter such speech ... is categorically prohibited by the Constitution.'. . .[T]he evidence must be sufficient to establish that the officers' desire to chill Ford's speech was a but-for cause of their conduct. In other words, would Ford have been booked and jailed, rather than cited and arrested, but for the officers' desire to punish Ford for his speech? . . . .Ford does not contend that police officers lacked probable cause to arrest him for violating the city noise ordinance. But Officer Urlacher's probable cause to arrest Ford does not necessarily mean that booking and jailing him was constitutional. . . While the issue of causation ultimately should be determined by a trier of fact, Ford has provided sufficient evidence for a jury to find that the officers' retaliatory motive was a but-for cause of their action, thus satisfying the causation element of a First Amendment retaliation claim for the purposes of qualified immunity. . . Taken in the light most favorable to Ford, the facts establish that the officers' alleged conduct violated his right to be free from police action motivated by retaliatory animus, even if probable cause existed for that action. . . . [T]his Court's 2006 decision in Skoog established that an individual has a right to be free from retaliatory police action, even if probable cause existed for that action. . . . Thus, Duran clearly established that police officers may not use their authority to punish an individual for exercising his First Amendment rights, while Skoog clearly established that a police action motivated by retaliatory animus was unlawful, even if probable cause existed for that action. The officers' conduct in this case falls squarely within the prohibitions of Duran and Skoog. While the precise issue of retaliatory booking and jailing has not been addressed in this Circuit, 'closely analogous preexisting case law is not required to show that a right was clearly established.'. . Duran addressed a retaliatory arrest and Skoog applied to a retaliatory search and seizure, but the unlawfulness of a retaliatory booking and jailing was nevertheless apparent from those cases. After Duran, any reasonable police officer would have known that it was unlawful to use his authority to retaliate against an individual because of his speech. Likewise, any reasonable police officer would have understood that Skoog's prohibition on retaliatory police action extended to typical police actions such as booking and jailing. Therefore, this case involved the kind of 'mere application of settled law to a new factual permutation' in which we assume an officer had notice that his conduct was unlawful. . . A reasonable officer would have understood that he did not automatically possess the authority to book and jail an individual upon conducting a lawful arrest supported by probable cause. Washington law clearly enumerates the limited factors that would allow a police officer to book and jail an individual who has been arrested for a misdemeanor. CrRLJ 2.1(b)(2). A reasonable officer would have been aware of the law governing his ability to book and jail an individual he lawfully has arrested. Moreover, a reasonable officer would have been aware that Washington law explicitly states that its rules 'shall not be construed to affect or derogate from the constitutional rights of any defendant.' CrRLJ 1.1. Thus, a reasonable police officer would have understood that he could not exercise his discretion to book an individual in retaliation for that individual's First Amendment activity.")

Ford v. City of Yakima, 706 F.3d 1188, 1197-1204 (9th Cir. 2013) (Callahan, J., dissenting) ("This case raises an issue of first impression. It is not a case of retaliatory arrest. Nonetheless, our review is informed by cases suggesting that, in order to state a claim for retaliatory arrest, a plaintiff must show a lack of probable cause for the arrest. See Reichle v. Howards, ––– U.S. ––––, ––––, 132 S.Ct. 2088, 2095 (2012) (noting that evidence of probable cause "could be thought similarly fatal to a plaintiff's claim that animus caused his arrest, given that retaliatory arrest cases also present a tenuous causal connection between the defendant's alleged animus and the plaintiff's injury"). But see Skoog v. Cnty. of Clackamas, 469 F.3d 1221, 1232 (9th Cir.2006) (noting "that a plaintiff need not plead the absence of probable cause in order to state a claim for retaliation"). The police had probable cause to arrest Ford for violating the city noise ordinance and he does not argue otherwise. . . .Ford seeks monetary damages in an action under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 based on the assertion that the police officers violated his constitutional rights when, after detaining him for violating the city noise ordinance, they decided to book him based, in part, on his post-detention statements, rather than just issuing a ticket. . . .[H]ere we are concerned not with speech that might give rise to an arrest, but with speech made after a person has been lawfully detained. This is a critical distinction. It is well settled that once an individual is lawfully detained, his or her rights may be restricted for legitimate penological and custodial reasons. . . . Accordingly, Ford's case is analogous to the situation presented in Reichle, where the Supreme Court noted that 'the right in question is not the general rule to be free from retaliation for one's speech, but the more specific right to be free from a retaliatory arrest that is otherwise supported by probable cause.'. . The Court held that it 'has never held that there is such a right.' Id. Similarly, Ford has no right not to be booked based on his post-detention statements where the booking is supported by probable cause. . . .The Supreme Court expressed a preference for requiring the showing of the absence of probable cause and approvingly cited decisions by other circuit courts requiring a showing of a lack of probable cause. . . .Rather than focus on whether an officer's action had a chilling effect on the plaintiff, the proper inquiry under cases such as Reichle is whether the officer had probable cause to book the detained individual in light of his statements. In other words, did Ford's post-detention statements give the officers reason to believe that Ford might harm himself or others, injure property, or breach the peace? . . . . If the officer has probable cause to book a detained individual based, in part, on the person's post-detention actions or statements, there is no causation; and thus, there is no cause of action for violation of a constitutional right. See Hartman, 547 U.S. at 260. The reasons underlying the Supreme Court's opinion in Reichle also require a showing of a lack of probable cause in a § 1983 action based on the plaintiff's post-detention speech. Ford's claim of retaliation presents a 'tenuous causal connection between the defendant's alleged animus and the plaintiff's injury' similar to that presented in retaliatory prosecution and arrest cases. . . . [U]nlike probable cause for an arrest or for prosecution, for which there is considerable case law, there is little judicial guidance on how to evaluate an officer's decision to book a lawfully detained individual. Thus, requiring the pleading and proving of a lack of probable cause is necessary to shield officers from being second guessed in civil actions brought by those they lawfully detained. . . . [E]ven if the statement in Skoog that a plaintiff need not plead the absence of probable cause survives the Supreme Court's statement in Reichle that it 'has never recognized a First Amendment right to be free from a retaliatory arrest that is supported by probable cause,' . . . here, the district court's finding that the officers' 'desire to cause the chilling effect' was not a 'but-for cause' of Ford's booking terminates the case, even under Skoog. . . . Even if I were to agree with the majority that Ford had a constitutional right not to have the officers consider his comments while he was detained, which I do not, I could not agree that this right was 'clearly established.' That is to say, the officers were not on notice that deciding to book Ford based, in part, on his comments while detained, violated his rights under the First Amendment. . . . [T]he extent to which Skoog itself clearly established a cause of action for alleged police retaliation despite the presence of probable cause for the officer's action is doubtful. The clarity of this rule is further muddied by the spirit, if not the holding, of the Supreme Court's subsequent opinion in Reichle, 132 S.Ct. 2088. . . . The majority states that police officers have been on notice since 1990 that it is unlawful to use their authority to retaliate against individuals for their protected speech. . . But all of the cases on which the majority relies concerned actions to arrest or to search based on individuals actions as free private persons. . . Had the officers initially detained Ford based on his speech, the majority's broad axiom might apply. But that is not what Ford alleges. He alleges only that the officers decided to book him instead of giving him a ticket based on what he said after he was legally detained. . . . Because an officer's use of a detained person's statements raise substantially different considerations from an officer's reactions to the statements of a free person, the cases cited by the majority did not reasonably put the officers on notice that in telling Ford that he had talked himself into jail, they were chilling Ford's constitutionally protected right to free speech. If we are going to impose such etiquette upon peace officers, we must first clearly so hold, and not expect them to glean such a 'vague' constitutional rule from Ninth Circuit cases that appear to be out of step, if not inconsistent, with recent Supreme Court decisions.")

Chappell v. Mandeville, 706 F.3d 1052, 1064, 1065 (9th Cir. 2013) ("We conclude that the law did not clearly establish that the conditions that Chappell experienced constituted an 'atypical and significant hardship.' At the time of Chappell's contraband watch, we had explained that the 'atypical and significant hardship' is context-dependent and requires 'fact by fact consideration,' Keenan, 83 F.3d at 1089. We confirmed this only a year after the contraband watch took place, noting that '[t]here is no single standard for determining whether a prison hardship is atypical and significant' and that analysis under this standard requires 'case by case, fact by fact consideration.'. . Indeed, we had noted prior to April–May 2002 that at least three factors from Sandin should be considered in each case: (1) whether the conditions of confinement 'mirrored those conditions imposed upon inmates in analogous discretionary confinement settings, namely administrative segregation and protective custody,' (2) the duration and intensity of the conditions of confinement; and (3) whether the change in confinement would 'inevitably affect the duration of [the prisoner's] sentence.'. .We are not aware of any court that, as of April–May 2002, had applied the Sandin test, or similar temporary, investigatory confinement, to hold that a contraband watch was an 'atypical and significant hardship' apart from the ordinary conditions of prison management. The only similar case in which we had considered a due process claim was Mendoza, where the prisoner had been placed on 'feces watch.'. . That case, however, was pre-Sandin and thus did not apply the "atypical and significant hardship" test. Id. Moreover, no other jurisdiction had applied the 'atypical and significant hardship' test to any factually similar cases before April–May 2002 either. Because there was no case law holding that contraband watch, or any similar regime, is an 'atypical and significant hardship,' and the 'atypical and significant hardship' test is so fact-specific, Mandeville and Rosario did not have fair notice on whether the conditions that Chappell experienced violated a state-created liberty interest that would trigger due process protections. Thus, Mandeville and Rosario are also entitled to qualified immunity on Chappell's due process claim.")

Chappell v. Mandeville, 706 F.3d 1052, 1057-62 & n.4 (9th Cir. 2013) ("We hold that as of April–May 2002, when Chappell was placed on contraband watch, the law was not clearly established as to whether the conditions Chappell experienced—either in isolation or combination—violated the Eighth Amendment, made applicable to the states through the Fourteenth Amendment. . . .[O]ur case law did not clearly establish that in April–May 2002 that the constant illumination of Chappell's cell was unconstitutional. . . .Since, at the time Chappell's contraband watch took place, no court had ruled on whether contraband watch constitutes a legitimate penological purpose that would justify continuous lighting, and Chappell was subjected to continuous lighting for only seven days and did not claim that he was deprived of sleep or intentionally kept awake, Mandeville and Rosario did not have fair notice that their actions were unconstitutional. Given our decision in Keenan and the decisional law in other circuits, we have some doubt that the conditions that Chappell experienced under contraband watch even amounted to Eighth Amendment violation, but we do not reach this question since, at a minimum, the law was not clearly established that the contraband watch was unconstitutional and thus Chappell's Eighth Amendment claim can be resolved on qualified immunity grounds. . . . The law was not clearly established as of April–May 2002 with regards to mattress deprivation either. . . .Viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Chappell, in addition to the continuous lighting and the mattress deprivation, Chappell alleged that he was taped into two pairs of underwear and jumpsuits, placed in a hot cell with no ventilation, chained to an iron bed, shackled at the ankles and waist so that he could not move his arms, and was forced to eat like a dog. The district court adopted the magistrate's finding that these conditions had the 'mutually enforcing effect of sleep deprivation that any reasonable officer would know comprised unconstitutional conditions of confinement.' We disagree. . . .[T]he focus of the inquiry under qualified immunity is whether the defendants had fair notice that their actions were unconstitutional. In April–May 2002, there were no cases in this jurisdiction that involved a contraband watch similar to the one that occurred here. . . .Because no court had held that conditions similar to those Chappell experienced were unconstitutional in the face of the important penological purpose of discovering contraband, we hold that Mandeville and Rosario are entitled to qualified immunity on Chappell's Eighth Amendment claim. . . .Because Mandeville and Rosario are entitled to qualified immunity, we do not consider whether these conditions amounted to an actual Eighth Amendment violation. Our holding is limited to a finding that the law was not clearly established as to whether the conditions that Chappell was subjected to, both in isolation and combination, violated the Eighth Amendment.")

Chappell v. Mandeville, 706 F.3d 1052, 1070, 1072 (9th Cir. 2013) (Berzon, J., dissenting in part) ("Whether constant illumination violates the Eighth Amendment in a particular case is a fact-specific inquiry. But contrary to the majority's suggestion, . . .officials do not enjoy qualified immunity simply because the precise facts at issue in their particular case have not been addressed previously. Officials can 'still be on notice that their conduct violates established law even in novel factual circumstances.'. . If new facts alone triggered qualified immunity, then officials would rarely if ever be held accountable in cases involving 'fact-driven' claims, such as the Eighth Amendment claim at issue here. . . We therefore must begin with what was the clearly established Eighth Amendment law regarding prison conditions at the time of Chappell's contraband watch, and then proceed to determine whether a reasonable prison official could have considered the conditions of Chappell's contraband watch constitutional in light of those precedents. In April–May 2002, it was clearly established that it is unconstitutional to cause a prisoner harm by subjecting him to constant lighting. Keenan pronounced in 1996 that '[t]here is no legitimate penological justification for requiring [inmates] to suffer physical and psychological harm by living in constant illumination.'. . .A reasonable officer would have known that, in combination, the twenty-four-hour bright light, the absence of a mattress, and the extensive bodily restraints risked depriving Chappell of sleep, in violation of the Eighth Amendment.")

Jackson v. California Dept. of Corrections and Rehabilitation, No. 12–15880, 2013 WL 681178, *1 (9th Cir. Feb. 26, 2013) (not published) ("At the time of the defendants' conduct in 2007, it was not clearly established that a cross-gender strip search in a non-emergency situation may be unreasonable. . . The fact that California law does not permit non-emergency cross-gender strip searches does not strip the defendants of their qualified immunity. . . Thus, because the state of the law in 2007 did not give the defendants fair warning of the potential unlawfulness of their conduct, they are entitled to qualified immunity.")

Mueller v. Auker, 700 F.3d 1180, 1188 (9th Cir. 2012) ("[T]he district court stated that '[t]he Court's research, and the parties' briefing do not reveal any cases which have laid out the constitutional guidelines for resolving parental [non-religious] objections to medical treatment....' Five years later, the Muellers still have not provided us with any cases specific enough to the emergency room facts and circumstances of this case to advance their cause. We have not uncovered a decision identifying a Fourteenth Amendment violation 'on facts even roughly comparable to those present in this case.' Ryburn, 565 U.S. at ——, 132 S.Ct. at 990. Nowhere can we find any clearly established law which would have required a judicial hearing before Detective Rogers or the Department of Health and Welfare took the actions that they did when facing these dangers. . . . In effect, the Muellers ask us to repeat the analytical mistake we made in Brosseau, where we approached this issue based upon general tests and abstract constitutional propositions instead of focusing on the precise factual scenario confronted by the officers. . . .Idaho law permits a police officer to place a child in shelter care without a court order when necessary to prevent serious physical injury. . . . The Muellers' late assertion in their reply brief that this law is 'obviously unconstitutional' is of no help to them on this issue, because at the time the disputed decisions were made, no clearly established law existed to that effect. Moreover, the existence of a state statute authorizing an official's disputed conduct weighs in that official's favor, so long as the statute itself does not offend the Constitution, and I.C. § 16–1612 does not.")

Marsh v. County of San Diego, 680 F.3d 1148, 1159 (9th Cir. 2012) ("As already noted, this is the first case to address the federal privacy interest in death images. While we believe the right is sufficiently grounded in federal law, we can't fault a state actor for failing to anticipate our ruling. Because it wouldn't have been 'clear to a reasonable officer that his conduct was unlawful in the situation he confronted,' . . . Coutler is entitled to qualified immunity.")

Karl v. City of Mountlake Terrace, 678 F.3d 1062, 1073-75 (9th Cir. 2012) ("We . . . consider whether existing law at the time of Caw's conduct in 2008 provided him 'fair notice' that the First Amendment prohibits retaliating against an employee for providing subpoenaed deposition testimony during another person's civil rights lawsuit. . . .Although there is no case in our circuit with the same facts as those presented here, a reasonable official in Caw's position would have known that it was unlawful to retaliate against an employee for providing subpoenaed deposition testimony in connection with a civil rights lawsuit alleging government misconduct. First, a reasonably competent official would have known that a public employee's subpoenaed deposition testimony addresses a matter of public concern when it is given in connection with a judicial or administrative proceeding involving allegations of 'significant government misconduct.'. . It has been clearly established since at least 2004 that judicial and administrative proceedings are matters of public concern when they seek to expose 'potential or actual discrimination, corruption, or other wrongful conduct by government agencies or officials.'. . Caw was therefore on notice that Wender's § 1983 action was a matter of public concern, for any reasonable official would know that unlawfully retaliating against a public employee for his protected speech activities constitutes 'significant government misconduct.' Furthermore, we have held that it was clearly established since at least 2007 that testifying pursuant to a subpoena in a judicial or administrative proceeding of public concern constitutes protected speech. . . Although none of our earlier cases specifically addressed subpoenaed deposition testimony as opposed to testimony in open court, our holdings have not been so narrowly cabined that Caw could reasonably have believed subpoenaed deposition testimony was excluded from the First Amendment's ambit of protection. . . Second, a reasonable official would also have known that a public employee's speech on a matter of public concern is protected if the speech is not made pursuant to her official job duties, even if the testimony itself addresses matters of employment. . . . Garcetti in no way altered Karl's clearly established First Amendment right to give subpoenaed deposition testimony in the Wender litigation in her capacity as a private citizen, without facing retaliation as a result. Finally, it was clearly established at the time of Caw's conduct that a subordinate officer can be liable under § 1983 for retaliating against an employee even if he also has legitimate, non-retaliatory motives. Under the 'mixed motive' analysis established by Mt. Healthy, the intensely fact-bound question is simply whether the employer 'would have reached the same [adverse employment] decision even in the absence of the [employee's] protected conduct.'. . Furthermore, we held in 1999 that 'a subordinate cannot use the nonretaliatory motive of a superior as a shield against liability if that superior never would have considered a dismissal but for the subordinate's retaliatory conduct.'. .Thus, the relevant principles were all clearly established long before the events in question, such that 'every reasonable official would have understood that what he is doing violate[d]' Karl's First Amendment right to be free from retaliation.")

Henry A. v. Willden, 678 F.3d 991, 1000-03 (9th Cir. 2012) ("In this case, the district court's qualified immunity analysis was too narrow. The district court looked at Plaintiffs' detailed factual allegations and essentially determined that Defendants were entitled to qualified immunity because the 'very action[s] in question' had not 'previously been held unlawful.'. . Instead, the district court should have (1) determined the contours of a foster child's clearly established rights at the time of the challenged conduct under the 'special relationship' doctrine of substantive due process, and (2) examined whether a reasonable official would have understood that the specific conduct alleged by Plaintiffs violated those rights. . . Using the correct analysis, we conclude that Plaintiffs have alleged violations of their clearly established constitutional rights, and the individual defendants are not entitled to qualified immunity at this stage of the litigation. . . . Having examined the relevant contours of a foster child's clearly established due process rights to adequate safety and medical care, we conclude that a reasonable official would have understood that at least some of the specific conduct alleged by Plaintiffs violated those rights. . . . It may be that Plaintiffs cannot prove these allegations, or that they can only prove some of their less serious allegations, such as the failure to provide standardized periodic health screenings. If that turns out to be the case, the individual defendants can again raise the defense of qualified immunity at a later stage in the proceedings. . . But at this stage, when we accept as true all well pleaded facts in the complaint, Plaintiffs have alleged violations of their clearly established constitutional rights, and qualified immunity is not appropriate. We reverse the district court's dismissal of the damages claims in Count One. . . . We [also] reverse the district court's dismissal of Count Two for failure to state a claim under the state-created danger doctrine. Because Tamas also held that these rights were clearly established, we reject the district court's conclusion that qualified immunity provides an alternative ground for dismissal.")

Hunt v. County of Orange, 672 F.3d 606, 615, 616 (9th Cir. 2012) ("Hunt's First Amendment right to be free from demotion for campaigning against Carona was clearly established as of June 2006. . . . However, the critical question here is whether a reasonable official in Carona's position should have known that Hunt was not a policymaker whose political loyalty was important to the effective performance of his job. . . . We conclude, like the district court, that Carona could have reasonably but mistakenly believed that Hunt's demotion was not unconstitutional, given the unique nature of his job as Chief of Police Services for the City of San Clemente. Although Hunt's position had no department-wide policy-making responsibility, influence, or control, as the jury found, Hunt exercised discretion over the implementation of OCSD policy within San Clemente, influenced OCSD policy as it affected San Clemente, and formulated plans to implement OCSD policy in San Clemente. While Hunt had to secure authority before speaking with the public, when he did so, it was on behalf of the OCSD. We have carefully analyzed the development of the policymaker exception, its underlying purpose, the high burden on the government to prove that political fidelity was a necessary requirement of Hunt's job, and balanced the nine-factor Fazio analysis that requires a fact-dependent inquiry. Even if Carona engaged in the appropriate analysis and wrongly concluded that Hunt was a policy-maker such that demoting him was constitutional, we cannot say that he acted objectively unreasonably in concluding he could demote Hunt without violating his constitutional rights.")

Rosenbaum v. Washoe County, 663 F.3d 1071, 1076-79 & n.2 (9th Cir. 2011) ("In the context of an unlawful arrest, then, the two prongs of the qualified immunity analysis can be summarized as: (1) whether there was probable cause for the arrest; and (2) whether it is reasonably arguable that there was probable cause for arrest–that is, whether reasonable officers could disagree as to the legality of the arrest such that the arresting officer is entitled to qualified immunity. . . . Framing the reasonableness question somewhat differently, the question in determining whether qualified immunity applies is whether all officers would agree that there was no probable cause in this instance. See Ashcroft, 131 S.Ct. at 2083 (holding that an official is not entitled to qualified immunity where 'every reasonable official' would have understood that he was violating a clearly established right (emphasis added) (internal quotation marks and citation omitted)). . . . The Court uses the language 'all reasonable officers' or 'every reasonable officer' to explain that it must be clear that the conduct is unlawful; qualified immunity will attach whenever reasonable officers could disagree about whether the facts in the particular case give rise to probable cause. The law does not imply, however, that police officers are the ultimate arbiters of constitutional questions. The lawfulness of their conduct does not turn on whether all, or most, officers think that the law is clearly established. For example, if the Supreme Court has issued an opinion condemning racial profiling, but 90 percent of the police in a given geographic area think racial profiling is just fine, an officer would not be entitled to qualified immunity simply because his fellow officers disagree with a clear Supreme Court ruling. . . .This is not a case where courts disagree about the contours of a constitutional right or where officers may be confused about what is required of them under various circumstances. As our analysis establishes, the statute is unambiguous, and not susceptible to the reading that the county suggests. Therefore, no reasonable officer could believe that Rosenbaum's conduct violated this statute. Considering the facts in the light most favorable to Rosenbaum, all reasonably competent officers would have agreed that he was not committing a crime. There is no scalping law in Nevada; it is simply not a crime to sell tickets to a fair–even when the tickets were received for free. His t-shirt did not suggest fraud, nor were the ticket buyers duped by the sale. The district court's grant of summary judgment on the grounds of qualified immunity for an unlawful arrest is reversed.")

Heyne v. Metropolitan Nashville Public Schools, 655 F.3d 556, 568 (6th Cir. 2011) ("Taken as a whole, the Amended Complaint's factual allegations, which we must accept as true, plausibly suggest that Manuel's ability to impartially determine the appropriate discipline in relation to the September 5, 2008 incident had been manifestly compromised–by virtue of his knowledge of and expressed concern about student discipline statistics, his instructions to faculty and staff concerning discipline of African-American students, and his reaction to communications with the parents of D.A. These are the kinds of specific facts, indicating the presence of pre-existing bias, that this Court has recognized could give rise to a valid claim for infringement of the due process right to an impartial decisionmaker in the context of student discipline. . . Viewing the allegations in the light most favorable to plaintiff Heyne, as we must, we conclude that a reasonable school official in Manuel's alleged position should have known that his impartiality was compromised and that his participation in the discipline decision-making process was not permissible. The impropriety of Manuel's alleged conduct in failing to disqualify himself should have been apparent based on Goss, Newsome, and other precedent directly on point. . . Heyne's right to an unbiased decisionmaker was thus clearly established when Manuel acted. . . Therefore, we hold that Heyne has stated a facially valid claim against Manuel under § 1983 for violating his right to procedural due process. The district court's denial of Manuel's motion to dismiss based on qualified immunity is AFFIRMED . . . . Read in the light most favorable to Heyne, the Amended Complaint contains well-pled factual allegations we must accept as true suggesting that Manuel suspended Heyne for ten days based in part on Heyne's race. Heyne's factual allegations state a plausible claim against Manuel for violation of his right to equal protection. . . Heyne's right not to be disciplined based on his race was clearly established at the time of Manuel's actions. . . Therefore, we hold that Heyne has stated a claim against Manuel under § 1983 for violating his right to equal protection. The district court's denial of Manuel's motion to dismiss based on qualified immunity is AFFIRMED.")

Dougherty v. City of Covina, 654 F.3d 892, 899, 900 (9th Cir. 2011) ("[W]hile the 'totality of circumstances' could, in some instances, allow us to find probable cause to search for child pornography, Officer Bobkiewicz's conclusory statement tying this 'subject,' alleged to have molested two children and looked inappropriately at others, to 'having in [his] possession child pornography' is insufficient to create probable cause here. . . . The law in this circuit had not been clearly established regarding whether allegations of sexual misconduct or molestation at a place of work provide probable cause to search a residence for child pornography in the absence of an explanation tying together the two crimes. Neither this court nor the Supreme Court has addressed this question. Further, as discussed supra, other Circuit Courts of Appeal have split on similar questions. . . Therefore, because the law was not clearly established at the time of the alleged events, the district court did not err in holding Bobkiewicz and the other police officers are entitled to qualified immunity.")

Ammons v. Washington Dept. of Social and Health Services, 648 F.3d 1020, 1026-34 (9th Cir. 2011) ("Courts are given the discretion to decide 'which of the two prongs of the qualified immunity analysis should be addressed first in light of the circumstances in the particular case at hand.'. . Here, it is difficult to assess whether the facts alleged by Ammons establish the alleged constitutional violation without setting forth the governing law. Therefore, we first examine the clearly established law with respect to the alleged Fourteenth Amendment violation, and then determine whether the facts before us support such a violation. . . .[A]t the time the events alleged in this case took place, it was clearly established that LaFond and Webster, as state officials, had a duty to exercise professional judgment to provide safe conditions for Ammons and the other patients at CSTC. . . .In light of the clearly established law that hospital officials must provide safe conditions for involuntarily committed patients, we now examine the circumstances under which state hospital officials may be held responsible for failing to do so. . . . Youngberg and Neely serve as pre-existing, clearly established law as to what conduct supports infringement of the Fourteenth Amendment rights of involuntarily committed hospital patients. At the time of the alleged events, then, it was clear that the actions of LaFond and Webster violated the Constitution if they ran afoul of the objective Youngberg professional judgment standard as applied in Neely. . . . Under Neely, a jury could find that a reasonable administrator, exercising professional judgment with respect to providing safe conditions, would have taken Resident A's allegation into account when assigning and supervising staff members in cottages where female patients resided. While LaFond had no cause to discipline Grant, because he had been exonerated of the molestation charge, she certainly had reason, in light of her duties with respect to the safety of her patients, to manage and monitor his duties more carefully. Instead, LaFond allowed Grant to gain unfettered and unmonitored access to the female residents, and to spend time with them on a one-on-one basis. . . . We hold that, under the facts alleged and produced, LaFond's apparent inaction and poor supervision with respect to the safety of Ammons and the other female patients support a finding that she failed to exercise professional judgment, and thereby violated the Fourteenth Amendment."[footnotes omitted])

Gerhart v. Lake County, Mont., 637 F.3d 1013, 1025 (9th Cir. 2011) ("Gerhart's constitutional right not to be intentionally treated differently than other similarly situated property owners without a rational basis was clearly established at the time his permit application was denied. . . . Because Willowbrook clearly establishes Gerhart's constitutional right to not be intentionally treated differently than other similarly situated property owners without a rational basis, we conclude that the individual Commissioners are not entitled to qualified immunity on Gerhart's equal protection claim.")

Clairmont v. Sound Mental Health, 632 F.3d 1091, 1110 (9th Cir. 2011) ("In Robinson, we held that, as early as 2005, it was clearly established that a public employee's voluntary testimony relating to discrimination was a matter of public concern. . . In light of our then existing case law, we conclude that, in 2007, it was clearly established that Clairmont's subpoenaed testimony related to an issue of public concern. In addition, as stated in Robinson, it was clearly established by 2005 that for a government employer's legitimate administrative interests to outweigh an employee's right to engage in protected speech, the disruption had to be 'real, not imagined.'. . .When we resolve all factual disputes and draw all reasonable inferences in Clairmont's favor, as we must, there is no support for Wilson's argument that Clairmont's testimony caused workplace disruption the quelling of which outweighed Clairmont's interest in engaging in protected speech. It was clearly established at the relevant time that Wilson's proffered evidence of disruption in the workplace was woefully insufficient.")

Tamas v. Department of Social & Health Services, 630 F.3d 833, 846, 847 (9th Cir. 2010) ("The Fourth Circuit in Doe held that its precedent did not clearly establish such a right because its prior cases did not involve foster children within the custody and control of the state when the state made foster care placement decisions. . . However, unlike the Fourth Circuit, we previously held in 1992 that '[o]nce the state assumes wardship of a child, the state owes the child, as part of that person's protected liberty interest, reasonable safety and minimally adequate care and treatment appropriate to the age and circumstances of the child.'. . We may also look to the law of other circuits to determine if a principle is clearly established. [collecting law of other circuits]

Based on these cases, we conclude that it was clearly established in 1996 that Appellees had a protected liberty interest in safe foster care placement once they became wards of the state.")

Community House, Inc. v. City of Boise, Idaho, 623 F.3d 945, 968-70 (9th Cir. 2010) ("It is true that when reviewing a denial of qualified immunity, 'our appellate jurisdiction is limited to questions of law.'. . However, we have power to consider qualified immunity even where facts are disputed, so long as we 'assum[e] that the version of the material facts asserted by the non-moving party is correct.'. . We have made such an assumption and thus have jurisdiction to consider the second prong of Saucier's test. It would be quite incongruous if a public official's right to an immediate appeal from a denial of qualified immunity were to evaporate simply because the district court failed or chose not to complete the required Saucier analysis. . . . [E]ven if it was clearly established that the FHA applied to Community House, a reasonable official could not have known that the single-men-only policy violated the statute. It was not until the earlier appeal that we determined what types of justifications could validate a facially discriminatory, men-only policy–an issue already subject to a circuit split. Cmty. House I, 490 F.3d at 1050. The council members questioned the BRM regarding the policy, were assured that the women could stay at the City Light shelter and that it would be safer to house men and women in separate facilities, and even verified the BRM's claims of fewer police calls. These were reasonable actions, especially considering that this court later determined that a discriminatory policy based on legitimate, non-stereotypical safety concerns would in fact pass muster under the FHA.")

Dunn v. Castro, 621 F.3d 1196, 1205 (9th Cir. 2010) ("The right at issue here is not an abstract right to familial association. By so holding, the district court erred by defining the question at too high a level of generality and evaluating that question without regard to the relevant fact-specific circumstances. Like the Court in Overton, we do not hold or imply that incarceration entirely extinguishes the right to receive visits from family members. . . Nor do we deprecate the value of the relationship between Dunn and his children. The relationship between a father or mother and his or her child, even in prison, merits some degree of protection. The pertinent inquiry in this case, however, goes beyond an ordinary father's interest in sharing a relationship with his child. It is rather whether a reasonable officer could have believed that Dunn–a lawfully incarcerated prisoner who was reasonably believed to have engaged in improper conduct with a minor–could be temporarily deprived of his visitation privileges with his own children. That constitutional question 'is by no means open and shut.'. . At the time of the challenged restriction on Dunn's visitation privileges, federal courts had held that prisoners do not have an absolute right to visitation, as such privileges are necessarily subject to the prison authorities' discretion, provided their administrative decisions are tied to legitimate penological objectives. Thus, we conclude that the right of a prisoner to receive visits from his children in the factual circumstances of this case was not clearly established in 2004, when the restriction was imposed.") Crowe v. County of San Diego, 608 F.3d 406, 429-32 (9th Cir. 2010) (second amended opinion) ("In contrast to the facts in Chavez, the prosecution of Michael and Aaron did not cease with the boys' interrogations. Rather, the boys were indicted and the case against them continued for a year, up and until the eve of trial. During this time, statements obtained during the boys' interrogations were used in several pre-trial proceedings, including a 'Dennis H. Hearing,' the grand jury proceedings, and a '707 Hearing.' Following Stoot, we hold that the use of Michael's and Aaron's statements in the pre-trial proceedings gives rise to a Fifth Amendment cause of action. . . . In summary, we hold that a Fifth Amendment cause of action against the relevant defendants arose when Michael and Aaron's coerced statements were introduced against them during pre-trial proceedings. Further, the defendants are not entitled to qualified immunity. In 1998, when defendants interrogated Michael and Aaron, the clearly established rule in this Circuit was that a § 1983 cause of action for a violation of the Fifth Amendment's Self-Incrimination Clause arose as soon as police employed coercive means to compel a statement. See Cooper, 963 F.2d at 1242; see also Stoot, 2009 WL 2973229, at *14-15) (denying qualified immunity for a similar claim). As such, defendants cannot claim the protection of qualified immunity. . . . [In addition] The interrogations violated Michael's and Aaron's Fourteenth Amendment rights to substantive due process. . . . Further, defendants are not entitled to qualified immunity because it was clearly established, at the time of the boys' interrogations, that the interrogation techniques defendants chose to use 'shock the conscience.' Defendants had the benefit of this Court's holding in Cooper, as well as Supreme Court case law directing that the interrogation of a minor be conducted with 'the greatest care,' In re Gault, 387 U.S. at 55. Just as in Cooper, here, '[q]ualified immunity is manifestly inapplicable.'").

Edgerly v. City and County of San Francisco, 599 F.3d 946, 958, 959 (9th Cir. 2010) ("We conclude that the Officers are not entitled to qualified immunity for their alleged strip search of Edgerly by visually inspecting his genitalia or buttocks. As we explained above, without reasonable individualized suspicion, a strip search like that alleged here is unconstitutional. . . The law on this point was clearly established at the time of this search: we have previously held that it was clearly established in 1989 'that it is unlawful to strip search an arrestee brought to a jail facility on charges of committing a minor offense, unless the officer directing the search possesses Aa reasonable suspicion that the individual arrestee is carrying or concealing contraband.'". . . Because Bull did not disturb our cases requiring individualized suspicion for strip searches of arrestees not classified for housing in the general jail population, Bull's overruling of Giles in no way affects our conclusion that the law was clearly established here. . . . In light of this clearly established law, no reasonable officer could have believed that the police station search, as described by Edgerly at trial, was lawful.").

Elliot-Park v. Manglona, 592 F.3d 1003, 1008, 1009 (9th Cir. 2010) ("The right to non-discriminatory administration of protective services is clearly established. . . Nevertheless, the officers argue that it wasn't clearly established that investigation and arrest are protective services. But the very purpose of section 1983 was to provide a federal right of action against states that refused to enforce their laws when the victim was black. It hardly passes the straight-face test to argue at this point in our history that police could reasonably believe they could treat individuals disparately based on their race. The officers argue that Elliott's equal protection rights weren't clearly established because she can't find a case similar to hers–like a sobriety check and arrest case or a traffic case–where the court found an equal protection violation. But there doesn't need to be a prior case with materially similar facts in order for a right to be clearly established. . . We have recognized the absurdity of requiring equal protection plaintiffs to find a case with materially similar facts. In Flores v. Morgan Hill Unified School District, we held that public school administrators who failed to respond to gay students' harassment complaints were not entitled to qualified immunity. . . . Flores found that school administrators were on notice that they had to treat gay students the same as straight students based on a case holding that state employees in general can't irrationally discriminate on the basis of sexual orientation. . . The same holds true here. It's been long established that state employees can't treat individuals differently on the basis of their race. The three officers thus had a more than fair warning that failure to investigate and arrest Babauta because of race violated equal protection.")

Stoot v. City of Everett, 582 F.3d 910, 927 (9th Cir. 2009) (amended opinion)("At the time of the interrogation, Jensen was on notice under clearly established law that if he failed to provide Paul with appropriate Miranda warnings or physically or psychologically coerced a statement from Paul, the use of the confessions could ripen into a Fifth Amendment violation. That there was some uncertainty as to precisely what 'use' in a criminal case would suffice does not matter. Qualified immunity is accorded so that reasonable officers are not deterred in carrying out their duties vigorously. . .The qualified immunity evaluation must therefore focus on an officer's duties, not on other aspects of the constitutional violation. That the allegedly coerced confession did not 'ripen' into a Fifth Amendment violation until it was 'used' against Paul in a criminal case does not change this analysis, as Jensen had no reason to believe that the statements would not be used against Paul. . . . As we have already explained in Part B above, a properly-instructed jury could find that some 'use' of Paul's statements was reasonably foreseeable to Jensen at the time of the interrogation. We thus join the Second Circuit in holding that an officer is not entitled to qualified immunity where '[a] reasonable fact finder could conclude that it was not reasonable for an officer to believe that it was constitutional to coerce a confession and then to hand that information to a prosecutor-without divulging the means by which the confession was acquired-for use in a criminal case.'").

Hopkins v. Bonvicino, 573 F.3d 752, 776 (9th Cir. 2009)(requirement that a police officer establish independent probable cause before taking individuals into custody solely on the basis of a citizen's arrest was not clearly established in 2003).

Tennison v. City and County of San Francisco, 570 F.3d 1078, 1093, 1094 (9th Cir. 2009) ("The Inspectors argue that, even if a constitutional right was violated, such a constitutional right was not clearly established in 1990. The Inspectors, however, define the right too narrowly. They argue that they did not have a duty to disclose a confession that was made after a guilty verdict was rendered, that was 'inherently unbelievable,' and that was given by someone who earlier had denied involvement in the murder. . . . The Inspectors received a Mirandized confession by someone who had been named by a reliable witness, known to the officers, who recounted events surrounding the murder in detail, and whose account contradicted that of the prosecution's witnesses. The evidence certainly 'undermines confidence in the outcome of the trial.'. .Thus, it would have been clear to a reasonable officer that such material should have been disclosed to the defense.").

Eng v. Cooley, 552 F.3d 1062, 1075, 1076 (9th Cir. 2009) ("The Defendants did not argue before the district court, and do not argue before this court now, that Eng's rights were not clearly established with respect to any speech not spoken pursuant to his official employment duties. Relying on Garcetti(decided in 2006), the Defendants assert only that 'the law was not clearly established [in 2001] as to the nature of First Amendment protection for public employee speech expressed pursuant to official job duties.' This observation is beside the point. Garcetti makes clear that if Eng's comments about the leaks to the IRS were spoken pursuant to his official job duties, then he cannot recover regardless of the state of the law in 2001, since there is no private First Amendment interest in 'speech that owes its existence to a public employee's professional responsibilities.'. . And if the statements were not spoken pursuant to Eng's job duties, the Defendants do not dispute that Eng's free speech interest was clearly established. Nor could they. Garcetti concluded only that 'work product' that 'owes its existence to [an employee]'s professional responsibilities' is not protected by the First Amendment. . . Prior to Garcetti, the Defendants therefore may have been uncertain whether the Task Force report itself was protected, but only insofar as they might reasonably have believed that it was protected when in fact it was not. There could be no confusion, however, that when Eng 'comment[ed] upon matters of public concern' 'as a citizen' and not pursuant to his job responsibilities, his speech was protected by the First Amendment–that rule had long been the law of the land. . . Thus, assuming Eng's version of the facts to be true, he had a clearly established right to comment on the leak to the IRS.. . . Geragos's and Eng's respective First Amendment interests in Geragos's speech to the press were also clearly established at the time of the alleged retaliation. The clarity of Geragos's interest in his own speech (regardless of Eng's standing to vindicate that interest) is beyond dispute. With respect to Eng's personal interest, by 2003, the right to retain and consult an attorney 'implicate[d] ... clearly established First Amendment rights of association and free speech.'. . It was also clearly established that 'an individual's First Amendment rights of association and free speech are violated when a police officer retaliates against her for retaining an attorney.'. . An individual's personal First Amendment interest in his or her lawyer's speech on his or her behalf is a natural corollary of the First Amendment right to retain counsel. . . . Although we have not previously addressed a case precisely like this one, ' Aofficials can still be on notice that their conduct violates established law even in novel factual circumstances."'. . . Because this case involved 'mere application of settled law to a new factual permutation,'. . . we conclude that Eng's personal First Amendment interest in Geragos's speech was clearly established by 2003. Denius, DeLoach, and Velazquez were sufficient to put the Defendants on notice of the common sense conclusion that the government may not retaliate against a public employee for speech spoken by the employee's lawyer on the employee's behalf.").

Foster v. Runnels, 554 F.3d 807, 815, 816 (9th Cir. 2009) ("There is no question that an inmate's Eighth Amendment right to adequate food is clearly established. . . .Cole nevertheless argues that her actions were reasonable and that because there is no Ninth Circuit authority on point, she had no way of knowing that her conduct was unlawful. These arguments are unavailing. . . . The decisions from this Circuit and others alerting prison officials of their obligations to provide inmates with nutritionally adequate meals on a regular basis should have given Cole sufficient notice of the contours of the Eighth Amendment right. Cole cannot seek shelter in the reasonableness of her actions on the basis of the July 27 memo outlining the in-cell feeding policy for Facility C. . . Indeed, the memo issued by the HDSP warden on September 12 suggests that forfeiture of meals or an activity for failing to remove coverings from all windows was never an official HDSP policy, but rather a measure temporarily implemented in Facility C. Furthermore, Cole's conduct was not reasonable because she took no other action to ensure that her obligation to provide Foster with meals was met. Consequently, she is not entitled to qualified immunity.")

CarePartners, LLC v. Lashway, 545 F.3d 867, 883, 884 (9th Cir. 2008) ("[T]he assertion of an unsuccessful defense to a violation of a constitutional right does not render the right 'unsettled' or not 'clearly established.' Notwithstanding the fact that the Soranno's Gasco court did not make a specific holding regarding the application of the 'public concern' requirement and Pickering balancing test beyond the public employee context, that panel addressed a regulated entity's precise claim of retaliation by government officials as a result of the entity's owners' public comments and petition to the courts to challenge a regulatory act. The scope of the rights at issue here were particularized enough at the time of the violation to satisfy the Saucier test for 'clearly established' law. The State employees also argue that this court should not rely on Soranno's Gasco because that decision relied in part on a causation test from the public employee context, Mt. Healthy, 429 U.S. 274, 97 S.Ct. 568, 50 L.Ed.2d 471. Far from being persuasive, this tends to bolster the argument that the public concern should not be grafted onto the regulated entity context because the Soranno's Gasco court knew of the causation test and yet decided not to apply it to the regulated entity's retaliation claim. Finally, we reject any suggestion that the State employees could have believed, 'reasonably but mistakenly,' that their conduct did not violate a clearly established constitutional right. . . The speech and petition rights at issue have been clearly established in this circuit since 1989. At least at the summary judgment stage, absent some type of extraordinary showing that is not present here, a court could hardly find that the government officials 'reasonably but mistakenly' believed that they could retaliate against a regulated entity and its owners for exercising their First Amendment rights.").

Center for Bio-Ethical Reform, Inc. v. Los Angeles County Sheriff Dept., 533 F.3d 780, 794 (9th Cir. 2008) ("Here, it was clear that the officers could not apply a time, place or manner restriction on speech to the Plaintiffs' activities around the school without advancing any significant state interest by doing so. But the officers could have made a reasonable mistake in believing that ' 626.8 applied to Plaintiffs' conduct and thus advanced a significant state interest. . .There was no case law determining whether ' 626.8 does or does not apply to the circumstances the officers faced. . . And, although we believe that our reading of the statute is one California courts would adopt, that conclusion is premised in part on the practice of avoiding unconstitutional interpretations of statutes, not solely on the language of the statute. Moreover, as we have noted, there is some question whether the heckler's veto consideration applies where the target audience consists of children. As far as we have been able to determine, there is no case law holding either that it does or that it does not. In these circumstances, we cannot conclude that the law was sufficiently clear that a reasonable officer would know that it was unlawful to request the Plaintiffs to cease driving their truck around the area.")

Center for Bio-Ethical Reform, Inc. v. Los Angeles County Sheriff Dept., 533 F.3d 780, 798 (9th Cir. 2008) ("The deputies cannot receive qualified immunity for their unreasonably lengthy detention of Kulas and Padberg. The deputies' constitutional duty to act diligently and pursue a means of investigation likely to confirm or dispel their suspicions quickly was clearly established on the date of the detention in this case. . .Moreover, it should have been readily apparent to a reasonable officer that ' 626.8 provided no basis for a detention, as no violation of the statute occurred unless the Plaintiffs stayed on the premises after being asked to leave.").

Fogel v. Collins, 531 F.3d 824, 833 (9th Cir. 2008) ("Although we have concluded that the officers violated the First Amendment when they arrested Fogel, impounded his van, and forced him to remove his message, we cannot say that existing precedents would have alerted the police officers that we would find a violation. . . . As the district court pointed out, in no case had a court held on identical or closely comparable facts that the speech was protected by the First Amendment. That is, in May 2004, when the officers acted, there was no reported case in which a person in the post-September 11 environment satirically proclaimed himself or herself to be a terrorist in possession of weapons of mass destruction. We do not, by our invocation of September 11, 2001, suggest that the First Amendment provides less protection than before September 11. Rather, we recognize that what might previously have been understood as relatively harmless talk might, in the immediate aftermath of September 11, have been understood to constitute a real threat.").

Beck v. City of Upland, 527 F.3d 853, 861, 864, 865, 870, 871 (9th Cir. 2008) ("In this instance, . . . the officers, relying on Smiddy I, maintain that they cannot be held liable for violating Beck's First or Fourth Amendment rights by arresting him, because an independent prosecutor authorized prosecution before the officers sought and obtained an arrest warrant. . . We disagree. . . . We see no reason to limit Hartman's probable cause requirement solely to First Amendment retaliatory arrest and prosecution cases. Rather, its logic extends to Fourth Amendment false arrest cases like Beck's, at least to the extent that the plaintiff must prove the absence of probable cause to rebut the presumption of independent prosecutorial judgment, when a prosecutor's actions are interposed between the actions of investigating officials and the arrest. Ordinarily, however, the plaintiff bears the burden of proving the absence of probable cause anyway in a Fourth Amendment false arrest case. Proving lack of probable cause is usually essential to demonstrating that the plaintiff's Fourth Amendment rights were violated. As a practical matter, consequently, Hartman will rarely add to the plaintiff's ultimate burden in a § 1983 false arrest case. . . . To summarize: We hold, first, that to the degree Smiddy I could be understood under our case law to apply to a First Amendment-based retaliatory arrest or prosecution cause of action, Smiddy I is inconsistent with Hartman and cannot stand. In such cases, we will not separately inquire, through application of a presumption or otherwise, into the prosecutor's actual state of mind. Instead, a showing of a 'retaliatory motive on the part of an official urging prosecution combined with an absence of probable cause supporting the prosecutor's decision' will suffice to rebut the presumption of regularity and settle the causation issue. . . Second, in any constitutional tort case, including Fourth Amendment-based cases, in which a prosecutor has instigated a prosecution, it is necessary, if not sufficient, that a plaintiff seeking to sue non-prosecutorial officials alleged to be responsible post-complaint for the arrest or prosecution show the absence of probable cause. . . . We have already explained that, on this summary judgment record, Beck was arrested in retaliation for his speech and that the arrest was without probable cause. Those explanations satisfy the first step of the qualified immunity inquiry with regard to the First and Fourth Amendment issues, and we will not repeat them here. . . All that remains is to determine whether the pertinent law was clearly established at the time of the incidents in this case. . . It was. Regarding the First Amendment cause of action: Arresting someone in retaliation for their exercise of free speech rights was violative of law clearly established at the time of Beck's arrest. . . . Regarding the Fourth Amendment cause of action: As we have discussed, the California courts limited ' 69 'threat' violations to threats of violence as early as 1984.").

Clement v. City of Glendale, 518 F.3d 1090, 1096 (9th Cir. 2008) ("Officer Young did not violate Clement's clearly established right by calling for her car to be towed. The constitutional requirement at issue–that pre-towing notice be given before a car with a valid PNO certificate may be removed from a parking lot matching the owner's address–was not clearly established at the time of Officer Young's actions. Neither the text of the Constitution nor our caselaw clearly spoke to the balance between the rights of citizens to predeprivation notice and the authority of police to enforce registration statutes. While due process generally requires notice before the government may deprive a citizen of his property, . . . our caselaw recognizes many exceptions. . . We have never held that municipalities must always notify vehicle owners before towing. In fact, our most recent decision involving municipal towing of unregistered vehicles– admittedly in a different context–found there to be no right to pre-deprivation notice. . . It would not have been unreasonable for Officer Young to have interpreted this caselaw as not requiring that notice be given before towing an unregistered vehicle with a valid PNO certificate. We affirm the district court's grant of summary judgment in favor of defendant Young.").

Inouye v. Kemna, 504 F.3d 705, 714 (9th Cir. 2007) (as amended) ("Having held, first, as we must under Saucier, that there was a constitutional violation on the facts alleged, we now turn to the question at the heart of the parties' dispute: was the pertinent Establishment Clause law 'clearly established' on this point such that a reasonable official would know that his or her conduct was illegal? . . .. We find that it was. The vastly overwhelming weight of authority on the precise question in this case held at the time of Nanamori's actions that coercing participation in programs of this kind is unconstitutional. . . . By 2001, two circuit courts, at least three district courts, and two state supreme courts had all considered whether prisoners or parolees could be forced to attend religion-based treatment programs. Their unanimous conclusion was that such coercion was unconstitutional.").

Porter v. Bowen, 496 F.3d 1009, 1026, 1027 (9th Cir. 2007) ("We conclude that the application of First Amendment doctrine to vote swapping was not clearly established in 2000 (or, indeed, until our decision today). First, no court had ever addressed the constitutionality of efforts to halt vote swapping when Jones threatened Appellants with prosecution. Jones therefore had no on-point decision to rely on when he received complaints about Appellants' websites. Second, although it is true that 'officials can still be on notice that their conduct violates established law even in novel factual circumstances,'. . . this case does not involve the mere application of settled law to a new factual permutation. To the contrary, we have had to wrestle with difficult and unsettled questions about the First Amendment interests implicated by vote swapping and the weight of the countervailing interests asserted by the State. Finally, Jones was not the only Secretary of State to determine that vote swapping was illegal under state law; so too did his counterparts in Oregon and Minnesota, on grounds similar to those cited by Jones (though the Secretaries of State of Maine, Michigan and Nebraska reached the opposite conclusion). Taking these considerations into account, we hold that Jones is entitled to qualified immunity . He did not have 'fair warning' that his actions were unconstitutional,. . . nor would a 'reasonable official' in his position have understood that threatening the owners of vote-swapping websites with prosecution constituted a violation of the First Amendment . . . .")

Preschooler II v. Clark County School Bd. of Trustees, 479 F.3d 1175, 1182 (9th Cir. 2007) ("In light of the clear constitutional prohibition of excessive physical abuse of schoolchildren, and the heightened protections for disabled pupils, no reasonable special education teacher would believe that it is lawful to force a seriously disabled four year old child to beat himself or to violently throw or slam him. Existing law plainly prohibits excessive hitting, dragging or throwing of public school children.").

Morgan v. Morgensen, 465 F.3d 1041, 1043, 1045, 1046 (9th Cir. 2006) ("[W]e hold that, under certain circumstances, dangerous prison working conditions can give rise to an Eighth Amendment claim, not-withstanding the fact that the prisoner initially obtained his specific employment assignment through a voluntary application process within the prison system. We further hold that a prison official is not entitled to qualified immunity when he orders a prisoner to continue operating prison work equipment that the official has been warned and has reason to believe is unnecessarily dangerous. . . . Regardless of how a prisoner obtains his work, once he is employed and not in a position to direct his own labor, his supervisors are not free to visit cruel and unusual punishments upon him. Morgan did not apply to work with a dangerously defective printing press. . . . For our purposes, we conclude that the evidence, viewed in the light most favorable to Morgan, shows that Canady violated Morgan's constitutional right not to be compelled to perform work that endangered his health and caused undue pain. As an initial matter, Canady argues that he is entitled to qualified immunity as a matter of law, because at the time of the alleged violation, there existed no case law in this circuit, and there was a conflict among the other circuits, as to whether a prisoner could make out an Eighth Amendment violation when he alleges that a prison official compelled him to continue working with defective prison equipment. Canady argues that given the state of the law, he could not have known that he was violating Morgan's clearly established constitutional rights. Canady's view is not entirely correct. At the time of the alleged constitutional violation, there did exist a conflict among other courts as to whether a prisoner could make out an Eighth Amendment claim when he alleged that a prison official ordered him to work with prison equipment that the official has been told is dangerously defective. . . There was, however, case law within this circuit governing prison officials' conduct in the situation that Canady confronted.")

Sissoko v. Rocha, 440 F.3d 1145, 1167 (9th Cir. 2006) ("Rocha first contends that it was not clear that the Fourth Amendment applies to aliens whose presence here is unlawful. Although Rocha is correct that no Supreme Court case has squarely held that the Fourth Amendment applies to such aliens, . . . directly on-point Supreme Court case law is not required for a right to be 'clearly established.'. . Our own case law provided Rocha with 'fair and clear warning,'. . . that immigration officers dealing with aliens whose presence here may be unlawful must be solicitous of Fourth Amendment protections.").

Kennedy v. City of Ridgefield, 439 F.3d 1055, 1066 (9th Cir. 2006) ("It is beyond dispute that in September 1998, it was clearly established that state officials could be held liable where they affirmatively and with deliberate indifference placed an individual in danger she would not otherwise have faced. This court first recognized the theory of state-created danger liability almost ten years before the events in this case in Wood. . . We have explained before that the responsibility for keeping abreast of constitutional developments rests 'squarely on the shoulders of law enforcement officials. Given the power of such officials over our liberty, and sometimes over our lives, this placement of responsibility is entirely proper.'. . We conclude that no reasonable officer in Shields's position, knowing what he knew, could have concluded that Kennedy had no right not to be placed in physical danger by his deliberately indifferent action."), reh'g en banc denied, 440 F.3d 1091 (9th Cir. 2006).

Kennedy v. City of Ridgefield, 439 F.3d 1055, 1068 (9th Cir. 2006) (Bybee, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("We have never before recognized a state-created danger cause of action on facts remotely analogous to these. In the sixteen years since we invented the state-created danger exception to DeShaney, we have approved it on fewer than five occasions. In these cases we have narrowly construed the exception to encompass only claims in which the government's act was directed toward a specific plaintiff, rather than the public at large; the government acted affirmatively, rather than simply failed to act; the government's act caused the harm, rather than merely increased the risk; and the government's action constituted deliberate indifference to the known or obvious danger, rather than mere negligence, or even gross negligence. Ignoring these elements, the majority today extends the state-created danger doctrine to a situation in which it cannot be said with any measure of confidence either that the government's act caused the plaintiff's harm or that the government acted with the requisite level of culpability. Even if I thought Officer Shields had violated our state-created danger gloss on the Due Process Clause, the violation was surely not so obvious that he should have known at the time that he was violating Kennedy's constitutional rights. Consequently, even assuming a constitutional violation, I would

Atkins v. County of Riverside, No. 03-55844, 2005 WL 2219461, at *4 (9th Cir. Sept. 14, 2005) (not published) ("Miller is not entitled to qualified immunity as to the fabrication of evidence and Brady claims. . . Devereaux holds that the right not to be subjected to criminal charges on the basis of deliberately fabricated false evidence is 'clearly established.' . . And as for the Brady claim, a police officer in 1988 should have been aware of his obligation to not withhold exculpatory evidence. [citing cases] In addition, it seems sufficiently obvious that 'common sense' would instruct a police officer to not withhold exculpatory evidence.").

Meyers v. Redwood City, 400 F.3d 765, 774 (9th Cir. 2005) ("Even if we thought that the officers crossed a line established by Harris, the officers are surely entitled to qualified immunity because they could not have known that they were violating the Plaintiffs' 'clearly established' constitutional rights. . . Even with a copy of Harris in their back pockets, the officers could not have determined at what point in the middle of this messy repossession they deprived Meyers of her property without due process of law. Meyers may have every right to be unhappy with the situation, but the officers cannot be faulted for attempting to settle this late-night confrontation peacefully. In these circumstances, it would not 'be clear to a reasonable officer that his conduct was unlawful in the situation he confronted.'").

Johnson v. Hawe, 388 F.3d 676, 685 (9th Cir. 2004) (amended opinion on denial of reh'g) ("The principles of Flora and its progeny were well-established at the time of Johnson's arrest. At the very least, these cases stand for the following two propositions: (1) 'public officers performing an official function on a public thoroughfare in the presence of a third party and within the sight and hearing of passersby [do not] enjoy a privacy interest which they may assert under the statute'; and (2) the Privacy Act may not be 'transform[ed] ... into a sword available for use against individuals by public officers acting in their official capacity.'. . Any reasonable officer should have understood these rules to preclude Johnson's arrest under the circumstances. Although Flora involved officer statements made during an arrest, no subsequent authority limited its reach to those facts. Moreover, Flora's plain language suggests a broader application sufficient to preclude Chief Nelson from arresting Johnson for recording him during the performance of his official duties in public. Moreover, in light of the many Washington cases dealing with unlawful arrests under the Privacy Act, a reasonable police officer should have been aware of the 1998 Washington Attorney General's Opinion No. 11, which determines that communications over police dispatch radio are not private. . . Finally, even if these two points were not sufficiently clear to preclude Johnson's arrest, any reasonable officer should have known under the well-established precedent of Katz that there could be no reasonable expectation of privacy in the police radio transmissions which Chief Nelson knowingly exposed to the public through his open car windows. No exigent circumstances existed in this case that could justify a reasonable mistake on the part of chief Nelson. . . Therefore defendants are not entitled to qualified immunity.").

Kwai Fun Wong v. United States, 373 F.3d 952, 970, 976 (9th Cir. 2004) ("The INS officials do not contest that Wong was entitled to constitutional protections on her return despite her brief departure. They argue only that the extent of Wong's constitutional rights was not clearly established, because she was an alien lacking entry papers upon her return. As a result, the INS officials maintain, a reasonable official would not have known that Wong was entitled to the full panoply of protections offered by the Constitution. . . . Despite the limited scope of the officials' argument, we must address to some degree the extent of Wong's entitlement to constitutional rights. Saucier counsels that we must first determine whether a constitutional right has adequately been alleged by the plaintiff before turning to the 'clearly established' prong. . . . We therefore conclude that Wong's allegations of invidious discrimination are sufficient at this pleading stage to make out a Fifth Amendment discrimination claim arising out of the INS officials' actions with respect to revocation of Wong's temporary parole status and post-return rejection of her adjustment of status applications. . . . Because of the uncertainty surrounding the constitutional status of an alien in Wong's unusual position during the period after her return, we conclude that Wong has not alleged violations of clearly established law.").

Galvin v. Hay, 374 F.3d 739, 745-47 (9th Cir. 2004) ("Plaintiffs ask us to reverse the district court's ruling that, although Baugh held that it was constitutionally impermissible to require RWHP to promise not to engage in civil disobedience in return for a permit, the law on this issue was not clearly established at the time defendants acted. We decline to do so. We agree with the district court that, before Baugh, the contours of the constitutional right violated by the defendants' denial of the permit were not 'sufficiently clear that a reasonable official would understand that what he is doing violates that right.' . . . Baugh was . . . the first case to consider whether a permit conditioned on an agreement to refrain from illegal activity imposes a valid time, place, and manner restriction in a public forum or, instead, an unconstitutional restriction on freedom of speech. . . .Baugh's conclusions have firm support in the case law relied upon. Nonetheless, there was no case at that juncture that had addressed the question whether conditioning a march permit on a promise to abide by the law when there was a history of organized civil disobedience by the same group along the same route is an insufficiently tailored manner restriction. The Park Police's determination to impose the condition, while mistaken under the First Amendment, was at the time (although it would not be now) a legal error that reasonable officials could make in light of then-existing precedents. Nor, as in Hope, where '[a]rguably, the violation was so obvious that [the Court's] own Eighth Amendment cases gave the respondents fair warning that their conduct violated the Constitution,' . . . was the invalidity of imposing the restriction at issue self-evident, even in the absence of 'fundamentally similar' precedents. . . An official charged with enforcing the trespassing law and faced with a group that had engaged in prior unlawful activity could well think that conditioning another permit on promises to refrain from unlawful acts would allow legal but not illegal activity and thus protect First Amendment rights. We conclude that the district court was correct in granting defendants' motion for summary judgment for the permit denial on the ground of qualified immunity.").

Walker v. Gomez, 370 F.3d 969, 977, 978 (9th Cir. 2004) ("Walker has not brought to our attention, and our independent research does not reveal, case law involving the particular circumstances presented by this case. The second prong of the Saucier inquiry operates at a high level of specificity. It is insufficient that the broad principle underlying a right is well-established. . . . While it is well-established that racial discrimination in the assignment of prison jobs is unconstitutional, . . . it has not been clearly established that such race-based differentiation is unconstitutional in the context of a prison-wide lockdown instituted in response to gang-or race-based violence. Defendants are therefore entitled to qualified immunity.").

Lee v. Gregory, 363 F.3d 931, 936 (9th Cir. 2004) ("[W]e do not determine whether Gregory knew or did not know he was causing the arrest of the wrong man when he turned the SDSO on to Julian. That is an issue reserved to the trier of fact at trial, if a trial takes place. We merely hold that the district court did not err in finding that the disputed facts, viewed in the light most favorable to Julian, create a triable issue of fact: whether Gregory knew he was causing the arrest of the wrong man. If established, such wrongful arrest would be sufficient to constitute a constitutional violation. We further hold that clearly established law provides notice to a reasonable officer that arresting a man pursuant to a facially valid warrant that the officer knows does not apply to the man arrested is unlawful. The district court correctly denied Gregory's motion for summary judgment made on qualified immunity grounds.").

Cox v. Roskelley, 359 F.3d 1105, 1113 (9th Cir. 2004) ("Defendants knew or should have known that there would be 'some public disclosure' of the charges contained in the termination letter of a public employee embroiled in a dispute of public interest. By 1998, it was clearly established that such public disclosure meant that the procedural protections of due process applied. . . . . In combination, Roth, Vanelli, Mustafa, Buxton, and the operation of Washington's public disclosure law preclude a viable 'head-in-the-sand' defense on the part of County officials. We reiterate that, even in the absence of a Ninth Circuit case directly on point, government officials may still be fairly warned of potential constitutional deprivations. . . Here, however, there is much more than Buxton; because of the public disclosure provisions of state law, our own cases such as Vanelli plainly informed Defendants of their obligations. . . Accepting as true Cox's assertion that the Notice of Termination in his personnel file contained stigmatizing information and, in light of Washington law mandating disclosure of all materials contained in an employee's personnel file, we hold that placement of the Notice of Termination in Cox's personnel file without a name-clearing hearing violated Cox's due process rights under the Fourteenth Amendment. We further hold that the contours of the right to a name-clearing hearing upon placement of stigmatizing material in a personnel file were clearly established, such that a reasonable official in these defendants' position would have known that his conduct was unlawful.").

Vance v. Barrett, 345 F.3d 1083, 1092, 1094 (9th Cir. 2003) ("The utter lack of precedent and standards is dispositive that the law concerning an unconstitutional condition predicated on a procedural due process claim in a prison setting was not clearly established. The prison officials are thus entitled to qualified immunity for Vance's unconstitutional conditions claims. . . .Although Vance's retaliation claim is similar to his unconstitutional condition claim, our past precedent is much more developed in this area.. . . .Although there was no precedent specifically on point for the due process claim, our precedent is clear that prison officials could not retaliate against inmates for the exercise of their constitutional rights.").

Serrano v. Francis, 345 F.3d 1071, 1080, 1081 (9th Cir. 2003) ("Serrano has alleged both that he possesses a protected liberty interest in his being free from restraint in a unit that is not designed for disabled persons and that Francis violated his constitutional right to have live witness testimony at the hearing. Accordingly, he has checked off the list both components of his claim for the purposes of the first prong of the qualified immunity analysis. . . Thus, we proceed to the second Saucier prong–the 'purely legal' issue of whether the law at the time of the alleged constitutional violation was clearly established. . . We conclude that it was not. . . .this court has never before addressed the contours of the initial component of Serrano's claim–whether a disabled inmate's freedom from restraint in a facility that is not designed for disabled persons may, as a matter of law, constitute a protected liberty interest. . . . With regard to the conditions of administrative segregation for disabled inmates, the contours of the protected liberty interest have not been determined with sufficient specificity that Francis had fair warning that his levying of the punishment via failing to allow live witness testimony would deprive Serrano of his constitutional right to be free from this type of restraint. . . Although we need not look to a case with identical or even 'materially similar' facts to determine whether Francis had fair warning, . . . we note that no case in this circuit touches on the proper conditions for the liberty interest rights of disabled inmates in administrative segregation. We have discussed disabled inmates' rights in the context of Eighth Amendment claims [citing cases]. . . . And the Supreme Court has discussed disabled inmates' rights in the context of Americans with Disabilities Act claims.[citing Yeskey] But we have never discussed disabled inmates' rights in the context of claims involving protected liberty interests. . . . Although we note that the prison failed miserably in providing adequate facilities for the disabled Serrano during his spell in solitary confinement, we cannot hold Francis liable for a constitutional violation, the contours of which had never before been fleshed out. Those contours are fleshed out as of today. Accordingly, although we find deplorable the conditions under which Serrano was kept following Francis' decision, we will affirm the dismissal of the due process claim under Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 12(b)(6) on the basis of qualified immunity.").

Meredith v. Erath, 342 F.3d 1057, 1063 (9th Cir. 2003) ("At the time of the search, July 10, 1998, it was not clearly established in this (or any other) circuit that simply handcuffing a person and detaining her in handcuffs during a search for evidence would violate her Fourth Amendment rights. .. Our decision today makes it clear that such conduct, absent justifiable circumstances, will result in a Fourth Amendment violation. . . . [A] reasonable agent in Erath's position would have known, in July 1998, that to place and keep Bybee in handcuffs that were so tight that they caused her unnecessary pain violated her Fourth Amendment right to be free from an unreasonable seizure.").

Martinez v. City of Oxnard, 337 F.3d 1091, 1091, 1092 (9th Cir. 2003) ("We return to this case following remand from the United States Supreme Court. In 2001, we affirmed the district court's grant of summary judgment denying qualified immunity to Sergeant Ben Chavez. Martinez v. City of Oxnard, 270 F.3d 852 (9th Cir.2001) ('Martinez I'). We entertained at that time only the interlocutory appeal from the district court's denial of qualified immunity to Chavez. The Supreme Court reversed our holding Chavez was not entitled to qualified immunity because Martinez had a Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination regardless of whether his statements were used against him in criminal proceedings, Chavez v. . Martinez, 123 S.Ct. 1994, 2001, 2007 (2003); however, the Court left open the possibility that Chavez's coercive interrogation of Martinez violated his then clearly established due process rights under the Fourteenth Amendment. Id. at 2008. We hold that, if the facts as alleged are proven true, it did. Accordingly, Chavez is not entitled to qualified immunity on Martinez's Fourteenth Amendment substantive due process claim. . . .If Martinez's allegations are proven, it would be impossible not to be shocked by Sergeant Chavez's actions. A clearly established right, fundamental to ordered liberty, is freedom from coercive police interrogation.").

Bingham v. City of Manhattan Beach, 341 F.3d 939, 947, 948 (9th Cir. 2003) ("Schreiber contends that the district court failed properly to address the 'clearly established' prong. He posits a novel twist to the 'clearly established' inquiry, contending that because it is not clearly established that damages may be obtained under § 1983 for an unlawful traffic stop, qualified immunity should apply. This argument misunderstands the second part of the qualified immunity inquiry. The question is whether the constitutional right, not the right to damages under § 1983, is clearly established in law. . . . The qualified immunity cases are not concerned with whether there exists a body of case law known to the officer regarding whether or what type of damages are available for the violation of a person's constitutional rights. Rather, in determining whether qualified immunity is available, those cases merely inquire whether the right at issue was clearly established in law. It has been settled law since the 1970's that in order for a police officer to initiate an investigatory stop of a motorist, there must at least exist reasonable suspicion that the motorist is engaging in illegal activity. . . . Accordingly, we affirm the district court's denial of Schreiber's motion for summary judgment on qualified immunity grounds with respect to the traffic stop.") Flores v. Morgan Hill Unified School District, 324 F.3d 1130, 1137 (9th Cir. 2003) ("As early as 1990, we established the underlying proposition that such conduct violates constitutional rights: state employees who treat individuals differently on the basis of their sexual orientation violate the constitutional guarantee of equal protection. . . It is not necessary to find a case applying the principle to a particular category of state officials, such as school administrators. The defendants were officers of the state who had fair warning that they could not accord homosexual and bisexual students less protection on account of such students' sexual orientation.").

Ganwich v. Knapp, 319 F.3d 1115, 1125 (9th Cir. 2003) ("It may be argued that judges should not expect police officers to read United States Reports in their spare time, to study arcane constitutional law treatises, or to analyze Fourth Amendment developments with a law professor's precision. We do not expect police officers to do those things. We do, however, expect officers to think twice before embarking on a course of conduct, such as the one here, that is unusual, unfair, and unduly coercive. When the officers seized the plaintiffs, with no probable cause to arrest them, and then used the threat of continued incommunicado detention to coerce them to submit to police interrogation, the officers exceeded the generous leeway that the qualified immunity doctrine allows.").

Franklin v. Fox, 312 F.3d 423, 443 (9th Cir. 2002) ("Although we are bound by the court's holding in Franklin v. Duncan that Franklin suffered a Sixth Amendment deprivation, we conclude that a reasonable official in Murray's position could have believed that his actions did not violate Franklin's Sixth Amendment rights. As the Supreme Court stressed in Saucier v. Katz, '[t]he concern of the immunity inquiry is to acknowledge that reasonable mistakes can be made.' 533 U.S. at 205. By virtue of the decisions in Franklin v. Duncan, it is now a matter of clearly-established law in this circuit that facilitation of an interrogation such as that provided by Murray is unlawful. At the time Murray acted, however, an official may have reasonably believed the opposite to be true.").

Rudebusch v. Hughes, 313 F.3d 506, 517, 518 (9th Cir. 2002) ("Although Rudebusch has established an equal protection violation, we must still ask whether a 'reasonable official' in Hughes' position 'would understand that what he is doing violates that right,' Saucier, 533 U.S. at 201, keeping in mind that 'officials will not be liable for mere mistakes in judgment, whether the mistake is one of fact or one of law.'. . With this perspective in mind, we conclude that Hughes is entitled to qualified immunity. Our conclusion rests on a single factor–timing. The law in this area was not clearly established at the time Hughes made his decision nor did Hughes have the benefit of post-decision analyses and information. We start with the proposition that at the time of the decision, the general rules were well enough established, for example, that the Fourteenth Amendment requires all racial classifications to survive strict scrutiny. . . But the specific contours of the law pertaining to pay equity were not well developed or sufficiently clear at the time.").

Cruz v. Kauai County, 279 F.3d 1064, 1069, 1070 (9th Cir. 2002) ("Dela Cruz has not met his burden of proving that the right allegedly violated here was 'clearly established' at the time of the alleged violation. The right violated here, according to the complaint and evidence favorable to Dela , was the Fourth Amendment right not to have a prosecutor, in order to obtain a bail revocation, personally attest to a false statement of a biased source with no investigation of the statement's truth or falsity. Unfortunately for Dela Cruz, he has not cited any case that establishes such a right, nor is it self- evident. The situation is not one that appears to have been addressed, even tangentially, in the case law. . . .Because there was no clearly established right at the time Soong acted, an objectively reasonable person in Soong's position could not have known that he may have been acting in violation of Dela Cruz's rights by appending his own affidavit reciting the complaint of a third person to the bail revocation application, without having investigated the truthfulness of the third party's assertions. Consequently, Prosecutor Soong is entitled to qualified immunity.").

Devereaux v. Abbey, 263 F.3d 1070, 1074, 1075 (9th Cir. 2001) ("Undertaking the first step of the two-step qualified immunity inquiry, we are persuaded that there is a clearly established constitutional due process right not to be subjected to criminal charges on the basis of false evidence that was deliberately fabricated by the government. Perhaps because the proposition is virtually self-evident, we are not aware of any prior cases that have expressly recognized this specific right, but that does not mean that there is no such right. Rather, what is required is that government officials have 'fair and clear warning' that their conduct is unlawful.").

Navarro v. Block, 250 F.3d 729, 733, 734 (9th Cir. 2001) ("[T]he explicit holding of Trevino II is clear: local legislators who implement their state-created power to indemnify police officers from punitive damage awards in good faith on a discretionary, case-by- case basis are entitled to qualified immunity. . . .This much is clear after Trevino II and Cunningham: local legislators are not entitled to qualified immunity if they implement their state-created power to indemnify police officers from punitive damage awards in bad faith.").

Robinson v. Prunty, 249 F.3d 862, 867 (9th Cir. 2001) ("Robinson's evidence paints a gladiator-like scenario, in which prison guards are aware that placing inmates of different races in the yard at the same time presents a serious risk of violent outbreaks. The defendants' awareness of and indifference to this risk is demonstrated by the alleged frequency with which such outbreaks occur, by the alleged jokes made by the guards to Robinson before they released a Mexican-American inmate into the yard with him, and by the alleged fact that guards failed to intervene while Robinson was attacked by another inmate. We agree with the district court that if Robinson's gladiator-like scenario is true, then no reasonable prison official could have believed that his or her conduct was lawful. We therefore hold that the district court did not err in denying qualified immunity to the defendants.").

Cunningham v. Gates, 229 F.3d 1271, 1293 (9th Cir. 2000) ("Plaintiffs contend that since Trevino the law has been clearly established that a policy of indemnifying punitive damage awards violates constitutional rights. The Cunningham/Soly incident occurred nearly one year before we decided Trevino. As a matter of chronological necessity, it was not clearly established before or at the time of the Cunningham/Soly incident that voting to indemnify officers against punitive damage awards could violate constitutional rights. Thus, even assuming that these decisions somehow promoted the alleged use of excessive force in the Cunningham/Soly incident, the council members are clearly entitled to qualified immunity for lawsuits based on pre-Trevino decisions to indemnify officers against punitive damage awards.").

Devereaux v. Perez, 218 F.3d 1045, 1053, 1055 (9th Cir. 2000) ("After reviewing relevant case law, we conclude that there is no constitutional due process right to have child witnesses, in a child sexual abuse investigation, interviewed in a particular manner or pursuant to a certain protocol.

Devereaux has failed to show that the state defendants violated a constitutional right that is sufficiently particularized so that a reasonable official would understand that any due process right was violated. . . . Here, the underlying substantive constitutional right–whatever that might be–must in some way balance the rights and interests of the legal guardians (whether parents or foster parents), the child, and the public. The need to subject this abstract substantive constitutional right to a balancing test which weighs the interest of a parent against the interests of the child and the state makes the qualified immunity defense difficult to overcome, especially in light of the requirement that the substantive constitutional right be 'clearly established' at the time of the alleged violation.").

Devereaux v. Perez, 218 F.3d 1045, 1060 (9th Cir. 2000)(Kleinfeld, J., dissenting) ("The basis for the majority decision, a requirement of case law telling social workers how to interview children in a sex abuse case, is . . . an excessive demand for specificity. Sometimes officials lack qualified immunity despite the absence of a case in point, as in Lanier, and sometimes they enjoy qualified immunity despite the presence of a case in point, where the law is undeveloped or conflicting. . .The test is not whether there is case law, but whether the conduct violates 'clearly established statutory or constitutional rights of which a reasonable person would have known.'. . . The presence or absence of case law bears on whether the right is clearly established, but is not necessarily determinative either way.").

Diruzza v. County of Tahama, 206 F.3d 1304, 1313, 1314 (9th Cir. 2000) ("Under Elrod and Branti, decided by the Supreme Court in 1976 and 1980, and under Ninth Circuit case law decided prior to 1995, it was clearly established that a non-policymaking public employee in a sheriff's office is protected from retaliation for the exercise of First Amendment rights. While neither the Supreme Court nor this court has previously ruled on deputy sheriffs in Tehama County, such a ruling is not necessary. . . . It was thus clearly established, at the time defendants acted, that deputy sheriffs were not per se policymakers in California. . . It was clearly established, as a matter of law, that the actual duties performed by a deputy sheriff determined whether he or she was a policymaker and therefore subject to partisan dismissal, or a non-policymaker and therefore protected from such dismissal.").

Diruzza v. County of Tahama, 206 F.3d 1304, 1318 (9th Cir. 2000) (O'Scannlain, J., dissenting) ("Despite the fact that the Supreme Court's reasoning in this area has shifted, that the circuits are split on the question, and that the four Article III judges who have examined the very question in this case are equally divided on whether the First Amendment protects DiRuzza's disloyalty, the court concludes that the Sheriff and Undersheriff could have known in 1995 that DiRuzza had a clearly established right not to be fired under these circumstances.").

LSO, Ltd. v. Stroh, 205 F.3d 1146, 1157, 1158, 1160 (9th Cir. 2000) ("Not surprisingly, the parties propose rather different formulations of the right at issue in this case. LSO contends that the right at issue is 'the right to be free from content-based discrimination.' The Officials state that the issue is whether there was law clearly establishing that they 'would violate LSO's freedom of expression by advising LSO of the existence of the ABC regulations, and further advising that said regulations apply to conduct on ABC-licensed premises.' LSO's proposed formulation is too general . . . . Likewise, the Officials' formulation is too particularized. . . . Our goal is to define the contours of the right allegedly violated in a way that expresses what is really being litigated. In this case we are not called upon to decide if, in 1997, the Government generally had the power to censor speech based on content, or whether an official generally could inform someone of the existence of a particular state law without violating the First Amendment. . . . Instead, the Officials argue that they could reasonably have believed in 1997 that liquor regulations were subject to an exception to the general rules of the First Amendment, such that LSO's right to display artwork that violated Section 143.4 on the premises of an ABC licensee was questionable. Thus, we are asked to decide whether, under the circumstances, it was clear that LSO had the right to exhibit non-obscene art on the premises of an ABC licensee free of interference from state officials, even though some of the art fell within the proscriptions of a state liquor regulation governing expressive content at licensed establishments. . . . We conclude that in 1997 no reasonable official could have believed that Section 143.4 could constitutionally be employed to impede LSO's right to display non-obscene art on the premises of an ABC licensee.").

South v. Gomez, No. 99-15976, 2000 WL 222611, at *1 (9th Cir. Feb. 25, 2000) (not reported) ("Battalino claims that he is entitled to qualified immunity because inmates suffering from gender dysphoria (more commonly known as transsexualism), such as South, have no clearly established right to female hormone therapy. Battalino attempts to define the right at issue too narrowly. Our precedents make clear that with respect to prisoner medical claims, the right at issue should be defined as a prisoner's Eighth Amendment right 'to officials who are not Adeliberately indifferent to serious medical needs.'". . . We have repeatedly rejected attempts by defendants to define the right allegedly violated with greater specificity.").

Schwenk v. Hartford, 204 F.3d 1187, 1203-05 (9th Cir. 2000) ("In Mitchell's view, he cannot be held liable under the GMVA unless there is a Ninth Circuit opinion (or, presumably, a Supreme Court opinion) holding: (1) that the statute in question is constitutional; and (2) that the statute applies specifically to the sexual assault on a male to female transsexual state prison inmate by a male prison guard. . . . Mitchell is not entitled to qualified immunity from Schwenk's GMVA claim on the basis of the absence of a court opinion confirming the statute's constitutionality. . . . [A]lthough we now hold that a violation of state laws regarding rape or sexual assault necessarily constitutes a violation of the GMVA regardless of the actor's motivation, state of mind or emotions, we also hold that the law regarding gender motivation and animus was not clearly established at the time of the assault. Accordingly, we find that Mitchell is entitled to qualified immunity with respect to Schwenk's GMVA claim.").

Kelly v. City of Oakland, 198 F.3d 779, 784, 785 (9th Cir. 2000) ("A federal right to be free of same-sex harassment in the form of a hostile environment had not been established in the period 1989-1994. Consequently, neither Wirkkala nor the City can be held liable under § 1983 or § 1985. However, Kelly's case against McNab rested also on his claim that McNab bargained with him by offering a better official evaluation in return for sexual favors. Evidence of this bargaining was afforded by Kelly's testimony and was sufficient to prove quid pro quo harassment. . . The federal right to be free from such demeaning demands was clear without need for a specific holding by a court that such conduct violated an employee's civil rights. Where unlawfulness is apparent, qualified immunity does not exist.").

California Attorneys for Criminal Justice v. Butts,195 F.3d 1039, 1049, 1050 (9th Cir. 1999) ("The defendants next contend that their reliance on training and training materials entitles them to qualified immunity. The district court rejected this argument holding that 'following orders' will only insulate officers from liability when 'reliance is objectively reasonable.'. . . The fact that Los Angeles and Santa Monica may have trained their police to violate the rights of individuals does not provide any defense for these officers. Their policy contradicts the safeguards provided by Miranda, and, at the very least, is in direct conflict with Cooper. . . . Furthermore, training officers that inadmissible statements may nevertheless be used for impeachment purposes hardly sanctions this tactic of routinely and intentionally ignoring requests to speak to an attorney. For all of the reasons set forth in the preceding section of this opinion, a reasonable police officer should have known that this conduct was improper and violated the rights of McNally and Bey, whether or not the conduct was endorsed by training materials."), as amended on denial of reh'g and reh'g en banc (Jan. 8, 2000).

B.C. through Powers v. Plumas Unified School District, 192 F.3d 1260, 1268 (9th Cir. 1999) ("When the dog sniff in this case occurred, it was not clearly established that the use of dogs to sniff students in a school setting constituted a search. As such, the unlawfulness of defendants' conduct 'in light of preexisting law,' was not 'apparent.'").

Brewster v. Bd. of Ed. of Lynwood Unified School Dist., 149 F.3d 971, 983, 987 (9th Cir. 1998) ("[A]s is the case with respect to public-employee free speech claims, . . . because procedural due process analysis essentially boils down to an ad hoc balancing inquiry, the law regarding procedural due process claims 'can rarely be considered "clearly established" at least in the absence of closely corresponding factual and legal precedent.' [cites omitted] Indeed, without specific direction from cases applying it, the Mathews standard is perhaps even less amenable to the discovery of clearly established law than are the Pickering test and other multifactor balancing tests that arise in constitutional jurisprudence. . . . [N]owhere is the uncomfortable coexistence of balancing tests and Harlow's 'clearly established rights' standard more apparent than in this case, in which a plaintiff laid claim to two separate constitutional rights, each of which depends upon an ad hoc weighing of competing interests. Because we conclude that neither Brewster's First Amendment rights under Pickering nor his procedural due process rights under Mathews were 'clearly established,' as required by Harlow, the school officials are entitled to immunity from monetary damages.").

Moran v. State of Washington, 147 F.3d 839, 847 & n.5 (9th Cir. 1998) ("Because the underlying determination pursuant to Pickering whether a public employee's speech is constitutionally protected turns on a context-intensive, case-by-case balancing analysis, the law regarding such claims will rarely, if ever, be sufficiently 'clearly established' to preclude qualified immunity under Harlow and its progeny. We are certainly not the first to recognize this self-evident tenet of qualified immunity jurisprudence. . . . And today we join the chorus of voices from other circuits that have specifically observed the difficulty of finding clearly established law under Pickering. . . . We are certainly not endorsing a per se rule today; we recognize that there will be the occasional case in which existing case law is so closely on point that the law relating to a public-employee-speech claim might be said to be clearly established. Nor are we suggesting a formal evidentiary 'presumption' that somehow increases a public employee's burden of showing that the law under Pickering is clearly established in her favor. We are merely observing that, as a simple matter of logic, the context-specific, fact-intensive nature of the Pickering inquiry will generally preclude the law regarding public-employee-speech claims from being sufficiently clearly established to defeat qualified immunity.").

Watkins v. City of Oakland, 145 F.3d 1087, 1092-93 (9th Cir. 1998) ("Watkins argues that at the time of the incident the law governing the use of excessive force was clearly established. Officer Chew would confine the issue more narrowly to whether there was clearly established law at the time of the incident that the use of 'bite and hold' by police dogs constituted excessive force. Following our prior decision in Chew, we agree with appellants that Oakland's 'bite and hold' policy did not violate clearly established law concerning the use of excessive force at the time of the incident. . . . However, Watkins makes a different claim of excessive force than that described by Officer Chew. He argues that the duration and extent of force applied in effecting arrest after the officers caught up with Nero [the police dog] amounted to an unconstitutional application of force. . . . We agree that it was clearly established that excessive duration of the bite and improper encouragement of a continuation of the attack by officers could constitute excessive force that would be a constitutional violation. Therefore, we affirm the district court's denial of qualified immunity to Officer Chew on summary judgment.").

Oona, R.S., by Kate S. v. McCaffrey, 143 F.3d 473, 477 (9th Cir. 1998) ("In Petaluma, when we held that the school officials' duties were not clearly established in 1990, we noted the Supreme Court's 1992 Franklin decision and recognized that the result might well be different in a claim of immunity for conduct that occurred after Franklin was decided. Because Franklin was decided in February 1992, and the conduct here complained of began in October 1992, this is such a case. The holding adumbrated by the majority in Franklin is required today: Title VII standards apply to hostile environment claims under Title IX. We expressly recognized that hostile environments include peer harassment in Ellison v. Brady, 924 F.2d 872, 878 (9th Cir.1991). Accordingly, we hold that the defendants are not entitled to immunity for their failure to take steps to remedy the hostile environment created by the male students in Oona's class.").

Hyland v. Wonder, 117 F.3d 405, 411-12 (9th Cir. 1997), amended and reh'g en banc denied, 127 F.3d 1135 (9th Cir. 1997) ("Appellees insist that because there was no previous Ninth Circuit case involving a volunteer, no reasonable official would have known that the action of firing Hyland violated the First Amendment. The Supreme Court and our case law do not require that degree of specificity. . . . It was clearly established in 1988 that the government could not take action against an individual who. . . received a valuable benefit analogous to employment, because that individual exercised his First Amendment right to speak out on a matter of public concern.").

Somers v. Thurman, 109 F.3d 614, 622 & n.5 (9th Cir. 1997) ("[I]t is highly questionable even today whether prison inmates have a Fourth Amendment right to be free from routine unclothed searches by officials of the opposite sex, or from viewing of their unclothed bodies by officials of the opposite sex. Whether or not such a right exists, however, there is no question that it was not clearly established at the time of the alleged conduct. Because Somers's lawsuit seeks only monetary damages, not injunctive relief, we do not decide whether such a right exists. . . . This is not to say that an abusive cross-gender visual body cavity search was per se reasonable under the Fourth Amendment in 1993 or today. . . . [T]he purposeful subjection of prisoners to verbal assaults during strip searches performed by officials of the other sex serves no administrative purpose and might present a question under the Fourth Amendment. We need not wrestle with this question today because Somers' conclusory allegations fail to describe conduct that is sufficiently abusive to strip the officials of their qualified immunity.").

Blueford v. Prunty, 108 F.3d 251, 255 (9th Cir. 1997) ("To whatever extent it may be 'clear' today that a plaintiff may base a federal harassment claim on conduct perpetrated by a person of the same gender, courts were undecided on the issue at the time of [Defendant's] alleged conduct. Moreover, that [Plaintiff's] purported right existed is not the only reasonable conclusion one must have drawn from the extant authority.").

Carnell v. Grimm, 74 F.3d 977, 979 (9th Cir. 1996) ("[A]t the time of the alleged misconduct in this case, persons in custody had the established right to not have officials remain deliberately indifferent to their serious medical needs. The defendants argue that the right in question was phrased too broadly, and instead should be whether arrested rape victims have a clearly established right to receive immediate medical and psychological treatment. We do not agree.").

Kelley v. Borg, 60 F.3d 664, 666-67 (9th Cir. 1995) ("The magistrate judge in this case held that the right allegedly violated was a prisoner's right, under the Eighth Amendment, to have prison officials not be 'deliberately indifferent to serious medical needs.' . . . He further found that this right was clearly established. Appellants argue that the magistrate judge defined the right too broadly. They believe that the proper characterization of the right at issue is: '[D]id plaintiff, after complaining about foul smells, have a clearly established right, then or now, for defendant correctional officers to immediately remove him from his cell in the Security Housing Unit during a lock down, when they first were required to at least inform their superior officer that they needed to remove an inmate, be it any inmate, from his cell?' We believe that the magistrate judge correctly defined the right at issue. Appellants 'misapprehend the level of generality at which a law must be clearly established.' Appellants are correct that broad rights must be particularized before they are subject to the clearly established test. . . . What Appellants fail to realize, however, is that the right at issue in the present case has already been particularized. The magistrate judge did not ask whether the Eighth Amendment generally is clearly established. He asked whether Eighth Amendment rights in the prison medical context are clearly established. And he correctly found that they are. Under the Eighth Amendment, prisoners have a right to officials who are not 'deliberately indifferent to serious medical needs.'To hold that the magistrate judge should have defined the right at issue more narrowly, and included all the various facts that Appellants recited in their proposed definition, would be to allow Appellants, and future defendants, to define away all potential claims.").

Doe v. Petaluma School District, 54 F.3d 1447, 1451 (9th Cir. 1995) (not clearly established at time that school administrator had duty to prevent peer sexual harassment.).

Browning v. Vernon, 44 F.3d 818, 823 (9th Cir. 1995) ("[Defendants] argue for a rule where every violation of a duty must be litigated at least once in a case involving the exact factual circumstances as those presently involved before the official may be held liable for violating that duty. Anderson v. Creighton, however, holds that it is not necessary that a prior decision rule 'the very action in question' unlawful to deny a defendant the protection of qualified immunity.").

Grossman v. City of Portland, 33 F.3d 1200, 1209-10 (9th Cir. 1994) ("As with most legal matters, there are no absolutes here. On the one hand, an officer who acts in reliance on a duly-enacted statute or ordinance is ordinarily entitled to qualified immunity. [footnote omitted] On the other, as historical events such as the Holocaust and the My Lai massacre demonstrate, individuals cannot always be held immune for the results of their official conduct simply because they were enforcing policies or orders promulgated by those with superior authority. Where a statute authorizes official conduct which is patently violative of fundamental constitutional principles, an officer who enforces that statute is not entitled to qualified immunity. Similarly, an officer who unlawfully enforces an ordinance in a particularly egregious manner, or in a manner which a reasonable officer would recognize exceeds the bounds of the ordinance, will not be entitled to immunity even if there is no clear case law declaring the ordinance or the officer's particular conduct unconstitutional. [citing Chew] In the end, however, an officer who reasonably relies on the legislature's determination that a statute is constitutional should be shielded from personal liability.").

Franklin v. Foxworth, 31 F.3d 873, 879 (9th Cir. 1994) (Reinhardt, J., concurring) ("Specific precedent declaring the particular conduct involved unlawful is not required in order to foreclose a qualified immunity defense; rather, the 'law' in question need only be sufficiently clear that a reasonable official would not fail to perceive it .... [E]ven in the absence of relevant case law, if the manner of implementation of an otherwise constitutional policy is not only unconstitutional but clearly so, the officer 'will be deemed to have violated "clearly established statutory or constitutional rights of which a reasonable person would have known."'quoting Chew and Harlow).

Chew v. Gates, 27 F.3d 1432, 1449-50 (9th Cir. 1994) ("[W]e do not mean to suggest...that officers will be entitled to qualified immunity if they authorize the use of a new weapon or tactic which violates constitutional norms, simply because there is no case stating that the specific weapon or tactic involved violates the Constitution... [I]f new weapons or tactics are sufficiently similar in design, purpose, effect, or otherwise to weapons or procedures that have been held unconstitutional, so that a reasonable officer would have known that a court's holding of unconstitutionality would be extended to the new weapon or tactic, then qualified immunity will not apply. Similarly, even if a policy is longstanding and no case has declared it unconstitutional, officers authorizing its continued use will not be entitled to qualified immunity after a case has authoritatively declared unlawful other procedures that are not 'meaningfully distinguishable.' ...Finally, we do not mean to suggest that all actions taken pursuant to a longstanding policy are necessarily immunized. An officer who unlawfully implements an official policy or ordinance in an egregious manner or in a manner which clearly exceeds the reasonable bounds of the policy is not entitled to qualified immunity, whether or not there is a case on point declaring such actions unconstitutional. . . [E]ven in the absence of relevant case law, if the manner of implementation of an otherwise constitutional policy is not only unconstitutional but patently so, the officer will be deemed to have violated 'clearly established statutory or constitutional rights of which a reasonable person would have known.'").

Figueroa v. United States, 7 F.3d 1405, 1413 (9th Cir. 1993) ("While we acknowledge that a broader understanding of deprivation of liberty may have emerged later . . . we hold that in 1987 there was no clearly established constitutional right not to be placed in a position of danger by a government employer absent some sort of governmental restriction on an individual's physical freedom to act to avert potential harm.").

Camarillo v. McCarthy, 998 F.2d 638, 640 (9th Cir. 1993) ("[Plaintiff] argues that it was clearly established at the time he was segregated in the HIV unit that prison inmates have First Amendment rights, including freedom of association. [Plaintiff] misconstrues the level of generality at which a law must be 'clearly established.' . . . . The relevant, properly particularized question, . . . is whether it was clearly established that inmates are entitled to be free of prison regulations that restrict their association with members of the general prison population.").

Redmond v. San Jose Police Dep't., No. 14-CV-02345-BLF, 2017 WL 5495977, at *11, *13 (N.D. Cal. Nov. 16, 2017) ("As of April 17, 2013, the date of the incident in question, the constitutional right to be free from retaliation while recording police activity in a public place was clearly established in the Ninth Circuit. Fordyce, 55 F.3d at 439. This is because the First Amendment protects a 'right to film matters of public interest.' Fordyce v. City of Seattle, 55 F.3d 436, 439 (9th Cir. 1995). A majority of other circuits agree. [citing cases] Therefore, on the day in question, Redmond had 'a clearly established right to record police officers carrying out their official duties.'. . Even crediting Defendants' contention that Officer Pfiefer had non-retaliatory justifications to arrest Redmond for her failure to obey his commands, the law is clearly established in the Ninth Circuit that there is a right to be free from retaliation even if the officer had probable cause to arrest. . . Accepting, as the Court must, Redmond's contention that Officer Pfiefer grabbed her phone and punched her in an attempt to stop her from recording, a reasonable officer would have known that he cannot retaliate against a citizen for recording the police in a public place, even if the officer was also acting to protect the safety of officers or to arrest her based on probable cause. . . In light of Fordyce, which Redmond relies on in her opposition, no reasonable officer under the circumstances would believe that Officer Pfiefer's alleged actions were lawful under the First Amendment. . . . According to Redmond, she was a bystander who was recording the police, from a safe distance, as they tackled and arrested her boyfriend. That Officer Pfiefer contends Redmond was 'a suspect' who was threatening as she approached the officers with her arm outstretched, presents a factual dispute for the jury to determine before qualified immunity can be resolved. Redmond's right to record the officers—under the circumstances that she testifies to—was clearly established. Accordingly, Defendants' motion for summary judgment as to the retaliation claim against Officer Pfiefer is DENIED.")

Geier v. Davis, No. 16-CV-01980-JSC, 2017 WL 1133219, at *2 (N.D. Cal. Mar. 27, 2017) ("The Ninth Circuit recently held that the First Amendment prohibits prison officials from opening a prisoner's mail from his attorney outside of the prisoner's presence. Hayes v. Idaho Dept. Corrections, No. 14-35078, slip op. at 14, 2017 WL 836072 (9th Cir. Mar. 3, 2017) (agreeing with other circuits). The question, therefore, is whether that law was clearly established when Plaintiff's mail from his attorney was opened in November 2014 and June 2015. The answer is no. '[A] right is clearly established only if its contours are sufficiently clear that "a reasonable official would understand that what he is doing violates that right." In other words, "existing precedent must have placed the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate."'. . . A court determining whether a right was clearly established looks to 'Supreme Court and Ninth Circuit law existing at the time of the alleged act.'. . In November 2014 and June 2015 there were no decisions from the United States Supreme Court or the Ninth Circuit holding that the opening or reading of mail from an attorney to a prisoner in the prisoner's absence violates the prisoner's First Amendment rights. . . . The Ninth Circuit did not resolve the question of whether that violated Plaintiff's First Amendment rights until this month. Although the issue had been resolved in other circuits, . . . a prison official working within the Ninth Circuit could reasonably think that whether the First Amendment required the inmate's presence when opening mail from the inmate's lawyer was not 'beyond debate' because the Ninth Circuit and Supreme Court did not require the inmate's presence either when opening mail from the inmate's attorney or from a court. Because the First Amendment right was not 'clearly established' in November 2014 and June 2015, Defendants are entitled qualified immunity on Plaintiff's First Amendment claim.")

Borges v. City of Eureka, No. 15-CV-00846-YGR, 2017 WL 363212, at *10 (N.D. Cal. Jan. 25, 2017) ("For the purposes of the qualified immunity analysis, defendants argue in their motion that, '[t]o the extent any [constitutional] violation is found to have occurred, such a violation would not have been clearly established and qualified immunity should apply.'. . Defendants offer no further support for this argument. However, in their supplemental briefing, defendants note that, 'particularly with respect to plaintiff's Fourth and Fourteenth Amendment denial of medical care claims against the County [officers], the case law is not clearly established,' which the Court interprets as an attempt to support their earlier argument that there was no clearly established constitutional right that could have been violated. . .Defendants' arguments fail to persuade. While the legal standard to evaluate such conduct may be unclear, the nature of the constitutional violation is not. See Hope v. Pelzer, 536 U.S. 730, 741 (2002) (holding that the state of the law need only be sufficiently clear to give defendants fair notice their conduct was illegal). Here, just as in Castro, '[t]he contours of the right required only that the individual defendants take reasonable measures to mitigate the substantial risk to [the decedent].'. . Thus, the officers' obligations did not change, even though the court in Castro was (and is also here) applying a new, objective 'deliberate indifference' standard to the analysis of the Fourteenth Amendment claim. . .A reasonable officer would have known that ignoring serious signs of medical distress would violate a detainee's constitutional rights, regardless of which legal standard is ultimately applied to analyze the violation. Therefore, qualified immunity does not bar the claim against the County officers.")

Bremer v. Cty. of Contra Costa, No. 15-CV-01895-JSC, 2016 WL 6822011, at *6, *11 (N.D. Cal. Nov. 18, 2016) ("The Ninth Circuit has not yet addressed whether Kingsley's objective standard also applies to pretrial detainee's suicide claims; before Kingsley, it had left open the question of whether the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments required a different analysis in suicide claims. See Lolli, 351 F.3d at 419 n.6. In the papers, Defendants argued that the subjective standard applies and Plaintiff did not contend otherwise. But at oral argument, Plaintiff for the first time contended that the objective standard applies. . . .The Court need not decide whether the subjective or objective standard applies here as no reasonable jury could find the Individual Defendants were deliberately indifferent under either standard. . . .Even if the right at issue is stated broadly for the purposes of argument—i.e., the right of a suicidal pretrial detainee to be free from deliberate indifference by not being fed without constant monitoring—Plaintiff identifies no precedent clearly establishing it. In fact, Plaintiff does not cite a single case in their opposition to Defendants' qualified immunity argument. Nor did Plaintiff identify any authority at oral argument. The Court's own search did not reveal any cases, either. . . Because Plaintiff cannot show that David had a clearly established right to be constantly monitored when given food or otherwise, the deputies are entitled to qualified immunity on Plaintiff's Section 1983 claims.")

Austin v. Univ. of Oregon, No. 6:15-CV-02257-MC, 2016 WL 4708540, at *4–5 (D. Or. Sept. 8, 2016) ("Plaintiffs assert that they had a right to due process prior to potential deprivation of a property interest in their status as admitted university students in good standing, their ability to pursue public higher education and athletic participation, the economic benefit from an existing scholarship, a hypothetical future scholarship at another school, and future potential NBA careers. . . While the right to due process is 'clearly established,' the same cannot be said of the proposed interests, whether they be characterized as property or liberty interests, at issue in this case, as they have no parallels 'beyond debate' in relevant precedent. The parties dispute whether there exists such precedent here, but the answer is clear: there is no Supreme Court, Ninth Circuit, or Oregon District Court case that, at the time of the events giving rise to this case, clearly establishes the property rights Plaintiffs assert, nor is there any apposite statute establishing the same. While Plaintiffs point to a number of out-of-district cases that, at best, indirectly establish such a right, the parties correctly turn their focus to one Ninth Circuit case, Stretten v. Wadsworth Veterans Hosp., 538 F.2d 361 (9th Cir. 1976) (an appointed and employed medical resident had an interest in his position and continued education derived therefrom), and one Supreme Court case, Goss v. Lopez, 419 U.S. 565, 95 S. Ct. 729 (1975) (a junior high school student had a right to not be subject to a prolonged suspension, based on an Ohio education statute), which arguably come the closest to recognizing these rights. I find that Goss does not clearly establish the rights asserted here, given that it involved middle school public education under a relatively broad Ohio state statute establishing a right to such education. . . There is no analogous Oregon law applicable to college education that would create a corollary to Goss in this case. Turning to Stretten, I find that case can only arguably be interpreted to confer a right similar to that at issue. While I agree that Stretten is the more analogous of the two cases, as it involves a right to higher education, I find that it is sufficiently distinct so as to fall short of the 'beyond debate' standard articulated in Al-Kidd. Namely, the medical resident from Stretten was appointed to a four-year position but terminated allegedly without process after only one. The Ninth Circuit found that the plaintiff in that case had an interest in keeping his position to maintain his income, complete his residency, continue to benefit from the education derived from the residency, and protect his professional reputation. . . Here, the Plaintiffs are unpaid college student athletes who were denied the renewal on the subsequent term of their otherwise renewable one-year scholarships, from which they benefited the full promised year. Given the stark contrast between the rights conferred and then withdrawn in Stretten and those alleged in the case at hand, I find that Plaintiffs have failed to plead a clearly established constitutional right for the purposes of a qualified immunity analysis. Because there is no relevant precedent that clearly establishes the proposed constitutional rights at issue, per the standard articulated in Al-Kidd, 563 U.S. at 741, the Individual Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity from the due process claims asserted against them. Further, because those claims are asserted only against the Individual Defendants in this case and therefore do not survive against the University, the due process claims are DISMISSED with prejudice.") Engert v. Stanislaus Cnty., No. 1:13-CV-00126 LJO, 2015 WL 3609315, at *18 (E.D. Cal. June 8, 2015) ("The question is whether the present case and earlier cases are sufficiently similar that Paris and Glinskas would have had fair warning that their actions were unlawful. . . Here, the evidence, viewed in a light most favorable to Plaintiffs, reveals two officers who affirmatively cleared an unarmed civilian to participate in an eviction, despite the existence of information suggesting, among other things, that the occupant might be violent and might possess high-powered weapons. The Court finds that, taken together, Woods and Grubbs I put Defendants on notice that their conduct was potentially unlawful. These cases stand for the proposition that officials may not take affirmative actions to place a civilian into a dangerous situation where common sense indicates a high risk of serious harm. Here, if Plaintiffs' facts are accepted, Defendants did just that by inviting Engert to begin drilling the front door. Viewing the facts in a light most favorable to Plaintiffs, this case cannot meaningfully be distinguished from Woods and *Grubbs I.*Contrary to Defendants' assertions, this case does not present a mere 'qualm' with law enforcement strategy akin to that addressed in Johnson. There, the Ninth Circuit found the danger creation exception could not apply because there was no evidence of an affirmative act. . . Here, as discussed above, at least one additional affirmative act took place-inviting Engert to the door of the Property. Existing Ninth Circuit precedent put Paris and Glinskas on notice that this conduct could trigger Fourteenth Amendment liability. Paris's and Glinskas's motion for summary judgment that they are entitled to qualified immunity as to Plaintiffs' Fourteenth Amendment claim therefore is DENIED. This denial is without prejudice to appropriate post-trial motions, depending on factual findings by the jury.")

Nawabi v. Cates, No. 1:13-CV-00272-LJO-SA, 2015 WL 2414682, at *27-28 (E.D. Cal. May 20, 2015) ("The Court finds no binding precedent, and lower court cases are unclear, on when or if it would be a violation of an inmate's Eighth Amendment rights to be housed in an area where Valley Fever is prevalent. While Plaintiff alleges that he was subjected to Cruel and Unusual Punishment by being housed in areas where Valley Fever is prevalent, at least a million individuals live in the San Joaquin Valley and are exposed to Valley Fever. Similarly, tens of thousands of individuals live, work, and raise families in the areas that are the most endemic. Neither the State of California nor the federal government have implemented any standards or restrictions on exposure to Valley Fever. Similarly, there have been no recommendations issued to any sector of the general public to relocate out of the area. Prison officials could reasonably believe that since the government has not found it unsafe for non-imprisoned individuals to reside in areas in which Valley Fever spores are prevalent that it would not violate the Eighth Amendment to incarcerate inmates in these same areas. . . Finally, it is clear that even for those individuals that are at a higher risk from Valley Fever, exposure to Valley Fever is a risk that society tolerates. The Seventh Circuit found it would be inconsistent to find that prisoners are entitled to a healthier environment than substantial numbers of non-imprisoned Americans. . . More than half of the individuals who reside in the endemic areas belong to the racial groups which Plaintiff identifies as high risk. . .The Court finds that it is not beyond debate whether housing inmates in prisons in areas endemic for Valley Fever, a naturally occurring soil-borne fungus which can lead to serious illness, would violate their rights under the Eighth Amendment. . . For the reasons stated, the Court finds that the right alleged here is not clearly established. Defendants did not have fair notice that exposing inmates to an environmental risk of Valley Fever would violate the Eighth Amendment. . . Therefore, the Court finds that Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity on Plaintiff's claims arising out of being housed at a prison where they were exposed to Valley Fever. . . It is recommended that Defendants' motions to dismiss on the ground that they are entitled to qualified immunity be granted.")

Garcia v. City of King City, No. 14-CV-01126-BLF, 2015 WL 1843944, at *3 (N.D. Cal. Apr. 8, 2015) ("Though the Court is unaware of a case in which a court expressly holds that a police chief cannot receive personal financial gain from the unconstitutional actions of his subordinates - unconstitutional actions he allegedly ratified and approved—'[c]ertain actions so obviously run afoul of the law that an assertion of qualified immunity may be overcome even though court decisions have yet to address "materially similar" conduct.' Hope v. Pelzer, 536 U.S. 730, 753 (2002) (emphasis added). . . . The acts pled by Plaintiffs in the SAC so obviously run afoul of the law that Defendant Baldiviez would not be entitled to qualified immunity were they proven true. Any reasonable police officer, let alone the police chief, would have known that such conduct violates the Constitution.")

Am. Humanist Ass'n v. United States, 63 F.Supp.3d 1274, 1286-87 (D. Or. 2014) ("Defendants argue that they are unaware of any Supreme Court precedent or circuit court decision issued before or during the period where the alleged violation occurred that has held that Humanism is a religion for the purposes of the Establishment Clause, However, as noted above, the Supreme Court in Torcaso, referred to 'Secular Humanism' as a religion. . . Moreover, in McCreary County, Ky. v. American Civil Liberties Union of Ky., the Supreme Court said that the touchstone of the Establishment Clause was the 'principle that the First Amendment mandates government neutrality between religion and religion, and between religion and nonreligion.'. . Thus, whether Humanism is a religion or a nonreligion, the Establishment Clause applies. In addition, the Seventh Circuit has held that a prison violated inmates' constitutional rights when it refused to allow an Atheist study group on the grounds that it was not a religion. Kaufman v. McCaughtry, 419 F.3d 678 (7th Cir.2005). This year, the Seventh Circuit laid it out even more clearly, 'when making accommodations in prisons, states must treat atheism as favorably as theistic religion,' and that, '[w]hat is true of atheism is equally true of humanism, and as true in daily life as in prison.' Ctr. for Inquiry, Inc. v. Marion Circuit Court Clerk, 758 F.3d 869, 873 (7th Cir.2014). Although this decision was issued after the alleged violations occurred, the court does not find the Seventh Circuit's opinion to be revelatory or a departure from existing doctrine. Rather, the court simply summarized the law as it is commonly understood. Thus, the court finds that the right was clearly established and that defendants have not presented sufficient evidence to demonstrate that the individual defendants are entitled to qualified immunity.")

Estate of Hernandez-Rojas ex rel. Hernandez v. United States, 62 F. Supp. 3d 1169, 1184 (S.D. Cal. 2014) ("In sum, the record shows that Vales was on notice that the use of a Taser as a pain compliance device on an individual who was already knocked to the ground, was handcuffed, and compliant had a substantial risk of death or serious bodily injury. Viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to Plaintiffs, Vales had 'fair warning' that the force he used, multiple deployments of the Taser, was constitutionally excessive even absent a Ninth Circuit case presenting the same set of facts.")

Kirby v. City of East Wenatchee, No. 12–CV–190–JLQ, 2013 WL 2396008, *1, *2 (E.D. Wash. May 31, 2013) ("Defendants' Motion to Reconsider asks the court to re-think what it has already spent many hours on when it issued its ruling. First, Defendants contend that the Supreme Court decision authored by Justice Scalia in [al-Kidd] 'reformulated' the standard for the second prong of the qualified immunity analysis 'going from "a reasonable official standard to an "every reasonable official" rule.'. . Defendants suggest that this reformulation strengthens their position and was misapplied by the court. Notably, this court's decision quoted and applied the rule set forth in al Kidd. While it is not clear whether al Kidd actually changed any longstanding legal rules, if it did, it did so without comment. Confirming this court's belief that al Kidd did not alter

the standard, the Supreme Court's more recent statement of the definition of 'clearly established' is as follows:

[t]o be clearlystablished, a right must be sufficiently clear that every reasonable official would [have understood] that what he is doing violates that right. In other words, existing precedent must have placed the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate.... [T]he right allegedly violated must be established, not as a broad general proposition, but in a particularized sense so that the contours of the right are clear to a reasonable official.

Reichle v. Howards, —— U.S. ——, 132 S.Ct. 2088, 2093–94, 182 L.Ed.2d 985 (2012) . . . The Reichle decision applies the 'a reasonable official' standard, whereas there is no further mention of the 'every reasonable official' language in the opinion. . . The court has applied the proper standard.")

Price v. City of Sutherlin, 945 F.Supp.2d 1147, 1157 (D. Or. 2013) ("While defendants are correct that, prior to the events in question, neither the Supreme Court nor the Ninth Circuit had fully examined an officer's use of a Taser, it was nonetheless clearly established that 'force is only justified when there is a need for force.'. . Viewing the facts in the light most favorable to plaintiff, a reasonable officer would have had 'fair warning' that the use of painful, albeit non-lethal, force to restrain or subdue a non-threatening, nonresistant, unarmed suspect was excessive. . . Therefore, defendants' motion is denied as to plaintiff's excessive force claim.")

De Contreras v. City of Rialto, 894 F.Supp.2d 1238, 1252, 1255, 1256 (C.D. Cal. 2012) ("The Supreme Court recently emphasized the high burden that must be met for a plaintiff to overcome qualified immunity, replacing Anderson's language of 'a reasonable official' with 'every reasonable official' and stating that 'existing precedent must have placed the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate.' Ashcroft v. al-Kidd, 131 S.Ct. 2074, 2083 (2011) (emphasis added). The Supreme Court has also held that, 'in an obvious case, [the Graham standards for excessive force] can clearly establish the answer, even without a body of relevant case law' and that 'officials can still be on notice that their conduct violates established law even in novel factual circumstances.' Hope v. Pelzer, 536 U.S. 730, 738, 741 (2002). . . . The Eleventh Circuit has recently held that police officers using a taser were not entitled to qualified immunity where no threat, or escape, was imminent. Fils v. City of Aventura, 647 F.3d 1272, 1289, 1292 (11th Cir.2011). Nevertheless, the Supreme Court's opinion in al-Kidd appears to require us to hold that because there was no established case law recognizing taser use as excessive in similar circumstances, immunity is required. . . . The incident at issue here occurred in August 2010, before the Ninth Circuit's final decisions in Bryan, Brooks, or Mattos, the cases providing the most extensive and recent guidance on tasers as a use of force. Hence, the Court finds that Lee is entitled to qualified immunity because the law regarding a second application of a taser, after a first application that was objectively reasonable, was not then clearly established. Specifically, it was not clearly established how firing a taser at a threatening suspect affects the degree of threat that every reasonable officer would perceive after that first tasing. In fact, despite the many ways in which multiple tasings, particularly in the incapacitating dart mode, would appear to shift the Graham balance to weigh against reasonableness, the Ninth Circuit has given this factor only brief consideration. . . . Of the more recent Ninth Circuit cases, only Brooks concerned multiple taser applications, and that was in the context of a taser in drive-stun mode. . . As the applicable law regarding the reasonableness of Lee's use of force was not clearly established at the time of the injury, Officer Lee is qualifiedly immune. In light of this finding, the Court declines to determine whether a jury could find reasonably that Lee violated De Contreras's Fourth Amendment rights. Therefore, the Court grants summary judgment in favor of Defendant Lee on De Contreras's Fourth Amendment claim.")

Fazaga v. F.B.I. , 885 F.Supp.2d 978, 984, 985 (C.D. Cal. 2012) ("The Agent Defendants are not entitled to dismissal of Plaintiffs' FISA claim based on qualified immunity. Plaintiffs have pleaded sufficient facts to demonstrate that, taken in the light most favorable to them, they are 'aggrieved persons' and that the Agent Defendants violated a clearly established statutory right created by FISA. FISA constitutes clearly established law governing electronic surveillance, including that of the kind engaged in by the Agent Defendants. Sections 1809 and 1810 clearly prohibit 'the installation or use of an electronic, mechanical, or other surveillance device in the United States for monitoring to acquire information, other than from a wire or radio communication, under circumstances in which a person has a reasonable expectation of privacy and a warrant would be required for law enforcement purposes,' 50 U.S.C. § 1801(f), "under color of law except as authorized by [FISA], chapter 119, 121, or 206 of Title 18 or any express statutory authorization that is an additional exclusive means for conducting electronic surveillance under section 1812 [of FISA].'. . The Agent Defendants argue that they are entitled to qualified immunity because it was not clearly established that Plaintiffs were 'aggrieved persons.' Specifically, the Agent Defendants argue that Plaintiffs did not have a clearly established reasonable expectation of privacy with respect to the situations in which they were electronically surveilled. The Court disagrees. FISA's 'aggrieved person' status is coextensive with standing under the Fourth Amendment for claims involving electronic surveillance. . . Thus, the law regarding the reasonable expectation of privacy in the Fourth Amendment context governs here and is clearly established. . . .A reasonable officer knows that there is a reasonable expectation of privacy in one's home, office, and in certain discrete areas of a mosque as described in the FAC. . . .")

Jackson v. CDCR Employees, No. 1:07–cv–01414–LJO–SKO PC, 2012 WL 443850, at *9 (E.D. Cal. Feb. 10, 2012) ("The Ninth Circuit's most recent decision in Byrd represents a sharp departure from Somers, and reasonable government officials will be wise to note that departure. In as much as the Ninth Circuit has now held that non-emergency cross-gender strip searches are unconstitutional as a matter of law, it is perhaps only the unwise who will continue to risk participating in or permitting the practice of routine, non-emergency, cross-gender strip searches, regardless of prison staffing concerns, including equal employment opportunity concerns. Nevertheless, the Byrd decision was issued in 2011. In 2007, at the time of the events at issue here, Somers was controlling and directly on point with respect to routine body cavity searches of male inmates by female officers. The Court finds that in 2007, the pre-existing law did not give Defendants fair warning that it was unlawful to occasionally conduct routine cross-gender strip searches and it necessarily follows that it was not clearly established that the less direct participation of searching inmates' clothing and providing security coverage from the gun tower during these searches was unconstitutional. Accordingly, the Court finds that Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity on Plaintiff's Fourth Amendment claim against them." footnotes omitted)

Brawley v. Washington, No. C09-5382RJB, 2010 WL 1816654, at *11, *12 (W.D. Wash. May 3, 2010) ("Plaintiff has made a sufficient showing that by April of 2007 shackling inmates while they are in labor was clearly established as a violation of the Eighth Amendment's prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment. Defendants admit that Washington Department of Correction's own policy prohibited it. Although not binding authority, the Eight Circuit recently held that a female inmate's 'protections from being shackled during labor had ... been clearly established by decisions of the Supreme Court and the lower federal courts before September 2003.' Nelson v. Correctional Medical Services, 583 F.3d 522, 533 (8th Cir.2009). . . . As in Nelson, a reasonable factfinder could determine from the record in this case that the Defendants were not facing an emergency situation but nevertheless 'subjected [the Plaintiff] to a substantial risk of physical harm, to the unnecessary pain caused by the [shackles] and the restricted position of confinement ... [and] created a risk of particular discomfort and humiliation,' such that qualified immunity should be denied.")

Shilling v. Crawford, 536 F.Supp.2d 1227, 1234, 1235 (D. Nev. 2008) ("Despite a plaintiff's apparent ability to sue any person acting under color of state law, the United States Court of Appeals for the Eleventh Circuit recently held RLUIPA does not permit claims against officials in their individual capacities because construing RLUIPA to allow such suits would raise serious constitutional concerns. Smith v. Allen, 502 F.3d 1255, 1275 (11th Cir.2007). The Eleventh Circuit noted that Congress passed RLUIPA pursuant to its under Article I of the Constitution. . . The Court reasoned that federal statutes enacted under the spending power, which condition receipt of federal funds on a state's adherence to certain conditions, cannot subject a non-recipient of federal funds, such as a state official acting in his individual capacity, to private liability for damages. . . Thus, the Court reasoned that, as spending power legislation, RLUIPA cannot reach state officials in their individual capacities. . . Because only suits against individuals in their personal capacities implicate qualified immunity, the Eleventh Circuit held that qualified immunity would have no application to RLUIPA claims. . . The Eleventh Circuit is the only Circuit Court of Appeals that squarely has addressed this issue. Other Circuit Courts of Appeals have assumed without discussion that RLUIPA permits suits against state officials in their personal capacities. [citing cases] Plaintiff has sued Defendants in their official and individual capacities. No law in this jurisdiction directly addresses Plaintiff's ability to sue Defendants in their individual capacities under RLUIPA. . . Under the Eleventh Circuit's analysis, Plaintiff would have no individual capacity claim. The Court need not decide this novel issue here, however, because even if Plaintiff could bring an individual capacity claim under RLUIPA, Defendants would be entitled to qualified immunity. . . . That an inmate has a constitutional right to 'food sufficient to sustain them in good health that satisfies the dietary laws of their religion' is clearly established in the Ninth Circuit. . . The issue here is whether Plaintiff had a clearly established right under RLUIPA to a kosher diet at HDSP, such that requiring him to transfer to a higher security prison to obtain the diet violated his clearly established right. Defendants offered Plaintiff a kosher diet at ESP in April 2004. Plaintiff has identified no law supporting the existence of a clearly established right to a dietary accommodation at a particular institution. Plaintiff also has failed to identify any controlling law as of April 2004 indicating Defendants' attempt to satisfy Plaintiff's request for a kosher diet by transferring him was unlawful under RLUIPA. In light of the lack of legal precedent on this issue, it would not have been clear to a reasonable official in April 2004 that offering Plaintiff a transfer to a higher security prison to accommodate his religious diet would violate Plaintiff's rights under RLUIPA. Defendants therefore are entitled to qualified immunity from Plaintiff's RLUIPA claim. Even if Plaintiff properly can assert a claim against Defendants in their individual capacities under RLUIPA, Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity . This Court therefore will grant summary judgment in Defendants' favor.").

Thomas v. Baca, 2007 WL 2758741, at *15 (C.D. Cal Sept. 21, 2007) ("Although Rutherford and Thompson go far in establishing a clear right against floor-sleeping, Thompson involved an inmate who had neither bed nor mattress, and the court criticized that prison condition on Fourteenth Amendment grounds. Further, neither case speaks to the length of time LASD may allow inmates to wait to receive a bunk while still comporting with constitutional standards. Therefore, it was not unreasonable for Sheriff Baca to believe that the presence of a mattress cured any constitutional defect, and not to realize that floor-sleeping violated the Eighth Amendment as well as the Fourteenth. Accordingly, the Court finds that Sheriff Baca is entitled to qualified immunity and grants summary adjudication on that issue for Defendant in his individual capacity.")

Freitag v. California Dept. of Corrections, 2007 WL 1670307, at *5 (N.D. Cal. June 6, 2007) (on remand) ("Defendants. . . argue that Ceballos created such a change in the law that Defendants Ayers and Schwartz are entitled to qualified immunity on Freitag's First Amendment claim. The Court rejects this argument. . . The only rights at issue in this case that were not clearly established in light of Ceballos were a public employee's rights regarding speech made in the course of performing his or her official duties. Ceballos did not change the long-standing right of a public employee to speak out on matters of public concern as a citizen, as long as that right was not outweighed by the government's interests in suppressing such speech. . . Prior to Ceballos, there may have been some uncertainty regarding the legality of retaliating against a public employee who spoke as part of his or her official job responsibilities on a matter of public concern; however, there was no uncertainty–nor is there any now, following Ceballos–that a public employee speaking as a citizen on a matter of public concern is entitled to the protections of the First Amendment (unless the employer is justified in restricting such speech due to factors, such as disruption of the workplace, not present here). Ceballos did not establish a new right; it only narrowed the scope of an existing one. Freitag's First Amendment right to contact the director of the CDC, a state senator, and the Inspector General as a concerned citizen were clearly established during the relevant time period, and Defendants could not have reasonably believed that their actions against Freitag were lawful."), aff'd, 2008 WL 1734181 (9th Cir. Apr. 11, 2008).

Yezek v. Mitchell, No. C-05-03461 THE, 2007 WL 61887, at *8 (N.D. Cal. Jan. 8, 2007) ("Even if the stop is viewed purely from a reasonableness perspective, Plaintiffs have raised a triable issue of fact as to whether the length and scope of the stop were reasonable . . . . Although Plaintiffs argue that the Fourth Amendment standard was clearly established, . . . the Supreme Court's decision in Atwater has altered the legal landscape to some degree, and the court finds it was not clearly established that, in the course of a traffic stop based on probable cause, Mitchell could not prolong the stop to take the photographs, and Mitchell could have reasonably believed the photographs were lawful. . . Some Courts have held that since Atwater, arrested persons do not have to be released as quickly as possible, although detentions must remain reasonable. . . Because no Ninth Circuit case has directly addressed the impact of Atwater on reasonableness requirements for a traffic stop, under the circumstances of this case, Mitchell is entitled to qualified immunity.") Walters v. County of Maricopa, No. CV 04-1920-PHX-NVW, 2006 WL 2456173, at *18 (D. Ariz. Aug. 22, 2006) ("[T]he Supreme Court's recent decision in Garcetti v. Ceballos, 126 S.Ct. 1951 (2006), does not retroactively make Walters' rights as of 2003 any less clearly established. As discussed above, this circuit accorded whistleblowers of all kinds clear First Amendment protection as of 2003. To be sure, Garcetti changes the law in this circuit, and if Romley acted today, he could persuasively argue that Walters's rights are not currently clearly established. But as noted above, the law has not changed enough to deprive Walters of First Amendment protection in this case. And although the policy of protecting officials from liability for their actions may suggest a different outcome where the law changes in a way favorable to defendants, the general touchstone for determining qualified immunity is fair notice . . . . Romley had fair notice in 2003 under Ninth Circuit precedent that retaliatory action based on Walters' good-faith whistleblowing was impermissible. The Supreme Court's overrule of Ceballos on the ground that Ceballos' particular job required the speech involved does not detract from the fair notice provided by those cases to Romley in 2003.").

Hepting v. AT & T Corp., No C-06-672 VRW, 2006 WL 2038464, at 30-34 (N.D. Cal. July 20, 2006) ("The court now determines whether the history of the alleged immunity and purposes of the qualified immunity doctrine support extending qualified immunity to AT & T. . . . AT & T contends that national security surveillance is 'a traditional governmental function of the highest importance' requiring access to the 'critical telecommunications infrastructure' that companies such as AT & T would be reluctant to furnish if they were exposed to civil liability. . . AT & T's concerns, while relevant, do not warrant extending qualified immunity here because the purposes of that immunity are already well served by the certification provision of 18 USC ' 2511(2)(a)(ii). . . . [T]he statutes in this case set forth comprehensive, free- standing liability schemes, complete with statutory defenses, many of which specifically contemplate liability on the part of telecommunications providers such as AT & T. . . . In sum, neither the history of judicially created immunities for telecommunications carriers nor the purposes of qualified immunity justify allowing AT & T to claim the benefit of the doctrine in this case. . . . The court also notes that based on the facts as alleged in plaintiffs' complaint, AT & T is not entitled to qualified immunity with respect to plaintiffs' constitutional claim, at least not at this stage of the proceedings. Plaintiffs' constitutional claim alleges that AT & T provides the government with direct and indiscriminate access to the domestic communications of AT & T customers. . . . In United States v. United States District Court, 407 U.S. 297, 92 S.Ct. 2125, 32 L.Ed.2d 752 (1972) (Keith), the Supreme Court held that the Fourth Amendment does not permit warrantless wiretaps to track domestic threats to national security, id at 321, reaffirmed the 'necessity of obtaining a warrant in the surveillance of crimes unrelated to the national security interest,' id at 308, and did not pass judgment 'on the scope of the President's surveillance power with respect to the activities of foreign powers, within or without this country,' id. Because the alleged dragnet here encompasses the communications of 'all or substantially all of the communications transmitted through [AT & T's] key domestic telecommunications facilities,' it cannot reasonably be said that the program as alleged is limited to tracking foreign powers. Accordingly, AT & T's alleged actions here violate the constitutional rights clearly established in Keith. Moreover, because 'the very action in question has previously been held unlawful,' AT & T cannot seriously contend that a reasonable entity in its position could have believed that the alleged domestic dragnet was legal. . . Accordingly, the court DENIES AT & T's instant motion to dismiss on the basis of qualified immunity. The court does not preclude AT & T from raising the qualified immunity defense later in these proceedings, if further discovery indicates that such a defense is merited.").

Aguilera v. Baca, 394 F.Supp.2d 1203, 1218-21, 1229 (C.D. Cal. 2005) ("In light of Driebel, the Court concludes that Plaintiffs were not seized when they were ordered to remain at work to be questioned by ICIB investigators. First, no force was used: Plaintiffs were never handcuffed, physically restrained, or placed in a holding cell. Second, the show of force was distinctly benign: only two officers supervised Plaintiffs, and their supervision of Plaintiffs appears to have been intermittent and not particularly intrusive. For instance, Plaintiffs were permitted to talk to one another, use their cell phones, drink from the water foundation, and use the bathroom unaccompanied by an escort. Third, Plaintiffs retained possession of their LASD-issued equipment, including their guns. Under these circumstances, it cannot be concluded that Plaintiffs were arrested or seized. . . . Taken together, Garrity, Gardner, and Uniformed Sanitation Men establish several propositions. First, Garrity establishes that testimony given under the threat of discharge constitutes compelled testimony within the meaning of the privilege against self-incrimination and thus may not be used in a subsequent criminal prosecution. This is the so-called Garrity immunity which automatically attaches to compelled testimony. Second, Gardner and Uniformed Sanitation Men establish that a governmental employer may not get around the self-executing Garrity immunity by threatening to terminate an employee for refusing to waive her Garrity immunity prior to testifying. Third, both Gardner and Uniformed Sanitation Men make it clear that a governmental employer may terminate an employee for refusing to answer questions regarding the performance of her duties so long as the employer does not terminate or threaten to terminate the employee for refusing to waive her immunity. . . . In light of the teachings of Garrity, Gardner, and Uninformed Sanitation Men and such recent cases as Lingler, Hill, and Wiley, Plaintiffs' Fifth Amendment claim cannot stand. Plaintiffs were not compelled to answer Sgt. Kagy's questions or to waive their immunity. Since, as the Eighth Circuit has explained, the Fifth Amendment is violated 'only by the combined risks of both compelling the employee to answer incriminating questions and compelling the employee to waive immunity from the use of those answers,'. . . no Fifth Amendment violation occurred here. . . . Because Plaintiffs were not seized within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment, Defendants did not violate Plaintiffs' Fourth Amendment rights. Because Defendants did not compel Plaintiffs to waive their rights under the Fifth Amendment or attempt to use Plaintiffs' statements against them in a subsequent criminal case, Defendants did not violate Plaintiffs' Fifth Amendment rights. Finally, because Defendants' conduct did not shock the conscience or constitute coercive police conduct analogous to that at issue in Cooper, Defendants did not violate Plaintiffs' due process rights under the Fourteenth Amendment. Finally, because the law governing Defendants' conduct was not clearly established at the time, Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity even if their conduct did violate Plaintiffs' rights."[footnotes omitted]).

Hillmon v. Alameida, No. F-03-6409 REC DLB P, 2005 WL 2030571, at *6 (E.D. Cal. Aug. 22, 2005) ("With respect to plaintiff's RLUIPA claim, as discussed, plaintiff's allegations are sufficient to state a claim for violation of RLUIPA. RLUIPA was enacted in 2000 and has not yet generated much case law. Given the very recent nature of the limited case law regarding RLUIPA, the court finds that plaintiff's right under RLUIPA to be exempted from the grooming policy based on his religious beliefs is not sufficiently clear that a reasonable official would understand that what he was doing violated that right. . . Accordingly, the court recommends that defendants' motion for qualified immunity on plaintiff's damages claims under RLUIPA be GRANTED.").

Seidman v. Paradise Valley Unified School District No. 69, 327 F.Supp.2d 1098, 1120, 1121 (D. Ariz. 2004) ("The alleged violation in this case took place between August of 2002, when the Seidmans' submitted their tile application and March 6, 2002, when the tiles were repeatedly rejected and the school asked the Seidmans to alter the inscriptions to remove any religious expression. It was clearly established at the time of the violation that restrictions on speech in the context of a limited public forum must be both viewpoint neutral and reasonable in light of the purpose served by the forum. Rosenberger v. Rector & Visitors of the Univ. of Va., 515 U.S. 819, 829, 115 S.Ct. 2510, ___ (1995). The notion that speech discussing otherwise permissible subjects cannot be excluded from a limited public forum on the ground that the subject is discussed from a religious viewpoint was also a well-settled principle of law at the time of the alleged violation in this case. Good News Club, 533 U.S. at 108, 112, 121 S.Ct. 2093 (decided in 2001). Additionally, it had also been clearly established that, in the Ninth Circuit, the viewpoint neutrality analysis applies to nonpublic forum, school-sponsored speech as well as private speech in a limited public forum. [citing cases] However, this is a most general level of analysis. When these principles of law are applied to the facts of this particular case, it cannot be said that the law was clearly established. Due to the nature of the speech that was involved, the facts of this particular case could not fall within a murkier area of First Amendment jurisprudence. The Court itself had difficulty attempting to find the balance in this case between the school district's right to protect and maintain an educational environment suitable for elementary school children and the speaker's right to speak once the school had opened up the forum to certain forms of expression. It would be inappropriate 'to hold government officials to a higher level of knowledge and understanding of the legal landscape than the knowledge and understanding displayed by judges whose everyday business it is to decipher the meaning of judicial opinion.'. . Accordingly, the Court finds that the Individual Defendants are shielded by qualified immunity.").

Martiszus v. Washington County, 325 F.Supp.2d 1160, 1171, 1172 (D. Or. 2004) ("If there is one irreducible minimum in our Fourth Amendment jurisprudence, it is that a police officer may not detain an individual simply on the basis of suspicion in the air. No matter how peculiar, abrasive, unruly or distasteful a person's conduct may be, it cannot justify a police stop unless it suggests that some specific crime has been, or is about to be, committed, or that there is an imminent danger to persons or property. Were the law any different–were police free to detain and question people based only on their hunch that something may be amiss–we would hardly have a need for the hundreds of founded suspicion cases the federal courts decide every year, for we would be living in a police state where law enforcement officers, not courts, would determine who gets stopped and when. No less well established is the principle that government officials in general, and police officers in particular, may not exercise their authority for personal motives, particularly in response to real or perceived slights to their dignity. Surely anyone who takes an oath of office knows–or should know–that much.").

Myers v. Baca, 325 F.Supp.2d 1095, 1115, 1116 (C.D.Cal. 2004) ("In arriving at the conclusion that the seizure of Plaintiffs was unreasonable, the Court relied most heavily on Ganwich. While Ganwich was very useful for purposes of this Court's Fourth Amendment analysis, Ganwich could not have informed Defendants as to the contours of Fourth Amendment law because the case was decided in 2003. However, in that the events in Ganwich took place in December 1999, the section of Ganwich addressing clearly established law speaks to the state of the law at the time of the facts giving rise to this case. . . Turning to Ganwich's discussion of clearly established law highlights the differences between Ganwich and this case. During the second prong of the Saucier test, the Ganwich court focused on the principle that officers may only seize a person absent probable cause in a criminal investigation 'in a handful of well-defined situations' and that this was clearly not one of those situations. . . . Conversely, the seizure in the instant case was not carried out in the context of a criminal investigation, nor was it pursuant to a criminal investigation and a search of the business premises authorized by a warrant. Thus, the legal principles upon which the Ganwich court found the officers' conduct to be in violation of clearly established law are inapposite to this case. As such, Ganwich does not illuminate the state of the law in October 2001 in a relevant manner. Even if Ganwich had been decided by October 2001, there are key differences between it and this case such that a reasonable officer would not have fair warning of whether Plaintiffs' seizure was reasonable. Once again, the seizure in Ganwich was pursuant to a criminal investigation and a search of the business premises authorized by a warrant. Additionally, the detainees in Ganwich were held completely incommunicado for the length of their detention, unlike Plaintiffs here who were allowed to make certain arrangements by telephone. Third, in Ganwich it was clear that police officers were seizing private citizens, unlike here where Defendants could reasonably have thought that they were acting in their capacities as persons of higher rank and that Plaintiffs chose to stay at the school out of a fear of losing their jobs rather than under threat of arrest and prosecution for criminal acts. This case did not provide a clear-cut constitutional violation, but only upon great reflection and analysis by the Court was that decision reached. The Court's extensive deliberation on the question of whether Plaintiffs' Fourth Amendment rights were violated is relevant in that the 'analysis used to determine whether a plaintiff alleges a violation of a constitutional right is instructive in determining whether that right was clearly established.'. . Moreover, whereas in most qualified immunity inquiries, courts are dealing with variations of fact patterns that fit into a general paradigm of legal principles, this case presents a series of facts that span a wide range of legal principles in a manner that heretofore has not been definitively adjudicated. Indeed, to this Court's knowledge, no published case has dealt with an amalgamation of fact and law in a manner that could put a police officer on fair warning of a person's rights in such a situation. The Court acknowledges the ample body of Fourth Amendment caselaw regarding arrests and other seizures pursuant to criminal investigations, workplace detentions, and the detention of minors by school officials. However, while some of the legal principles set forth in those cases are implicated here, such principles can only be applied to the peculiar facts of this case through complex legal reasoning. The Court thus holds that a reasonable officer could have reasonably believed that a Fourth Amendment violation had not taken place. In sum, notwithstanding the Court's finding that when the facts are viewed in the light most favorable to Plaintiffs, Plaintiffs were unreasonably seized, a reasonable officer, given the state of the law on October 19, 2001, could have reasonably but erroneously believed that Plaintiffs were not seized and that even if they were seized pursuant to a non-criminal internal investigation, such seizure was reasonable. Defendants receive the benefit of the doubt with respect to a reasonable mistake of law, and, therefore, Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity.").

TENTH CIRCUIT

Leiser v. Moore, 903 F.3d 1137, 1139-45 (10th Cir. 2018) ("We express no view on whether Plaintiff's constitutional rights were violated. We can resolve this appeal by considering only the clearly-established prong of the qualified-immunity defense. . . . In two published opinions this circuit has held that government disclosure of an individual's personal medical information violated the Constitution. . . . Plaintiff quite reasonably argues that these two precedents from our circuit, as well as a few similar decisions by other circuits, clearly establish the law supporting his constitutional claim in this case. But we are not persuaded. One reason is that there are factual differences between the precedential cases and the one before us. When our precedents were decided, the stigma of HIV was enormous. . . .A diagnosis of cancer is not nearly as opprobrious as a diagnosis of HIV was then. A further distinction is that the disclosure in this case had a plausible positive purpose—to encourage the support of family and friends—as opposed to the hostile purposes in our precedents. . . .The second reason is the difference in governing law: the development—or, perhaps more precisely, the clarification—of the relevant constitutional law by the Supreme Court in the interval between our precedents and this case. As we proceed to explain, our precedents relied on a reasonable misreading of two Supreme Court opinions as establishing a right to informational privacy. More recently, however, the Supreme Court has made clear that the existence of such a right is an open question and it has not abandoned a third precedent which suggests that any right to informational privacy is limited. . . . [I]n recent years the Supreme Court has significantly elaborated on the applicable law, raising serious doubts about the assumptions of governing law on which we relied in our precedents on the disclosure of private medical information. . . . [I]t can no longer be said in the context of government disclosure of information that '[t]here is no dispute that confidential medical information is entitled to constitutional privacy protection.'. . The Supreme Court has stated that this is an open question—it has never held that there is a constitutional right to prevent government disclosure of private information. This is not to say that our precedents on this issue are incorrect or that they have been overruled. That is a matter we need not decide on this appeal. The question before us is only whether the law is clearly established that government disclosure to family and friends that a prisoner is suffering from cancer violates the prisoner's constitutional rights. Even if we assume that the disclosures in A.L.A. and Herring were unconstitutional, it is certainly unclear how far those opinions should be extended when we do not know the doctrinal boundaries of the protection against government disclosure. . . . We cannot say that it is clearly established that this court, in light of NASA 's characterization of Whalen and Nixon as expressing only dicta, would reject the kind of distinction between diseases that the Second Circuit expressed in Matson. In short, in our view clearly established law does not support Plaintiff's constitutional claim.") Grissom v. Roberts, 902 F.3d 1162, 1170-72 (10th Cir. 2018) ("Where Grissom fails is in not providing clearly established law to support his claim. There is a great hurdle in his path, and he has not persuaded us that he surmounted it. That hurdle is this court's decision in his earlier challenge to his solitary confinement. In Grissom II, 524 F. App'x. 467, we affirmed the district court's summary judgment (based on its analysis of the DiMarco factors) rejecting his claim that his solitary confinement from June 2005 to the time of our decision had violated his right to due process. In particular, we held that his solitary confinement did not infringe a protected liberty interest. . . True, our prior opinion was not published precedent of this circuit. But, as explained above, even an unpublished opinion can demonstrate that the law was not clearly established at the time the opinion was issued, at least within the circuit of the court issuing the opinion, and particularly when considering qualified immunity for the same conduct impacting the same plaintiff. The question before us therefore boils down to whether something significant has happened since our opinion was filed. One matter of significance would be Supreme Court or Tenth Circuit precedent postdating our prior decision that has now clearly established law that had not been previously so established. But Grissom points to no such recent authority. Similar significance could attach to a substantial change in the facts concerning Grissom's solitary confinement between his prior appeal and this case. We therefore examine whether any of the facts relevant to the DiMarco factors are different. . . . Given Grissom's failure to point to any controlling Supreme Court or Tenth Circuit precedent that would change the established law since his prior appeal, and his failure to point to any factual changes since that appeal that would be decisive under clearly established law, we are compelled to hold that the Prison Officials are entitled to qualified immunity on his due-process claim.")

Halley v. Huckaby, 902 F.3d 1136, 1144-47, 1149-51 (10th Cir. 2018) ("If a plaintiff demonstrates the officials violated a clearly established right, we consider a third question: 'whether extraordinary circumstances—such as reliance on the advice of counsel or on a statute—so prevented the official from knowing that his or her actions were unconstitutional that he or she should not be imputed with knowledge of a clearly established right.'. .We apply this standard to J.H.'s unlawful seizure and interference with familial relationship claims in turn. . . .We first consider whether J.H. has adequately shown a constitutional violation—one of the requirements in the qualified immunity analysis. We turn next to the second question: whether the law was clearly established at the time of the alleged violation. . . .[A]lthough there is clearly 'no "social worker" exception to the Fourth Amendment,'. . . we have not definitively decided what Fourth Amendment standard governs when social workers seize a child at school, rather than at home. In Hunt, we declined to decide precisely 'what Fourth Amendment test is most appropriate' when social workers seize a child at school. . . . Here, the officials took J.H. from school to a safe-house. They did not take J.H. from his home. As explained in Hunt, it has long been clearly established that any seizure at school without judicial authorization had to at least be reasonable under the minimal Terry reasonable-suspicion standard. In other words, the officials at least needed to have a reasonable suspicion of an imminent threat to the safety of the child. . . . It may very well constitute a best practice to interview a child at the safe-house during school hours once seizing the child is justified in the first place. Unless officials have judicial authorization, however, they cannot seize a child without at least having reasonable suspicion of imminent danger. . . . It was clearly established at the time of the seizure in this case that a social worker needs at least reasonable suspicion of abuse in order to seize a child at school. . . . This rule is sufficiently specific to constitute clearly established law placing officials on notice that the seizure here violated the Fourth Amendment. . . And even if it is a general rule of law, it applies here with obvious clarity. . . .Since the undisputed evidence at this stage supports Chief Goerke's claim that he merely relied on the DHS officials' directions, we conclude Chief Goerke is entitled to qualified immunity. Generally, '[a] police officer who acts "in reliance on what proves to be the flawed conclusions of a fellow police officer may nonetheless be entitled to qualified immunity as long as the officer's reliance was objectively reasonable."'. . And J.H. provides no cases clearly establishing that officers cannot rely on DHS officials just as much as on fellow officers. Chief Goerke thus did not violate clearly established law by relying on DHS officials' instructions without conducting his own investigation. . . .With no clearly established law to the contrary, we conclude Goerke's actions were a reasonable response to what he could have assumed to be an adequately supported child welfare investigation.")

Halley v. Huckaby, 902 F.3d 1136, 1156-58 (10th Cir. 2018) ("[As to the familial association claim,] [w]e need not decide whether the record here demonstrates a constitutional violation. Even if the officials did violate J.H.'s substantive due process rights, we conclude the right was not clearly established, and so the defendants are entitled to qualified immunity. In particular, we find

J.H. has not shown that reasonable officials would have known that the short seizure here would constitute an unwarranted interference with a family relationship—the second part of our test for substantive due process familial association claims. . . . As earlier explained, '[t]o determine whether the right was clearly established, we ask whether "the contours of a right are sufficiently clear that every reasonable official would have understood that what he is doing violates that right."'. . In making this determination, we are mindful of two pitfalls. We can neither require too much factual similarity between an existing case and the case at hand, nor too little. There 'need not be a case precisely on point.'. . But at the same time, 'it is a "longstanding principle that clearly established law should not be defined at a high level of generality."'. . And while general statements of law can sometimes provide fair warning that certain conduct is unconstitutional, they only do so if they 'apply with obvious clarity to the specific conduct in question.'. . 'General legal standards therefore rarely clearly establish rights.'. .The facts here do not meet this high bar. Even if the officials had the requisite intent—thus satisfying the first part of our test—their actions still must constitute an undue burden on J.H.'s right of familial association. We are not aware of a case from our court or the Supreme Court clearly establishing that the short seizure and interview here would unduly burden J.H.'s relationship with his family members. . . . Aside from Roska and Malik, J.H. has not pointed to any other cases that could clearly establish the right at issue here. J.H. need not provide a case with exactly the same facts, of course. But he has not provided a case with even remotely similar facts. Nor has he shown that our general statements of law in this area demonstrate the unconstitutionality of the officials' actions here with 'obvious clarity.'. . Indeed, our general rule that interference with family relationships cannot be 'unduly burdened' is too general a proposition to have clearly established the alleged violation here. The officials would not have known that taking J.H. from school for a short interview would necessarily constitute an 'undue burden' or 'unwarranted intrusion' into a family relationship. . . . Having found that 'existing precedent' did not place the 'constitutional question beyond debate,' we hold that Huckaby and Deputy Calloway are entitled to qualified immunity for the Fourteenth Amendment claims against them. . . It would not have been clear at the time that the balance between the interview's interference in J.H.'s family relationship and the officials' health and safety concerns made their actions so burdensome to the family relationship as to violate substantive due process rights.")

Rife v. Jefferson, No. 17-7037, 2018 WL 3660248, at *3-10 (10th Cir. Aug. 2, 2018) (not published) ("[A] panel of this court has already held that, based on the relevant 'universe of facts,' Jefferson, Willis, and Dale violated the Fourteenth Amendment by displaying deliberate indifference to Rife's serious medical needs. . . Thus, the lone question before us in this appeal is whether the law was clearly established at the time of that violation. . . .In determining whether the law was clearly established, we ask whether Rife has 'identif[ied] an on-point Supreme Court or published Tenth Circuit decision; alternatively, "the clearly established weight of authority from other courts must have found the law to be as [he] maintains."' . . Of course, this isn't to say that Rife must direct us to a case that is 'exactly on point.'. . . '[B]ut existing precedent must have placed the ... constitutional question beyond debate.'. . And to do that, a previous decision must be ' "particularized" to the facts of the case' before us. . . In other words, to demonstrate the law was clearly established, Rife must identify a case in which a defendant 'acting under similar circumstances as' Jefferson, Willis, and Dale 'was held to have violated' the Eighth or Fourteenth Amendments. . . Thus, our task is to examine the cases that the district court relied on below and those that Rife cites on appeal and ask whether any of those cases satisfy this test. . . . In undertaking this inquiry, we first address whether Rife has identified a case that clearly establishes Jefferson's conduct violated the Fourteenth Amendment. We then turn to the question of whether he has identified such a case vis-à-vis Willis and Dale. . . . According to Rife, 'there are obvious parallels between Garcia and the case at bar.' . . We don't necessarily disagree. But Rife overlooks a critical distinction between the two cases: Garcia involved a finding of municipal liability. . . .To the extent that Olsen, 312 F.3d 1304, also involved a finding of municipal liability, we reach the same conclusion. . . . [I]f anything, the case against Jefferson is stronger than was the plaintiff's case against the arresting officer in Olsen. Here, in addition to verbally informing Jefferson about those aspects of his condition that weren't necessarily subject to 'notice[ ] by an outsider,' Olsen, 312 F.3d at 1317—including, critically, heart and chest pain—Rife also displayed readily discernable signs that he needed medical care as the result of his motorcycle accident. . . . Thus, we conclude that at the time of the alleged constitutional violation, existing circuit precedent would have 'put a reasonable official' in Jefferson's position 'on notice that his conduct was unlawful.'. . But this conclusion doesn't necessarily resolve the clearly-established question. That's because Jefferson asserts that '[e]ven assuming' there exists 'on-point circuit precedent involving materially similar facts to this case and finding that the defendant ... violated the Constitution, this [c]ourt's other precedents are so favorable to Jefferson's position that the law would still be unclear due to apparent contradictions in the precedent.'. .In support, Jefferson cites a series of cases in which we have held that medical professionals didn't violate the Constitution by misdiagnosing prisoners. . . . Jefferson's reliance on this line of authority is misplaced. As even he acknowledges, we held in Rife I that the 'specialized' deliberate-indifference standards that apply to medical professionals don't apply to 'laypersons such as [Jefferson].'. . And although Jefferson asserts that '[t]his development was unforeseen because neither this [c]ourt nor any other court of appeals had previously made such a distinction,' he fails to identify any cases holding that a layperson may successfully assert a misdiagnosis defense to a deliberate-indifference claim. Indeed, we expressly noted the dearth of such cases in Rife I. . . Thus, contrary to Jefferson's assertions, none of the misdiagnosis cases he cites 'would have indicated to a reasonable officer' in Jefferson's position that his 'conduct did not violate the Constitution.'. . The same is true of the cases from outside our circuit that Jefferson cites in his brief. According to Jefferson, 'it is difficult to see how even an on-point circuit precedent could render the law "clearly established" if the same conduct in another circuit would be constitutional.'. . But even assuming the cases Jefferson cites suggest that other circuits might reach a different conclusion about the constitutionality of Jefferson's conduct in this case, 'the decisions of one circuit court of appeals are not binding upon another circuit.'. . Thus, to the extent that Jefferson suggests another circuit's cases can disestablish the clearly established law of this circuit, we disagree. . . And in this circuit, it has been clearly established for more than a decade that when an arrestee not only informs an arresting officer of the internal symptoms of a serious medical condition but also displays outward signs of the need for medical attention, the arresting officer violates the Fourteenth Amendment by failing to seek such care. . . Accordingly, Jefferson isn't entitled to qualified immunity, and we therefore affirm the district court's order denying his motion for summary judgment. . . . [With respect to defendants Willis and Dale] [w]hether Olsen's individual-individual liability discussion clearly establishes as much is a closer question. Like the plaintiff in Olsen, Rife verbally informed Willis and Dale of his internal discomfort: he 'repeatedly complain[ed] of stomach pain' as Willis and Dale were moving him to the holding cell. . . .Nevertheless, we cannot say that Olsen places the constitutional question here 'beyond debate.'. . Recall that when they booked him into the jail, Willis and Dale didn't know (or even have reason to suspect) that Rife had been thrown from his motorcycle, let alone that he might have suffered any internal injuries as a result. That's because when Jefferson delivered Rife to the jail for booking, 'no one mentioned the motorcycle accident or said that [Rife] might have been injured.'. . Thus, Willis and Dale knew only that Rife was suffering from stomach pain—a common malady that doesn't necessarily require any sort of immediate medical intervention. And we simply cannot say that Olsen would place every reasonable official in Willis' and Dale's position on notice that every detainee who entered the jail complaining of stomach pain (even 'considerable' stomach pain, Rife I, 854 F.3d at 652 n.58), was constitutionally entitled to immediate medical treatment for that ailment. More importantly, unlike the arresting officer in Olsen—who apparently ignored the plaintiff's condition completely—Willis placed Rife on medical observation, a designation that 'required jail personnel to check on [Rife] every [15] minutes.'. . In light of this proactive conduct, we hold that Olsen doesn't place 'beyond debate' the question of whether Willis and Dale were deliberately indifferent to Rife's serious medical needs. . . Thus, we agree with Willis and Dale: the district court erred in defining the right at issue here at too 'high [a] level of generality.'. . That is, the district court characterized the law as clearly established without first 'identify[ing] a case where an officer acting under similar circumstances as [Willis and Dale] was held to have violated the [Eighth or Fourteenth] Amendment.'. . But that doesn't necessarily mean we must reverse. On appeal, Rife cites two additional cases in support of his assertion that Willis and Dale violated his clearly established rights: Mata, 427 F.3d 745, and Sealock, 218 F.3d 1205. Yet in arguing that Mata and Sealock would have put reasonable officials in Willis and Dale's position on notice that their conduct violated his Fourteenth Amendment rights, Rife doesn't discuss the facts of either case. Thus, he necessarily fails to demonstrate that either case is '"particularized" to the facts' present here. . . Nevertheless, we have sua sponte reviewed the facts of both cases, and we find them distinguishable. . . . In short, neither the cases the district court relied on below nor any of the cases that Rife cites on appeal clearly establish that Willis and Dale violated Rife's Fourteenth Amendment rights. . .Accordingly, because Willis and Dale are entitled to qualified immunity, we reverse the portion of the district court's order denying their motion for summary judgment.")

Bailey v. Indep. Sch. Dist. No. 69 of Canadian Cty. Oklahoma, 896 F.3d 1176, ____ (10th Cir. 2018) ("The district court concluded that McDaniel was entitled to qualified immunity because Bailey's letters did not address a matter of public concern, and therefore Bailey had not adequately stated a violation of his First Amendment rights. As discussed above, we disagree with that conclusion. However, to defeat qualified immunity, Bailey must do more than establish that McDaniel violated his constitutional rights. . . He must also show that the constitutional right at issue was clearly established at the time of the violation. . . .A general test defining the elements of a constitutional violation, such as the Garcetti/Pickering test, will not provide clearly established law in anything but 'an obvious case.'. . As described above, we hold that a sentencing decision is a matter of public concern for the purposes of the First Amendment. But this proposition was not clearly established in our circuit at the time McDaniel acted. Bailey has cited the Garcetti/Pickering test and an Eighth Circuit case with facts similar to this one. . . He also relies on the Supreme Court's decision in Cox Broad. Corp., which concerned whether a state may sanction the truthful publication of judicial records. . . These cases are insufficient to demonstrate the existence of clearly established law. In other words, they would not give a reasonable official in McDaniel's position particularized notice that his termination of Bailey for writing letters to a sentencing judge would violate Bailey's First Amendment rights. Therefore, McDaniel is protected by qualified immunity.")

Moya v. Garcia, 895 F.3d 1229, 1250-51 (10th Cir. 2018) (McHugh, J., concurring in the result in part and dissenting in part), amended opinion on denial of rehearing en banc ("In my view, the complaint plausibly alleges that Sheriff Garcia, Warden Caldwell, and Warden Gallegos violated Plaintiffs' constitutional rights. But I recognize that conclusion is not foretold. No opinion from this court or the Supreme Court has ever clearly established that a jailer violates the Constitution by detaining an individual lawfully arrested in anticipation of an untimely scheduled arraignment. That principle of law, to be sure, is clearly established in at least two of our sister circuits, but that is not enough for the law to be clearly established here. I would thus affirm the district court's order insofar as it dismissed Plaintiffs' claims against the sheriff and wardens on the basis of qualified immunity, and so I partially concur in the majority's result. But because municipalities are not entitled to qualified immunity, I would reverse and remand to the district court for further proceedings against the County.")

N.E.L. v. Douglas County, Colorado, No. 17-1120, 2018 WL 3239239, at *7 n.18 (10th Cir. July 3, 2018) (not reported) ("N.E.L. and M.M.A. assert that the district court incorrectly concluded that clearly established law is proved when the plaintiff proffers case law with closely analogous facts. They contend that the appropriate test for proving clearly established law is found in Hope v Pelzer, 536 U.S. 730, 739–40 (2002), which they argue requires plaintiffs to proffer case law that 'only provide[s] "fair warning" that an officer's conduct would violate the constitution.'. . But as we have noted, Hope v. Pelzer appears to have fallen out of favor, yielding to a more robust qualified immunity. See Aldaba v. Pickens, 844 F.3d 870, 874 n.1 (10th Cir. 2016) (citing Mullenix, 136 S. Ct. at 308, 312 (2015)).")

Perry v. Durborow, 892 F.3d 1116, 1120-27 (10th Cir. 2018) ("[W]hen a defendant asserts a qualified-immunity defense at summary judgment, we require the plaintiff 'to shoulder' a heavy two-part burden to survive the defendant's assertion. . . First, '[t]he plaintiff must demonstrate on the facts alleged ... that the defendant violated his [or her] constitutional or statutory rights.'. . Second, the plaintiff must demonstrate 'that the right was clearly established at the time of the alleged unlawful activity.'. Here, the district court ruled that Perry made both of these showings.

Specifically, it ruled that on the facts as alleged, Perry demonstrated (1) Durborow violated her Fourteenth Amendment right as 'a female inmate to be protected from sexual assault' and (2) that right was clearly established at the time of the alleged violation. Critically, Durborow opts not to dispute the district court's ruling that he violated Perry's constitutional rights. Instead, he focuses solely on the second prong of the qualified-immunity analysis. That is, Durborow argues only that even assuming Perry demonstrated a constitutional violation, he is nevertheless entitled to qualified immunity because, as of February 25, 2013, no 'clearly established law ... would ... have put a reasonable official in [his] position on notice that his supervisory conduct' violated Perry's constitutional rights. . . Accordingly, the only question before us in this appeal is whether the district court erred in ruling that the law was clearly established. Nevertheless, we begin by sketching the general contours of the constitutional inquiry to provide a framework for our subsequent discussion of the clearly-established analysis. . . . [T]o satisfy the first prong of the qualified-immunity test in this case, Perry had to demonstrate that Durborow personally violated her constitutional rights. . . To do that here, Perry had to 'show an "affirmative link" between' Durborow and the rape. . . And to demonstrate such an 'affirmative link,'. . . Perry had to establish '(1) personal involvement; (2) causation, and (3) state of mind[.]'. . . For the reasons discussed above, we assume that Perry successfully demonstrated Durborow personally violated her Fourteenth Amendment rights under this framework. Nevertheless, Durborow is entitled to qualified immunity unless Perry can also show that the law was clearly established at the time of the constitutional violation. . . . Critically, just as the constitutional-violation question in this case didn't turn on whether Clements violated Perry's constitutional rights by raping her, the clearly-established-law question doesn't turn on whether existing precedent would have put a reasonable detention officer in Clements' position on notice that raping Perry would violate her constitutional rights. Instead, to satisfy the second part of the qualified-immunity test in the context of Perry's supervisory-liability claim against Durborow, Perry must show that as of February 25, 2013, 'clearly established law ... would ... have put a reasonable official in [Durborow's] position on notice that his supervisory conduct would' violate Perry's constitutional rights. . . In other words, Perry must 'identify a case where an offic[ial] acting under similar circumstances as [Durborow] was held to have violated' the Constitution. In ruling that Perry made this showing, the district court first cited Durborow's knowledge that male detention officers were routinely entering the female pod in violation of the Jail's emergencies-only policy. The court then cited Durborow's knowledge that the Jail's surveillance system didn't monitor the female pod's individual cells, its showers, or its mechanical room. And the court reasoned that the existence of these known 'blind spots' allowed male detention officers who entered the female pod in violation of the Jail's emergencies-only policy to remain there for substantial periods of time 'without surveillance.'. . Taken together, the district court said, these circumstances 'gave rise to an increased risk of sexual assault of female inmates' such that 'a reasonable jury could find that Durborow was deliberately indifferent to the[ir] health and safety,' in violation of the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments. . . And because 'it is clearly established that a prison official's deliberate indifference to sexual abuse by prison employees violates' the Constitution, the district court reasoned, Durborow wasn't entitled to qualified immunity. . . But as Durborow points out, the district court cited only two cases to support this conclusion . . . The court cited Cox for the threshold principle that a 'plaintiff must show that the constitutional right was clearly established when the conduct occurred.'. . And it cited Keith II for the general proposition that 'it is clearly established that a prison official's deliberate indifference to sexual abuse by prison employees violates the Eighth Amendment.'. . We agree with Durborow that these statements of law define the right at issue here at an unacceptably 'high level of generality.'. . . [B]efore the district court could determine the law was clearly established, it had to 'identify a case where an offic[ial] acting under similar circumstances as [Durborow] was held to have violated' the Eighth or Fourteenth Amendments under a theory of supervisory liability. . . Cox is not such a case. . . .Nor is Keith II, which we decided almost four years after Perry alleges Clements raped her. . . . True, we stated in Keith II that it has been clearly established since 2007 that inmates have a constitutional right 'to be free from attack by' prison employees and 'to expect reasonable protection from [prison] officials ... and a reasonable response when sexual misconduct occur[s].'. .But in determining whether Durborow was entitled to qualified immunity, the district court should have looked to the ' "particularized" ... facts' of the cases upon which Keith II relied in reaching that conclusion, not to Keith II's 'general statements of the law.'. . Accordingly, to the extent the district court failed to tether its clearly-established analysis to the ' "particularized" ... facts' of any case decided before February 25, 2013, the district court erred. . . . On appeal, Perry cites additional cases not relied upon by the district court and argues these cases would have put a reasonable official in Durborow's position on notice that his conduct in this case violated the Constitution. . . .[I]n each of these cases [Tafoya, 516 F.3d 912, Gonzales, 403 F.3d 1179, and Lopez, 172 F.3d 756], the defendant-supervisors weren't just aware of the risk that such assaults might occur. Instead, in each of these cases, the defendants were aware that those known risks had, in fact, already previously materialized. Here, on the other hand, the district court declined to credit Perry's assertions that Durborow was aware of any previous sexual assaults at the jail as of February 25, 2013. . . .Thus, in the absence of any finding by the district court that Durborow was aware of at least one previous assault at the Jail, neither Tafoya, 516 F.3d 912, Gonzales, 403 F.3d 1179, nor Lopez, 172 F.3d 756, were sufficient to 'place[ ] the ... constitutional question' in this case 'beyond debate.'. . In reaching this conclusion, we do not mean to suggest that '[a] prior case' must have 'identical facts' before it will put reasonable officials on notice that their specific conduct is unconstitutional. . . And we recognize that there are indeed factual similarities between this case and Tafoya. In particular, the defendants in both cases were sheriffs who knew of blinds spots in their jails' video surveillance systems and also knew that male officers were violating policies designed to restrict their contact with female inmates. . . Nevertheless, the fact that Durborow was unaware of any previous sexual assaults at the Jail remains a critical distinction. And in light of this distinction, Tafoya wouldn't have 'put a reasonable official in [Durborow's] position on notice that his supervisory conduct' in this case—which amounted to knowingly allowing the Jail's male detention officers to enter the female pod in violation of policy and without adequate supervision and monitoring—violated the Constitution. . . In short, the district court erred in concluding that the law was clearly established without first 'identify[ing]' in its order 'a case where an officer acting under similar circumstances as [Durborow] was held to have violated' the Eighth or Fourteenth Amendments. . . And in the absence of a finding that Durborow was aware of any previous incidents of sexual assault at the Jail, none of the cases that Perry identifies on appeal 'place[ ] the ... constitutional question' in this case 'beyond debate' either. . . Accordingly, Durborow is entitled to qualified immunity. We therefore reverse the district court's order denying Durborow's motion for summary judgment and remand with directions to enter summary judgment in his favor.")

Stevenson v. Cordova, 733 F. App'x 939, ___ (10th Cir. 2018) ("Turning to Eighth Amendment case law, we have not found a Supreme Court decision or a published Tenth Circuit case that is sufficiently on point. . . Nor have other circuit court decisions addressed a correctional officer's use of a taser in sufficiently analogous circumstances such that the constitutional question is beyond debate.")

Matthews v. Bergdorf, 889 F.3d 1136, 1152-53 (10th Cir. 2018) ("Plaintiffs state a cause of action against caseworkers Feather and Schraad-Dahn under the state-created danger exception. This leaves us with the question of whether the law surrounding the state-created danger exception as applied to the alleged facts was clearly established at the time of the two caseworkers' purported malfeasance. To show the law was clearly established, 'the plaintiff does not have to show the specific action at issue had been held unlawful;' rather the alleged unlawful 'conduct must have been apparent in light of preexisting law.'. . In 2001, we held a state caseworker could be held liable under the state-created danger exception for instructing a mother to stop making abuse allegations against the children's father. . . We reasoned that by actively discouraging the mother from reporting suspected wrongdoing, the caseworker increased the children's vulnerability to their father's abuse. . .We see little distinction between the affirmative act of instructing an individual to cease reporting evidence of abuse as occurred in Currier and the affirmative act of warning an individual so that the latter might cover up evidence of abuse as alleged here. . . Both acts effectively impede access to protective services, and perhaps additional sources of assistance, otherwise available to the victims. . . After we decided Currier in 2001, the law was well established in the Tenth Circuit such that a reasonable caseworker cognizant of the law would have understood the following: A caseworker's affirmative actions allegedly designed to shield and protect the Matthews in light of repeated child abuse and neglect referrals could give rise to constitutional liability under the state-created danger exception. Thus, the district court properly denied caseworker Feather's and Schraad-Dahn's defense of qualified immunity on this particular claim. For the reasons stated, however, the district court erred in denying the remaining named caseworkers qualified immunity on Plaintiffs' state-created danger claims. . . . Today we have pronounced no new law; we have done nothing more than apply binding precedent. To allow Plaintiff's complaint to proceed on claims that have no basis in constitutional jurisprudence would thwart the aims of qualified immunity and impose excessive discovery costs on Defendants absent legal justification.")

McCoy v. Meyers, 887 F.3d 1034, 1048-54 & n.22 (10th Cir. 2018) ("Even if Mr. McCoy was, as he maintains, lying face down with his hands behind his back and with several officers pinning him, . . . a reasonable officer in the Appellees' position could conclude that he was not subdued when the allegedly excessive force occurred. Under these circumstances, the preexisting precedent would not have made it clear to every reasonable officer that striking Mr. McCoy and applying a carotid restraint on him violated his Fourth Amendment rights. The cases cited by Mr. McCoy—Dixon, Casey, and Weigel—involved force used on individuals who either did not pose a threat to begin with or were subdued and thus no longer posed any threat. . . .Based on the foregoing, Mr. McCoy has failed to show clearly established law prohibiting the Appellees' pre-restraint use of force. . . . Although Dixon, Casey, and Weigel are not factually identical to this case, they nevertheless made it clear that the use of force on effectively subdued individuals violates the Fourth Amendment. In light of those cases, it should have been obvious to the Appellees that continuing to use force on Mr. McCoy after he was rendered unconscious, handcuffed, and zip-tied was excessive. Dixon, Casey, and Weigel clearly establish that the Fourth Amendment prohibits the use of force without legitimate justification, as when a subject poses no threat or has been subdued. . . .And in light of Dixon, Casey, and Weigel, the violation in this case is not necessarily 'rare' but is 'apparent.'. . Finally, this court's later decisions, though not controlling, accord with our clearly established law determination here. . . In Perea, for example, we relied primarily on Dixon in holding that it was 'clearly established [on March 21, 2011] that officers may not continue to use force against a suspect who is effectively subdued.'. . Likewise, in Estate of Booker, we relied on Weigel, Casey, and out-of-circuit cases in holding that it was clearly established on July 8, 2010 that officers may not use force—namely, pressure on back, tasering, and neck restraint—'on a person who is not resisting and who is restrained in handcuffs.'. . .In sum, qualified immunity applies (1) to Mr. McCoy's claims based on the pre-restraint force, due to the lack of clearly established law, but (2) not to the claims based the post-restraint force, which violated Mr. McCoy's clearly established right to be free from continued force after he was effectively subdued. . . . In Casey, this court adopted a 'sliding scale' approach to clearly established law in the excessive force context. . . We have since stated that 'our sliding-scale approach may arguably conflict with recent Supreme Court precedent on qualified immunity.' Lowe v. Raemisch, 864 F.3d 1205, 1211 n.10 (10th Cir. 2017). We do not rely on the sliding scale here and thus need not decide its validity. And nothing in recent Supreme Court precedent questions our merits holding in Casey, which—along with Dixon and Weigel—should have put the Appellees on notice that the post-restraint force was excessive.") Doe v. Hutchinson, 728 F. App'x 829, ___ (10th Cir. 2018) ("Hutchinson relies heavily on White v. Pauly, 137 S. Ct. 548 (2017), which stated it was 'again necessary to reiterate the longstanding principle that clearly established law should not be defined at a high level of generality' but instead 'particularized to the facts of the case.'. . That case reversed a decision of this court denying qualified immunity to officers because it 'failed to identify a case where an officer acting under similar circumstances as [defendants] was held to have violated the Fourth Amendment.'. . It held that 'general statements of the law' are not sufficient to 'create clearly established law outside an obvious case.'. .We have previously held 'the law holding that sexual harassment is actionable as an equal protection violation has long been clearly established.'. . In Sh.A., defendant was a fifth-grade teacher who repeatedly touched two boys in his class. . . We rejected the defendant's argument that he was entitled to qualified immunity because 'the contours of an equal protection claim by a student on the basis of sexual harassment by a teacher were [not] clearly established in 1997 and 1998 when the conduct at issue took place,' holding that 'a reasonable teacher would have known in the spring of 1997 that sexual harassment which gives rise to a violation of equal protection in the employment context will also do so in the teacher-on-student context.'. . Hutchinson argues that because the facts alleged in the complaint differ from those at issue in Sh.A., which involved physical touching, he is entitled to qualified immunity under Pauly. But Sh.A. did more than hold that the facts presented violated plaintiffs' equal protection rights, it clearly established the proposition that 'sexual harassment which gives rise to a violation of equal protection in the employment context will also do so in the teacher-on-student context.'. . At the time of Hutchinson's alleged conduct, we had repeatedly held in the employment context that sexual harassment was an actionable equal protection theory. . . And we had applied that rule to hostile environment claims, explaining that '[t]he law on discrimination arising from a hostile environment in the workplace is well established,' having been fleshed out by numerous decisions from the Supreme Court and this court with respect to § 1983 and Title VII. . . Accordingly, the question is not whether the facts of Sh.A. were sufficiently similar to those alleged in Doe's complaint, but whether our case law would make it clear to reasonable officials that Hutchinson's alleged conduct created a hostile environment. We have already concluded that Doe's allegations sufficiently allege a pervasively hostile environment. The law was clearly established that Hutchinson's full course of conduct may be considered, including statements that were not explicitly gender-based and those made to others of which Doe was aware. . . As was the proposition that we must consider context including 'the ages of the harasser and the victim.'. . Moreover, our hostile environment jurisprudence includes many cases not involving physical contact. . . In light of the foregoing, we conclude that any reasonable high school teacher would have understood that the conduct alleged created a hostile environment in violation of Doe's equal protection rights.")

Sandberg v. Englewood, Colorado, 727 F. App'x 950, 963 (10th Cir. 2018) ("Sandberg does not cite to any Tenth Circuit or Supreme Court case addressing whether a person who is the subject of the police action has a First Amendment right to record police activities. Rather, as with his Second Amendment argument, he urges us to look to an alleged 'clearly established weight of authority from other courts [that] found the law to be as the plaintiff maintains.'. . It is true that the First, Third, Fifth, Seventh, Ninth, and Eleventh Circuits have all held that 'the First Amendment protects the act of photographing, filming, or otherwise recording police officers conducting their official duties in public.' [collecting cases] Yet, these cases do not provide Sandberg with a clearly established weight of authority for two reasons. First, some of them post-dated the May 14, 2014 events in this case. . . Second, the cases are factually distinguishable. All of the cases Sandberg cites only involve a bystander or third party recording the police, and do not involve the person who is the subject of the police action. . . Sandberg does not point to a case in which the videographer was also the subject of the police action. As such, it was not clearly established that officers violate the First Amendment when they prevent a person who is the subject of the police action from filming the police. The district court correctly granted Johnson and Fieger qualified immunity on Sandberg's First Amendment claim.")

Knopf v. Williams, 884 F.3d 939, 946-47, 949-51 & n.10 (10th Cir. 2018) ("The following considers only the second requirement to overcome qualified immunity —whether the law was clearly established—and determines the district court erred in denying Mayor Williams summary judgment. Mr. Knopf did not meet his burden of showing that any violation of the First Amendment he may have suffered was based on clearly established law. . . .The district court's discussion of the second qualified immunity prong consisted only of the general statement that 'it is clearly established that a public employer cannot retaliate against an employee for exercising their First Amendment right to free speech.'. . Mr. Knopf relies on the district court's statement and similarly argues that at the time of his dismissal, it was clearly established that a public employer cannot retaliate against an employee for speaking on matters of public concern. . . But these are general statements of law. As the Supreme Court has cautioned, we must not 'define clearly established law at a high level of generality.'. . These statements merely repeat the generic Garcetti/Pickering standard— 'the First Amendment protects a public employee's right ... to speak as a citizen addressing matters of public concern.'. . Instead, for Mr. Knopf to meet his burden, 'the clearly established law must be particularized to the facts of the case.'. . .The key question is whether Mayor Williams 'reasonably [could] have believed, at the time he fired [Mr. Knopf], that a government employer could fire an employee on account of" speech stemming from almost 30 years of high-level involvement with an ongoing project. . . Mr. Knopf has not shown that such a belief was unreasonable based on then-existing law. Because it would not have been 'beyond debate' to a reasonable official that Mr. Knopf's email exceeded the scope of his official duties, . . . Mayor Williams is entitled to qualified immunity on the particular facts of this case. . . . The dissent's approach to qualified immunity analysis under the first element of Garcetti/Pickering runs counter to precedent. Instead of 'identify[ing] a case where an [official was] acting under similar circumstances,'. . . the dissent 'would apply clearly established general principles derived from Supreme Court precedent—from Lane v. Franks . . . and Garcetti . . . to determine whether the government employee's speech fell outside the scope of his job duties.'. . The dissent fails to cite a Supreme Court or Tenth Circuit case supporting its approach. . . .The dissent's lens, which is limited to Lane and Garcetti, should widen to consider relevant 'Supreme Court or Tenth Circuit decision[s], or the weight of authority from other courts' in determining whether clearly established law applies to this case. . . .The dissent also suggests, again without precedent, that the first step of Garcetti/Pickering warrants different treatment than other qualified immunity cases because of its focus on the plaintiff-employee's speech as opposed to the defendant-official's conduct. . . But we rarely focus on one party's conduct in qualified immunity analysis. . . The question here, as in other contexts, considers the conduct of both parties: would a reasonable person in Mayor Williams's position have understood Mr. Knopf to have spoken outside his official duties? . . . . Based on the foregoing opinion and Judge Briscoe's concurrence, this court reverses the district court's denial of qualified immunity on Mr. Knopf's First Amendment retaliation claim. . . . Our 'sliding scale' approach to qualified immunity in Fourth Amendment excessive force cases comes closest to supporting the dissent's approach, but not nearly close enough. Under that approach, we have stated that '[t]he more obviously egregious the conduct in light of prevailing [Fourth Amendment] constitutional principles, the less specificity is required from prior case law to clearly establish the violation.' Casey v. City of Fed. Heights, 509 F.3d 1278, 1284 (10th Cir. 2007). But see Lowe v. Raemisch, 864 F.3d 1205, 1211 (10th Cir. 2017) (stating that "our sliding-scale approach may arguably conflict with recent Supreme Court precedent on qualified immunity"). Here, it is far from obvious that Mr. Knopf's communication at issue occurred outside his official duties. See Concurrence at —— ("[I]t is a close question" whether "Mr. Knopf's email did not fall within the scope of his official duties as a City employee").")

Knopf v. Williams, 884 F.3d 939, 951, 954-57 (10th Cir. 2018) (Briscoe, J., concurring) ("I agree with Judge Matheson that 'Knopf did not meet his burden of showing that any violation of the First Amendment he may have suffered was based on clearly established law.'. . But I also conclude, as a preliminary matter, that Knopf failed to establish that defendant Williams violated his First Amendment rights by declining to reappoint him. . . .In the end, although it is a close question, I agree with the district court that Knopf's email did not fall within the scope of his official duties as a City employee. Thus, I conclude that the district court did not err in analyzing the first step of the Garcetti/Pickering framework. . . .I conclude, contrary to the determination made by the district court, that the interests expressed by Williams and the City were significant enough to outweigh Knopf's interest in speaking to Boal. Consequently, I conclude that Knopf failed to establish that Williams violated his First Amendment rights by failing to reappoint him as City Planner. . . .In denying summary judgment in favor of Williams, the district court also concluded that Knopf established that the law applicable to his First Amendment retaliation claim was clearly established at the time that Williams decided not to reappoint him as City Planner. Judge Matheson concludes, and I agree, that the district court erred in reaching this conclusion. . . .As discussed above, it is a very close question whether, under step one of the Garcetti/Pickering framework, Knopf's email was made pursuant to his official duties or was, instead, a matter of private speech. The difficulties posed by that analysis highlight why it may not have been clearly established in late 2015 that Knopf's email constituted protected First Amendment speech, rather than simply work-related speech. Moreover, Knopf has not pointed to any case that is remotely factually similar from 2015 or before, i.e., a case in which a court held that a similar email constituted protected First Amendment speech by a public employee. . . Thus, I conclude that it was entirely reasonable for Williams to 'believe that, as a legal matter, [Knopf] w[as] speaking in [his] capacity as [an] employee[ ] of the [City]' rather than as a private citizen. . . Likewise, Knopf has not pointed to a single case that is remotely factually similar in terms of discussing whether a public employee can be terminated (or not reappointed) in response to having sent an email to another public employee regarding a matter of public concern. Thus, again, he has failed to demonstrate that it was clearly established, in late 2015 or early 2016, that it was unconstitutional for a supervisor to terminate a subordinate for having sent an email like the one that Knopf sent. In short, Knopf has failed to identify clearly established law that is 'particularized' to the facts of his case. . . That is because, as of late 2015 and early 2016, the outcome of the Pickering balancing test, as applied to the facts presented in this case, did not place 'beyond debate' the questions of whether Knopf spoke as a private citizen when he sent his email and, in turn, whether it was proper for Williams to discipline Knopf for sending the email. . .

Knopf v. Williams, 884 F.3d 939, 957-63 & n. 3, 967 (10th Cir. 2018) (Ebel, J., dissenting) ("Plaintiff Paul Knopf claims his government boss, Evanston's Mayor Kent Williams, declined to reappoint Knopf as City planner in retaliation for Knopf engaging in speech protected by the First Amendment. I would affirm the district court's decision to deny the Mayor qualified immunity from Knopf's damages claim at the summary-judgment stage of this litigation. My conclusion is contrary to both of the other opinions in this case. I would, in particular, not require for purposes of the qualified-immunity analysis that Knopf identify factually on-point precedent that clearly established that the speech in which Knopf engaged—sending an email to the City attorney expressing concern about the possible misuse of City money in a greenway development project—fell outside the scope of Knopf's job duties as City planner, which is the first prong of the Garcetti/Pickering. . . test. This initial predicate inquiry in the five-part Garcetti/Pickering analysis that applies to Knopf's First Amendment claim turns, not on the defendant's alleged misconduct, but instead on the legal question of the precise and nuanced job duties required of Evanston's planner. There was only one Evanston planner with Knopf's job duties and responsibilities, so to require him to come up with preexisting precedent clearly establishing his job duties is not only impractical—it is in fact not possible. Requiring Knopf to come up with such precedent before he can defeat a qualified-immunity defense is to tell Knopf, and countless other government employees with unique jobs, that they have been disenfranchised from being able to assert their constitutional rights—here, First Amendment rights—against their employer. A government employee like Knopf will rarely, if ever, be able to identify a prior Supreme Court or Tenth Circuit case holding that a person with his particular job title and his same accompanying duties, engaging in the same speech under similar circumstances, was acting beyond the scope of his unique job duties. Instead, I would apply clearly established general principles derived from Supreme Court precedent—from Lane v. Franks. . . and Garcetti . . . to determine whether the government employee's speech fell outside the scope of his job duties. Of course, on the other four Garcetti/Pickering inquiries, I do agree that there has to be prior factually relevant precedent to defeat qualified immunity. But I believe that requirement is satisfied here. . . .Contrary to both my colleagues in the majority opinion, I conclude that, although there must be a prior case that clearly establishes the First Amendment violation under Garcetti/Pickering's factors two through five, I would not require a prior case that clearly establishes, at the first Garcetti/Pickering inquiry, that an employee in Knopf's position would have been speaking outside the scope of his job duties when he sent an email to the City attorney, another City department head, complaining about the possible misuse of city money in a development project that the person in Knopf's position was not overseeing. . . .I conclude, as the district court did, that Knopf sufficiently established a First Amendment claim that, on the merits, was sufficient to survive the Mayor's summary-judgment motion. The qualified-immunity question, which I address next, is whether Knopf's claimed First Amendment violation was clearly established at the time the Mayor refused to reappoint Knopf City planning director. . . .Although, as just mentioned, ordinarily to defeat a qualified-immunity defense, the plaintiff must identify a case clearly establishing the unconstitutional nature of the defendant government official's challenged conduct, I would not require, as the majority does, that Knopf locate a factually on-point case clearly establishing that a city department head, like Knopf, would be acting outside the scope of his job duties, analogous to Knopf's employment responsibilities, if he sent an email to the City attorney, a co-equal city department head, complaining about the misuse of city money in a development project that the person in Knopf's position was not overseeing. The fact of the matter is that a senior government employee will rarely, if ever, be able to find such a close factually analogous prior case addressing whether a person with his same job title and responsibilities, employed by the same employer or one with a closely similar job description and employment duties and reporting responsibilities, engaging in the particular speech at issue, was acting outside the scope of his or her official or ordinary job responsibilities as those job responsibilities were both legally and factually applied to this particular plaintiff. Even if a plaintiff-employee could somehow find a prior case addressing the job responsibilities of his exact or closely comparable government position, whether speech undertaken in a particular case fell outside his job duties as applied would still turn on myriad details unique to a given case—including not only the plaintiff-employee's (1) official job duties, but also (2) the informal customs developed around the performance of those duties and (3) further nuances involving, for example, the plaintiff-employee's understanding from his supervisors of how and what exactly the plaintiff's job entails in the particular factual scenario presented. It will be virtually impossible for any plaintiff-employee to find such a closely analogous prior Supreme Court or Tenth Circuit case, unless the prior case happened to involve this same plaintiff or, at the very least, involved another employee of the same government employer with a similar job description who chose a closely similar route to protest a similarly serious transgression of government law and ethics. That is just not a realistic possibility. To require the plaintiff to find such a directly analogous prior case would essentially grant all government employers qualified immunity on any employee's First Amendment claim at the first Garcetti/Pickering prong before even getting to the substance of the alleged wrongdoing. It is not surprising, then, that Knopf could not cite to any prior Supreme Court or Tenth Circuit case with closely analogous facts addressing whether a government employee was acting outside the scope of his job duties. That should not be fatal to Knopf's First Amendment retaliation claim. Nor do I think such a close factually analogous case is required at this first step in the Garcetti/Pickering analysis. The usual qualified-immunity inquiry—asking whether 'at the time of the [official's] conduct, the law was sufficiently clear that every reasonable official would understand what he is doing is unlawful,'. . . focuses on the defendant government official's conduct. In contrast, the inquiry at the first step of the Garcetti/Pickering analysis focuses instead on whether the plaintiff-employee's speech fell within that employee's job duties. That question presents a legal determination. Although the second and third Garcetti/Pickering inquiries are also legal questions, this first prong presents a very different inquiry. . . That first inquiry may turn, at least in part, on legal authorities such as government regulations or job descriptions setting forth the employee's job responsibilities and authority to act for his government employer. To remain true to the purpose of the qualified-immunity analysis, of course, it must be clear to a reasonable person in the defendant government official's position that the plaintiff-employee was acting outside his job duties. But who better to make that determination, which is typically a sui generis legal question, . . . than the court in the unique context of the case before it? . . . .Here, as in these other cases [discussed], it was clearly established at the time that the Mayor declined to reappoint Knopf that a government employee's speech made outside the scope of his job duties was protected by the First Amendment. And the Supreme Court's clearly established principles for making that determination, set forth in Garcetti and Lane and applied by prior Tenth Circuit cases, provide sufficient guidance for us to determine whether it was clear to a reasonable government employee that the plaintiff employee's speech was constitutionally protected because it fell outside his job duties. That was enough to satisfy the first Garcetti/Pickering inquiry under the qualified-immunity analysis. Applying these clearly established principles here, then, it would have been clear to a reasonable person in the Mayor's position that Knopf sent his email outside the scope of his job duties. The Mayor would, or should, have been aware that Knopf had no official duties as to the phase of the greenway development project that was the subject of the email, and that he did not have general oversight responsibilities for the department head involved in that phase of the project. The Mayor also would, or should, have been aware that Knopf sent the email to someone outside Knopf's chain of command, the City attorney. In fact, this was one of the Mayor's primary complaints about Knopf's email, that it bypassed the Mayor, who was Knopf's supervisor. Moreover, the Mayor would, or should, have been aware that any citizen with concerns over the misuse of City money in the greenway development project could have sent such an email to the City attorney expressing those concerns. Further, the Mayor knew or should have known that the underlying allegations of financial favoritism had been discussed at a public city council meeting. The facts that Knopf did not make his concerns public and that the email concerned information that Knopf may have acquired because of his government job do not preclude the conclusion that sending that email was outside the scope of Knopf's job duties. . . .I conclude, contrary to both the majority and the concurrence, that Knopf has established a First Amendment violation of his right to free speech sufficient to defeat summary judgment, has shown that it was clear to a reasonable person in the Mayor's position that Knopf's email fell outside the scope of Knopf's ordinary job responsibilities, and that the First Amendment violation was otherwise clearly established at the time the Mayor refused to reappoint Knopf City planning director. On that basis, I would affirm the district court's decision to deny the Mayor's summary judgment motion asserted he is entitled to qualified immunity.")

Scott v. Mid-Del Sch. Bd. of Educ., 724 F. App'x 650, ___ (10th Cir. 2018) ("In Garcia, elementary-school officials administered two beatings to a nine-year-old girl, immobilizing her and using a paddle that was split into two pieces so that 'when it hit, it clapped and grabbed,' and resulted in severe injuries. . . Similarly here, Ms. Scott alleged that Mr. McGuire caused numerous physical injuries to B.P. by hitting him with the bathroom-stall door and pushing him back against the stall. She further alleged that Mr. McGuire blocked B.P. in the stall and cursed and bullied him while he was in the vulnerable position of having his pants down. Although the facts of Garcia are not identical to those here, 'we do not require plaintiffs to produce a factually identical case, but allow some degree of generality in factual correspondence.' Armijo ex rel. Chavez v. Wagon Mound Pub. Sch., 159 F.3d 1253, 1260 (10th Cir. 1998). At the Rule 12(b)(6) stage, the district court found that the complaint stated a claim of conscience-shocking behavior by Mr. McGuire. Mr. McGuire's alleged conduct sufficiently resembles the conduct we held unconstitutional in Garcia such that 'a reasonable official in [his] position would have known that [his] actions violated [B.P.'s] clearly established right,' T.D., 868 F.3d at 1213. He was therefore not entitled to qualified immunity at this stage of the proceedings.")

Poore v. Glanz, 724 F. App'x 635, ___ (10th Cir. 2018) ("[W]e reject the argument that defendants are entitled to qualified immunity because this court has not previously held that the precise combination of policies implemented by Glanz constituted deliberate indifference. We have recognized 'it is clearly established that a prison official's deliberate indifference to sexual abuse by prison employees violates the Eighth Amendment.'. . And because 'a prison official's failure to protect an inmate from a known harm may constitute a constitutional violation,' we have further held it to be clearly established that inmates possess 'a constitutional right to expect' that jail officials will 'reasonabl[y] protect[ ]' them from such abuse. . . Principles regarding supervisory liability in this context are also firmly established. In Dodds, we explained that 'the clearly established prong of the qualified immunity inquiry asks whether the contours of the right the plaintiff claims the defendant violated are sufficiently clear that a reasonable official would understand that what he is doing violates that right.'. . We concluded it was 'clearly established by 2007 that officials may be held individually liable for policies they promulgate, implement, or maintain that deprive persons of their federally protected rights.'. . We have held corrections supervisors liable for failing to protect inmates from sexual abuse from staff on several occasions. . . .[D]efendants correctly point out that other facts not present in this case supported a finding of deliberate indifference in Keith I, Tafoya, and Keith II. But the qualified immunity analysis is not 'a scavenger hunt for prior cases with precisely the same facts'; the relevant inquiry is 'whether the law put officials on fair notice that the described conduct was unconstitutional.'. . 'We cannot find qualified immunity wherever we have a new fact pattern.'. . Although each of the conditions identified by Poore taken individually would not constitute a clearly established violation of Poore's Eighth Amendment rights, the confluence of factors in this case impels us to affirm the district court's denial of qualified immunity. . . A reasonable official in Glanz's position, who had his subjective knowledge of the dangers posed by conditions in the north wing, would have been on fair notice that his conduct was unlawful.")

Marin v. King, 720 F. App'x 923, (10th Cir. 2018)) ("Plaintiffs cite no authority—from the Supreme Court, our circuit, or any other circuit—demonstrating it was clearly established that such a statement made to an affiant by a private citizen volunteer, not employed or paid by any government entity, can serve as a basis for a Franks violation, even when the individual acted under color of state law for purposes of § 1983. Instead, the federal cases Plaintiffs cite to—Kennedy, DeLeon, Wapnick, Calisto, and Pritchard—all involved paid city employees with delineated investigatory roles. Accordingly, these cases do nothing to establish that a reasonable individual in Ms. Ferguson's or Dr. Norris's position on the Task Force, as a private citizen without law enforcement training or training regarding constitutional rights, would have recognized that he or she was violating Plaintiffs' constitutional rights by making knowingly and intentionally, or recklessly, false statements to Mr. Salas. And, within the context of qualified immunity, the burden falls squarely on the plaintiff to identify case law demonstrating that a defendant's conduct violated clearly established law such that a reasonable person in the defendant's position would have known she was violating the plaintiff's rights. . . In an attempt to overcome the absence of case law establishing that a private citizen volunteer commits a constitutional violation by providing a false statement that is later innocently incorporated into a search warrant affidavit, Plaintiffs contend that a reasonable jury could find Ms. Ferguson and Dr. Norris were not merely citizen advisors but acted as law enforcement officers. Plaintiffs cite, among other things, evidence that Ms. Ferguson requested insignia that would show the 'law enforcement' capacity of the Task Force members; that Ms. Ferguson was the Task Force's 'coordinator'; and that Dr. Norris was the Task Force's 'forensic veterinarian.' They also cite evidence indicating that neither Mr. Salas nor Ms. Ferguson viewed Ms. Ferguson's role as merely advisory. But Plaintiffs' argument that a jury could conclude that Ms. Ferguson and Dr. Norris were law enforcement officers runs contrary to language in Plaintiffs' complaint relative to Plaintiffs' supervisor liability claim against Mr. King and Mr. Suttle. Specifically, Plaintiffs alleged that 'King and Suttle knew that Ferguson was not a peace officer, a law enforcement officer of any other sort, held no public office, and had had no training in law enforcement or the constitutional rights of citizens.'. .And, once again, Plaintiffs provide no federal authority for the proposition that private citizens—who are not employed or compensated by the state and who do not receive any law enforcement training or training on constitutional rights—can be considered law enforcement officers. Indeed, our review of federal law has not yielded any authority treating a private citizen volunteer as a law enforcement officer for purposes of assessing a qualified immunity defense.")

Pauly v. White, 874 F.3d 1197, 1211, 1213-14, 1222-23 (10th Cir. 2017) (Pauly III), cert. denied, 138 S. Ct. 2650 (2018) ("After reading plaintiffs' brief in opposition to the officers' petition for certiorari and plaintiffs' supplemental brief to us after the Supreme Court vacated our judgment, we are convinced that we misstated the facts in Pauly I. Originally, we had the following view of Officer White's role in the altercation: 'Officer White did not participate in the events leading up to the armed confrontation, nor was he there to hear the other officers ordering the brothers to "Come out or we're coming in." Almost immediately upon Officer White's arrival, one of the brothers shouted "We have guns."' Pauly I, 814 F.3d at 1076 (internal citations omitted). But this was not an accurate portrayal of the events that unfolded on that rainy night in rural New Mexico almost six years ago. Unfortunately, we were misled by defendant's briefs on appeal. . . From the beginning, defendants framed the case as one where Officer White entered the situation without participation in, or knowledge of, the alleged reckless conduct of the officers that escalated into a gunfight, and plaintiffs responded accordingly. Our review of the record on remand shows otherwise. It turns out that if the facts are viewed in the light most favorable to plaintiffs, Officer White's reckless or deliberate conduct unreasonably created a need for him to shoot Samuel Pauly. . . . [C]ontrary to our determination in Pauly I, . . . we are now persuaded a reasonable jury could find that Officer White participated in the events leading up to the armed confrontation and heard the other officers threaten the brothers by saying, 'Come out or we're coming in.'. . A reasonable jury could thus conclude that Officer White acted recklessly by precipitating the need to use deadly force. . . .As we explained above, in Pauly I we analyzed Officers Mariscal and Truesdale together while analyzing Officer White separately because we thought the facts warranted it. . . Although we now recognize that a reasonable jury could find Officer White's pre-seizure conduct to be just as reckless as Officers Mariscal and Truesdale, we still believe the facts warrant a separate qualified immunity analysis because Officer White is the only officer who actually shot Samuel Pauly. . . .Turning to this case, we look first to Officer White, as he is the one who actually 'seized' Samuel Pauly by shooting him. Viewing the facts in the light most favorable to plaintiffs, the district court determined that the brothers were in their home when Officers Mariscal and Truesdale—and Officer White shortly thereafter—approached their house while it was dark and raining and, without knocking on the door, made threatening comments about intruding into the home. In response, the brothers shouted 'We have guns,' hoping to scare off their perceived home invaders, and all three officers took cover. In particular, Officer White took cover behind a rock wall approximately fifty feet away from the house. Samuel Pauly opened the window of his home and pointed his gun aimlessly into the dark in the direction of Officer White. Within five seconds of Samuel pointing his gun out of the window, Officer White shot Samuel in the heart without first identifying himself or warning Samuel to put down his weapon. To analyze the reasonableness of Officer White's actions, we turn to the ubiquitous three factor test from Graham v. Connor. . . .Based on the record in the present case, viewed in the light most favorable to plaintiffs, Officer White did not have probable cause to believe there was an immediate threat of serious harm to himself or to Officer Mariscal. This is especially true considering Officer White may have participated in the reckless conduct that lead to his perceived need to shoot Samuel Pauly. Thus, Officer White's use of deadly force was not objectively reasonable and violated Samuel Pauly's constitutional right to be free from excessive force. . . .The district court relied on Allen, 119 F.3d at 841, in concluding that Officer White had violated clearly established law. It stated that '[s]ince 1997, it has been clearly established in the Tenth Circuit "that an officer is responsible for his or her reckless conduct that precipitates the need to use force."'. . . But this statement suffers from the same lack of specificity as does the general propositions from Graham and Garner that 'use of force is contrary to the Fourth Amendment if it is excessive under objective standards of reasonableness,' which, by itself, 'is not enough.'. . The statement in Allen, that the reasonableness inquiry includes an evaluation of an officer's actions leading up to the use of force, is absolutely relevant in determining whether a police officer acted unreasonably in effecting a seizure, as we illustrated above. But it cannot alone serve as the basis for concluding that an officer's particular use of excessive force was 'clearly established,' Pauly II, 137 S.Ct. at 552. Accordingly, Allen is of little help in this case because the facts are completely different. Because there is no case 'close enough on point to make the unlawfulness of [Officer White's] actions apparent,' Pauly I, 814 F.3d at 1091 (Moritz, J., Dissenting) (alteration in original) (quoting Mascorro, 656 F.3d at 1208), we conclude that Officer White is entitled to qualified immunity. . . .Officer White is entitled to qualified immunity because his alleged use of excessive force was not clearly established in the circumstances of this case. It therefore cannot serve as the basis of liability for Officers Mariscal and Truesdale. . . And neither Officer Mariscal nor Truesdale committed a constitutional violation in his own right. Thus, there is no basis for holding either of them liable under § 1983. Accordingly, we REVERSE the district court's denial of summary judgment to Officers Mariscal, Truesdale, and White, and REMAND with instructions to enter judgment in favor of each officer.")

Pauly v. White, 874 F.3d 1197, 1219 n.7 (10th Cir. 2017) (Pauly III), cert. denied, 138 S. Ct. 2650 (2018) ("[T]he concept that pre-seizure conduct should be used in evaluating the reasonableness of an officer's actions is not universally held among other circuits. See, e.g., Schulz v. Long, 44 F.3d 643 (8th Cir. 1995) (holding that evidence of pre-seizure conduct was irrelevant to reasonableness); Cole v. Bone, 993 F.2d 1328, 1333 (8th Cir. 1993) (same); Carter v. Buscher, 973 F.2d 1328, 1332 (7th Cir. 1992) (same); Greenidge v. Ruffin, 927 F.2d 789, 792 (4th Cir. 1991) (same). The Supreme Court very recently had an opportunity to resolve this issue but declined to do so[.] [referencing language in Mendez] Thus, at least for now, Sevier and Allen remain good law in this circuit.")

Pauly v. White, 874 F.3d 1197, 1223 (10th Cir. 2017) (Pauly III) (Moritz, J., concurring), cert. denied, 138 S. Ct. 2650 (2018) ("I agree with the majority that White is entitled to qualified immunity because the contours of the constitutional right at issue aren't clearly established. . . But unlike the majority, I would decline to address the constitutional question.")

Brown v. City of Colorado Springs, 709 F. App'x 906, ___ (10th Cir. 2017) ("Brown asks us to do exactly what the Supreme Court has told us not to do—define clearly established law based on Graham and Garner. . . The Supreme Court rejected this same argument in Pauly, declaring that 'Garner and Graham do not by themselves create clearly established law.'. .The district court properly recognized that 'there is no precedent for the claims in this case.'. . In the Supreme Court's words, '[t]his alone should have been an important indication' that officers didn't violate a clearly established Fourth Amendment right. . . Just as the plaintiff in Pauly had failed to show that an 'officer acting under similar circumstances as [the officer-defendant] was held to have violated the Fourth Amendment,' Brown has failed to cite a case holding that an officer acting under similar circumstances as presented here had violated the Fourth Amendment. . . Instead, Brown relies on cautionary language from flashbang cases to show that the officers in this case violated a clearly established Fourth Amendment right when they detonated an explosive device while executing an arrest warrant. For a variety of reasons, we are unpersuaded that those cases provide Brown much help. . . .Brown cannot show any Supreme Court or Tenth Circuit decision on point or that the clearly established weight of authority from other circuits prohibited the officers' conduct in this case. . . Thus, we must reverse the district court's denial of qualified immunity to the Defendants on Brown's individual-capacity claims.")

Malone v. Bd. of County Commissioners, 707 F. App'x 552, ___ (10th Cir. 2017) (" 'For the law to be "clearly established," there ordinarily must be a Supreme Court or Tenth Circuit opinion on point, or the clearly established weight of authority from other circuits must point in one direction.'. . The Supreme Court has warned not to define a clearly established right 'at a high level of generality.'. . Instead, 'the clearly established law must be particularized to the facts of the case.'. . 'This is not to say that an official action is protected by qualified immunity unless the very action in question has previously been held unlawful, but it is to say that in the light of pre-existing law the unlawfulness must be apparent.'. . 'A clearly established right is one that is sufficiently clear that every reasonable official would have understood that what he is doing violates that right.'. . 'Such specificity is especially important in the Fourth Amendment context, where the Court has recognized that it is sometimes difficult for an officer to determine how the relevant legal doctrine, here excessive force, will apply to the factual situation the officer confronts.'. . For example, in Mullenix, an excessive-force case, the Supreme Court rejected as too general the 'rule that a police officer may not use deadly force against a fleeing felon who does not pose a sufficient threat of harm to the officer or others.'. . Instead, the relevant inquiry into whether the law at issue there was clearly established had to incorporate the particular facts presented in that case, asking: whether it was clearly established that the use of deadly force against 'a reportedly intoxicated fugitive, set on avoiding capture through high-speed vehicular flight, who twice during his flight had threatened to shoot police officers, and who was moments away from encountering an officer' violated the Fourth Amendment. . . Mullenix also cited to Brosseau v. Haugen, 543 U.S. 194, 199-200 (2004) (per curiam), in which the Supreme Court framed the question as 'whether it was clearly established that the Fourth Amendment prohibited the officer's conduct in the "situation [she] confronted": whether to shoot a disturbed felon, set on avoiding capture through vehicular flight, when persons in the immediate area are at risk from that flight.'. . .Applying the Supreme Court's guidance here, the parties do not cite, nor could we find, any Supreme Court or Tenth Circuit case that is sufficiently close factually to the circumstances presented here to establish clearly the Fourth Amendment law that applies to our case. The cases Malone mentions in his brief are not sufficiently analogous.")

T.D. v. Patton, 868 F.3d 1209, 1212-13 (10th Cir. 2017), cert. denied, 138 S. Ct. 1270 (2018) ("We agree with the district court that Ms. Patton violated T.D.'s substantive due process right by knowingly placing T.D. in a position of danger and knowingly increasing T.D.'s vulnerability to danger. . . She recommended to the juvenile court that T.D. be placed and remain in Mr. Duerson's temporary custody despite her admitted concerns about T.D.'s safety in the home, her knowledge of Mr. Duerson's criminal history that included a conviction for attempted sexual assault against a minor in his care, and notice of evidence that Mr. Duerson was potentially abusing T.D. She failed to inform the juvenile court about her concerns and knowledge of Mr. Duerson's criminal history and made her affirmative recommendations out of fear of being fired. . . . Ms. Patton acted recklessly and in conscious disregard of a known and substantial risk that T.D. would suffer serious, immediate, and proximate harm in his father's home. Her conduct, taken as a whole, shocks the conscience and thus amounts to a substantive due process violation under the Fourteenth Amendment. Based on the facts and legal determination in this court's Currier decision, a reasonable official in Ms. Patton's shoes would have understood she was violating T.D.'s constitutional rights. In both Currier and here, county social workers removed children from their mothers' homes and placed them in their fathers' homes, where the children were abused. The social workers in both cases failed to alert the juvenile court of relevant facts undermining the fathers' fitness as caretakers and recommended that the fathers assume custody of the children—despite being on notice that the fathers' homes were places of danger. And, in both cases, the social workers failed to investigate whether the fathers were abusing their children, despite being on notice of evidence suggesting abuse. Ms. Patton's conduct sufficiently resembles the conduct we held unconstitutional in Currier such that a reasonable official in her position would have known that her actions violated T.D.'s clearly established right. She was therefore not entitled to qualified immunity.")

Starrett v. City of Lander, 699 F. App'x 805, ___ (10th Cir. 2017) ("On appeal, Mrs. Starrett has offered no case to meet her burden of showing that the law was clearly established that she was entitled to resist Sergeant Romero's attempt to follow Mr. Starrett into the house to retrieve his shoes by shutting the door and telling him he could not enter because he did not have a warrant. Nor has she pointed us to any case that 'squarely governs the case here[.]'. . Instead, she relies on three older Supreme Court cases stating there is a common-law right to resist an unlawful arrest. . . But that right 'has given way in many jurisdictions to the modern view that the use of force is not justifiable to resist an arrest which the actor knows is being made by a peace officer, although the arrest is unlawful.' . . In any event, none of the cases is sufficiently 'particularized to the facts of [this] case[.]'. .We conclude that, given the 'unique set of facts and circumstances' this case presents, . . . Sergeant Romero and Officer Ramsey had arguable probable cause to arrest Mrs. Starrett for interference under Wyo. Stat. Ann. § 6-5-204(a). The district court therefore properly determined that the officers are entitled to qualified immunity on the unlawful arrest claim. . . . As in the district court, Mrs. Starrett has on appeal failed to 'identify a case where an officer acting under similar circumstances as [Officer Ramsey] was held to have violated the Fourth Amendment.'. . Instead, she outlines Graham's general excessive-force principles. But the Graham factors 'do not by themselves create clearly established law,'. . . and, given the unique circumstances here, '[t]his is not a case where it is obvious that there was a violation of clearly established law under ... Graham.'. . We therefore conclude that Officer Ramsey was entitled to qualified immunity on the excessive-force claim.")

Apodaca v. Raemisch, 864 F.3d 1071, 1074-79 (10th Cir. 2017), cert. denied, 138 S. Ct. ___ (U.S. Oct. 9, 2018) ("We conclude that even if the alleged prohibition on outdoor exercise had violated the Eighth Amendment, the underlying constitutional right would not have been clearly established. The right would not have been clearly established because existing precedent would have left the constitutional question within the realm of reasonable debate. The underlying right turns on our opinion in Perkins. But Perkins can be read either expansively or narrowly. Under an expansive reading, Perkins would squarely prohibit the alleged denial of outdoor exercise for eleven months. But, under a narrow reading, Perkins would apply only to denials of out-of-cell exercise—a situation not present here. We need not decide which reading is correct. Because Perkins is ambiguous, our opinions do not clearly establish that an eleven-month deprivation of outdoor exercise would violate the Eighth Amendment. . . .A constitutional right is clearly established when a Tenth Circuit precedent is on point, making the constitutional violation apparent. . . This precedent cannot define the right at a high level of generality. . . Rather, the precedent must be particularized to the facts. . . But even when such a precedent exists, subsequent Tenth Circuit cases may conflict with or clarify the earlier precedent, rendering the law unclear.

See Lane v. Franks, 134 S. Ct. 2369, 2382-83 (2014). A precedent is often particularized when it involves materially similar facts. . . But the precedent may be adequately particularized even if the facts differ, for general precedents may clearly establish the law when the defendant's conduct '"obvious[ly]"' violates the law. . . Thus, a right is clearly established when a precedent involves '"materially similar conduct"' or applies '"with obvious clarity"' to the conduct at issue. . . .The plaintiffs allege a deprivation of the right to exercise outdoors for roughly eleven months. For the sake of argument, we may assume that this deprivation would violate the Eighth Amendment. Even with this assumption, the warden and director would enjoy qualified immunity because the underlying constitutional right had not been clearly established. Roughly three decades ago, we recognized a consensus in the case law regarding the importance of outdoor exercise for prisoners: 'There is substantial agreement among the cases ... that some form of regular outdoor exercise is extremely important to the psychological and physical well being of inmates ....' Bailey v. Shillinger, 828 F.2d 651, 653 (10th Cir. 1987) (per curiam). But we also made clear that a denial of outdoor exercise does not per se violate the Eighth Amendment. . .In the absence of a per se violation, courts must examine the totality of the circumstances. Perkins v. Kan. Dep't of Corr., 165 F.3d 803, 810 n.8 (10th Cir. 1999). These circumstances include the length of the deprivation. . . .The plaintiffs rely on our published opinion in Perkins v. Kansas Department of Corrections. In Perkins, a prisoner invoked the Eighth Amendment, alleging a continuing inability to exercise outside of his cell for more than nine months. . . The district court dismissed the claim, and we reversed. . . In reversing, we expressed our holding in terms of the denial of 'outdoor exercise.'. . But, as noted above, the plaintiff in Perkins had alleged the inability to exercise not only outdoors but also anywhere outside of his cell. . .The resulting issue is whether our holding was • narrow, prohibiting only the extended denial of exercise outside of the cell.

• expansive, prohibiting the extended denial of exercise outdoors or

The plaintiffs embrace the expansive interpretation of Perkins. . . . The warden and director embrace the narrow interpretation of Perkins, insisting that it applies only to deprivations of out-of-cell exercise. This interpretation also appears reasonable based on the content of Perkins and the later unpublished opinion in Ajaj v. United States, 293 F. App'x 575 (10th Cir. 2008). . . .[A] narrow interpretation is supported by our unpublished opinion in Ajaj, where we held that a year-long deprivation of outdoor exercise did not violate the Eighth Amendment. . . . If Perkins is read broadly, Ajaj might appear to conflict with Perkins. . . Which reading of Perkins is correct? We need not decide that today. For now, it is enough to conclude that the question is within the realm of reasonable debate, for Perkins can be read either expansively or narrowly. . . .At a minimum, Perkins would not render the warden and director 'plainly incompetent' for failing to recognize a constitutional prohibition against an eleven-month ban on outdoor exercise. Perkins's ambiguity means that our circuit has not clearly established a right to outdoor exercise over an eleven-month period. As a result, the warden and director are entitled to qualified immunity.")

Lowe v. Raemisch, 864 F.3d 1205, 1208-12 & n.10 (10th Cir. 2017), cert. denied, 138 S. Ct. ___ (U.S. Oct. 9, 2018) ("The law is clearly established when a Supreme Court or Tenth Circuit precedent is on point or the alleged right is clearly established from case law in other circuits. . . The precedent is considered on point if it involves '"materially similar conduct"' or applies

‘“with obvious clarity”’ to the conduct at issue. Because the prior case must involve materially similar conduct or apply with obvious clarity, qualified immunity generally protects all public officials except those who are ‘“plainly incompetent or those who knowingly violate the law.”’ Mr. Lowe’s claim involves the disallowance of exercise outdoors rather than outside of his cell. In precedential opinions, we have reached four conclusions on the constitutionality of denying outdoor exercise to inmates:

1. The denial of outdoor exercise could violate the Eighth Amendment ‘under certain circumstances.’
2. The denial of outdoor exercise does not create a per se violation of the Eighth Amendment.
3. Restricting outdoor exercise to one hour per week does not violate the Eighth Amendment.
4. The denial of outdoor exercise for three years could arguably involve deliberate indifference to an inmate’s health under the Eighth Amendment.

These conclusions permit reasonable debate on the constitutionality of disallowing outdoor exercise for two years and one month. We have said that denying outdoor exercise could violate the Constitution under some circumstances, but we have not defined those circumstances. Thus, the constitutional inquiry would depend on a case-by-case examination of the totality of circumstances. . . .[W]e lack any on-point precedent regarding the constitutionality of disallowing outdoor exercise for a period approximating two years and one month. . . .Even when no precedent involves facts ‘materially similar’ to ours, the right can be clearly established if a precedent applies with ‘obvious clarity.’. . When the public official’s conduct is egregious, even a general precedent would apply with obvious clarity. . . .Even in the absence of egregious conduct, the constitutional violation may be so obvious that similar conduct seldom arises in our cases. . . .Ultimately, we consider whether our precedents render the legality of the conduct undebatable. Aldaba v. Pickens, 844 F.3d 870, 877 (10th Cir. 2016).[10] [fn. 10: We have described these principles in terms of a sliding scale. . . But our sliding-scale approach may arguably conflict with recent Supreme Court precedent on qualified immunity. See Aldaba v. Pickens, 844 F.3d 870, 874 n.1 (10th Cir. 2016). The possibility of a conflict arises because the sliding-scale approach may allow us to find a clearly established right even when a precedent is neither on point nor obviously applicable. . . We need not decide today whether our sliding-scale approach conflicts with Supreme Court precedent. As explained in the text, the defendants lacked clearly applicable precedents showing whether denial of outdoor exercise for two years and one month was sufficiently serious to violate the Eighth Amendment.] On this record, however, the deprivation of outdoor exercise for two years and one month would not have obviously crossed a constitutional line. Thus, the underlying right was not clearly established and the defendants are entitled to qualified immunity. . . .Qualified immunity is unavailable to officials who ‘knowingly violate the law.’. . Mr. Lowe applies this principle, arguing that the two officials knew that they were violating the law because a district court had already found a constitutional violation based on similar conditions at the same prison. . . We reject this argument based on a key factual distinction with the prior district court case, a conflict with Supreme Court precedent, and the existence of an erroneous assumption. First, the deprivation in the district court’s earlier case spanned twelve years. Anderson v. Colorado, 887 F. Supp. 2d 1133, 1138 (D. Colo. 2012). Here the alleged deprivation was far shorter: two years and one month. Second, the Supreme Court rejected a nearly identical argument in Ashcroft v. al-Kidd, 563 U.S.

731 (2011). There the Court concluded that a district court opinion, which identified the same defendant (Attorney General Ashcroft) and said that his actions were unconstitutional, did not clearly establish the underlying right because a district court's holding is not controlling in any jurisdiction. . .Third, Mr. Lowe assumes that a defendant's knowledge affects the availability of qualified immunity. We reject that assumption, for there is a single standard: 'whether it would have been clear to a reasonable officer that the alleged conduct "was unlawful in the situation he confronted."' If this standard is met, the defendant would be either plainly incompetent or a knowing violator of the law. . . For these reasons, the district court's Anderson ruling does not preclude qualified immunity.") [footnotes omitted]

Sause v. Bauer, 859 F.3d 1270, 1274-75 (10th Cir. 2017) ("[W]e assume that the defendants violated Sause's rights under the First Amendment when, according to Sause, they repeatedly mocked her, ordered her to stop praying so they could harass her, threatened her with arrest and public humiliation, insisted that she show them the scars from her double mastectomy, and then 'appeared ... disgust[ed]' when she complied—'all over' a mere noise complaint. . . But this assumption doesn't entitle Sause to relief. Instead, Sause must demonstrate that any reasonable officer would have known this behavior violated the First Amendment. . . Sause argues she can make this showing because it was clearly established that she had a 'right to pray in the privacy of [her] home free from governmental interference,' at least in the absence of 'any legitimate law enforcement interest.'. . Alternatively, she asserts, '[t]he right to be free from official retaliation for exercising one's First Amendment rights [was] also clearly established.'. .We don't disagree with Sause's articulation of these general rights. But the Supreme Court has repeatedly and consistently warned us 'not to define clearly established law at [this] high level of generality.'. . Instead, '[t]he dispositive question is "whether the violative nature of [the defendants'] particular conduct is clearly established."'. . In other words, 'the clearly established law must be "particularized" to the facts of the case.'. . Thus, before we may declare the law to be clearly established, we generally require (1) 'a Supreme Court or Tenth Circuit decision on point,' or (2) a showing that 'the clearly established weight of authority from other courts [has] found the law to be as the plaintiff maintains.'. .Here, Sause doesn't identify a single case in which this court, or any other court for that matter, has found a First Amendment violation based on a factual scenario even remotely resembling the one we encounter here—i.e., a scenario in which (1) officers involved in a legitimate investigation obtain consent to enter a private residence and (2) while there, ultimately cite an individual for violating the law but (3) in the interim, interrupt their investigation to order the individual to stop engaging in religiously-motivated conduct so that they can (4) briefly harass her before (5) issuing a citation. In other words, 'this case presents a unique set of facts and circumstances.'. . And '[t]his alone' provides 'an important indication ... that [the defendants'] conduct did not violate a "clearly established" right.'"), cert. granted and judgment reversed by Sause v. Sause v. Bauer, 859 F.3d 1270, 1279-80 (10th Cir. 2017) (Tymkovich, C.J., concurring) ("I fully join in Judge Moritz's opinion and agree that the officers' conduct here did not violate clearly established First Amendment precedent. I write separately to emphasize that Ms. Sause's allegations fit more neatly in the Fourth Amendment context. And, I must add, either the officers here acted with extraordinary contempt of a law abiding citizen and they should be condemned, or, if Ms. Sause's allegations are untrue, she has done the officers a grave injustice by manufacturing such reprehensible conduct. . . .If true, Ms. Sause's allegations are inconsistent with any legitimate law enforcement purpose capable of justifying a continuing police intrusion in her home. The officers deny the alleged conduct, although we assume for purposes of a motion to dismiss that the allegations are true. And we do not know whether the district court would find a constitutional violation in these circumstances or, if so, whether any violation would be clearly established. But Ms. Sause did not make a Fourth Amendment claim on appeal and has only appealed the First Amendment cause of action. I agree First Amendment law is not clearly established for the reasons articulated by Judge Moritz in her well-written opinion."), cert. granted and judgment reversed by Sause v. Pompeo v. Bd. of Regents of the University of New Mexico, 852 F.3d 973, 990 (10th Cir. 2017) ("In assessing defendants' claims of qualified immunity, we are mindful of the Supreme Court's admonition to 'define the clearly established right at issue on the basis of the specific context of the case.' . . Pompeo claims a right to use language in a course assignment that her professors found to be inflammatory without being criticized or pressured to make revisions. Because we conclude that such a right is not clearly established, the district court's grant of summary judgment in favor of defendants is AFFIRMED.")

Garcia v. Escalante, 678 F. App'x 649, ___, ___ (10th Cir. 2017) ("[A]kin to White, 'this case presents a unique set of facts and circumstances,'. . . that 'alone' should be 'an important indication' to us that Defendants' conduct did not run afoul of clearly established law[.] . . .In sum, guided by Mullenix and its progeny, we adhere to our view that there is no clearly established law that would have put Defendants—like 'every objectively reasonable officer,' Aldaba, 844 F.3d at 877, in a similar position—on notice in March 2009 that their arrest and prosecution of Plaintiff for possessing hydrocodone without a valid prescription was lacking in probable cause, and therefore violative of the Fourth Amendment, notwithstanding Plaintiff's presentation to them of a thirteen- or fourteen-month-old prescription.")

Vogt v. City of Hays, Kansas, 844 F.3d 1235, 1240-42, 1247-48 (10th Cir. 2017), cert. dismissed as improvidently granted, 138 S. Ct. 1683 (2018) ("Following Chavez, a circuit split developed over the definition of a 'criminal case' under the Fifth Amendment. The Third, Fourth, and Fifth Circuits have stated that the Fifth Amendment is only a trial right. . . .In contrast, the Second, Seventh, and Ninth Circuits have held that certain pretrial uses of compelled statements violate the Fifth Amendment. . . .Different approaches have emerged because the Chavez Court declined to pinpoint when a 'criminal case' begins. . . Like the Supreme Court, we have not yet defined the starting point for a 'criminal case.'. . .Like the Supreme Court, we have declined until now to unequivocally state whether the term 'criminal case' covers pretrial proceedings as well as the trial. Precedents like Stover provide conflicting signals without squarely deciding the issue. Nonetheless, today's case requires us to decide whether the term 'criminal case' covers at least one pretrial proceeding: a hearing to determine probable cause. . . .To decide this issue, we join the Second, Seventh, and Ninth Circuits, concluding that the right against self-incrimination is more than a trial right. . . .Until today, the applicability of the Fifth Amendment to pretrial proceedings remained unsettled, for the Supreme Court had declined to decide 'the precise moment when a "criminal case" commences'. . . and we had declined to decide whether the Fifth Amendment applied to pretrial proceedings. . . And outside our circuit, courts had disagreed about the applicability of the Fifth Amendment to pretrial proceedings. . . Thus, when the police officers acted, they could not have known that the Fifth Amendment would be violated by the eventual use of the compelled statement to develop investigatory leads, initiate a criminal investigation, bring charges, or support the prosecution in a probable cause hearing. As a result, the alleged constitutional violation was not clearly established. In similar circumstances, the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals took a different approach. That court interpreted the Fifth Amendment to apply in a pretrial hearing to determine whether to release or detain the defendant. . . This interpretation required the court to determine whether a police detective enjoyed qualified immunity after compelling a statement that was later used in a hearing to determine release or detention. . . To decide qualified immunity, the court considered the underlying purpose of qualified immunity, which was to prevent deterrence of reasonable officers trying to carry out their duties. . . This purpose led the court to 'focus on [the] officer's duties, not on other aspects of the constitutional violation.'. . Focusing on the officer's duties, the court declined to permit qualified immunity because the police detective had been on notice that coercion of a confession could ripen into a Fifth Amendment violation. . . And once the police detective coerced a confession and turned it over to the prosecutor, the detective's role in the constitutional violation was complete. . . Thus, the Ninth Circuit did not tarry over whether the detective would have known which uses would violate the Fifth Amendment; he knew all along that coercing a confession could lead to a Fifth Amendment violation. . . As a result, the Ninth Circuit determined that the detective was not entitled to qualified immunity. . .We respectfully disagree with this approach. The Ninth Circuit appeared to acknowledge that its test would allow police officers to incur personal liability for contributing to a constitutional violation that had not been clearly established. . . But qualified immunity protects officers from liability when the misconduct did not violate a clearly established right. . . The four police officers allegedly compelled a statement used before trial but not in an actual trial. Until now, the precedents had not clearly determined whether these uses would have violated the Fifth Amendment. Thus, even if the police officers could have anticipated the eventual use in a probable cause hearing, they could not have known that this use would violate the Fifth Amendment. Thus, we reject the approach taken in the Ninth Circuit. . . .Because it was not clearly established in 2013 or 2014 that the pretrial use of Mr. Vogt's statements would violate the Fifth Amendment, the four police officers are entitled to qualified immunity.") Browder v. Casaus, 675 F. App'x 845, ___ (10th Cir. 2017) ("As we noted in Browder I, no one contends that Casaus acted with the specific intent to harm—the high end of culpability. . . We further recognized that a jury might ultimately conclude that his actions in '[s]peeding and jumping red lights' amounted to nothing more than negligence, below the level of culpability. . . But on the facts alleged in the complaint, applying the middle, deliberate-indifference standard, we held a jury might also conclude that speeding through city streets for almost 9 miles 'through eleven city intersections and at least one red light—all for [Casaus's] personal pleasure, on no governmental business of any kind' showed a 'conscious contempt of the lives of others' sufficient to shock the conscience and state a substantive due process claim. . . .In Browder I, we found the law clearly established that a police officer could be liable 'for driving in a manner that exhibits "a conscience-shocking deliberate indifference" to the lives of those around him.'. . And Browder I's general statement is entirely consistent with Supreme Court precedent, which has broadly characterized the risks posed by speeding police officers as encompassing 'all those within stopping range, be they suspects, their passengers, other drivers, or bystanders.'. . Accordingly, we agree with the district court that, in order to show Casaus violated their Fourteenth Amendment rights, the Browders had to show only that Casaus acted with deliberate indifference to the risk his conduct posed to the motoring public in general—not to Lindsay and Ashley specifically. . . . Casaus attempts to resurrect his Browder I argument that, at the time of the accident, it wasn't clearly established that the commission of a traffic infraction by an officer in a police car could amount to a constitutional violation. But in Browder I, we held it was clearly established that Casaus's alleged conduct—speeding and running a red light for no law enforcement reason—could give rise to a substantive due process claim. . . Unwilling to let this argument go, Casaus points out that Browder I relied for this proposition on Lewis, where the Supreme Court 'expressly noted when a private person suffers a serious physical injury "due to a police officer's intentional misuse of his vehicle" a viable due process claim can arise.'. . Casaus suggests the term 'misuse' isn't defined and could include negligent conduct. Consequently, Casaus reasons, a reasonable officer couldn't be expected to know what type of misuse of a police vehicle could give rise to a constitutional claim. While this argument suffers from numerous flaws, . . . we need not expansively consider them. The bottom line is that we've already held that extant authority 'was more than enough to make clear to any reasonable officer in 2013 (the time of the accident) that the conduct alleged here could give rise to a claim under the Fourteenth Amendment.'. . That holding is both the law of the case and binding circuit precedent. Accordingly, we affirm the district court's denial of Casaus's motion for partial summary judgment.")

Muhammad v. Hall, 674 F. App'x 810, 813 (10th Cir. 2017) ("We agree with the district court. Assuming (without deciding) that Ms. Muhammad's reports and prior litigation qualified as constitutionally protected activity, the facts set forth in the second amended complaint show that Ms. Hall was ready and willing to hire Ms. Muhammad, but was prevented from doing so by her superior. Thus, the second amended complaint does not plausibly establish that Ms. Hall caused Ms. Muhammad to suffer an injury or that Ms. Hall was motivated to do so by retaliation. This court has not yet decided whether a subordinate employee can be liable for First Amendment retaliation when he or she merely acts at the direction of a superior who desires to retaliate. See Trant v. Oklahoma, 754 F.3d 1158, 1170 n.5 (10th Cir. 2014) (stating that '[w]e have never held that true subordinate employees may be liable for First Amendment retaliation claims' and declining to decide the issue). . . Further, the other circuits are not of one mind. Compare King v. Zamiara, 680 F.3d 686, 696 (6th Cir. 2012) ('Individuals who aid in the implementation of an adverse action at the instructions of a superior will be liable along with their superior if they knew or should have known that the adverse action was unlawful.'), with Johnson v. Louisiana, 369 F.3d 826, 831 (5th Cir. 2004) ('[O]nly final decision-makers may be held liable for First Amendment retaliation employment discrimination under § 1983.'). Because Ms. Muhammad did not establish the Worrell elements, we need not decide the question here. . . But this lack of precedent also means that the law is not clearly established, so that Ms. Hall would be entitled to the protection of qualified immunity on this claim.").

Big Cats of Serenity Springs, Inc. v. Rhodes, 843 F.3d 853, 864, 868-69 (10th Cir. 2016) ("If we were writing on a blank slate, we might be persuaded that Bivens is a relic of another era, and that Congress is perfectly capable of policing federal misconduct. But given our case law, Supreme Court precedent, and the factual context present here, we are constrained to find that Big Cats may proceed. Big Cats alleges a garden-variety constitutional violation (hardly a new context), the regulatory scheme is plainly unavailable to remedy the alleged misconduct, and no special factors place AWA inspectors outside Bivens. We therefore agree with the district court that Big Cats' Bivens claim may go forward unless the inspectors are entitled to qualified immunity. . . . Because we see no meaningful difference between the Colonnade inspection scheme and the one here, reasonable APHIS inspectors should have known they could not forcibly enter a business facility to perform an inspection, absent a warrant or an exception to the warrant requirement. Big Cats alleges facts showing that the agents cut the locks to conduct a non-emergency inspection where the regulations did not provide for forcible entry. The law is clearly established that inspection officials cannot enter business premises without a warrant in those circumstances.")

Keith v. Koerner, No. 15-3219, 2016 WL 7176605, at *12-13 (10th Cir. Dec. 9, 2016) ("[A]t the time of the constitutional violation in October 2007, it was clearly established that Ms. Keith not only had a right to be free from attack by Mr. Gallardo, she also had a constitutional right to expect reasonable protection from TCF officials such as Warden Koerner and a reasonable response when sexual misconduct occurred. And Ms. Keith presented sufficient evidence that these clearly established rights were violated. She presented evidence of inappropriate behavior by Mr. Gallardo, systemic problems within the maintenance program, and misconduct throughout the facility. To be sure, the misconduct fell along a broad spectrum, ranging from undue familiarity to confirmed sexual assault. But we must consider the totality of the circumstances, including all instances of employee misconduct. Moreover, we must consider the evidence of limited investigation and lax discipline for both undue familiarity and sexual misconduct, evidence which supports an inference that a culture existed where TCF employees faced no real consequences for misconduct. Importantly, the evidence includes the inadequate investigation of the sexual misconduct allegations against Officers Bohn and Templeton, and the slack discipline imposed on Officer Bohn. In other words, viewing the evidence as a whole, a reasonable jury could conclude that Warden Koerner created an atmosphere where policies were honored only in the breach, and, as a result, he failed to take reasonable measures to ensure inmates were safe from the risk of sexual misconduct by TCF employees. Because Ms. Keith possessed a clearly established constitutional right and presented evidence of a constitutional violation by Warden Koerner, summary judgment was inappropriate on qualified-immunity grounds.")

Gutierrez v. Cobos, 841 F.3d 895, 903-07 (10th Cir. 2016) ("As in Smith and Rojas, we conclude the district court properly granted summary judgment. "This isn't to say [Plaintiffs] lacked (or possessed) a meritorious case," but "clients ... are usually bound by their lawyers' actions—or, as here, inactions." Smith, 707 F.3d at 1162. Plaintiffs failed to carry their burden of showing that Deputy Maynes violated clearly established federal law because their counsel did not make any legal argument in the district court to rebut qualified immunity. We therefore affirm the district court's grant of summary judgment on Count III. . . .Plaintiffs dispute the hot-pursuit exception applies here. They argue Deputy Maynes had probable cause to suspect Ms. Gutierrez of only misdemeanor offenses. . . and they contend '[p]robable cause to arrest for a misdemeanor, by itself, does not justify warrantless entry into a home under the hot pursuit exception.'. . Further, they argue that, as of 2009, it was clearly established that 'a police officer could not enter a home without a warrant while in hot pursuit of a suspected misdemeanant.'. . We reject this argument because the law is unsettled even now as to whether an officer's hot pursuit of a misdemeanor suspect into a home violates the Fourth Amendment. In Stanton v. Sims, 134 S. Ct. 3 (2013) (per curiam), the Supreme Court explained that 'federal and state courts nationwide are sharply divided on the question whether an officer with probable cause to arrest a suspect for a misdemeanor may enter a home without a warrant while in hot pursuit of that suspect.'. . In reversing the Ninth Circuit's decision to deny qualified immunity to an officer on this issue, the Court emphasized that its earlier cases had not decided this question. . . And the Court pointedly declined to express any view on the constitutionality of warrantless entries made in hot pursuit of misdemeanor suspects. . . As for Tenth Circuit authority, Plaintiffs cite Mascorro v. Billings, 656 F.3d 1198 (10th Cir. 2011), and although they acknowledge a 2011 decision cannot serve as clearly established law in 2009, Plaintiffs nevertheless appear to argue that Mascorro's discussion of 'serious offenses' and its citation to an earlier case, Bledsoe v. Garcia, 742 F.2d 1237 (10th Cir. 1984), supply the clearly established law they need. . . We disagree. . . . Mascorro . . . requires a 'serious offense' along with other exigent circumstances, but Mascorro did not define 'serious offense' or establish that warrantless entries made in hot pursuit of all misdemeanor suspects necessarily violate the Fourth Amendment. . . . Neither Mascorro nor Bledsoe can do the work Plaintiffs need to meet their burden, and they cite no other hot-pursuit cases. We therefore affirm the district court's grant of summary judgment to Deputy Maynes on Count I because Plaintiffs failed to demonstrate that it was 'beyond debate,'. . . in 2009 that the Constitution prohibited a warrantless entry based on hot pursuit in the circumstances presented here. . . . Plaintiffs alleged that Deputy Maynes violated Ms. Flores's Fourth Amendment rights in two respects. First, in Count III, Plaintiffs alleged Deputy Maynes used excessive force against Ms. Flores. But, as already discussed, the district court granted summary judgment to Deputy Maynes on this claim, and on appeal Plaintiffs waived review of the excessive force claim as to Ms. Flores . . . . Second, in Count II, we understand Plaintiffs to allege that Deputy Maynes unreasonably seized Ms. Flores when he tased her because, irrespective of the amount of force used, he had no legal justification to seize her at all. They argue any seizure of Ms. Flores was unreasonable because she 'was not suspected of committing any crimes.'. . .On Count II, we must again affirm the grant of summary judgment. Plaintiffs failed to show the law was clearly established in 2009 that a tasing under these circumstances was a seizure, and we therefore need not address whether Deputy Maynes had the reasonable suspicion or probable cause necessary to seize Ms. Flores. . . . Plaintiffs do not cite authority that clearly establishes Ms. Flores was seized. Although they cite several taser cases, . . . these cases concerned excessive force claims and did not establish that the tasing of Ms. Flores necessarily constituted a seizure. Plaintiffs not only failed to provide legal authority showing it was clear in 2009 that a tasing under these circumstances was a seizure, they did not even provide general authority showing when other methods of police restraint constitute seizures in like circumstances. . . . At oral argument, Plaintiffs candidly acknowledged they did not cite a case establishing when use of a taser effects a seizure. . .We do not and need not decide here whether Ms. Flores was seized. Because Plaintiffs did not proffer clearly established authority that Ms. Flores was seized, they did not carry their burden to rebut qualified immunity on this illegal seizure claim.") Vasquez v. Lewis, 834 F.3d 1132, 1137-39 (10th Cir. 2016) ("Currently, twenty-five states permit marijuana use for medical purposes, with Colorado, Alaska, Oregon, Washington, and Washington, D.C. permitting some recreational use under state law. . . Thus, the Officer's reasoning would justify the search and seizure of the citizens of more than half of the states in our country. It is wholly improper to assume that an individual is more likely to be engaged in criminal conduct because of his state of residence, and thus any fact that would inculpate every resident of a state cannot support reasonable suspicion. Accordingly, it is time to abandon the pretense that state citizenship is a permissible basis upon which to justify the detention and search of out-of-state motorists, and time to stop the practice of detention of motorists for nothing more than an out-of-state license plate. And we cannot think of a scenario in which a combination of otherwise innocent factors becomes suspicious because the individual is from one of the aforementioned twenty-five states or the District of Columbia. Even under the totality of the circumstances, it is anachronistic to use state residence as a justification for the Officers' reasonable suspicion. Absent a demonstrated extraordinary circumstance, the continued use of state residency as a justification for the fact of or continuation of a stop is impermissible. . . .In sum, Vasquez's conduct does not create reasonable suspicion. What we have here is a driver traveling from Colorado to Maryland, on a major interstate; in an older car despite owning a newer car; with blankets and a pillow obscuring items in the back seat; who did not have items visible that an officer expected to see; and who was and continued to be nervous when pulled over by officers late at night. Such conduct does not raise an inference of reasonable suspicion. Thus, we conclude that the Officers violated Vasquez's Fourth Amendment rights in searching his car. . . We next turn to whether it was clearly established, at the time of the incident, that the Officers' actions violated Vasquez's constitutional rights. . . . We have previously held, under strikingly similar circumstances, that an officer—in fact, one of the officers before us now—did not have reasonable suspicion to further detain a defendant after issuing a speeding warning. . . . In both cases, Jimerson detained an individual because: he thought the car was unusual (Vasquez's older car and Wood's rented car); the car had 'unusual' but typical items in it (Vasquez's items covered by blankets and Wood's trash wrappers and maps); and the driver was nervous, leaving a drug source state, and passing through Kansas. The facts of these cases are almost indistinguishable. The district court erred in concluding that the differences between Wood and this case were significant. . . Wood 'place[s] the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate' and provides 'contours [that] are sufficiently clear that a reasonable offic[er] would understand that what he is doing violates that right.'. . Thus, at the time of the detention, it was clearly established that the Officers did not have reasonable suspicion based upon the articulated circumstances.")

Vasquez v. Lewis, 834 F.3d 1132, 1140-42 (10th Cir. Aug. 23, 2016) (Tymkovich, C.J., dissenting) ("This case presents a close call on reasonable suspicion. But the essence of qualified immunity is to give government officials protection in resolving close calls in reasonable ways. Because the majority employs a divide-and-conquer analysis specifically rejected by the Supreme Court and because Vasquez cannot identify clearly established law necessary to overcome qualified immunity, I respectfully dissent. . . .Vasquez points to no Supreme Court or Tenth Circuit case with sufficiently analogous facts. He and the majority rely on a case where we held the police lacked reasonable suspicion where the driver 'had fast food wrappers and other trash in his car, he had open maps out, he misidentified the place where he picked up his rental car, and he described somewhat expensive travel plans despite being temporarily employed.'. . I disagree that Wood clearly defines the absence of reasonable suspicion here, especially given the multiple times we have affirmed district court decisions finding reasonable suspicion while citing and distinguishing Wood. . . .Most notably, the two cases differ in the degree of unusual travel plans. The court in Wood declined to give any weight to Wood's 'unusual' travel plans—driving a rental car from Sacramento to Topeka. . . . Vasquez's travel plans are sufficiently distinct as to allow a reasonable officer to be more suspicious. Vasquez asserted he was moving, but no items in his car aligned with his story. Vasquez was driving in the middle of the night, apparently sleeping in his car. Vasquez was driving a newly-purchased twenty-year-old car, despite owning a new car, and had a flimsy, even implausible, explanation as to why. . . Because reasonable officers may differ regarding whether Vasquez's detention violated the Fourth Amendment, I would affirm the district court's finding of qualified immunity.")

Culver v. Armstrong, 832 F.3d 1213, 1217-20 (10th Cir. 2016) ("In this case, we exercise our discretion and proceed directly to the qualified immunity standard's second inquiry. We need not go so far as the district court and decide (1) whether Defendant had probable cause to arrest Plaintiff, i.e., whether a constitutional violation occurred. Rather, we need only decide (2) whether an officer in the situation Defendant confronted could have reasonably believed he had probable cause to arrest Plaintiff, i.e., whether the constitutional right was clearly established in the factual context of this case. . . . Plaintiff seriously misunderstands the nature of our qualified immunity inquiry. He tells us the law was clearly established at the time of his encounter with Defendant because a warrantless arrest absent probable cause has been unlawful from time immemorial. . . . Simply to say the law has long recognized one's right to be free from arrest absent probable cause casts way too high a level of generality over our inquiry. . . .That Defendant cited Plaintiff for public intoxication alone is inconsequential. We measure probable cause against an objective standard. That an officer may not have subjectively believed probable cause existed to arrest a suspect for a certain crime does not preclude the Government from justifying the suspect's arrest based on any crime an officer could objectively and reasonably have believed the suspect committed. . . .The facts of this case, when considered together with the Wyoming Supreme Court's construction of Wyo. Stat. Ann. § 6-5-204(a) in Tillett and Newton, arguably were sufficient to warrant a prudent officer in believing Plaintiff had committed or was committing the criminal offense of 'interfer[ing] with ... a peace officer while engaged in the lawful performance of his official duties' in violation of Wyoming law. And this means that at the time of his encounter with Defendant, the law was not clearly established in Plaintiff's favor, such that a reasonable officer would have known that seizing Plaintiff was against the law.")

Wright v. Collison, 651 F. App'x 745, 748-49 (10th Cir. 2016) ("We dispose of the claims against Sheriff Stanley on the clearly-established-law prong. '[W]e inquire whether, under [Mr. Wright's] version of the facts, then-extant clearly established law would have given Sheriff [Stanley] fair warning that he could be held liable for his conduct under a supervisory-liability theory for violating [Mr. Wright's due-process] rights.'. . .Although Sheriff Stanley argued that Mr. Wright had not presented evidence that the suggested remedies were feasible (and Mr. Wright has not disputed that a sheriff was required to take all prisoners brought for booking), the district court said it should not weigh the evidence on the matter. It concluded that Sheriff Stanley's supervisory conduct could be considered unconstitutional because it was clearly established that 'prison officials have a duty to protect prisoners from violence at the hands of other prisoners.'. . But the law governing a sheriff's obligations in these circumstances was not clearly established. The issue is whether case law existing as of August 2011 would alert any reasonable sheriff that he had a constitutional duty to reduce overcrowding by any of the measures suggested by Mr. Wright. But neither Mr. Wright nor the district court has cited such case law. Sheriff Stanley is entitled to qualified immunity.")

Wright v. Collison, 651 F. App'x 745, 750 (10th Cir. 2016) ("At the time of Mr. Wright's beating, the law was clearly settled that prison authorities had a constitutional obligation to act to protect a prisoner who had been plausibly threatened with serious harm by fellow inmates. . . A defendant is not entitled to qualified immunity simply because the threat and the surrounding circumstances in his or her case are not identical to those in any precedent. If the evidence reveals that the threat of serious injury is plausible, the duty to protect is clear. As for whether Officers Collison and Cannon acted with deliberate indifference, we believe that a reasonable juror could believe that their decision to put Mr. Wright in the cell, rather than keeping him in their custody while deciding where best to place him, showed not just negligence but the requisite recklessness. We therefore affirm the court's denial of the qualified-immunity motions by Officers Collison and Cannon.")

Columbian Fin. Corp. v. Stork, 811 F.3d 390, 393 (10th Cir. 2016) ("Columbian Financial alleged violation of a clearly established right to procedural due process when commission officials seized the bank's assets and placed them under FDIC receivership without a predeprivation hearing or a prompt postdeprivation hearing. In our view, Ms. Stork and Mr. Thull enjoy qualified immunity on this claim because the alleged conduct would not have violated a clearly established constitutional right. Thus, we agree with the district court's decision to dismiss the claims for damages against Ms. Stork and Mr. Thull.")

Sanchez v. Hartley, 810 F.3d 750, 760-61(10th Cir. 2016) ("[W]e conclude that the defendants should have realized that the knowing or reckless use of a false confession to institute legal process would violate a clearly established constitutional right. The purported uncertainty did not involve the constitutionality of the conduct; instead, the purported uncertainty involved whether the violation would

• constitute malicious prosecution or false imprisonment and

• involve the Fourth Amendment or the Fourteenth Amendment's right to procedural due process.

In our view, the defendants misread our precedents, which by 2009 had clearly recognized malicious-prosecution claims under the Fourth Amendment after the initiation of a legal process resulting in an unreasonable seizure. . . The district court properly held that Mr. Sanchez had adequately alleged the violation of a clearly established constitutional right. As a result, we uphold the denial of the defendants' motion to dismiss on the basis of qualified immunity.")

> See also Sanchez v. Hartley, No. 13-CV-1945-WJM-CBS, 2017 WL 4838738, at *22–23, *30 (D. Colo. Oct. 26, 2017) ("The Court is fully aware of the Supreme Court's recent emphasis on defining clearly established rights with specificity, see, e.g., White v. Pauly, 137 S. Ct. 548, 552 (2017), but the specificity Dickson seeks is absurd. Pierce established as of 2004 that a government official responsible for investigating a crime can be liable for malicious prosecution if that official knowingly or recklessly supplies false evidence against the accused. Dickson cannot reasonably claim that he needed further notice specifically that he could be liable even where other police officers, the prosecutor, the judge, etc., could have discovered for themselves that he introduced false evidence into the investigation. . . In short, no Defendant can claim qualified immunity in this case if there is a genuine dispute of fact over whether that Defendant subjectively formed the opinion, or recklessly disregarded a serious suspicion, that Sanchez's confession was false. Stated somewhat differently, is there enough evidence from which a reasonable jury could agree with Sanchez that a particular Defendant has been lying about his or her state of mind since 2009? The Court must keep this question in mind for the remainder of its analysis. The Court now turns to the elements of Sanchez's claim that Defendants have variously challenged. . . .Sanchez has shown he is prepared to introduce competent evidence of the six factual scenarios that the Tenth Circuit endorsed as sufficient to establish knowledge or reckless disregard. The Tenth Circuit has further established that knowledge or reckless disregard in these circumstances would strip an official of qualified immunity. . . Thus, the qualified immunity question as to each Defendant turns on genuine disputes of material fact that a jury must resolve, and this case must accordingly be set for trial.")

Henderson v. Glanz, 813 F.3d 938, 953 (10th Cir. 2015) ("Ms. Henderson has provided no authority clearly establishing that an officer violates the Eighth Amendment when that officer, as here with DO Thomas, has no subjective knowledge of risk of assault to an inmate, leaves to attend to a medical emergency, and does so believing the inmate is in a locked room under the guard of another officer. Moreover, although DO Thomas may have violated Jail policy by leaving the medical unit in the care of only DO Johnson, Ms. Henderson offers no authority to show this was a clearly established constitutional violation. Because Ms. Henderson has not carried her burden to show violation of a clearly established constitutional right, the district court erred in denying DO Thomas qualified immunity.") Callahan v. Unified Gov't of Wyandotte Cty., 806 F.3d 1022, 1027-30 (10th Cir. 2015) ("We have discretion to decide which prong of the qualified immunity analysis to address first. . . Because we conclude that Plaintiffs have not carried their burden in showing that the law was clearly established, it is unnecessary to address whether Defendants had probable cause. In this circuit, to show that a right is clearly established, the plaintiff must point to 'a Supreme Court or Tenth Circuit decision on point, or the clearly established weight of authority from other courts must have found the law to be as the plaintiff maintains.'. . The law is also clearly established if the conduct is so obviously improper that any reasonable officer would know it was illegal. . . Without such conduct, case, or consensus, we may not second-guess judgments of law enforcement with the benefit of hindsight. Plaintiffs and the district court confounded this inquiry by engaging in generic, overbroad, and conclusory analyses on the question of clearly established law. Both assert that the law was clearly established that an officer must have probable cause to make a warrantless arrest. Of course it was. But such a sweeping pronouncement of the law could not put Defendants on fair notice that their conduct was illegal. Presenting the issue so broadly is at odds with the Supreme Court's consistent admonishment 'not to define clearly established law at a high level of generality.'. . Though 'a case directly on point' is not required, 'existing precedent must have placed the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate.'. . The proper and properly-focused inquiry is whether the law was clearly established that an officer could not arrest an entire small group when he knows some unidentifiable members, if not all members, of that group have committed a crime. This question of probable cause in multi-suspect situations is far from beyond debate. Plaintiffs and the district court relied upon Ybarra v. Illinois to remind us that probable cause must be particularized to the individual who is searched or seized. . . Indeed, Ybarra may have served as a case on point if Maryland v. Pringle—which the district court appears to have overlooked in its clearly established law analysis—had never been decided. But Pringle makes the question debatable at the very least, and therefore precludes a finding that the law was clearly established. . . .Before we hold officers liable, we must ensure that they were fairly put on notice that their actions were unlawful. The contours of the law must be sufficiently drawn so that a reasonable officer knows when he is acting outside of those lines—the law must be clearly established. That was simply not the case here. Though Ybarra requires particularized probable cause, Pringle raises questions regarding how that requirement is satisfied in multi-suspect situations. The officer in Pringle knew a crime had been committed but could not identify the perpetrator. He was presented with three suspects, none of whom were independently suspected prior to the stop. Evidence of a "common enterprise" existed, and so the officer could reasonably infer that all present were involved in the crime. In such a scenario, the Supreme Court seemed satisfied that Ybarra's particularized probable cause requirement was met. . . But what if there were ten passengers, not three? What if the suspects were in a house, not a car? What if they were engaged in theft, not drug dealing? The Court did not establish a clear standard for applying Pringle beyond its specific facts. But neither are the facts of this case so distinct from Pringle that an officer could not reasonably assume it applied. Simply put, Pringle's application to this case is debatable. . .We cannot ask officers to make a legal determination—that law professors probably could not agree upon—without any guidance from the courts and then hold them liable for guessing incorrectly. Qualified immunity exists to prevent exactly that. Plaintiffs offer us no other case on point to establish that Defendants violated their clearly established rights by arresting the entire unit.")

Toler v. Troutt, 631 F. App'x 545, 547-48 (10th Cir. 2015) ("We disagree with the district court's framing of what had to be clearly established. In stating that deliberate indifference to an inmate's medical needs is a clearly established constitutional violation, . . . the district court's parameters were overly broad. If such a general statement of the constitutional violation that must be clearly established were sufficient, qualified immunity would almost never be granted. In this case, the proper inquiry is whether it was clearly established that Dr. Troutt's conduct—prescribing a medication in treating Mr. Toler's medical condition that was different than the medication recommended by consulting physicians—was deliberately indifferent to Mr. Toler's medical needs. Not only was this not clearly established, but the law was clearly established to the contrary. . . . Alloway, which the magistrate judge relied on to establish the predicate constitutional violation, offers no support for a clearly-established-law argument. In addition to being a single nonprecedential decision of a panel of our court, it is distinguishable from the situation here because it involved a complete denial of medication, as opposed to the substitution of alternative medicines as in this case, and applied a forgiving abuse of discretion standard to the granting of injunctive relief. . . . The bottom line is that Mr. Toler identifies no decision clearly establishing the proposition that exercising medical judgment in prescribing one course of treatment over another constitutes deliberate indifference to a serious medical need. He cannot identify such precedent because our controlling precedent clearly establishes the law to the contrary.")

Maresca v. Bernalillo Cnty., 804 F.3d 1301, 1310-12 (10th Cir. 2015) ("The arrests at issue here were not supported by probable cause because Fuentes lacked an objectively reasonable basis to believe that the Marescas' truck was stolen. An unreasonable mistake of fact cannot furnish probable cause. . . .Moreover, in determining whether there is probable cause, officers are charged with knowledge of any 'readily available exculpatory evidence' that they unreasonably fail to ascertain. . . .In this case, such readily available exculpatory evidence included the stolen-vehicle description already on Fuentes's computer screen before the arrest, which did not match the Marescas' truck in style, make, model, year, color, license plate number, or registration status; and the corrective information that dispatch presumably would have provided had Fuentes waited for verification, in accordance with her training. These steps were not taken. . . .The sole basis for arresting the Marescas was Fuentes's mistaken and unreasonable belief that their truck was stolen. That belief arose because Fuentes mistyped the Marescas' license plate number into her computer, thereby triggering the stolen vehicle report. We do not hold that a mere typing error in entering a license plate number would make it unreasonable for the officer to rely on the result of the database inquiry. In the often unpredictable and fast-paced context of traffic stops, we cannot require perfection—only reasonable behavior. Our conclusion that it was unreasonable for Fuentes to arrest the Marescas is based upon all the circumstances of the case and, in particular, Fuentes's failure to use readily available information—already on the computer screen in front of her and from the dispatcher—to verify that the Marescas' vehicle was reported stolen before arresting them. . . .Every application of the Fourth Amendment's reasonableness standard is fact-dependent, and the myriad circumstances officers confront do not lend themselves to bright-line rules. Thus, we do not suggest that an officer must always double-check a database hit or await confirmation from dispatch that the hit is accurate. There are undoubtedly circumstances that would justify a reasonably prudent officer's decision to bypass such steps. However, in the circumstances of this case, which did not suggest any likely threat to the arresting officers or any need for immediate action preventing verification, a reasonable officer would be expected to confirm the accuracy of her information in light of the disparity between the vehicle described on the stolen vehicle report and that driven by the Marescas. In fact, Fuentes could have detected her error by merely reading (or rereading) the computer screen right in front of her that reported the database result. . . . Therefore, the undisputed facts establish that Fuentes violated the Fourth Amendment when she arrested the Marescas without probable cause. And it was clearly established, at the time of this arrest, that an officer must have probable cause to arrest an individual, and the officer must reasonably investigate readily available exculpatory evidence 'before invoking the power of warrantless arrest and detention.'. . We therefore conclude that Fuentes is not entitled to qualified immunity on the Marescas' unlawful arrest claim, and, to the contrary, the Marescas are entitled to summary judgment against Deputy Fuentes on that claim.")

Maresca v. Bernalillo Cnty., 804 F.3d 1301, 1315-16 (10th Cir. 2015) ("[W]e reject the officers' argument that the Marescas' excessive force claim fails as a matter of law because any injuries the Marescas suffered were 'de minimis.' As an initial matter, it is not clear that a § 1983 excessive force claim raising excessive force issues beyond mere handcuff use would fail at the summary judgment stage if the plaintiff alleged and submitted evidence of only de minimis injury. . . . Generally, since Cortez, the Tenth Circuit has required a showing of more than de minimis injury only in Fourth Amendment excessive force cases based on handcuffing. . . Here, however, we need not decide whether the Marescas need to show more than de minimis injury because the Marescas presented evidence that each of them suffered psychological and emotional injury that significantly exceeded any de minimis requirement. . . .Under Cortez, we must consider whether the Marescas have an excessive force claim that is separate from and in addition to their unlawful arrest claim. The reasonableness of the force used during an arrest ordinarily involves questions of fact for the jury. . . That is the case here. Because there are genuine disputes of facts that are material to the question of whether the deputies used excessive force to arrest the Marescas—including whether the deputies pointed their weapons at members of the Maresca family and whether the deputies made nine-year-old M.M. lie on the highway with her hands behind her back—summary judgment is not appropriate on this claim for any party.")

[See also United States v. Rodella, 804 F.3d 1317, 1327-29 (10th Cir. 2015)([T]his court's post-Cortez cases reflect the view that the holding in Cortez is limited to handcuffing cases. . . Moreover, the Supreme Court's decision in Wilkins v. Gaddy . . . effectively rebuts any assertion that Cortez's 'de minimis injury' requirement is applicable beyond handcuffing-only cases. . . . Notably, the Eighth Circuit has applied Wilkins to Fourth Amendment excessive force claims generally, while carving out a narrow exception for handcuffing-only claims. Specifically, in Chambers v. Pennycook, 641 F.3d 898 (8th Cir.2011), the Eighth Circuit rejected the notion 'that evidence of only de minimis injury necessarily forecloses a claim of excessive force under the Fourth Amendment.'. . . The Eleventh Circuit has also applied the holding in Wilkins to an excessive force claim brought under the Fourth Amendment. . . . In light of the authorities discussed above, we reject the central premise of Rodella's argument, i.e., that there is a de minimis injury requirement for Fourth Amendment excessive force claims in cases which involve more than handcuffing. . . As a result, we conclude Rodella's challenge to the sufficiency of the evidence underlying his conviction for violating 18 U.S.C. § 242 is without merit.")]

Arden v. McIntosh, 622 F. App'x 707, 711 (10th Cir. 2015) ("[W]e examine the state of the law in August 2010 to determine whether it was clearly established that in serving a community caretaking function, a police officer was prohibited from removing firearms from the home of the suicidal homeowner. Deputy Bondell was faced with the following circumstances: a 911 emergency call reported a suicidal party/drug overdose; she arrived to find Mr. Arden in his bedroom, incoherent and unresponsive to the point of needing help to walk to the ambulance, so he could be taken to the hospital where he was placed on a mental health hold; she observed several firearms in plain sight, some in Mr. Arden's bedroom within his reach; and she was aware that Mr. Arden had attempted suicide just ten days earlier. We have found no authority clearly establishing that firearms may not constitutionally be removed from a residence under these circumstances. . . Therefore, we conclude that a reasonable officer could believe that she was authorized to remove the firearms temporarily. This is sufficient to establish Deputy Bondell's qualified-immunity defense as a matter of law.")

McInerney v. King, 791 F.3d 1224, 1238 (10th Cir. 2015) ("Although there is no Tenth Circuit or Supreme Court precedent dealing with the exact factual scenario we have here, 'there will almost never be a previously published opinion involving exactly the same circumstances,' and '[w]e cannot find qualified immunity wherever we have a new fact pattern.'. . To be sure, 'officials can still be on notice that their conduct violates established law even in novel factual circumstances.'. . Simply put, Officer King had fair notice that his conduct in entering Ms. McInerney's house without a warrant was unlawful. Moreover, based on the existing case law at the time of Officer King's warrantless entry—both those cases finding exigent circumstances and those holding such circumstances were not present—it was clearly established that the circumstances he confronted did not constitute exigent circumstances. Finally, it was clearly established that officers may not create exigent circumstances to justify their actions. Thus, the district court erred in granting Officer King summary judgment based on qualified immunity.")

Waugh v. Dow, 617 F. App'x 867, 878-79 (10th Cir. 2015) ("The law governing the constitutional assessment of Deputy Dow's conduct, as to both the state-created danger theory and the deliberate-indifference standard for actions taken with time for actual deliberation, was clearly established at the time of the operative events—as evident from the precedent cited throughout this decision. While none of this precedent involved a citizen-assistance situation like that here, '[a] previous decision need not be materially factually similar or identical to the present case; instead, the contours of the right must be sufficiently clear that a reasonable official would understand that what he is doing violates that right.'. . And this circuit has noted that 'the more obviously egregious the conduct in light of prevailing constitutional principles, the less specificity is required from prior case law to clearly establish the violation.'. . Applying these standards to the record developed thus far, we agree with the district court that a reasonable officer in Deputy Dow's position would have understood that his conduct—involving the creation of, and a conscience-shocking deliberate indifference to, a substantial risk of serious and immediate harm to Mr. Waugh—violated Mr. Waugh's constitutional rights.")

Browder v. City of Albuquerque, 787 F.3d 1076, 1082-83 (10th Cir. 2015) ("Having determined that, taking the facts alleged as true, Sergeant Casaus violated the constitutional rights of Ashley and Lindsay Browder one more question still remains: were those rights clearly established at the time at issue in this case such that 'every reasonable official would have understood that what he [was] doing' violated them? . . . Unless we can say so much, Sergeant Casaus rightly reminds us, he remains entitled to qualified immunity, whatever he may have done. In deciding the 'clearly established law' question this court employs a 'sliding scale' under which 'the more obviously egregious the conduct in light of prevailing constitutional principles, the less specificity is required from prior case law to clearly establish the violation.'. .. After all, some things are so obviously unlawful that they don't require detailed explanation and sometimes the most obviously unlawful things happen so rarely that a case on point is itself an unusual thing. Indeed, it would be remarkable if the most obviously unconstitutional conduct should be the most immune from liability only because it is so flagrantly unlawful that few dare its attempt. . . . Ours is perhaps a case along these lines. We've encountered plenty of cases involving officers responding to emergency calls who unintentionally cause traffic accidents. But we haven't encountered many cases involving deadly traffic accidents with officers speeding on their own business—presumably (hopefully) because such things happen rarely. Even so, the Supreme Court and this court have both spoken unmistakably to this situation. In Lewis, the officer was using his police car to respond to an emergency and the Court held he didn't violate the Constitution. But the Court also expressly noted when a private person suffers a serious physical injury '"due to a police officer's intentional misuse of his vehicle"' a viable due process claim can arise. . . As early as 1996, this court warned that an officer who kills a person while speeding at 60 miles an hour on surface streets absent any emergency and in violation of state law invites a Fourteenth Amendment claim. Williams v. City and County of Denver, 99 F.3d 1009 (10th Cir.1996), vacated, 140 F.3d 855 (10th Cir.1997). Though this court eventually vacated the Williams panel decision and remanded the case for reconsideration in light of Lewis, the result proved the same in the end precisely because Lewis itself made the same point the Williams panel had. See Williams v. City and County of Denver, Civ. Act. No. 90 N 1176, at 16 (D.Colo. Sept. 28, 1999). Indeed, in Green this court noted Williams's warning with approval. 574 F.3d at 1298 n. 5. And it proceeded to hold that, as of 2006, it was clearly established 'a police officer could be liable under the Fourteenth Amendment' for driving in a manner that exhibits 'a conscience-shocking deliberate indifference' to the lives of those around him. . . Taken collectively, we believe all this was more than enough to make clear to any reasonable officer in 2013 (the time of the accident) that the conduct alleged here could give rise to a claim under the Fourteenth Amendment.")

Quinn v. Young, 780 F.3d 998, 1007-14 (10th Cir. 2015) ("[T]he salient Fourth Amendment questions presented are (1) whether the Officers possessed probable cause to arrest Mr. Quinn and Ms. Gonzalez for committing larceny in this sting operation; and (2) whether extant clearly established law in July of 2010 would have placed a reasonable, similarly situated police officer on notice that no probable cause existed for the warrantless arrests in this sting operation—more specifically, that no probable cause existed that Mr. Quinn and Ms. Gonzalez intended to permanently deprive another of property. As our qualified-immunity jurisprudence permits us to do, we exercise our discretion to proceed straight to the latter question and resolve this claim on the clearly-established-law prong of our qualified-immunity test. . . That is, without deciding whether the Officers violated Plaintiffs' Fourth Amendment rights by effecting the arrests at issue, we conclude that any constitutional violation would not have been apparent based on the clearly established law existing at that time. It follows ineluctably that the Officers are entitled to qualified immunity on Plaintiffs' Fourth Amendment claim. . . .Our qualified-immunity conclusion is predicated upon the specific factual context of the Officers' conduct—a larceny sting operation—which presents a set of 'circumstance[s] unique in itself' under extant clearly established law. . . As we detail below, Plaintiffs have not directed us to any clearly established law involving such sting operations or an analogous law-enforcement setting, nor did the district court rely on any such law. This caselaw void is significant and ultimately determinative because we cannot confidently conclude that a reasonable officer engaged in a sting operation, such as the one here, would have had fair warning based on the holdings of non-sting cases regarding the quantum and quality of proof necessary to establish probable cause for a larceny offense, especially with respect to a suspect's specific intent—that is, the intent to permanently deprive another of property. We are not alone among the circuit courts in recognizing that sting operations present unique questions relating to suspect culpability, particularly regarding the question of intent. . . .Ultimately, having carefully reviewed the specific non-sting authorities that Plaintiffs identify here, and upon which the district court relied, we determine that the Officers would not have had fair warning that their arrests of Mr. Quinn and Ms. Gonzalez were lacking in probable cause, including regarding the intent element. In other words, in the context of the Tact Plan's backpack sting operation, we conclude that no constitutional violation would have been apparent to the Officers based on the extant clearly established law. As explained below, the district court's clearly-established-law analysis was conducted at too high a level of generality—both with respect to our caselaw and with respect to New Mexico law. And Plaintiffs' attempt to bolster the district court's analysis through further authorities is unavailing. In sum, because the district court did not rely upon, and Plaintiffs have not identified, any extant clearly established law that would have given the Officers fair warning that they lacked probable cause to effect arrests of Mr. Quinn and Ms. Gonzalez in their larceny sting operation, we conclude that the Officers are entitled to qualified immunity and the district court erred in finding to the contrary. . . .At bottom, by relying upon Keylon in such a general sense, the district court committed error. . . Keylon provides negligible support for the proposition that the law was clearly established that arresting Mr. Quinn and Ms. Gonzalez in this backpack sting operation would violate their Fourth Amendment rights to be free from unlawful seizure. . . . Accordingly, for the reasons stated herein, we must reject the district court's generalized clearly-established-law analysis. Putting a finer point on the matter, we cannot agree with the district court's conclusion that Keylon or Miller could 'be said to arguably place the [O]fficers on notice that their actions were unconstitutional[]'. . . when they arrested Mr. Quinn and Ms. Gonzalez in this larceny sting operation. . . . Even putting aside the truth that there are no cases in the extant clearly established law that precisely correspond to the facts of the instant case—involving a larceny sting operation—Plaintiffs cannot overcome the fact that there are no cases within the relevant temporal period that even slightly resemble these facts. And we know from our precedent that the correspondence must be 'substantial.'. . Therefore, Plaintiffs' reliance on Lawmaster as support for a generalized clearly-established-law analysis—of the type the district court undertook here—is unavailing.")

Seifert v. Unified Gov't of Wyandotte Cnty./Kansas City, 779 F.3d 1141, 1150-52, 1159 (10th Cir. 2015) ("We hold that under Lane v. Franks, 134 S.Ct. 2369 (2014), Plaintiff's testimony was protected by the First Amendment; that there is a triable issue of fact about whether Plaintiff was removed from investigations and had his commission revoked because of his testimony in Bowling; and that the Unified Government is potentially liable because the actions of Sheriff Ash represented municipal policy. On the other hand, we hold that Sheriff Ash and Undersheriff Roland are entitled to qualified immunity on Plaintiff's § 1983 claim because when they acted the law was not clearly established that Plaintiff's testimony was protected by the First Amendment. . . .[T]he Court [in Lane] did not hold that all testimony is protected. It did not address 'whether truthful sworn testimony would constitute citizen speech under Garcetti when given as part of a public employee's ordinary job duties.'. . . Here, Plaintiff's testimony was protected speech. It concerned his work but was not part of it. Although Defendants assert that testifying was a routine part of Plaintiff's job as a reserve deputy, they cite no supporting evidence. And the testimony he gave at the Bowling trial was nothing like the routine testimony of law-enforcement agents in support of criminal prosecutions. Plaintiff testified for a private party, not his public employer; in a civil lawsuit, not a criminal prosecution; against law-enforcement entities, not for them; and in compliance with a subpoena, not an employer mandate. His testimony was not among 'the type of activities that [he] was paid to do.'. . .Was the law clearly established in 2009 and 2010, when Ash and Roland committed the alleged misconduct, that testimony by a law-enforcement officer about matters observed while on duty could be protected by the First Amendment? We think not. The Supreme Court did not address the specific issue before Lane was handed down in June 2014, neither did we, and in 2010 other circuits were divided. [collecting cases] And Lane held that the individual defendant in that case was entitled to qualified immunity because 'no decision of this Court was sufficiently clear to cast doubt' on controlling lower-court precedent. . . We hold that Ash and Roland did not have 'reasonable warning that [their] conduct ... violated constitutional rights' and are therefore entitled to qualified immunity.")

Ragsdell v. Reg'l Hous. Alliance of La Plata Cnty., 603 F. App'x 653, 655-56 (10th Cir. 2015) ("Neither the Supreme Court nor our court has ever applied the Fourteenth Amendment's Equal Protection Clause to unequal treatment based on a failure to accommodate an employee's disability. To the contrary, both courts have suggested that the Equal Protection Clause does not apply in these circumstances. For example, the Supreme Court has observed that '[i]f special accommodations for the disabled are to be required, they have to come from positive law and not through the Equal Protection Clause.'. . And, we have rejected an equal protection claim by a disabled job applicant, reasoning that 'nothing in the United States Constitution requires the City to accommodate [the disabled applicant's] condition.'. . Other courts have reached similar conclusions. . .In the absence of precedential or widespread support, Ms. Lopez lacked notice of a constitutional requirement to accommodate Mr. Ragsdell's disability. . . .For the sake of argument, we may assume that Ms. Lopez's conduct was irrational and violated Mr. Ragsdell's right to equal protection. But, these assumptions would not preclude qualified immunity, for Mr. Ragsdell 'must do more than simply allege the violation of a general legal precept' such as the rational-basis standard for equal protection. . . He must also show that existing law would have alerted Ms. Lopez to the unlawfulness of her actions. . . .Against the existing legal backdrop, Ms. Lopez would have had little reason to expect a court to regard denial of accommodation to Mr. Ragsdell as unconstitutional under the rational-basis standard.")

McDonald v. Wise, 769 F.3d 1202, 1215 (10th Cir. 2014) ("Mayor Hancock. . .was in a position to provide due process, and the right to a name-clearing hearing in these circumstances is a clearly established constitutional right. See Wisconsin v. Constantineau, 400 U.S. 433, 437 (1971). ("Where a person's good name, reputation, honor, or integrity is at stake because of what the government is doing to him, notice and an opportunity to be heard are essential."). Thus, Mayor Hancock is not entitled to qualified immunity.")

Al-Turki v. Robinson, 762 F.3d 1188, 1195(10th Cir. 2014) ("We are unpersuaded by Defendant's [prison nurse] argument that facts unknown to her at the time of her conduct can now insulate her actions from liability because these then-unknown facts do not precisely align with the facts of previous Tenth Circuit cases. Taking the facts in the light most favorable to Plaintiff, Defendant violated clearly established law by choosing to ignore Plaintiff's repeated complaints of severe abdominal pain and requests for medical assistance, thus completely denying him any medical care 'although presented with recognizable symptoms which potentially create[d] a medical emergency.'")

Van De Weghe v. Chambers, 569 F. App'x 617, 619, 620 (10th Cir. 2014) ("[E]ven if the officers and prosecutor had probable cause for thinking him guilty of evidence tampering, Mr. Van De Weghe insists they didn't have probable cause to believe he'd committed some of the other crimes he was charged with—including theft and perjury. But even if we assume this is just as Mr. Van De Weghe alleges, he still faces a problem. He still has not identified any clearly established law suggesting that a claim for malicious prosecution lies when one charge is supported by probable cause but other simultaneous charges arising from the same set of facts are not. Put differently, he hasn't borne his burden of demonstrating that the law is clear that an individual may pursue a claim for malicious prosecution when at least some of the charges against him were supported by probable cause. The failure to carry that burden is fatal to his claim. . . Though this court bears no obligation to conjure arguments for the parties, as it happens our own research has turned up little that might've helped Mr. Van De Weghe carry his burden anyway. The Third Circuit has expressly held that probable cause to pursue one charge 'preclude[s] the plaintiff from proceeding with [a] malicious prosecution claim with respect to any' other charge brought simultaneously against her and arising from the same set of facts. . . True, at least two other circuits disagree, reasoning that 'when it comes to prosecution, the number and nature of the charges matters'—extra charges may impose extra costs and each may be attacked separately. . . But this court hasn't definitively spoken to the question either way. We have case law suggesting that a malicious prosecution claim arises when 'there was no probable cause to support the ... prosecution,' a formulation that at least arguably leans the Third Circuit's way. . . But in an unpublished decision we seem to have assumed something closer to the Second and Seventh Circuit's view, though without acknowledging or considering the split of authority. . . In these circumstances—without a binding opinion from the Supreme Court, with uncertain signals in this court, and with other courts unmistakably divided—it becomes difficult to conjure how Mr. Van De Weghe might have cleared the 'clearly established law' hurdle even if he had tried.")

Estate of Booker v. Gomez, 745 F.3d 405, 427-29, 434 (10th Cir. 2014) ("[A] reasonable jury could conclude that the Defendants' use of substantial pressure on Mr. Booker's back, a two-minute carotid hold on his neck, and a taser while Mr. Booker was subdued and struggling to breathe in a prone position demonstrated the requisite level of culpability for a due process violation. We hold that the Plaintiffs met their burden to show the Defendants violated Mr. Booker's constitutional rights because a reasonable jury could conclude the Defendants engaged in excessive force in violation of the Due Process Clause. . . .We have therefore 'adopted a sliding scale to determine when law is clearly established' in which '[t]he more obviously egregious the conduct in light of prevailing constitutional principles, the less specificity is required from prior case law to clearly establish the violation.'. . . Defendants assert that Plaintiffs cannot rely on Fourth Amendment case law to show that any violation of Mr. Booker's constitutional rights was clearly established. They argue the 'Plaintiffs failed to identify any due process case involving a use of force in a correctional setting that would have put any of the deputies on notice that the force that was used—either individually or collectively—was unconstitutional.'. .The Defendants are mistaken. As noted above, Fourth Amendment case law addressing whether force is 'reasonable' is relevant to the first due process excessive force factor: the relationship between the amount of force used and the need presented. . . Cases finding force to be unreasonable necessarily imply that the use of force was disproportionate to the need presented. Indeed, the Graham Fourth Amendment excessive force factors are consistent with the disproportionate force analysis under the Fourteenth Amendment: (1) the severity of the offense, (2) whether the subject posed an immediate threat to the safety of officers or others, and (3) whether the subject resists officers. . . .Here, despite any uncertainty about which constitutional amendment governs the Plaintiffs' excessive force claim, the 'legal norms' underlying the three—factor due process analysis-proportionality, injury, and motive—were clearly established at the time of Mr. Booker's death. Weigel (pressure on back), Casey (taser), and the weight of authority from other jurisdictions (neck restraint). . . put Defendants on notice that use of such force on a person who is not resisting and who is restrained in handcuffs is disproportionate. . . .Mr. Booker was handcuffed, prone on his stomach, and not resisting while much of the disproportionate use of force occurred. We conclude not only that a reasonable jury could find the Defendants violated Mr. Booker's due process right, but also that this right was clearly established at the time of their conduct. We therefore affirm the district court's denial of summary judgment on Plaintiffs' excessive force claim. . . .Here, the contours of the right are clearly established such that any reasonable officer in the Defendants' position (and with their training) would have known that failing to check Mr. Booker's vital signs, perform CPR, or seek medical care for three minutes when he was limp and unconscious as a result of the Defendants' use of force could violate the Constitution. . . .In light of the foregoing, any reasonable officer in the Defendants' position—having rendered Mr. Booker unconscious by use of force with at least a two-minute carotid neck hold, roughly 140 pounds of pressure on his back, and an eight-second taser stun—should have known that failing to check Mr. Booker's vitals or seek immediate medical attention could evince deliberate indifference to a serious medical need. Accordingly, the conduct alleged by the Plaintiffs—if proven at trial and accepted by the jury—violated clearly established law.")

Cillo v. City of Greenwood Village, 739 F.3d 451, 466 (10th Cir. 2013) ("We . . . hold that the individual defendants are not entitled to summary judgment based on the second requirement for § 1983 qualified immunity because Sgt. Cillo's First Amendment right to associate with a Union was a clearly established right at the time of his termination.")

Panagoulakos v. Yazzie, 741 F.3d 1126, 1129-31 (10th Cir. 2013) ("As the 'clearly established' prong resolves this case, we begin with it. . . .All roads lead to the same conclusion in this case; we need address only one. Even assuming arguendo that clearly established law demonstrated that Officer Yazzie no longer had probable cause to detain Panagoulakos after her review of the protective order. . . , Panagoulakos would still bear the burden of showing that clearly established law imposed a duty on Officer Yazzie to release him. In other words, Panagoulakos must show that, even though probable cause supported his initial arrest, clearly established law gave fair warning to Officer Yazzie that following her review of the protective order it was her constitutional duty to release him. There is only one standard to which the parties point that could impose such a duty. In Thompson v. Olson, the First Circuit held that 'following a legal warrantless arrest based on probable cause, an affirmative duty to release arises only if the arresting officer ascertains beyond a reasonable doubt that the suspicion (probable cause) which forms the basis for the privilege to arrest is unfounded.'. . For Panagoulakos to prevail, the Tenth Circuit must have adopted the Thompson standard, and it must be clearly established that the Thompson standard required his release under these facts. . . Quite to the contrary, we have never applied the Thompson standard in a published opinion. . . . Nor has the 'clearly established weight of authority from other courts' imposed a duty to release under these circumstances. . . A handful of other courts have adopted some form of the Thompson standard. [collecting cases] But those courts do not represent the 'clearly established weight of authority of other courts.'. . The majority of courts have never imposed such a duty, much less under circumstances similar enough to make 'the contours of the right ... sufficiently clear that a reasonable official' in Officer Yazzie's position would understand that her actions violated that right. . .In short, Officer Yazzie is entitled to qualified immunity because no clearly established law imposed on her a duty to release Panagoulakos following his lawful arrest after the traffic stop.") Panagoulakos v. Yazzie, No. 13–2003, 2013 WL 6698134, *5-*8 (10th Cir. Dec. 20, 2013)(Holloway, J., dissenting) ("It is clear, in my view, that there was no probable cause for Officer Yazzie to file a criminal complaint against Mr. Panagoulakos, the Plaintiff, after Officer Yazzie had reviewed the protective order which she quite mistakenly believed provided such probable cause. . .The majority's holding that the officer is entitled to qualified immunity for her mistake of law is contrary to our precedents, most notably Courtney v. Oklahoma, 722 F.3d 1216, 1223 (10th Cir.2013). Accordingly, I respectfully dissent. . . .Defendant Yazzie was tasked with taking Plaintiff to the police station and with examining the protective order to see if Plaintiff was in violation of the law for being in possession of a firearm. It is undisputed that the order did not forbid Plaintiff from possessing a firearm. Defendant Yazzie, however, did not know the law and erroneously believed that all persons subject to protective orders are forbidden from possessing firearms. Finding no affirmative statement in the protective order to authorize Plaintiff's firearm possession, Defendant Yazzie did not merely fail to release Plaintiff, she took affirmative steps to insure his continued detention, which led directly to his being held in jail for eleven days on the completely invalid charge of violation of a protective order by possession of a firearm. The majority duly notes this act by Officer Yazzie, but its analysis completely ignores it. . . . In another recent case, our court addressed this issue in a case with closely analogous facts and held that an officer should have been denied qualified immunity for the continued detention of the plaintiff when facts learned during the initial detention would have made it clear to a reasonable officer in the defendant's position that she 'lacked lawful authority to extend the stop.' Courtney v. Oklahoma, 722 F.3d 1216, 1223 (10th Cir.2013). . . .Similarly, here a reasonable officer would have known that there was no probable cause to believe that Mr. Panagoulakos had committed the offense of possession of a firearm in violation of a protective order. . . .The magistrate judge here went on to consider whether Officer Yazzie might nevertheless be entitled to qualified immunity, focusing on whether the officer's mistake of law was one that could be considered reasonable. . Because the requirements of both state and federal law were clear and unambiguous, and both had been established law 'for a long time,' the court held that the mistake was not reasonable. . . . Further, '[t]he face of the actual Order of Protection vitiated the probable cause that existed at the time of Plaintiff's initial arrest, and Plaintiff was therefore unlawfully detained.'. .For these reasons, I am convinced that the district court was correct not only in denying Officer Yazzie's motion for summary judgment based on qualified immunity, but also in granting partial summary judgment in favor of Mr. Panagoulakos on his claim that his Fourth Amendment rights were violated by Officer Yazzie.") Blackmon v. Sutton, 734 F.3d 1237, 1239-43 (10th Cir. 2013) ("The jurisprudential terrain between arrest and conviction remains today only partially charted. Over the last several decades, the Supreme Court has elaborated in considerable detail the standards of care prison administrators must satisfy to avoid inflicting 'cruel and unusual' punishment on convicted prisoners in violation of the Eighth Amendment. . . The Court has, as well, expounded on what force officers may and may not use to effect an arrest consistent with the Fourth Amendment and its prohibition of 'unreasonable searches and seizures.'. . But at least so far the Court has done comparatively little to clarify the standards of care due to those who find themselves between these stools—held by the government after arrest but before conviction at trial. . .We know that after the Fourth Amendment leaves off and before the Eighth Amendment picks up, the Fourteenth Amendment's due process guarantee offers detainees some protection while they remain in the government's custody awaiting trial. . . But we do not know where exactly the Fourth Amendment's protections against unreasonable searches and seizures end and the Fourteenth Amendment's due process detainee protections begin. Is it immediately after arrest? Or does the Fourth Amendment continue to apply, say, until arraignment? Neither do we know with certainty whether a single standard of care applies to all pretrial detainees—or whether different standards apply depending where the detainee stands in his progress through the criminal justice system. Might, for example, the accused enjoy more due process protection before a probable cause hearing than after? All these questions remain very much in play. . .The defendants make much of these lingering questions, going so far as to suggest they preclude the possibility they could have violated the clearly established legal right of any pretrial detainee in 1997, the time of the events in question in this lawsuit. But that argument proves a good deal too much. In the defendants' world, officials who engaged in sadistic and malicious conduct in 1997 would have violated the defined rights of convicted inmates, but the same conduct would not have violated the rights of pretrial detainees because of the comparative ambiguity surrounding their rights. Though the law of pretrial detention may not have been precise in all its particulars in 1997, though it may remain comparatively ambiguous today, things have never been quite as topsy turvy as that. Pretrial detainees are not men without countries, persons without any clearly defined legal rights. By 1997, it was beyond debate that a pretrial detainee enjoys at least the same constitutional protections as a convicted criminal. . . Conduct that violates the clearly established rights of convicts necessarily violates the clearly established rights of pretrial detainees. By 1997, it was clearly established as well that prison officials run afoul of the Eighth Amendment's prohibition of cruel and unusual punishments when they exhibit 'deliberate indifference' to a convicted inmate's 'serious medical needs.'. . It was clearly established, too, that Estelle's standard gives way to a more onerous test when 'guards use force to keep order.'. . In deference to the need to maintain order in a prison environment, liability will not attach in these particular circumstances unless the challenged force is 'applied ... maliciously and sadistically for the very purpose of causing harm.'. .Neither is this the end to what we know with certainty about the state of the law in 1997 regarding pretrial detainees. By then the Supreme Court had held that the Fourteenth Amendment's guarantee of due process prohibits any punishment of those awaiting trial. Punishment may be constitutionally acceptable for persons convicted of crimes—at least so long as it doesn't amount to 'cruel and unusual' punishment as defined by Estelle and Hudson. But punishment is never constitutionally permissible for presumptively innocent individuals awaiting trial. . . Where exactly do we draw the line between what does and doesn't constitute 'punishment'? Historically, the government has enjoyed the authority to detain until trial those defendants who pose a flight risk. And no doubt those who find themselves detained in this manner experience a great many restrictions on their liberty—restrictions many of us would regard as punishment in themselves. But when do these restrictions pass, as a matter of law, from constitutionally acceptable to constitutionally impermissible? Bell tells us the answer turns on the answers to two questions. First, we must ask whether an 'expressed intent to punish on the part of detention facility officials' exists. . . If so, liability may attach. If not, a plaintiff may still prove unconstitutional punishment by showing that the restriction in question bears no reasonable relationship to any legitimate governmental objective. . . .With these (clearly established) legal principles in hand, we can now turn to Mr. Blackmon's primary complaint: the many hours he spent shackled to the Pro–Straint chair. The district court analyzed his claim under Hudson's demanding Eighth Amendment 'malicious and sadistic' test for cruel and unusual punishments—and, even then, it found that Mr. Blackmon succeeded in stating a triable claim. We don't need to travel so far, however, to reach the same destination. While Hudson forbids a certain class of punishments for convicted prisoners (cruel and unusual ones), Bell forbids punishment altogether for pretrial detainees like Mr. Blackmon. And there is ample evidence in this case that the defendants at least sometimes used the Pro–Straint chair to punish their young charge. To be very clear, we do not doubt that the defendants often had a legitimate (nonpunitive) purpose for using the chair, or that its use was often reasonably related to that purpose. While awaiting trial—on charges of rape that were eventually thrown out—Mr. Blackmon was deeply distraught. The eleven-year-old attempted suicide and repeatedly banged his head dangerously against walls. No one disputes that the defendants had a legitimate interest in restraining him from these attempts at self-harm. Neither do we understand Mr. Blackmon to suggest that the use of restraints like the Pro–Straint chair is never a reasonable way to achieve this legitimate purpose. Indeed, we are confident Mr. Blackmon remains alive today thanks to the intervention of facility staff and they are due no small measure of credit for that. The problem is that the factual record in this case points in more than one direction. Much of it suggests that the defendants usually used the restraint chair in a reasonable effort to prevent Mr. Blackmon from killing or seriously injuring himself. But viewing the record in the light most favorable to Mr. Blackmon as we must, it also suggests the defendants sometimes shackled him with the express purpose of punishing him, in clear violation of Bell's first test. At least one defendant allegedly instructed others—openly—to use the chair as 'punishment.' The record evidence suggests the possibility, too, that on other occasions officials shackled Mr. Blackmon without any legitimate penological purpose, in clear violation of Bell's second test. Sometimes, Mr. Blackmon alleges, he was shackled to the chair for long stretches when there was no hint he posed a threat of harming himself or anyone else. Other times, Mr. Blackmon was placed in the chair because of a legitimate threat of self-harm but then arguably kept there for extensive periods after any threat of self-harm had dissipated. On one occasion, too, the boy was stripped out of his clothes and forced to wear a paper gown while restrained in the chair. All of this, says Mr. Blackmon's expert, left him with severe mental health problems. And in none of these instances does the record appear to reveal a legitimate penological reason for the defendants' actions. The district court held that facts like these preclude the entry of qualified immunity at summary judgment and we cannot disagree. By 1997, the defendants were on notice that they could not use restraints with the express purpose of punishing or without some legitimate penological purpose in mind. Yet the record here suggests they may have used restraints in both forbidden ways at least some of the time. In fact, as the district court observed, by 1997 this court had already held that the use of force without any 'disciplinary rationale' runs afoul even of the Eighth Amendment's protections for convicted prisoners. . . Under Bell and the Fourteenth Amendment, surely no less could have been said by then for pretrial detainees.")

Esparza v. Bowman, No. 12–2140, 2013 WL 1760932, *5 & n.5 (10th Cir. Apr. 25, 2013) ("Chief Bowman remains entitled to qualified immunity unless Mrs. Esparza can show that her First Amendment right to be free from retaliatory arrest was clearly established at the time of her arrest. We conclude she has. 'The freedom of individuals verbally to oppose or challenge police action without thereby risking arrest is one of the principal characteristics by which we distinguish a free nation from a police state.'. . Indeed, there can be no doubt that 'the First Amendment prohibits government officials from subjecting an individual to retaliatory actions, including criminal prosecutions, for speaking out.' Hartman v. Moore, 547 U.S. 250, 256 (2006). Consequently, accepting the facts as found by the district court on summary judgment, Mrs. Esparza has submitted sufficient evidence to overcome Chief Bowman's assertion of qualified immunity. Based on the evidence submitted thus far, we conclude that Mrs. Esparza has satisfied her burden to allege a violation of her clearly established right to be free from retaliatory arrest. . . . The Supreme Court's decision in Reichle v. Howards, 132 S.Ct. 2088, 2094 (2012) does not alter our analysis because the evidence before the district court was sufficient to show that Mrs. Esparza's arrest was not otherwise supported by probable cause.")

Schwartz v. Booker, 702 F.3d 573, 587, 588 (10th Cir. 2012) ("Booker and Peagler assert entitlement to qualified immunity because no Supreme Court or Tenth Circuit case has ever 'held that a government employee[,] who was not involved in limiting an individual's liberty, has a constitutional duty to protect that individual,' and, therefore, 'Ms. Booker [and] Ms. Peagler did not have "fair warning" that their alleged conduct could result in liability.'. . Booker and Peagler's argument broadly is one of 'the level of generality at which the constitutional right must be "clearly established."'. . They do not dispute that case law has clearly established that foster children have a Fourteenth Amendment constitutional right to be reasonably safe while in the State's custody. . . Rather, they contend that because no case law explicitly delineates their interpretation of the special-relationship exception—an argument contrary to their previous assertion that the case law explicitly requires such participation—the law was not clearly established. Booker and Peagler's argument is untenable. . . . Since 1985, case law in this circuit and the established weight of authority has clearly established that state officials could violate foster children's substantive due process rights if they knew of an asserted danger to a foster child or failed to exercise professional judgment with respect thereto. Booker and Peagler's singular argument regarding the construction of the special relationship doctrine does not negate that the contours of foster children's constitutional rights were clearly delineated in this circuit as well as other circuits. Accordingly, reasonable DHS officials overseeing the cases of foster children were on notice that such conduct would violate a foster child's constitutional right. . . Consequently, it was apparent, in light of pre-existing law, to a reasonable official in Booker's and Peagler's positions that failing to investigate the child abuse referrals and dismissing Chandler's case without investigation was an abdication of duty that would violate Chandler's substantive due process right to be reasonably safe from harm as a foster child.")

Stewart v. Beach, 701 F.3d 1322, 1330-33 (10th Cir. 2012) ("Stewart argues that Judge Robinson's definition of the constitutional right at issue was too narrow. Again, Judge Robinson's definition was 'whether it was clearly established that [Beach and Wilson] violated [Stewart's] First Amendment free exercise right by requiring him to cut his hair for security reasons.'. . Stewart asserts that the Supreme Court and the Tenth Circuit emphasize a broader standard and advocates for Judge Belot's definition: 'the right to reasonably exercise one's religion in prison[.]'. . . We disagree with Stewart's contention that a broader standard is necessary. . . . For example, in Reichle v. Howards, the Supreme Court recently reiterated its long-held view that 'the right allegedly violated must be established, not as a broad proposition, but in a particularized sense so that the contours of the right are clear to a reasonable official.'. . Applying this test to the free-speech claim before it, the Court concluded that 'the right in question is not the general right to be free from retaliation for one's speech, but the more specific right to be free from a retaliatory arrest that is otherwise supported by probable cause.'. .So too here, Judge Robinson's formulation of the First Amendment free-exercise right at issue is more specific—to be free from having to cut one's hair for prison security reasons based on one's sincerely held religious beliefs. We might add that cutting is apparently required because Stewart's hair could not be combed out. . .. The additional level of specificity is helpful to focus on case law that would have given Beach and Wilson 'reasonable warning that the conduct then at issue violated constitutional rights.'. . Contrary to Stewart's suggestion, a more precise definition does not lead to an overreliance on factual similarity but to a proper reliance. . . Applying Stewart's formulation would encompass a very broad spectrum of conduct directed at prisoners and result in the examination of cases that would not have given Beach and Wilson the requisite warning under the facts of this case. . . .In the absence of controlling authority, we may conclude that a constitutional right is clearly established if there is a 'robust consensus of cases of persuasive authority.'. . To that end, we have reviewed all of the extra-circuit cases Stewart has identified, as well as those cases Judge Robinson discussed in her order. We agree with Judge Robinson's conclusion that they cut both ways. In some cases, courts have found that prison regulations requiring haircuts or prohibiting beards violate a prisoner's free exercise rights. [collecting cases] In other cases, courts have found that such regulations did not offend the First Amendment because the regulations were reasonably related to legitimate penological interests. [collecting cases] . . . In sum, from our survey of these cases, the most we can say is that Beach and Wilson had warning that enforcement of a grooming policy that required hair be capable of being combed out (or cut) might violate Stewart's free exercise right if the policy was not reasonably related to legitimate penological interests. But we cannot say that it was clearly established that their enforcement of the KDOC policy violated Stewart's constitutional rights. We therefore conclude that Beach and Wilson are entitled to qualified immunity on Stewart's First Amendment claim.")

Brown v. Montoya, 662 F.3d 1152, 1171 (10th Cir. 2011) ("Although Gwinn did not specifically resolve what level of procedural protections are due before a person may be directed to register as a sex offender outside of prison, its holding that an inmate is entitled to certain minimal procedural protections before being classified as a sex offender in prison clearly establishes that directing a person to register as a sex offender outside of prison triggers at least that level of process. Mr. Brown alleges that Officer Montoya did not provide him with any process, much less the level of procedural protections owed to a prison inmate before being classified as a sex offender. Accepting as true Mr. Brown's allegation that Officer Montoya had no factual basis to believe that his victim was a minor, it should have been apparent to a reasonable officer that classifying Mr. Brown as a sex offender violated his clearly established procedural due process right.")

Koch v. City of Del City, 660 F.3d 1228, 1241, 1246 (10th Cir. 2011) ("For the purposes of our qualified immunity inquiry, therefore, the relevant question is this: Could a reasonable officer in Officer Beech's position have believed that Ms. Koch had a legal obligation to answer questions about Ms. Lance's whereabouts, such that refusal to answer would constitute obstruction? Put another way, was it clearly established that Ms. Koch had a right not to answer these questions? . . . . As discussed above, at the time of Ms. Koch's arrest, there was neither Supreme Court nor Tenth Circuit precedent, nor clearly established weight of authority from other courts, recognizing a right to refuse to respond to an officer's questions during a Terry stop. A reasonable officer could therefore believe that, under the circumstances of this case, Ms. Koch was required to answer questions regarding Ms. Lance's whereabouts, and that her refusal to do so constituted a willful delay or obstruction of an officer's duty. Accordingly, the district court did not err in granting summary judgment in favor of Officer Beech on his qualified-immunity defense to Ms. Koch's false-arrest claim. We emphasize that our conclusion is specific to the facts of this case. We hold only that in this case, a reasonable officer could believe that Ms. Koch had information regarding Ms. Lance's location, that under the circumstances Ms. Koch was required to convey this information, and thus that her refusal to do so constituted obstruction. Summary judgment was therefore appropriate.")

Mascorro v. Billings, 656 F.3d 1198, 1208, 1209 (10th Cir. 2011) ("The constitutional right was clearly established for purposes of qualified immunity if it would have been clear to a reasonable officer at the time the officers entered the Mascorro house that their entry was unlawful under the circumstances presented. . . For a right to be clearly established there must be Tenth Circuit or Supreme Court precedent close enough on point to make the unlawfulness of the officers' actions apparent. . . In the alternative, 'the clearly established weight of authority from other courts must have found the law to be as the plaintiff maintains.'. .Relevant precedent clearly prohibits police from routinely entering a person's home to effectuate a warrantless arrest (even if the officers have probable cause to believe the person committed a felony), . . . and a minor offense does not permit warrantless entry into the home except in the most extraordinary of circumstances. . . . Our focus must be on whether an exception to bedrock constitutional principles clearly exists. There appears to be no relevant precedent announcing such an exception in cases such as this. While hot pursuit of a felon might be sufficient, neither the Supreme Court nor this Court . . . has ever found an entry into a person's home permissible based merely on the pursuit of a misdemeanant; additional circumstances have always dictated the result. . . . No reasonable officer would have thought pursuit of a minor for a mere misdemeanor traffic offense constituted the sort of exigency permitting entry into a home without a warrant.")

Tiscareno v. Anderson, 639 F.3d 1016, 1022-24 (10th Cir. 2011), reh'g granted and opinion vacated in part by Tiscareno v. Anderson 2011 WL 1549519 (10th Cir. Apr. 26, 2011) (not reported) ("Beyond police officers, we have extended Brady obligations to other personnel in the police department who are actively involved in a particular investigation. . . We have never addressed the question of whether someone like Anderson, the head of a child services agency, is subject to Brady duties. Courts examining somewhat similar situations have generally refused to deem social workers or child services agencies subject to Brady's requirements. . . . Although in a criminal prosecution, intent of the prosecutor and the investigative team is irrelevant, in a § 1983 context, all that is clearly established is that an investigator must not knowingly or recklessly cause a Brady violation. . . Turning to the facts of this case, we must determine if Tiscareno has alleged facts sufficient to show that Anderson violated any clearly established principle. Even a generous reading of the case law fails to establish clearly that Anderson's actions amounted to a constitutional deprivation. Several factors distinguishing this case from our past precedent make this apparent. First, Tiscareno does not allege that Anderson or DCFS actually participated in the investigation. . . In cases in which courts have held investigative agents and agencies are subject to Brady, the agent or agency has been involved in the 'particular' investigation. . . But Tiscareno alleges that Anderson is liable for failing to investigate and for improperly delegating DCFS's investigative responsibility to the doctors with whom DCFS worked. Further, Tiscareno does not allege that Anderson acted recklessly or in bad faith. . . Absent a specific reckless or intentional act on Anderson's part to withhold exculpatory evidence from the prosecutor and thus the defendant, we may not conclude that he violated clearly established law. . . . Anderson is entitled to qualified immunity because he acted reasonably in light of clearly established law. It was not clearly established at any time during the investigation of N.M.'s abuse that a child services agency, under state reporting requirements, had a duty pursuant to Brady to unearth, or train others to reveal, exculpatory evidence.")

Clark v. Wilson, 625 F.3d 686, 691, 692 (10th Cir. 2010) ("Although Sandin addresses liberty interests, we interpret it to extend the same analysis to protected property interest inquiries. . . We have since applied the Sandin analysis beyond the context of prison conditions. In Steffey v. Orman, for example, we held that a prisoner did not have a protected property interest in a money order sent to him by another prisoner's mother. . . . Because it is based on the 'legitimate expectations' methodology expressly abrogated by Sandin, Gillihan's holding that prisoners have a protected property interest in the funds in their prison trust accounts is no longer good law and, hence, not 'clearly established' in this circuit. . . As in Steffey, we cannot find Clark had a protected property interest in the frozen funds without first applying the Sandin test to his claim. But we have never before addressed the question of whether freezing a prison account in response to a garnishment summons imposes an atypical and significant hardship on an inmate in relation to the ordinary incidents of prison life. Neither did any Supreme Court decision on point or clearly established authority from other circuits exist at the time of Wilson's actions. . . In sum, because neither the Supreme Court nor any court of appeals had applied Sandin's 'atypical and significant hardship' test to the freezing of a prison account by 2007, Wilson did not violate a clearly established constitutional right and hence is entitled to qualified immunity.")

Mink v. Knox, 613 F.3d 995, 1011 (10th Cir. 2010) ("[I]t was clearly established in this circuit that speech, such as parody and rhetorical hyperbole, which cannot reasonably be taken as stating actual fact, enjoys the full protection of the First Amendment and therefore cannot constitute the crime of criminal libel for purposes of a probable cause determination.").

Brammer-Hoelter v. Twin Peaks Charter Academy, 602 F.3d 1175, 1186, 1187 (10th Cir. 2010) ("More than twenty years ago, we held in Luethje that a school's interest in efficient functioning does not justify a broad ban on the discussion of 'school problems' with anyone except the school's principal. The minor differences between the ban in Luethje and the ban in this case–the distinction between 'school problems' and, in this case, the broader category of 'school matters,' and the addition in Luethje of one individual with whom these matters could be discussed–only make the unlawfulness of this ban more apparent. Although Defendants have asserted one governmental interest that the defendants in Luethje did not assert, an interest in deterring the disclosure of confidential student information, we are not persuaded that a reasonable official would conclude that this interest alone would justify almost the same restraint that we found unconstitutional in Luethje, particularly where this interest could easily be satisfied by a less sweeping restraint on speech. We therefore hold that Dr. Marlatt is not entitled to qualified immunity on the claim that her directives constituted an illegal prior restraint on speech.").

Brammer-Hoelter v. Twin Peaks Charter Academy, 602 F.3d 1175, 1186, 1188 (10th Cir. 2010) ("In this case, a reasonable administrator could have concluded from our preexisting precedent that each meeting by school employees to discuss various school-related matters would be considered a 'single instance of speech' and should be analyzed as a whole to determine whether it was protected by the First Amendment. Further, because the vast majority of speech that occurred at each meeting was unprotected speech relating to personal disputes with the school's administration and other matters of solely internal significance, . . . we conclude controlling precedent would not have put a reasonable administrator on notice that the speech at each meeting, viewed in the aggregate, was protected by the First Amendment. We therefore hold Dr. Marlatt is entitled to qualified immunity because the protected nature of Plaintiffs' speech was not clearly established at the time she took the alleged retaliatory actions.").

Benshoof v. Layton, No. 09-6044, 2009 WL 3438004, at *4 (10th Cir. Oct. 27, 2009) ("It does not appear that this court has considered a case in which an inmate was placed in a cell with hundreds of fire ants and, while suffering numerous painful stings, was refused a transfer and effective means of eradicating the pests for six days. But such a high degree of factual similarity is not required to conclude that the law was clearly established . . . .[T]his court held in Ramos v. Lamm that 'a state must provide an inmate with shelter which does not cause his degeneration or threaten his mental and physical well being.' 639 F.2d 559, 568 (10th Cir.1980). Thus, prison officials must provide living space with 'reasonably adequate ventilation, sanitation, bedding, hygienic materials, and utilities.' Id. Ramos is sufficient to put a reasonable officer on notice that it would be unconstitutional to house an inmate in a cell containing a swarm of stinging insects and to refuse the inmate either a transfer to another cell or any effective means of eradicating the infestation.").

Green v. Post, 574 F.3d 1294, 1305 n. 10 (10th Cir.2009) (discussing how unpublished opinions cannot constitute clearly established precedent in the Fourth and Tenth Circuits, but may be used in the Sixth and Ninth Circuits).

Cassady v. Goering, 567 F.3d 628, 643, 644 (10th Cir. 2009) (unlawfulness of overbroad, general search warrant, that authorized seizure of all possible evidence of any crime prohibited by law of any jurisdiction, and not just of suspected narcotics activity that caused officer to apply for search warrant, was clearly established at time, and no reasonable officer could have believed that warrant was valid)

Wilkins v. DeReyes, 528 F.3d 790, 805, 806 (10th Cir. 2008) ("Under the version of facts presented by Plaintiffs and accepted by the district court on summary judgment, the officers intentionally coerced matching false statements, and a reasonable officer should have known no probable cause existed without the statements. The officers are therefore not entitled to qualified immunity on the malicious prosecution claim.")

Price-Cornelison v. Brooks, 524 F.3d 1103, 1114, 1115 (10th Cir. 2008) ("Watson . . . was sufficient to put Brooks on notice that providing Price-Cornelison less police protection than other domestic violence victims because she is a lesbian would deprive her of equal protection of the law, at least in the absence of an articulated rational governmental reason for such discrimination. This is true even assuming that Brooks was acting according to a County policy of affording less police protection to lesbian victims of domestic violence, because Watson would have put Brooks on notice that applying such a policy could result in a constitutional violation. . . . In any event, Brooks does not argue here that he is entitled to qualified immunity because he was following official policy, nor does he attempt to argue that there is a rational basis for such a policy; instead, he denies that there is such a policy.")

Milligan-Hitt v. Board of Trustees of Sheridan County School Dist. No. 2, 523 F.3d 1219, 1233 (10th Cir. 2008) ("Plaintiffs acknowledge the import of our ruling in Jantz, but argue that it became clear as early as 1996 that 'government action that discriminates against homosexuals can[not] pass muster under the Equal Protection Clause merely because the community may disapprove of homosexuality," . . . when the Supreme Court decided Romer v. Evans, 517 U.S. 620 (1996). We do not think Romer's holding was so clear, and do not think it clearly overruled Jantz's holding that municipal officials may sometimes defer to community standards when discriminating on non-suspect grounds.").

Gruenwald v. Maddox, No. 07-3245, 2008 WL 1766890, at *5 (10th Cir. Apr. 17, 2008) ("The court is mindful that correctional officers have a significant responsibility in instituting order and discipline in our nation's prisons. Nevertheless, this responsibility does not come with the attendant right to use prisoners as personal punching bags. There no doubt may be times when prisoners agitate correctional officers or act in an otherwise unruly fashion. However, the Eighth Amendment demands that correctional officers respond to such incidents in a fashion that is appropriate for the situation. Because Gruenwald's allegations demonstrate that the officers violated his Eighth Amendment rights, the court has little difficulty in concluding that his claims clear the second hurdle of the qualified immunity analysis as well. . . . We conclude that it would have been clear to a reasonable officer in the shoes of Buchanan, Maddox, or Myers, that the malicious and sadistic infliction of pain exhibited in this case was unlawful.").

Archuleta v. Wagner, 523 F.3d 1278, 1285, 1286 (10th Cir. 2008) ("The arrest warrant gave Deputy Mandelko cause for processing and detaining Ms. Archuleta, but whether a strip search is permissible is a separate inquiry based on whether a detainee will be placed in the general prison population and whether the officer has reasonable suspicion that a detainee has hidden drugs, contraband, or weapons. . . In this case, Ms. Archuleta was not placed in the general prison population and a reasonable officer could not have suspected Ms. Archuleta of harboring a weapon. The arrest warrant itself could not provide Deputy Mandelko with reasonable suspicion for a strip search. . . . Ms. Archuleta thus has satisfied the first step of the two-step qualified-immunity inquiry by demonstrating that her constitutional rights were violated. We now consider whether those rights were clearly established at the time of the search. . . . [A] detainee who is not placed in the general prison population cannot be strip searched if the searching officer does not at least have reasonable suspicion that the detainee possesses concealed weapons, drugs, or contraband. As Ms. Archuleta alleges she never intermingled with the general prison population and we have held Deputy Mandelko could not have had reasonable suspicion that Ms. Archuleta possessed a weapon based upon the allegations in the complaint, we hold that the law in these circumstances was clearly established.").

Mecham v. Frazier, 500 F.3d 1200, 1206 (10th Cir. 2007) ("Mecham cites to an unpublished opinion from this circuit, Martinez v. New Mexico Dep't of Public Safety, 47 F. App'x 513 (10th Cir.2002), to support her position that, at the time of her arrest, the law was clear that the force used in her case was excessive. In Martinez, officers used mace on a suspect who had already been removed from her car and handcuffed. Under these specific circumstances, the court found the use of mace was not reasonable as a matter of law since the suspect was already out of the car, handcuffed, and no longer a danger to herself or others. The circumstances facing the officers in Mecham's case were quite different. The pepper spray here was used to subdue and remove an uncooperative and unresponsive, belligerent traffic violator from the car she still controlled, not to further incapacitate an already subdued suspect. An unpublished opinion, moreover, even if the facts were closer, provides little support for the notion that the law is clearly established on this point.")

Meyer v. Bd. of County Com'rs of Harper County, Oklahoma, 482 F.3d 1232, 1242 (10th Cir. 2007)("[W]e reject the district court's conclusion that evidence of deliberately submitting false information to influence Western State to admit the plaintiff is irrelevant to the qualified immunity analysis. We do not, of course, disagree with the general point that subjective good faith or bad faith of government actors is ordinarily irrelevant to the objective inquiry whether a reasonable officer would have realized that his conduct was unlawful. . . .But deliberate misconduct is something different. It is clearly relevant to the objective inquiry. In short, a reasonable officer would know that he cannot rely on deliberate falsehoods to establish probable cause to deprive a person of her liberty. We held in Snell v. Tunnell, 920 F.2d 673, 698-699 (10th Cir.1990), that officials who relied on false information to obtain a search warrant for the home of foster parents were not entitled to qualified immunity. The district court found Snell irrelevant because it did not involve a mental health detention. That focus was much too narrow. Instead, the broader principle is directly relevant here, and Snell is not the only case in which we have enunciated the broader principle. Put most directly, 'conduct [may be] so bad that case law is not needed to establish that this conduct cannot be lawful.' Vinyard v. Wilson, 311 F.3d 1340, 1350 (11th Cir.2002). We have cited that language with approval and have also noted that '[t]he more obviously egregious the conduct in light of prevailing constitutional principles, the less specificity is required from prior case law to clearly establish the violation.'").

Casey v. West Las Vegas ISD, 473 F.3d 1323, 1333, 1334 (10th Cir. 2007) ("It has long been established law in this circuit that when a public employee speaks as a citizen on matters of public concern to outside entities despite the absence of any job-related reason to do so, the employer may not take retaliatory action. . . . The advice Ms. Casey directed to the Board, as her supervisor, is no longer viable as a basis for a First Amendment retaliation claim after Garcetti. Ms. Casey's indirect report to federal Head Start officials likewise implicated responsibilities she held by virtue of her administration of a federally funded program and thus cannot supply the basis for a First Amendment claim. But we find different in character Ms. Casey's statements to the New Mexico Attorney General regarding alleged violations of the Open Meetings Act, violations that she had no apparent duty to cure or report and which were not subject to her control. We hold that, even after Garcetti, a claim based on these statements remains legally viable, and we remand the matter for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.").

Suasnavas v. Stover, 196 F. App'x 647, 2006 WL 2458678 , at *9 (10th Cir. 2006) ("Lastly, we also agree with the district court that the Luethjes have alleged sufficient facts to show a violation of a clearly established constitutional right. Although Trujillo did not explicitly recognize a right of familial association between grandparents and grandchildren, we made it clear in Trujillo that the right of familial association extends beyond the context of 'parent, spouse, or child,'. . . and we cited specific legal authority recognizing the importance of the familial relationship between grandparents and grandchildren . . . . In addition, Trujillo clearly recognized the paramount importance of the parent/child relationship, even if the child is an adult. We therefore believe that Trujillo gave defendants 'fair warning that their [alleged] conduct was unconstitutional.'").

Gomes v. Wood, 451 F.3d 1122, 1136, 1137 (10th Cir. 2006) ("As of April 2000, we had announced the emergency circumstances exception to the notice and hearing requirement, see Hollingsworth, 110 F.3d at 739, and we had had two occasions to apply that standard: in Hollingsworth itself and in Malik, 191 F.3d at 1315. However, in neither case was their any evidence whatsoever of an immediate threat. . . . Moreover, as of April 2000, we had not yet identified as an important consideration the time available to state officials to seek and obtain judicial authorization for the removal without jeopardizing the safety of the child. Nor had we held that the reasonable suspicion standard applies to the determination of whether emergency circumstances exist. Additionally, we had stated that 'considerable deference should be given to the judgment of responsible government officials in acting to protect children from perceived imminent danger or abuse.'. . In applying that case law to the circumstances confronted by the defendants, we conclude that 'officers of reasonable competence could disagree' as to whether there were emergency circumstances justifying the removal of Rebekah without a hearing.")

Hill v. Fleming, No. 04-1166, 2006 WL 856201, at *6 (10th Cir. Apr. 4, 2006) (not published) ("The law on whether certain adverse conditions of confinement create a liberty interest continues to develop, as evidenced by the Supreme Court's recent decision in Wilkinson v. Austin. In *Wilkinso*n, the Court determined the government created a liberty interest subject to procedural due process protections when officials placed an inmate indefinitely in a super-max prison where almost all human contact was prohibited and which made him ineligible for parole. . . Obviously, the duration and conditions of Mr. Hill's administrative detention were not as onerous, nor was the duration of his sentence affected. More importantly, for the purpose of determining qualified immunity, the prison officials in Mr. Hill's case did not have the benefit of the 2005 Wilkinson decision or any of its implications on prisoners' liberty interests at the time of Mr. Hill's confinement. Thus, based on the wealth of cases considered, the established law at the time of Mr. Hill's confinement would not put prison officials on notice of a liberty interest created by the type of deprivation presented, including the 399-day duration or other conditions of his confinement.").

Moore v. Guthrie, 438 F.3d 1036, 1042, 1043 (10th Cir. 2006) ("We have identified the 'classic' danger creation case to be Wood v. Ostrander, 879 F.2d 583 (9th Cir.1989), where police officers impounded the plaintiff's car and abandoned her in the middle of the night in a high crime area where she was raped. . . This is a narrow exception, . . . which applies only when a state actor 'affirmatively acts to create, or increases a plaintiff's vulnerability to, danger from private violence,' Currier v. Doran, 242 F.3d 905, 923 (10th Cir.2001). It does not apply when the injury occurs due to the action of another state actor. In the instant case, since Plaintiff was injured by a Simunition bullet fired by a fellow police officer and not a private third party, the danger creation doctrine is inapplicable. Plaintiff also contends that he has sufficiently pleaded a violation of his right to bodily integrity under the 'special relationship' doctrine. The special relationship doctrine is another exception to the general principle that government actors are not responsible for private acts of violence. . . As just discussed, however, because this case does not involve a private act of violence by a third party, this theory is also inapplicable to the facts alleged by Plaintiff. More importantly, we have specifically held that the special relationship doctrine is not triggered in an employment relationship, which is presumed consensual. . . Last, it should be noted that, even if either the danger creation or special relationship theory were applicable, it would not relieve Plaintiff of his duty to allege actions that shock the conscience. As required under the second prong to defeat a qualified immunity defense, Plaintiff argues that his violated right was clearly established at the time of his injury. . . . Although Plaintiff does not need to find a case with an identical factual situation, he still must show legal authority which makes it 'apparent' that 'in the light of pre-existing law' a reasonable official, in Chief Guthrie's position, would have known that having police officers wear riot helmets rather than Simunition face masks would violate their substantive due process right of bodily integrity. . . First, as discussed earlier, the Supreme Court has only recognized a right to bodily integrity under the Fourteenth Amendment in very limited circumstances, not including working in a safe environment. Second, courts have declined to find a violation of substantive due process in circumstances similar to, or more shocking than, that alleged by Plaintiff. Therefore, we cannot say that it was clearly established that Chief Guthrie and the City of Evans violated Plaintiff's constitutional right to bodily integrity by requiring him to wear his riot helmet during training.").

Maldonado v. City of Altus, 433 F.3d 1294, 1315, 1316 (10th Cir. 2006) ("We have already held that Plaintiffs have produced sufficient evidence to sustain claims that they were denied statutory rights under ' 1981 and constitutional equal protection. Accordingly, we must address whether the rights at issue had been clearly established by 2002, when the English-only policy was adopted. Assessing whether a right has been clearly established depends substantially upon the level of generality at which the relevant 'legal rule' is to be identified. For example, the right to due process of law is quite clearly established by the Due Process Clause, and thus there is a sense in which any action that violates that Clause (no matter how unclear it may be that the particular action is a violation) violates a clearly established right. Much the same could be said of any other constitutional or statutory violation. But if the test of 'clearly established law' were to be applied at this level of generality, it would bear no relationship to the 'objective legal reasonableness' that is the touchstone of Harlow. . . . Plaintiffs have not called to our attention, nor have we found, any cases from either the Supreme Court or this circuit establishing the right to speak a foreign language in the workplace. Further, published authority from other circuit courts suggests that English-only rules as applied to bilingual speakers are generally not discriminatory. . . Thus, we affirm the district court's grant of qualified immunity to the individual defendants on Plaintiffs' claims under 42 U.S.C. § 1983. The individual defendants are likewise entitled to qualified immunity on Plaintiffs' claims under 42 U.S.C. § 1981.").

Beedle v. Wilson, 422 F.3d 1059, 1071 (10th Cir. 2005) ("In sum, we do not agree with the district court's ruling that at the time the Hospital brought its suit for libel against Mr. Beedle, it was not clearly established that the Hospital was a governmental entity. Our cases had made clear that a public trust hospital in Oklahoma is deemed a governmental entity for § 1983 purposes. Similarly, as discussed in the previous section, ample authority had made clear that the filing of a malicious libel action by a governmental entity against a citizen contravenes the First Amendment of the United States Constitution. These two series of cases demonstrate it was clearly established when the Hospital filed its suit against Mr. Beedle that the Hospital was a governmental entity barred from bringing a malicious libel action. Consequently, the district court erred in dismissing the claims against Mr. Wilson and Mr. King in their individual capacities on qualified immunity grounds.").

Smith v. Wampler, Nos. 01-1455 / 01-1481, 2004 WL 1752377, at *4, *5 (10th Cir. Aug. 5, 2004) (unpublished) ("Here, Smith has not alleged Wampler pointed his firearm at him; instead he claims Wampler physically threatened to hit him with a pistol. Threatening to hit someone with a pistol is significantly different than pointing the pistol at them. However, Wampler did much more than merely hold his firearm in a fashion ready for immediate use. The physically threatening gesture was accompanied by racial epithets and threats to reincarcerate Smith while Smith was on the floor, handcuffed, and making no attempt to resist. Even though Smith's criminal activity was severe (drug possession and possible distribution), the totality of the circumstances demonstrates Wampler's conduct was not reasonable. . . . Having concluded Wampler's conduct constituted an unreasonable seizure in violation of the Fourth Amendment, we now turn to whether the law at that time, based on these facts, clearly established a constitutional violation. It did not. Smith urges a generalized analysis. He maintains the standard–that an officer's actions in executing a search must be reasonable–was clearly established in 1994, therefore, Wampler's conduct was unreasonable and he should have known it violated the constitution. That argument strikes us as a tautology and not particularly helpful because it tends to fuse or combine the separate qualified immunity inquiries: (1) whether there has been a violation of a specific constitutional right; and (2) whether the law clearly established the officer's conduct was impermissible at the time of the violation. . . . [T]he appropriate question here is whether a reasonable officer in late December 1994, under the facts described, would have known the physical and psychological intimidation of Smith was unreasonable, and thus unconstitutional. Wampler would not have reasonably known his conduct violated the Fourth Amendment. In Holland, we adopted other circuits' rationale in holding that pointing a firearm at a non-threatening, non-resistant person during a search was excessive force in violation of the Fourth Amendment. . . . In Holland and the cases cited therein, the conduct considered was the threat of deadly harm, a significantly different threat than the force in this case. Smith claims Wampler threatened to hit him with a pistol, not that Wampler pointed the firearm at him. This difference, standing alone, is sufficient to show that the law established in 1994 was unclear and not universally applicable to the factual situation here.").

Pierce v. Gilchrist, 359 F.3d 1279, 1297-1300 (10th Cir. 2004) ("In response to the district court's denial of qualified immunity, Dr. Gilchrist argues that there are no 'actual specific details of concrete cases which indicate' that her alleged conduct violated clearly established law. . . Dr. Gilchrist points to factual differences between her alleged conduct and the facts of the cases cited by the district court and concludes that these distinctions prevent those cases from clearly establishing the law as applied to her conduct. . . . Dr. Gilchrist overemphasizes the degree of specificity required of prior cases to clearly establish the law. . . . Hope thus shifted the qualified immunity analysis from a scavenger hunt for prior cases with precisely the same facts toward the more relevant inquiry of whether the law put officials on fair notice that the described conduct was unconstitutional. . . . The degree of specificity required from prior case law depends in part on the character of the challenged conduct. The more obviously egregious the conduct in light of prevailing constitutional principles, the less specificity is required from prior case law to clearly establish the violation. . . . No one could doubt that the prohibition on falsification or omission of evidence, knowingly or with reckless disregard for the truth, was firmly established as of 1986, in the context of information supplied to support a warrant for arrest. . . . We have no doubt that, in light of these holdings, an official in Dr. Gilchrist's position in 1986 had "fair warning" that the deliberate or reckless falsification or omission of evidence was a constitutional violation–even though the arrest had already occurred. There is no moral, constitutional, common law, or common sense difference between providing phony evidence in support of an arrest and providing phony evidence in support of continued confinement and prosecution. Even if there were no case directly on point imposing liability on officials whose falsification of evidence occurred at the post-arrest stage, an official in Dr. Gilchrist's position could not have labored under any misapprehension that the knowing or reckless falsification and omission of evidence was objectively reasonable. Qualified immunity is designed to protect public officials who act in good faith, on the basis of objectively reasonable understandings of the law at the time of their actions, from personal liability on account of later-announced, evolving constitutional norms. Dr. Gilchrist's alleged misconduct did not stem from a miscalculation of her constitutional duties, nor was it undertaken in furtherance of legitimate public purposes that went awry. Rather, as alleged, Dr. Gilchrist engaged in a deliberate attempt to ensure the prosecution and conviction of an innocent man. Such conduct, if it can be proven at trial, violated Mr. Pierce's constitutional rights with 'obvious clarity.'").

SH.A., as Parent and Next Friend of J.A. v. Tucumcari Municipal Schools, 321 F.3d 1285, 1288, 1289 (10th Cir. 2003) ("Mr. Dominguez concedes, as he must, that the law holding that sexual harassment is actionable as an equal protection violation has long been clearly established. . . However, he maintains that the court erred in drawing upon the standard set out in employment cases and applying it to teacher-on- student sexual harassment. He argues that he is entitled to qualified immunity because no opinion by the Tenth Circuit had announced the standard applicable to this particular type of sexual harassment, nor had the weight of authority from other circuits done so. Mr. Dominguez' argument asks this court to require exact correspondence between prior cases and the instant facts. Significantly, we rejected a similar argument made by the defendants in Johnson, the case relied upon by the district court. . . . . In light of Johnson and Franklin, we conclude that a reasonable teacher would have known in the spring of 1997 that sexual harassment which gives rise to a violation of equal protection in the employment context will also do so in the teacher-on-student context.").

Johnson v. Martin, 195 F.3d 1208, 1218 (10th Cir. 1999) ("We therefore conclude that, during the period of time that Mr. Martin allegedly engaged in the acts of sexual harassment, a public official's reasonable application of the prevailing law would lead him to conclude that to abuse any one of a number of kinds of authority for purpose of one's own sexual gratification (including the abuse of the authority granted a municipal building inspector) would violate the Equal Protection Clause. . . .As a result, the defendants are not entitled to qualified immunity on the grounds that the law regarding sexual harassment of nonemployees was not clearly established during the period from October 1994 to January 1996.").

Murrell v. School District No. 1, Denver, 186 F.3d 1238, 1251 (10th Cir. 1999) ("The School District asserts the individual defendants are entitled to qualified immunity because there has previously been no case holding an individual school employee liable for sexual harassment under the Fourteenth Amendment. This argument carries the concept of 'clearly established' to an extreme we decline to adopt. We have never said that there must be a case presenting the exact fact situation at hand in order to give parties notice of what constitutes actionable conduct. Rather, we require parties to make reasonable applications of the prevailing law to their own circumstances. . . .[T]he fact that we have said other supervisory municipal employees may be held liable under the Fourteenth Amendment for deliberate indifference to the discriminatory conduct of third parties was sufficient to make apparent the unlawfulness of such deliberate indifference by a school employee exercising supervisory authority over students.").

Sutton v. Utah State School for the Deaf and Blind, 173 F.3d 1226, 1241 (10th Cir. 1999) ("We are satisfied that a supervisor's liability for failing to train subordinates or to implement a policy to prevent a sexual assault on a severely disabled child like James was clearly established as of February 1995 when the instant assault occurred. Applying the Supreme Court's reasoning in Canton, the Tenth Circuit has clearly established that a supervisor may be individually liable for failing to adopt or implement policy or training of subordinates to prevent deprivations of constitutional rights. . . While here the assault was committed by a private actor, the Tenth Circuit has also clearly established that a state official may be liable for the violence committed by private actors under the 'danger-creation' doctrine. . . . Therefore, the contours of the right, which plaintiff-appellant asserts was violated, were clearly established as of February 1995 and the defense of qualified immunity fails.").

Lee v. Waters, No. 98-6160, 1999 WL 41949 (10th Cir. Feb. 5, 1999) (unpublished) ("The Prison Litigation Reform Act, 42 U.S.C. § 1997e, requires the court to dismiss any § 1983 claim regarding prison conditions if it 'seeks monetary relief from a defendant who is immune from such relief.' 42 U.S.C. § 1997e(c)(1). In this case, the defense of qualified immunity, asserted by the defendants in their motion to dismiss, or in the alternative for summary judgment, supports the district court's entry of judgment in favor of the defendants. . . . Because there is no clearly established right to attend a disciplinary hearing when such competing concerns exist, i.e., no unqualified right to attend a disciplinary hearing, by conducting the hearings in Mr. Lee's absence after he refused to comply with this condition, prison officials did not violate a clearly established due process right of which a reasonable person would have known.").

Brasko v. City of Caney, Nos. 97-3027, 97-3047, 97-3029, 97-3046, 1997 WL 759093, at *3 (10th Cir. Dec. 9, 1997) (unpublished) ("It is clearly established in this circuit that '[a]n allegation of sexual harassment is actionable under § 1983 as a violation of the Equal Protection Clause.'. . . As the city council members point out, however, there is no factually identical authority establishing the liability of an individual city council member for failure to act on a city employee's claim of sexual discrimination. Thus, the question we must decide is whether it was clearly established 'within a sufficiently analogous factual setting' that the individual city council members would have understood that their failure to act would violate plaintiffs' rights. . . . This law, permitting liability of an employer for an employee's alleged wrongdoing, was not sufficiently particularized for individual city council members to be held liable for the alleged sexual harassment by an employee, who apparently does not work directly for the city council. No authority indicates an appropriate response by individual city council members to an employee's complaints to them of sexual harassment. Thus, it was not clear that reasonable city council members with knowledge of the alleged harassment would understand that their individual failure to act could violate plaintiffs' equal protection rights such that they could be held individually liable.").

Clanton v. Cooper, 129 F.3d 1147, 1156-57 (10th Cir. 1997) ("[W]e do not think that Clanton's failure to cite cases clearly establishing the unconstitutionality of knowingly transmitting false information over the NCIC computer system is fatal to her claim. The purpose of the requirement that the law be 'clearly established' before its violation may waive qualified immunity is to insure that officials may reasonably anticipate when their actions might give rise to liability for damages. . . . In the present case, we think that the knowing transmission of false statements over the NCIC computer system, in order to cause unjustifiedly extended incarceration of a suspect, is sufficiently similar to the swearing knowingly (or with reckless disregard of the truth) of false information in a warrant application, proscribed by Franks v. Delaware, 438 U.S. 154, 98 S.Ct. 2674, 57 L.Ed.2d 667 (1978), that a reasonable official would have known it to be illegal. We therefore hold that Cooper enjoyed no qualified immunity to engage in such activity.").

Lawmaster v. Ward, 125 F.3d 1341, 1351 (10th Cir. 1997) ("While qualified immunity was meant to protect officials performing discretionary duties, it should not present an insurmountable obstacle to plaintiffs seeking to vindicate their constitutional rights. Therefore, while it is true there are no decisions expressly prohibiting officers from leaving guns submerged in water or prohibiting officers from leaving cigar or cigarette ashes in a home, it is well established the Fourth Amendment is in place to preserve the sanctity of the home to the largest extent consistent with the reasonable exercise of law enforcement duties. . . Concomitantly, the law is well established officers may only engage in conduct that reasonably furthers the purpose for which they are in the home; those officers who execute a warrant in an unreasonable manner violate the Constitution.

. . . We conclude no reasonable officer in the position of the Agents in this case would believe that leaving a gun submerged in a water bowl, and leaving ashes in bedding was reasonably necessary to the search for a machine gun and parts.").

Foote v. Spiegel, 118 F.3d 1416, 1425, 1426 (10th Cir. 1997) ("It was clearly established in May 1994 that a strip search of a person arrested for driving while under the influence of drugs but not placed in the general jail population is not justified in the absence of reasonable suspicion that the arrestee has drugs or weapons hidden on his or her person. . . . The belief that Foote had drugs hidden in a body cavity because she was suspected of driving while under the influence of drugs, when no drugs had been found in her vehicle, on her passenger, or in a pat-down search, was unreasonable.").

Mick v. Brewer, 76 F.3d 1127, 1136 (10th Cir. 1996) ("Our observation in [United States v.] Merkley that '[t]here are no hard-and-fast rules regarding the reasonableness of force used during investigatory stops,' Merkley, 988 F.2d at 1063, merely illustrates that the excessive force inquiry requires the court to determine 'whether the officers' actions are "objectively reasonable" in light of the facts and circumstances confronting them.' [citing Graham] We therefore conclude the district court did not err by ruling that the law governing excessive force cases was clearly established on June 18, 1992.").

Liebson v. New Mexico Corrections Dep't, 73 F.3d 274, 278 (10th Cir. 1996) ("While the facts of this case need not precisely mirror those addressed in prior precedent in order to preclude qualified immunity , [cite omitted], Ms. Liebson must demonstrate a substantial correspondence between the conduct in question and prior law establishing that defendants' actions were clearly prohibited. [cite omitted] Under the facts alleged by Ms. Liebson, we cannot conclude that extension of the custodial relationships addressed in DeShaney to Ms. Liebson's employment situation was sufficiently obvious to put a reasonable state official on notice that his conduct was constitutionally proscribed.").

Trigalet v. Young, 54 F.3d 645, 648 (10th Cir. 1995) ("We have found no opinion decided between 1986 and 1990 holding that an officer could be held liable under section 1983 to a third party injured as a result of police chasing a fleeing felon.").

Pallotino v. City of Rio Rancho, 31 F.3d 1023, 1026 (10th Cir. 1994) ("[T]here is no clearly established right, under the Fifth Amendment, to ignore police requests at the scene of an investigation for a witness's name and address.").

Lankford v. City of Hobart, 27 F.3d 477, 480 (10th Cir. 1994) ("[W]e hold that on May 22, 1989, with this court's opinion in Starrett v. Wadley, . . . it became clearly established that sexual harassment can constitute a violation of equal protection and give rise to an action under 42 U.S.C. 1983.").

Calhoun v. Gaines, 982 F.2d 1470, 1475 (10th Cir. 1992) ("The standard adopted by this Court requires that there be some, but not necessarily precise, factual correspondence between previous cases and the case at bar. . . In essence, this standard requires officials to know well developed legal principles and to relate and apply them to analogous factual situations.").
